START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

May 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE
NUMBER:
BSO-56-031

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library
(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14x

FILM STOCK:

Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35mm x 30.5m · 100ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 01/1996
1461-0334-024-07
CAT 840 3594
29-10

REEL 31

Volumes 55-56

BSO, Pops
1932-1933
to BSO
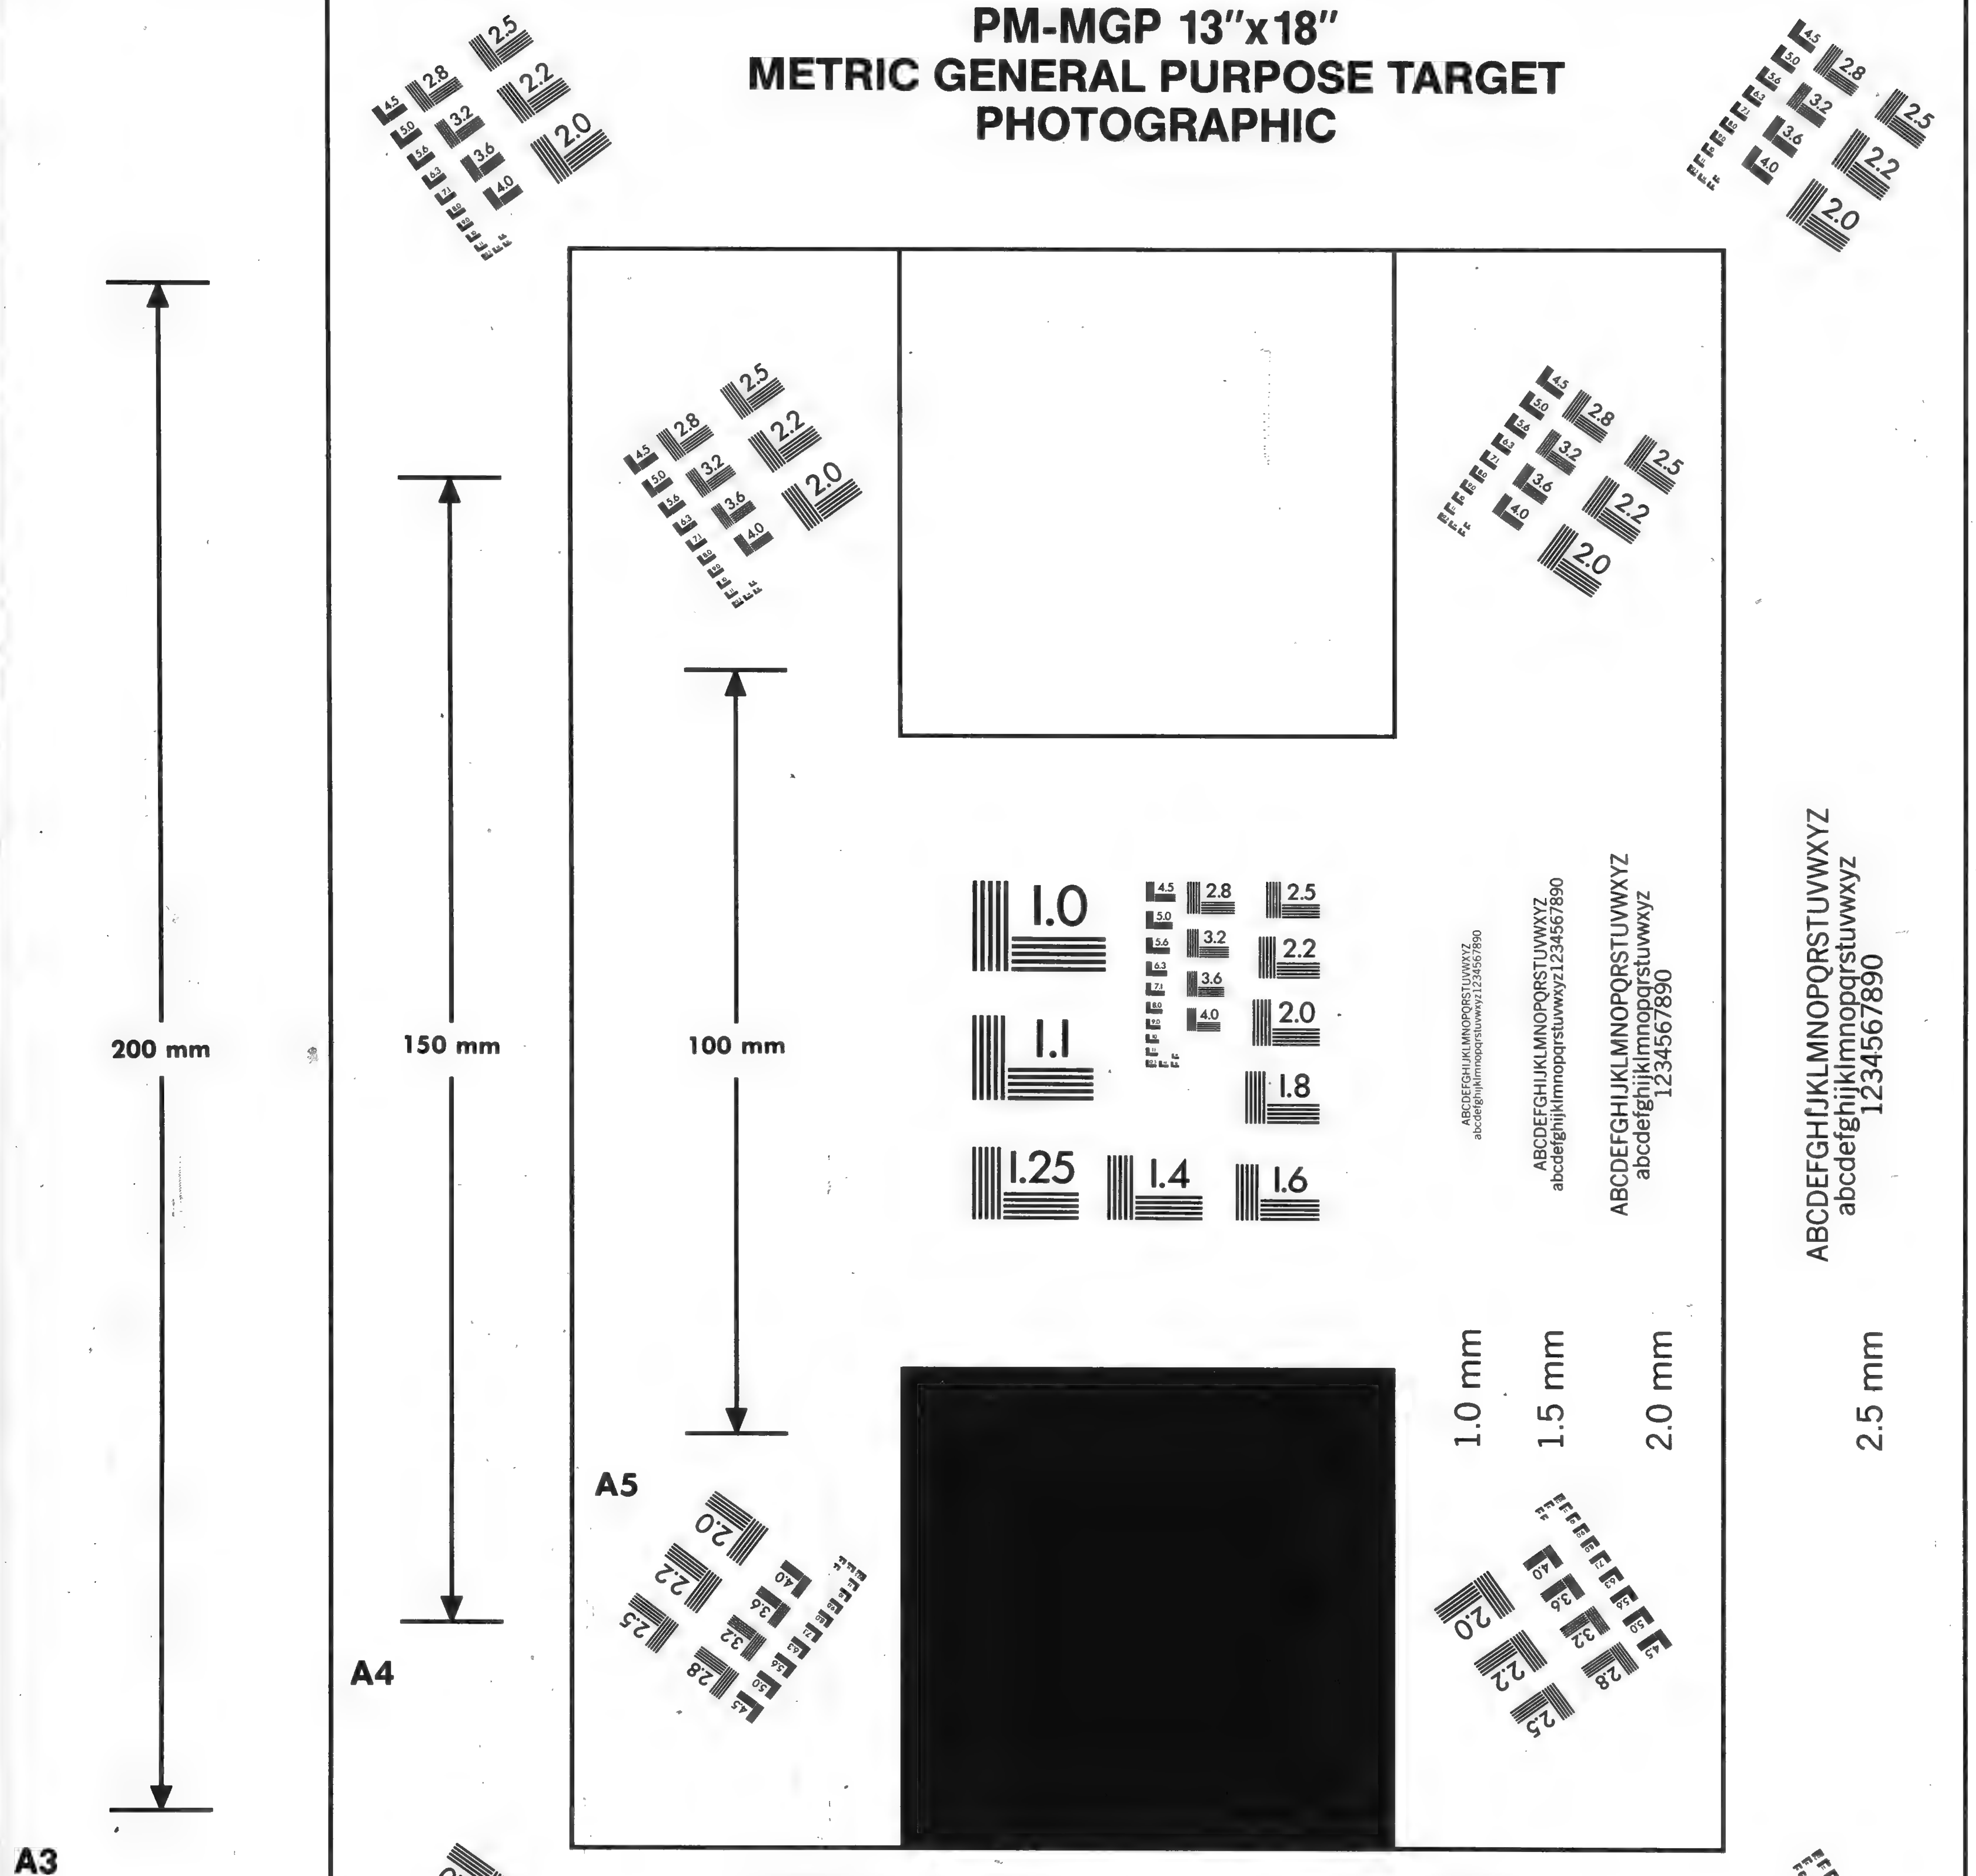
1933-1934

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
7.1
4.0
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

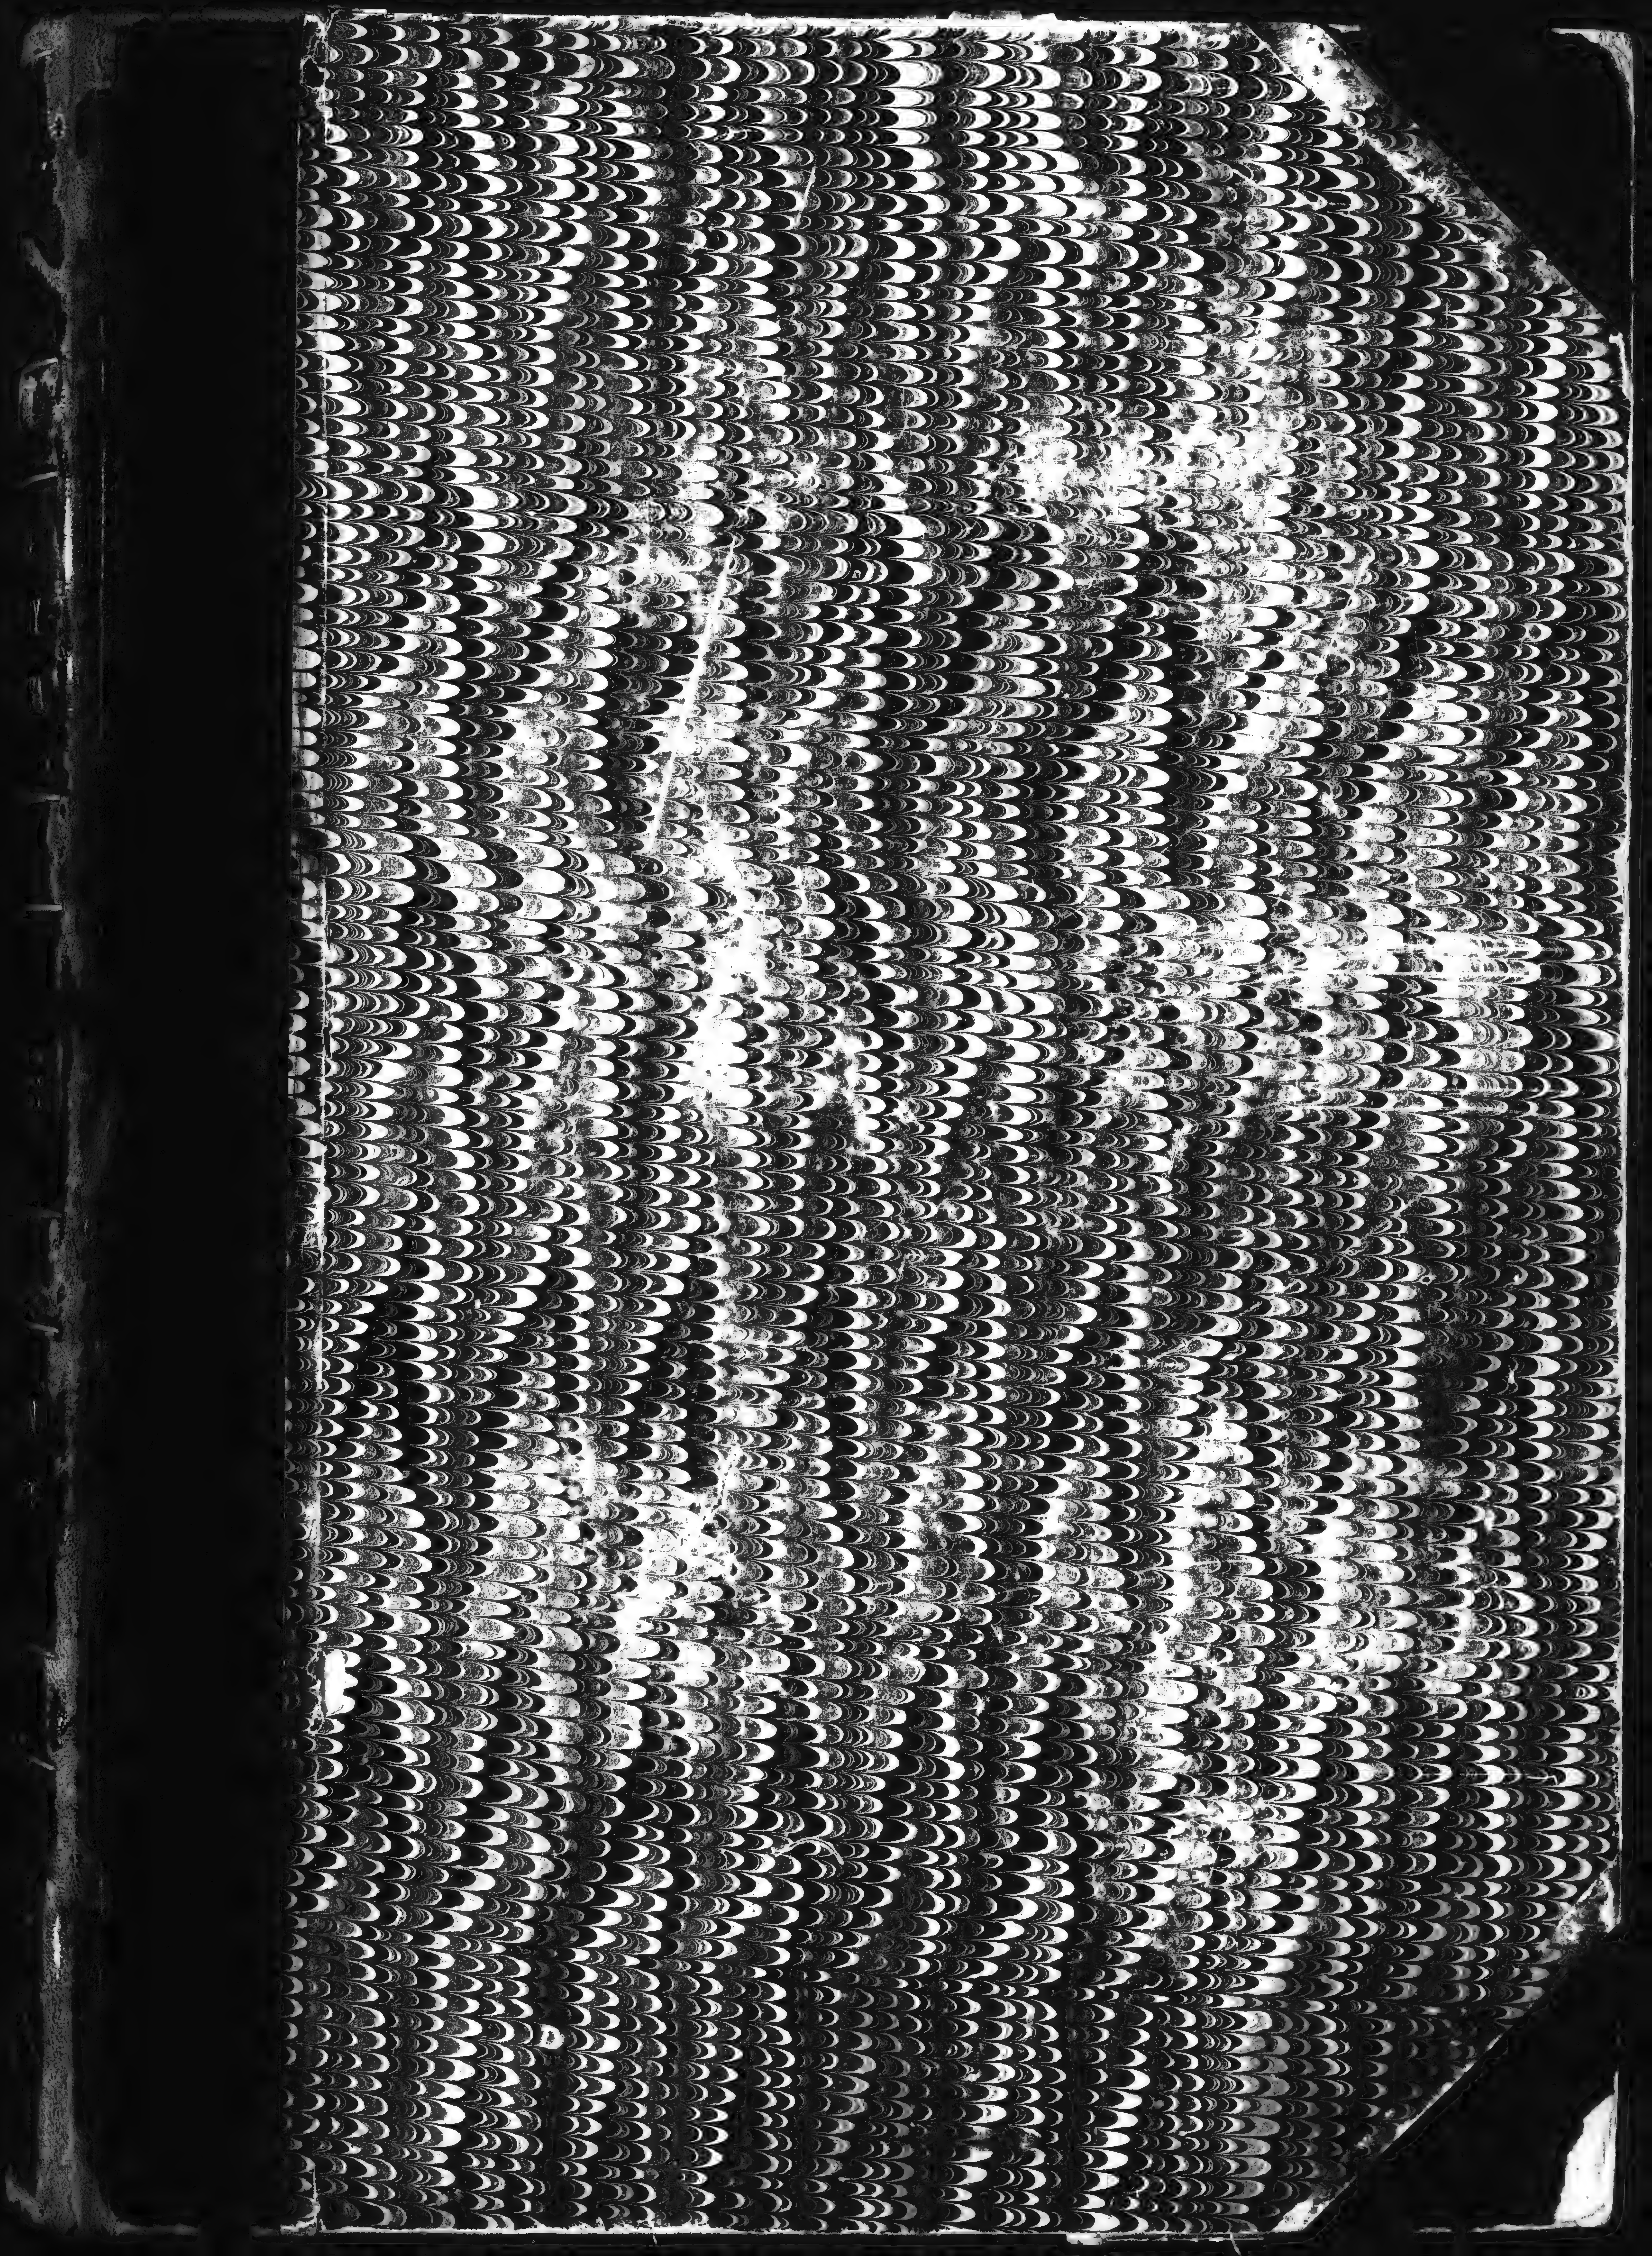
VOLUME 55

BSO
Pops

1932 - 1933



THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald Tribune

SEP 4 - 1932

Schmitt and Tansman Due Here This Season

Composers to Introduce Some of Their Latest Works

Florent Schmitt, French composer, and Alexander Tansman, Polish composer, will be heard in this country during the coming season as soloists with orchestra and in chamber music concerts of their own works, according to an announcement from the Bogue-Laberge concert management.

Mr. Schmitt will appear in November with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, giving the first performance of his new "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra. After a New York apearance under the auspices of the League of Composers he will make a transcontinental tour, taking part in chamber music programs under the auspices of Pro-Musica and other societies. He will then go to Honolulu and return to Europe via the Orient, making a Tokio appearance on the way.

Mr. Tansman, who will be here in January and February, will play his latest piano concerto with the Cleveland and St. Louis Symphonies. He will also appear as a pianist in chamber music programs in various cities under the auspices of Pro-Musica and other groups.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

SEP 4 1932

Famous Composers to Tour America

A number of American cities will be visited this coming season by Florent Schmidtt, French composer, and Alexander Tansman, Polish composer, it has been announced in New York.

Mr. Schmidtt will appear in November with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, giving the first performance of his new "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra.

In New York he will appear under auspices of the League of Composers and later make a transcontinental tour under auspices of Pro Musica and other societies. He will travel as far as Honolulu.

Mr. Tansman will arrive in January. He will remain for two months. Already he is scheduled to appear with the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra under Nicolai Sokoloff and the St. Louis Symphony under Golshmann.

Faculty Increased

Bendetson Netzorg has announced the addition of Lillian Mumford, Emily Godard Hauss, Marjorie Nievens and Aileen Kengey Kirby to the faculty of the Netzorg School of Piano, 5415 Cass Ave.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

SEP 4 1932

FLORENT SCHMITT and Alexander Tansman, European composers, will visit this country during the coming season and will play their own works with orchestra and chamber music ensembles. Mr. Schmitt will appear in November with the Boston Symphony in the first performance of his new "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra. In New York he will appear under the auspices of the League of Composers, and then will make a transcontinental tour, appearing in chamber music concerts under the auspices of Pro-Musica.

Mr. Tansman will be here in January and February. He will apear with the Cleveland and St. Louis Symphony Orchestras. He will present his latest piano concerto in Cleveland.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

SEP 12 1932

John Alden Carpenter Busy Practicing Piano to Play at Premiere of New Opus

Composer Must Reaccustom Himself to Keys Before Boston Symphony Presents His Newest Work This Fall.

BY PENELOPE.

FURTHER reports on John Alden Carpenter's few months will be spent assiduously.

Mr. Carpenter has not played th when Koussevitsky, conductor of th the newest Carpenter opus—"Episod pleted a few days ago—he requested chromatics and fifths. He wants M the piano when the Boston Symph fall in celebration of the fiftieth anni

Most of the Carpenter friends ar now enjoying quiet chuckles over thoughts of the composer strugglin with his own brilliant phrases. Something else to think about is what Mr Stock and the Chicago Symphony will do about the "Episodes." Mr. Stock presented the Carpenter "Song of Faith" the first time it was produced, last winter at Orchestra Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CALGARY, ALBERTA
HERALD

SEP 17 1932

BRITISH MUSIC NEEDS DICTATOR DIRECTOR AFFIRMS

By CYRIL FONTAINBLEAU
(Central Press Canadian)

LONDON, Sept. 17.—"British music needs a dictator," says Sir Henry Wood, famous conductor.

"The British musical public needs kicking," adds Sir Henry.

Sir Henry Wood has just begun his thirty-eighth season of promenade concerts at the Queen's Hall, London. For 50 years Sir Henry has worked for music in England, but he still despairs of making England musical.

"The British attitude towards music is infuriating," he says. "We are ashamed to mention it.

"If I go into a barber's shop in Philadelphia the barber will say to me: 'Have you heard our symphony orchestra?'

"It is the finest in the world.

"The same thing happens in Milan. But in London, no.

"Yet we British have music in us. And I have stuck to it. Two years after the war I had an offer from America to go to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It would have made my fortune and would have enhanced my fame. But I chose to stick to it here.

"I was a fool.

"If I had my time again, I would not be such a fool.

"This is what is wrong with English music. With the nineteenth century came the industrial revolution, and this country of island pioneers sets itself to making machines, conquering nature and making money.

"Music took a back seat in the debutante's boudoir.

"The other thing wrong with music in Britain is that it is in a state of chaos. We need a man of business, we need a dictator of music.

"We want a man who will recognize talent and encourage it—who will nurse young musicians and produce them and will store up genius for the future.

"English people appreciate music—but they have to be kicked into it."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

SEP 19 1932

Serge Prokofieff Will Be Heard in Orchestras

Returning to this country next season after an absence of two years, Serge Prokofieff will be heard with several leading orchestras. His new piano concerto will be introduced to America by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer as soloist on December 30 and 31 in Symphony Hall, Boston; on January 5 and 7 in Carnegie Hall, New York, and on January 6 in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

SEP 17 1932

Noted Conduct
re Next Season

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor Lauds American Music

Koussevitzky Prepares for Season With Boston Symphony

ASKED for his impression of the musical situation in America, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, promptly replied: "A phenomenal musical renaissance."

Reporters cornered the renowned maestro in Paris during his sojourn abroad this summer. He enthusiastically cited, as specific instances of American musical development, "her 20 superb orchestras" and "her promising young composers such as Aaron Copeland, Roger Sessions and John Alden Carpenter."

STRAVINSKY INFLUENCE

Jazz will no longer threaten American music, said the conductor, outside of the realm of the dance, tho he declares Stravinsky to be the most outstanding influence in the New World of music today.

"Americans," said Koussevitzky, "have the active temperament. Everyone is active, especially the women. They have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense business developments. The American seems to have an extraordinary genius for growth."

NINTH SEASON

Koussevitzky is preparing his ninth consecutive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony. He will arrive in Boston several weeks before the opening of the 52d season at Symphony Hall on Oct. 7. His summer was spent mostly in the Austrian Alps, but he attended the various European musical festivals in his search for significant new music, and conducted the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra at which he played that lovely Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloe" suite.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Washington for a single concert next winter as one of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's attractions in Constitution Hall. While no announcement has been made, it is believed that he will introduce a number of new orchestral works to the American public this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~DISPATCH~~
Independent

SEP 2

I'M TELLING YOU

By
GEORGE ROSEN

OUR MOTTO — PROSPERITY IS JUST AROUND THE CIRCLE

* * *

Alexander Woollcott, dean of American raconteurs and, truth to say, a Twentieth Century Dickens, ent often reminded us in the pub-

* * *

It happened back in the days, when Karl Muck, the esteemed conductor now residing in Germany, was wielding the baton for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Muck, though internationally celebrated for his flawless performances, was not, however, the only attraction, for audiences also flocked to the society's concerts to hear it's concertmeister, Ivan Sirovich. A finer soloist could not be heard, back in those pre-war days. Audiences were enraptured by his beautiful violin playing. But lo, Sirovich had the most ungodly habit of making the ugliest faces conceivable as he played. His face would assume the most grotesque form and naturally, these facial distortions distracted from the beauty of his playing. It was Muck, himself who, mustering up sufficient courage one day, had a talk with Sirovich to learn why he made such grimaces.

"Tell me, he said to the celebrated concertmeister, "Don't you like the audiences in Boston?"

"Why, of course, I do," was the reply. "Boston audiences are the most attentive to be found anywhere."

"Then perhaps you do not enjoy working with the other men in the orchestra?" Muck asked.

"But Mr. Muck, you are mistaken," Sirovich replied. "They are all cooperating with me and make me very comfortable."

"Then," said Muck "perhaps you

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, M
MERCURY

SEP 30 1932

MORNING GOSSIP

FLOWER-FAITH.

Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived Wednesday on the Ile de France after a summer spent in Europe, revealed that he was planning to present his usual quota of symphonic novelties this season, his ninth as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The new American works Mr. Koussevitzky will present are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, the composer of the opera "Emperor Jones," which the Metropolitan will present for the first time this season; two compositions, as yet unnamed, by John Alden Carpenter, and one untitled work by Roger Sessions.

The list of new compositions by European composers is also a distinguished one. It includes "Rebus," by the youthful Russian composer, Igor Markevitch, who is living in Paris; Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante, for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist; Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerte, with Profofieff as the soloist; a suite for full orchestra by Alban Berg; a new piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by a young British composer, who has been highly praised by critics abroad. The Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs will assist in the performance of Walton's work.

One of the most important novelties of the season will be Sibelius's Eighth symphony which Mr. Koussevitzky expects to present in February. This work was announced for performance last season, but Sibelius did not have the manuscript completed.

Mr. Koussevitzky said that it was a positive duty of American orchestras to perform American compositions, for the playing of native compositions was the strongest stimulus to the development of an indigenous art.

Except for a guest appearance with the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra in June, Mr. Koussevitzky did not conduct while abroad. He divided his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest.

NEW BEDFORD, MA
MERCURY

SEP 27 1932

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

(Philip Hale in The Boston Herald.)

The program of the first symphony concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra (October seventh) will comprise compositions by Brahms, Strauss, Wagner, and possibly another piece. An orthodox program which undoubtedly will delight the audience.

The prospectus of the Philadelphia orchestra for this, its thirty-third season, contains a significant paragraph:

"The programs for the season will be almost entirely devoted to the acknowledged masterpieces of orchestral music. The directors of the association feel that in times such as the present the audiences prefer music which they know and love and that performances of debatable music should be postponed until a more suitable time. With these opinions the conductors fully concur."

It is also stated that "the Philadelphia Orchestra Association has not been immune to financial conditions due to the depression. In meeting these conditions the directors have made drastic economies, and all employes have willingly reduced their salaries * * * * Only the hearty support of the subscribers will make it possible for the association to overcome the difficulties of one of the most critical years of its history." And yet the Philadelphia orchestra, unlike the Boston, is heavily endowed.

It is known that some subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts have deplored the number of ultra-modern compositions that have been introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky. Some of the complaints have been unreasonable, even silly; other complaints have been justified. If there were noteworthy works in the list, works that imperatively called for a hearing, others, foreign and domestic, did not deserve attention. Thackeray in a proposed inscription in memory of George the First said in speaking of his tastes, that he "gave an enlightened patronage to bad oysters." The Boston public has at times been served compositions that might thus be classed.

Dr. Koussevitzky in his desire to enlarge the orchestra's repertory and acquaint the public with contemporaneous music has not infrequently, in his desire to afford foreign and even domestic composers a hearing, given evidence of his generous nature at the expense of his critical judgment; perhaps the novelty of expression appealed to him even when the musical ideas were non-eexistent, or the workmanship of poor or mediocre quality. But audiences welcome unfamiliar works only when their idiom is at first more or less familiar, when their beauty is not too hard to find, when they appeal to the heart and are not for the head alone.

NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

SEP 27 1932

Will Teach Enjoyment of Music

Olin Downes Arranges Course at Brooklyn Institute.

A COURSE in "The Enjoyment of Music," to be conducted by Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, will form part of the program of the new season at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The course is intended for the general public.

A series of fifteen recitals has been planned. Mr. Downes will discuss the representative styles of musical composition from the eighteenth to the twentieth century. The examples selected for illustration will be performed by these artists and organizations:—

Oct. 17—Lawrence Tibbett. The making of melody and text. Early song forms. Folk song, art song and opera.

Oct. 25—Violin, Albert Spalding. History and evolution of the instrument. Development of its literature from the seventeenth century to today.

Nov. 9—The orchestra in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Georges Barrere and Barrere Little Symphony.

Nov. 22—Early music of the piano and its predecessors, Jose Iturbi.

Nov. 30—Lieder, Lotte Lehmann. Schubert to Brahms and Wolf.

Dec. 20—Choral music, Schola Cantorium. Hugh Ross conducting Religious and secular music of medieval period.

Jan. 4—Opera and the coloratura soprano, Lili Pons. Florid developments of operatic style.

Jan. 23—Modern piano music, Walter Gieseking.

Feb. 8—Music for string quartet and piano, Roth String Quartet.

Feb. 16—Piano composers of the nineteenth century, Harold Bauer.

Feb. 28—Wagnerian opera and its influence upon modern song, Goeta Ljungberg.

March 7—Chamber music of the classic and romantic periods, London String Quartet.

March 21—The piano and orchestra from Handel to Bach to Beethoven, John Erskine, Ernest Schelling, Olin Downes.

March 29—The last piano sonatas of Beethoven, Josef Hofmann.

April 5—The modern symphony and symphonic poem, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald Tribune

SEP 4 - 1932

Schmitt and Tansman Due Here This Season

Composers to Introduce Some of Their Latest Works

Florent Schmitt, French composer, and Alexander Tansman, Polish composer, will be heard in this country during the coming season as soloists with orchestra and in chamber music concerts of their own works, according to an announcement from the Bogue-Laberge concert management.

Mr. Schmitt will appear in November with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, giving the first performance of his new "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra. After a New York apearance under the auspices of the League of Composers he will make a transcontinental tour, taking part in chamber music programs under the auspices of Pro-Musica and other societies. He will then go to Honolulu and return to Europe via the Orient, making a Tokio appearance on the way.

Mr. Tansman, who will be here in January and February, will play his latest piano concerto with the Cleveland and St. Louis Symphonies. He will also appear as a pianist in chamber music programs in various cities under the auspices of Pro-Musica and other groups.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

SEP 4 1932

Famous Composers to Tour America

A number of American cities will be visited this coming season by Florent Schmidtt, French composer, and Alexander Tansman, Polish composer, it has been announced in New York.

Mr. Schmidtt will appear in November with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, giving the first performance of his new "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra.

In New York he will appear under auspices of the League of Composers and later make a transcontinental tour under auspices of Pro Musica and other societies. He will travel as far as Honolulu.

Mr. Tansman will arrive in January. He will remain for two months. Already he is scheduled to appear with the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra under Nicolai Sokoloff and the St. Louis Symphony under Golshmann.

Faculty Increased

Bendetson Netzorg has announced the addition of Lillian Mumford, Emily Godard Hauss, Marjorie Nievens and Aileen Kengey Kirby to the faculty of the Netzorg School of Piano, 5415 Cass Ave.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

SEP 4 1932

FLORENT SCHMITT and Alexander Tansman, European composers, will visit this country during the coming season and will play their own works with orchestra and chamber music ensembles. Mr. Schmitt will appear in November with the Boston Symphony in the first performance of his new "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra. In New York he will appear under the auspices of the League of Composers, and then will make a transcontinental tour, appearing in chamber music concerts under the auspices of Pro-Musica.

Mr. Tansman will be here in January and February. He will apear with the Cleveland and St. Louis Symphony Orchestras. He will present his latest piano concerto in Cleveland.

[i]

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

SEP 12 1932

John Alden Carpenter Busy Practicing Piano to Play at Premiere of New Opus

Composer Must Reaccustom Himself to Keys Before Boston Symphony Presents His Newest Work This Fall.

BY PENELOPE.

FURTHER reports on John Alden Carpenter's musical career: The next few months will be spent by him in practicing the piano assiduously.

Mr. Carpenter has not played the piano for the last twenty years. But when Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, heard the newest Carpenter opus—"Episodes for a Piano and Orchestra," completed a few days ago—he requested the composer to brush up a bit on his chromatics and fifths. He wants Mr. Carpenter to appear in person at the piano when the Boston Symphony presents his work in Boston this fall in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra's founding.

Most of the Carpenter friends are now enjoying quiet chuckles over thoughts of the composer struggling with his own brilliant phrases. Something else to think about is what Mr. Stock and the Chicago Symphony will do about the "Episodes." Mr. Stock presented the Carpenter "Song of Faith" the first time it was produced, last winter at Orchestra Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CALGARY, ALBERTA
HERALD

SEP 17 1932

BRITISH MUSIC NEEDS DICTATOR DIRECTOR AFFIRMS

By CYRIL FONTAINBLEAU
(Central Press Canadian)

LONDON, Sept. 17.—"British music needs a dictator," says Sir Henry Wood, famous conductor.

"The British musical public needs kicking," adds Sir Henry.

Sir Henry Wood has just begun his thirty-eighth season of promenade concerts at the Queen's Hall, London. For 50 years Sir Henry has worked for music in England but he still despairs of making England musical.

"The British attitude towards music is infuriating," he says. "We are ashamed to mention it.

"If I go into a barber's shop in Philadelphia the barber will say to me: 'Have you heard our symphony orchestra?'

"It is the finest in the world.

"The same thing happens in Milan. But in London, no.

"Yet we British have music in us. And I have stuck to it. Two years after the war I had an offer from America to go to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It would have made my fortune and would have enhanced my fame. But I chose to stick to it here.

"I was a fool.

"If I had my time again, I would not be such a fool.

"This is what is wrong with English music. With the nineteenth century came the industrial revolution, and this country of island pioneers sets itself to making machines, conquering nature, and making money.

"Music took a back seat in the debutante's boudoir.

"The other thing wrong with music in Britain is that it is in a state of chaos. We need a man of business, we need a dictator of music.

"We want a man who will recognize talent and encourage it—who will nurse young musicians and produce them and will store up genius for the future.

"English people appreciate music—but they have to be kicked into it."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

SEP 19 1932

Serge Prokofieff Will Be Heard in Orchestras

Returning to this country next season after an absence of two years, Serge Prokofieff will be heard with several leading orchestras. His new piano concerto will be introduced to America by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the composer as soloist on December 30 and 31 in Symphony Hall, Boston; on January 5 and 7 in Carnegie Hall, New York, and on January 6 in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn.

Koussevitzky Prepares for Season With Boston Symphony

ASKED for his impression of the musical situation in America, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, promptly replied: "A phenomenal musical renaissance."

Reporters cornered the renowned maestro in Paris during his sojourn abroad this summer. He enthusiastically cited, as specific instances of American musical development, "her 20 superb orchestras" and "her promising young composers such as Aaron Copeland, Roger Sessions and John Alden Carpenter."

STRAVINSKY INFLUENCE

Jazz will no longer threaten American music, said the conductor, outside of the realm of the dance, tho he declares Stravinsky to be the most outstanding influence in the New World of music today.

"Americans," said Koussevitzky, "have the active temperament. Everyone is active, especially the women. They have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense business developments. The American seems to have an extraordinary genius for growth."

NINTH SEASON

Koussevitzky is preparing his ninth consecutive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony. He will arrive in Boston several weeks before the opening of the 52d season at Symphony Hall on Oct. 7. His summer was spent mostly in the Austrian Alps, but he attended the various European musical festivals in his search for significant new music, and conducted the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra at which he played that lovely Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloe" suite.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Washington for a single concert next winter as one of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's attractions in Constitution Hall. While no announcement has been made, it is believed that he will introduce a number of new orchestral works to the American public this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~DISPATCH~~
Independent

SEP 2

I'M TELLING YOU

By
GEORGE ROSEN

OUR MOTTO — PROSPERITY IS JUST AROUND THE CIRCLE

* * *

Alexander Woollcott, dean of American raconteurs and, truth to say, a Twentieth Century Dickens, ent [illegible] reminded us in the pub-

* * *

It happened back in the days, when Karl Muck, the esteemed conductor now residing in Germany, was wielding the baton for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Muck, though internationally celebrated for his flawless performances, was not, however, the only attraction, for audiences also flocked to the society's concerts to hear it's concertmeister, Ivan Sirovich. A finer soloist could not be heard, back in those pre-war days. Audiences were enraptured by his beautiful violin playing. But lo, Sirovich had the most ungodly habit of making the ugliest faces conceivable as he played. His face would assume the most grotesque form and naturally, these facial distortions distracted from the beauty of his playing. It was Muck, himself who, mustering up sufficient courage one day, had a talk with Sirovich to learn why he made such grimaces.

"Tell me, he said to the celebrated concertmeister, "Don't you like the audiences in Boston?"

"Why, of course, I do," was the reply. "Boston audiences are the most attentive to be found anywhere."

"Then perhaps you do not enjoy working with the other men in the orchestra?" Muck asked.

"But Mr. Muck, you are mistaken," Sirovich replied. "They are all cooperating with me and make me very comfortable."

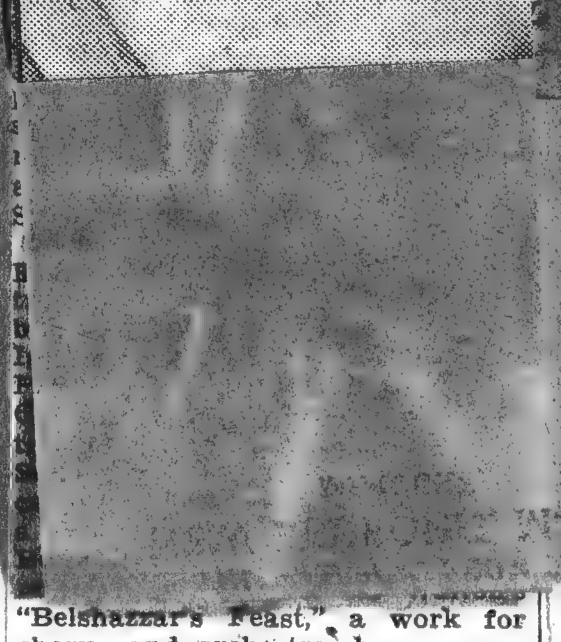
"Then," said Muck "perhaps you do not like me. Perhaps when you look at me you lose your inspiration."

"How can you say such a thing?" Sirovich asked. "You, the great Karl Muck! I've played before all the conductors in the world, but you are the finest. Why do you ask such a question?"

"Then tell me," asked the conductor. "Why is it that you make such annoying faces when you play so beautifully."

"Well, you see,' was the reply of Sirovich, "I don't like music."

* * *



"Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by a young British composer, who has been highly praised by critics abroad. The Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs will assist in the performance of Walton's work.

One of the most important novelties of the season will be Sibelius's Eighth symphony which Mr. Koussevitzky expects to present in February. This work was announced for performance last season, but Sibelius did not have the manuscript completed.

Mr. Koussevitzky said that it was a positive duty of American orchestras to perform American compositions, for the playing of native compositions was the strongest stimulus to the development of an indigenous art.

Except for a guest appearance with the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra in June, Mr. Koussevitzky did not conduct while abroad. He divided his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest.

NEW BEDFORD, MA
MERCURY

SEP 27 1932

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

(Philip Hale in The Boston Herald.)

The program of the first symphony concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra (October seventh) will comprise compositions by Brahms, Strauss, Wagner, and possibly another piece. An orthodox program which undoubtedly will delight the audience.

The prospectus of the Philadelphia orchestra for this, its thirty-third season, contains a significant paragraph:

"The programs for the season will be almost entirely devoted to the acknowledged masterpieces of orchestral music. The directors of the association feel that in times such as the present the audiences prefer music which they know and love and that performances of debatable music should be postponed until a more suitable time. With these opinions the conductors fully concur."

It is also stated that "the Philadelphia Orchestra Association has not been immune to financial conditions due to the depression. In meeting these conditions the directors have made drastic economies, and all employes have willingly reduced their salaries * * * * Only the hearty support of the subscribers will make it possible for the association to overcome the difficulties of one of the most critical years of its history." And yet the Philadelphia orchestra, unlike the Boston, is heavily endowed.

It is known that some subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts have deplored the number of ultra-modern compositions that have been introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky. Some of the complaints have been unreasonable, even silly; other complaints have been justified. If there were noteworthy works in the list, works that imperatively called for a hearing, others, foreign and domestic, did not deserve attention. Thackeray in a proposed inscription in memory of George the First said in speaking of his tastes, that he "gave an enlightened patronage to bad oysters." The Boston public has at times been served compositions that might thus be classed.

Dr. Koussevitzky in his desire to enlarge the orchestra's repertory and acquaint the public with contemporaneous music has not infrequently, in his desire to afford foreign and even domestic composers a hearing, given evidence of his generous nature at the expense of his critical judgment; perhaps the novelty of expression appealed to him even when the musical ideas were non-eexistent, or the workmanship of poor or mediocre quality. But audiences welcome unfamiliar works only when their idiom is at first more or less familiar, when their beauty is not too hard to find, when they appeal to the heart and are not for the head alone.

NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

SEP 27 1932

Will Teach Enjoyment of Music

Olin Downes Arranges Course at Brooklyn Institute.

A COURSE in "The Enjoyment of Music," to be conducted by Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, will form part of the program of the new season at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The course is intended for the general public.

A series of fifteen recitals has been planned. Mr. Downes will discuss the representative styles of musical composition from the eighteenth to the twentieth century. The examples selected for illustration will be performed by these artists and organizations:—

Oct. 17—Lawrence Tibbett. The making of melody and text. Early song forms. Folk song, art song and opera.

Oct. 25—Violin, Albert Spalding. History and evolution of the instrument. Development of its literature from the seventeenth century to today.

Nov. 9—The orchestra in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Georges Barrere and Barrere Little Symphony.

Nov. 22—Early music of the piano and its predecessors, Jose Iturbi.

Nov. 30—Lieder, Lotte Lehmann. Schubert to Brahms and Wolf.

Dec. 20—Choral music, Schola Cantorium. Hugh Ross conducting Religious and secular music of medieval period.

Jan. 4—Opera and the coloratura soprano, Lili Pons. Florid developments of operatic style.

Jan. 23—Modern piano music, Walter Gieseking.

Feb. 8—Music for string quartet and piano, Roth String Quartet.

Feb. 16—Piano composers of the nineteenth century, Harold Bauer.

Feb. 28—Wagnerian opera and its influence upon modern song, Goeta Ljungberg.

March 7—Chamber music of the classic and romantic periods, London String Quartet.

March 21—The piano and orchestra from Handel to Bach to Beethoven, John Erskine, Ernest Schelling, Olin Downes.

March 29—The last piano sonatas of Beethoven, Josef Hofmann.

April 5—The modern symphony and symphonic poem, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

sense of humor, knows how to gesture easily, speaks English which is bound to be attractive because of his accent, and on the first night showed himself to be a good sport under the most trying circumstances.

Concert-Chronicle

Carpenter-Koussevitzky

AT the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra in New York, last Saturday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky divided the program between the Second Symphony of Brahms, the new "Patterns" and the older "Skyscrapers" of Mr. Carpenter. About the "ballet of American life," now surviving as tone-poem, two reviewers spoke out unhesitatingly. To The Times, "it remained by far the most successful and important application of jazz on a symphonic scale that has yet been made." To The Evening Post "Skyscrapers" endures "repetition rather better than any othe American composition for orchestra written in its time (1924) except possibly Schelling's 'Impressions from an Artist's Life.' Saturday's audience saluted once more a work which draws upon everyman's technique and yet succeeds in being American—and that in spite of, quite as much as because of, its American subject."

Toward "Patterns" most of the reviewers were as well disposed. According to The Herald Tribune, "The work is deftly made, the patterns artfully designed and varied. There is charming and witty music in the score; there is an ingratiating waltz section; there is an admirable play of rhythms and of contrasted instrumental textures." By word of The Times, "One need not knit critical brows over this piece; it is frankly unpretentious; the rather sunny musings of a sensitive traveler voyaging in his mind through musical ports of call."

To The Evening Post, "'Patterns' is the music of a collector, not of books, paintings, china or postage stamps, but of patterns. The patterns color the collector's life. He gives them back with something of his inner self spun into them. If this is not important music, nor highly distinguished, it is in a sense both personal and racial. It is featly done. It holds the ear. Its substance, such as it is, has a clear and well-sounding statement." Only The Sun found "little" that was "interesting" or "stimulating" in the piece. Mr. Carpenter, again playing the piano-part, was cordially received.

N.Y. Times Sept 29

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK WITH NEW WORKS

Returns on Ile de France With Symphonic Novelties for Season With the Boston.

GRUENBERG ALSO LISTED

Stresses Need for American Orchestras to Present Native Compositions as Aid to Art.

Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived yesterday on the Ile de France after a Summer spent in Europe, revealed that he was planning to present his usual quota of symphonic novelties this season, his ninth as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new American works Mr. Koussevitzky will present are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, the composer of the opera "Emperor Jones," which the Metropolitan will present for the first time this season; two compositions, as yet unnamed, by John Alden Carpenter, and one untitled work by Roger Sessions.

The list of new compositions by European composers is also a distinguished one. It includes "Rebus," by the youthful Russian composer, Igor Markevitch, who is living in Paris; Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante, for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist; Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto, with Profofieff as the soloist; a suite for full orchestra by Alban Berg; a new piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by a young British composer, who has been highly praised by critics abroad. The Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs will assist in the performance of Walton's work.

One of the most important novelties of the season will be Sibelius's Eighth symphony, which Mr. Koussevitzky expects to present in February. This work was announced for performance last season, but Sibelius did not have the manuscript completed.

Mr. Koussevitzky said that it was a positive duty of American orchestras to perform American compositions, for the playing of native compositions was the strongest stimulus to the development of an indigenous art.

Except for a guest appearance with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in June, Mr. Koussevitzky did not conduct while abroad. He divided his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

SEP 29 1932

Koussevitzky Arrives to Start Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 110 players, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will make a brief western tour this October, giving concerts in Ann Arbor, which will be the only Michigan appearance, also New York, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and back to Boston. The Ann Arbor appearance will take place on the evening of Oct. 25.

The Ile de France, which arrives in New York Wednesday, brought from Europe Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Koussevitsky went immediately to Boston to assemble the 110 musicians of the orchestra for rehearsal, in preparation for the season's opening which will take place in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7 and 8. This will be the orchestra's fifty-second season and the ninth under the conductorship of this renowned leader. Dr. Koussevitsky will thus exceed any continuous term of a previous conductor of this orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitsky, who spent the summer in Europe, enjoyed a season of recreation, dividing his time between rest in the mountains and his usual quest for new scores of importance. Save for a single concert in Vienna June 14, when he appeared as guest of the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra and was given a most brilliant reception, he made no public appearances.

NEW YORK H

Tribune Sept 29/32

Koussevitsky Arrives With Novel Scores

Boston Symphony Conductor Brings American, Foreign Works From Abroad

Praises U. S. Composers

Says They Should Be Given Every Chance to Succeed

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here from Europe yesterday morning on the Ile de France with a list of several new works, American and European, which his orchestra is to perform during its fifty-second season, which will be its ninth under the Russian conductor.

Before departing for Boston on an afternoon train, Dr. Koussevitzky expressed his belief that it is the duty of American orchestras to give due representation to the work of American composers. "For them," he said, "the right way is to work; that will give results. They must work, and the orchestras must play their music. For a composer, it is very important to be heard. If he does not hear this work performed, he does not know how it sounds. We do not wish to claim an exclusive privilege to perform American music; we will be very happy when every American orchestra plays the works of American composers."

Finds Half Dozen Excellent Writers

Among American composers, said Dr. Koussevitzky, there are four or six whose music is of exceptional value, while he believes that American music in general offers marked promise for the future. He praised Frederick A. Stock, the leader of the Chicago Symphony, as a conductor who gives American music generous representation on his programs.

In the list of new American works to be played by the Boston Symphony in 1932-'33 are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, whose one act opera "The Emperor Jones" is to be produced by the Metropolitan this year, two new pieces by John Alden Carpenter, and a new composition, of a type as yet undivulged, by Roger Sessions.

Dr. Koussevitzky's list of novelties also includes a work by Igor Markevitch, a nineteen-year-old Russian whose music has made a notable impression already in Europe; a symphonic concertante for piano and orchestra by the French composer, Florent Schmitt, to be played for the first time anywhere, and Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto. Both Mr. Schmitt and Mr. Prokofieff will be the soloists in the American premieres of their works. The conductor praised Mr. Schmitt's attainments as a writer as well as a composer—he is music critics for "Le Temps" of Paris—and commented on the fact that many French composers have been active also in music criticism.

To Introduce Beck Suite

Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to this country a suite by Conrad Beck, one of the works played last June in the Vienna festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, and a suite by Alban Berg, the composer of "Wozzeck." New Britain works to be presented include a piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's oratorio, "Belshazzar's Feast," to be sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs.

The first performance of the eighth symphony of the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius, long promised to this orchestra, is expected to take place in Boston in February, and the Boston Orchestra will introduce the work here later in the season. Among other contemporary Europeans who will figure in the Symphony Hall programs are Jerzy Fitelberg and Bohuslav Martinu.

Dr. Koussevitzky found the Vienna festival, in which he conducted one program with the Vienna Philharmonic, "very interesting." "But," he added, "although I am not a reactionary, much of the new music I have heard recently is not of great value." Among the more significant contributions to the festival, he mentioned a string quartet by Francesco Malipiero and a work by Berg for barytone with orchestra.

The United States, said the conductor, has the world's best orchestras. "Take care of them," he advised; "they are among America's greatest achievements in its art." Every effort, he added, should be made to keep them going during hard times.

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

OCT 1 1932

The Boston Symphony orchestra is using a fly swatter as a musical instrument. This should prove a help to mother next summer if she can get the children to stay home and practice their music lessons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

SEP 29 1932

Koussevitzky Arrives With Novel Scores

Boston Symphony Conductor Brings American, Foreign Works From Abroad

Praises U. S. Composers

Says They Should Be Given Every Chance to Succeed

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here from Europe yesterday morning on the Ile de France with a list of several new works, American and European, which his orchestra is to perform during its fifty-second season, which will be its ninth under the Russian conductor.

Before departing for Boston on an afternoon train, Dr. Koussevitzky expressed his belief that it is the duty of American orchestras to give due representation to the work of American composers. "For them," he said, "the right way is to work; that will give results. They must work, and the orchestras must play their music. For a composer, it is very important to be heard. If he does not hear this work performed, he does not know how it sounds. We do not wish to claim an exclusive privilege to perform American music; we will be very happy when every American orchestra plays the works of American composers."

Among American composers, said Dr. Koussevitzky, there are four or six whose music is of exceptional value, while he believes that American music in general offers marked promise for the future. He praised Frederick A. Stock, the leader of the Chicago Symphony, as a conductor who gives American music generous representation on his programs.

In the list of new American works to be played by the Boston Symphony in 1932-'33 are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, whose one act opera "The Emperor Jones" is to be produced by the Metropolitan this year, two new pieces by John Alden Carpenter, and a new composition, of a type as yet undivulged, by Roger Sessions.

Dr. Koussevitzky's list of novelties also includes a work by Igor Markevitch, a nineteen-year-old Russian whose music has made a notable impression already in Europe; a symphonic concertante for piano and orchestra by the French composer, Florent Schmitt, to be played for the first time anywhere, and Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto. Both Mr. Schmitt and Mr. Prokofieff will be the soloists in the American premieres of their works.

Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to this country a suite by Conrad Beck, one of the works played last June in the Vienna festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, and a suite by Alban Berg, the composer of "Wozzeck." New British works to be presented include a piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's oratorio, "Belshazzar's Feast," to be sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs.

The first performance of the eighth symphony of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, long promised to this orchestra, is expected to take place in Boston in February, and the Boston Orchestra will introduce the work here later in the season.

The United States, said the conductor, has the world's best orchestras. "Take care of them," he advised; "they are among America's greatest achievements in its art." Every effort, he added, should be made to keep them going during hard times.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 1 - 1932

Conductor Back From Trip

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned this week from his trip to Europe. He was guest conductor for the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. Most of the summer he spent in retirement in the Swiss Alps.

Dr. Koussevitzky brings his orchestra of 110 musicians here Oct. 27 to play the opening concert of the series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. Tickets are on sale by Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood Ave.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

SEP 29 1932

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrives from a summer in Europe with abundant evidence that conducting can develop almost as many differences of opinion as politics. He has always been a specialist in novelties, ready to give his baton to the service of an American or European unknown composer who seems to have something to say in a new way. So he surprised no one when he stated, on his return, that "Music must grow and improve like every living art." But this statement will not be allowed to go without argument by those who delight in debating such points, for it is directly opposed to the policy of the Philadelphia Philharmonic, where only proven masterpieces of orchestral music are to be played this season. Koussevitzky would argue that unless new music is played, whether it compare or not with the classics, there will be no development of masterpieces these days. "For a composer, it is very important to be heard. If he does not hear his work performed, he does not know how it sounds." Willing as he is to give ear to the productions of the European youngsters, he is especially anxious that the cause of American music should be forwarded. "The United States," he says, "has the world's best orchestras. They are among America's greatest artistic achievements. Take care of them. And we will be very happy when every American orchestra plays the works of American composers. We do not wish to claim the exclusive privilege."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 1 - 1932

Boston Symphony Begins Rehearsal Under Director

Koussevitzky Immediately Becomes Busy Upon Return from Europe.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in America Wednesday of this week on the Ile de France, and left immediately for Boston, where he assembled the 110 members of the orchestra for rehearsal. The orchestra in its full strength will come to Buffalo Monday night, Oct. 24, opening the annual season of the Buffalo Musical foundation. As usual, its concert will be given in Elmwood Music hall.

This is the orchestra's 52d season, its eighth under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky. It makes its first trip outside of Boston the week of Oct. 24, and Buffalo gets the opening concert in the tour. Except for a single concert in Vienna, June 14, when he appeared as guest conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra, Koussevitzky made no public appearances in Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Evening Post

OCT 1 - 1932

Serge Koussevitzky will open the fifty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will be Koussevitzky's ninth season in America, and will make the longest continuous term of a Boston Symphony conductor. Save for a guest appearance as conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra on June 14, a brilliant occasion, Koussevitzky has given no concerts in Europe this summer—dividing his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest. The New York series in Carnegie Hall by this orchestra will be given on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons on the following dates: November 17 and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

OCT 1 - 1932

The Boston Symphony orchestra is using a fly swatter as a musical instrument. This should prove a help to mother next summer if she can get the children to stay home and practice their music lessons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

SEP 29 1932

Koussevitzky Back with New Novelties

Conductor of Boston Symphony to Present Compositions of Europeans.

NEW YORK, Sept. 29—Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived yesterday on the Ile de France after a summer spent in Europe, revealed that he was planning to present his usual quota of symphonic novelties this season, his ninth as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The new American works Mr. Koussevitzky will present are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, the composer of the opera "Emperor Jones," which the Metropolitan will present for the first time this season; two compositions, as yet unnamed, by John Alden Carpenter, and one untitled work by Roger Sessions.

The list of new compositions by European composers is also a distinguished one. It includes "Rebus," by the youthful Russian composer, Igor Markevitch, who is living in Paris; Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante, for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist; Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto, with Prokofieff as the soloist; a suite for full orchestra by Alban Berg; a new piano concerto by Arnold Bax, and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by a young British composer who has been highly praised by critics abroad. The Harvard and Radcliffe glee clubs will assist in the performance of Walton's work.

One of the most important novelties of the season will be Sibelius' eighth symphony, which Mr. Koussevitzky expects to present in February. This work was announced for performance last season, but Sibelius did not have the manuscript completed.

Mr. Koussevitzky said that it was a positive duty of American orchestras to perform American compositions, for the playing of native compositions was the strongest stimulus to the development of an indigenous art.

Except for a guest appearance with the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra in June, Mr. Koussevitzky did not conduct while abroad. He divided his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HANOVER, PA.
SUN

OCT 1 - 1932

Music

ORCHESTRAL SEASON OPENS

Serge Koussevitzky, who returned Wednesday after a Summer spent in Europe, revealed that he was planning to present his usual quota of symphonic novelties this season, his ninth as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new American works Mr. Koussevitzky will present are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, the composer of the opera "Emperor Jones," which the Metropolitan will present for the first time this season; two compositions, as yet unnamed, by John Alden Carpenter, and one untitled work by Roger Sessions.

The list of new compositions by European composers is also a distinguished one. It includes "Rebus," by the youthful Russian composer, Igor Markevitch, who is living in Paris; Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante, for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist; Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto, with Prokofieff as the soloist; a suite for full orchestra by Alban Berg; a new piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by a young British composer, who has been highly praised by critics abroad.

N.Y. Times Sept 29

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK WITH NEW WORKS

Returns on Ile de France With Symphonic Novelties for Season With the Boston.

GRUENBERG ALSO LISTED

Stresses Need for American Orchestras to Present Native Compositions as Aid to Art.

Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived yesterday on the Ile de France after a Summer spent in Europe, revealed that he was planning to present his usual quota of symphonic novelties this season, his ninth as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new American works Mr. Koussevitzky will present are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, the composer of the opera "Emperor Jones," which the Metropolitan will present for the first time this season; two compositions, as yet unnamed, by John Alden Carpenter, and one untitled work by Roger Sessions.

The list of new compositions by European composers is also a distinguished one. It includes "Rebus," by the youthful Russian composer, Igor Markevitch, who is living in Paris; Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante, for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist; Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto, with Profofieff as the soloist; a suite for full orchestra by Alban Berg; a new piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by a young British composer, who has been highly praised by critics abroad. The Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs will assist in the performance of Walton's work.

One of the most important novelties of the season will be Sibelius's Eighth symphony, which Mr. Koussevitzky expects to present in February. This work was announced for performance last season, but Sibelius did not have the manuscript completed.

Mr. Koussevitzky said that it was a positive duty of American orchestras to perform American compositions, for the playing of native compositions was the strongest stimulus to the development of an indigenous art.

Except for a guest appearance with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in June, Mr. Koussevitzky did not conduct while abroad. He divided his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

SEP 29 1932

Koussevitzky Arrives to Start Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 110 players, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will make a brief western tour this October, giving concerts in Ann Arbor, which will be the only Michigan appearance, also New York, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and back to Boston. The Ann Arbor appearance will take place on the evening of Oct. 25.

The Ile de France, which arrives in [illegible] York Wednesday, brought from Europe Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Koussevitsky went immediately to Boston to assemble the 110 musicians of the orchestra for rehearsal, in preparation for the season's opening which will take place in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7 and 8. This will be the orchestra's fifty-second season and the ninth under the conductorship of this renowned leader. Dr. Kousevitsky will thus exceed any continuous term of a previous conductor of this orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitsky, who spent the summer in Europe, enjoyed a season of recreation, dividing his time between rest in the mountains and his usual quest for new scores of importance. Save for a single concert in Vienna June 14, when he appeared as guest of the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra and was given a most brilliant reception, he made no public appearances.

NEW YORK H

Tribune Sept 29/32

Koussevitsky Arrives With Novel Scores

Boston Symphony Conductor Brings American, Foreign Works From Abroad

Praises U. S. Composers

Says They Should Be Given Every Chance to Succeed

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here from Europe yesterday morning on the Ile de France with a list of several new works, American and European, which his orchestra is to perform during its fifty-second season, which will be its ninth under the Russian conductor.

Before departing for Boston on an afternoon train, Dr. Koussevitzky expressed his belief that it is the duty of American orchestras to give due representation to the work of American composers. "For them," he said, "the right way is to work; that will give results. They must work, and the orchestras must play their music. For a composer, it is very important to be heard. If he does not hear this work performed, he does not know how it sounds. We do not wish to claim an exclusive privilege to perform American music; we will be very happy when every American orchestra plays the works of American composers."

Finds Half Dozen Excellent Writers

Among American composers, said Dr. Koussevitzky, there are four or six whose music is of exceptional value, while he believes that American music in general offers marked promise for the future. He praised Frederick A. Stock, the leader of the Chicago Symphony, as a conductor who gives American music generous representation on his programs.

In the list of new American works to be played by the Boston Symphony in 1932-'33 are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, whose one act opera "The Emperor Jones" is to be produced by the Metropolitan this year, two new pieces by John Alden Carpenter, and a new composition, of a type as yet undivulged, by Roger Sessions.

Dr. Koussevitzky's list of novelties also includes a work by Igor Markevitch, a nineteen-year-old Russian whose music has made a notable impression already in Europe; a symphonic concertante for piano and orchestra by the French composer, Florent Schmitt, to be played for the first time anywhere, and Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto. Both Mr. Schmitt and Mr. Prokofieff will be the soloists in the American premieres of their works. The conductor praised Mr. Schmitt's attainments as a writer as well as a composer—he is music critics for "Le Temps" of Paris—and commented on the fact that many French composers have been active also in music criticism.

To Introduce Beck Suite

Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to this country a suite by Conrad Beck, one of the works played last June in the Vienna festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, and a suite by Alban Berg, the composer of "Wozzeck." New Britain works to be presented include a piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's oratorio, "Belshazzar's Feast," to be sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs.

The first performance of the eighth symphony of the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius, long promised to this orchestra, is expected to take place in Boston in February, and the Boston Orchestra will introduce the work here later in the season. Among other contemporary Europeans who will figure in the Symphony Hall programs are Jerzy Fitelberg and Bohuslav Martinu.

Dr. Koussevitzky found the Vienna festival, in which he conducted one program with the Vienna Philharmonic, "very interesting." "But," he added, "although I am not a reactionary, much of the new music I have heard recently is not of great value." Among the more significant contributions to the festival, he mentioned a string quartet by Francesco Malipiero and a work by Berg for barytone with orchestra.

The United States, said the conductor, has the world's best orchestras. "Take care of them," he advised; "they are among America's greatest achievements in its art." Every effort, he added, should be made to keep them going during hard times.

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

OCT 1 1932

The Boston Symphony orchestra is using a fly swatter as a musical instrument. This should prove a help to mother next summer if she can get the children to stay home and practice their music lessons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

SEP 29 1932

Koussevitzky Arrives With Novel Scores

Boston Symphony Conductor Brings American, Foreign Works From Abroad

Praises U. S. Composers

Says They Should Be Given Every Chance to Succeed

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here from Europe yesterday morning on the Ile de France with a list of several new works, American and European, which his orchestra is to perform during its fifty-second season, which will be its ninth under the Russian conductor.

Before departing for Boston on an afternoon train, Dr. Koussevitzky expressed his belief that it is the duty of American orchestras to give due representation to the work of American composers. "For them," he said, "the right way is to work; that will give results. They must work, and the orchestras must play their music. For a composer, it is very important to be heard. If he does not hear this work performed, he does not know how it sounds. We do not wish to claim an exclusive privilege to perform American music; we will be very happy when every American orchestra plays the works of American composers."

Among American composers, said Dr. Koussevitzky, there are four or six whose music is of exceptional value, while he believes that American music in general offers marked promise for the future. He praised Frederick A. Stock, the leader of the Chicago Symphony, as a conductor who gives American music generous representation on his programs.

In the list of new American works to be played by the Boston Symphony in 1932-'33 are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, whose one act opera "The Emperor Jones" is to be produced by the Metropolitan this year, two new pieces by John Alden Carpenter, and a new composition, of a type as yet undivulged, by Roger Sessions.

Dr. Koussevitzky's list of novelties also includes a work by Igor Markevitch, a nineteen-year-old Russian whose music has made a notable impression already in Europe; a symphonie concertante for piano and orchestra by the French composer, Florent Schmitt, to be played for the first time anywhere, and Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto. Both Mr. Schmitt and Mr. Prokofieff will be the soloists in the American premieres of their works.

Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to this country a suite by Conrad Beck, one of the works played last June in the Vienna festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, and a suite by Alban Berg, the composer of "Wozzeck." New British works to be presented include a piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's oratorio, "Belshazzar's Feast," to be sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs.

The first performance of the eighth symphony of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, long promised to this orchestra, is expected to take place in Boston in February, and the Boston Orchestra will introduce the work here later in the season.

The United States, said the conductor, has the world's best orchestras. "Take care of them," he advised; "they are among America's greatest achievements in its art." Every effort, he added, should be made to keep them going during hard times.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 1 - 1932

Conductor Back From Trip

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned this week from his trip to Europe. He was guest conductor for the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. Most of the summer he spent in retirement in the Swiss Alps.

Dr. Koussevitzky brings his orchestra of 110 musicians here Oct. 27 to play the opening concert of the series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. Tickets are on sale by Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood Ave.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

SEP 29 1932

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrives from a summer in Europe with abundant evidence that conducting can develop almost as many differences of opinion as politics. He has always been a specialist in novelties, ready to give his baton to the service of an American or European unknown composer who seems to have something to say in a new way. So he surprised no one when he stated, on his return, that "Music must grow and improve like every living art." But this statement will not be allowed to go without argument by those who delight in debating such points, for it is directly opposed to the policy of the Philadelphia Philharmonic, where only proven masterpieces of orchestral music are to be played this season. Koussevitzky would argue that unless new music is played, whether it compare or not with the classics, there will be no development of masterpieces these days. "For a composer, it is very important to be heard. If he does not hear his work performed, he does not know how it sounds." Willing as he is to give ear to the productions of the European youngsters, he is especially anxious that the cause of American music should be forwarded. "The United States," he says, "has the world's best orchestras. They are among America's greatest artistic achievements. Take care of them. And we will be very happy when every American orchestra plays the works of American composers. We do not wish to claim the exclusive privilege."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 1 - 1932

Boston Symphony Begins Rehearsal Under Director

Koussevitzky Immediately Becomes Busy Upon Return from Europe.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in America Wednesday of this week on the Ile de France, and left immediately for Boston, where he assembled the 110 members of the orchestra for rehearsal. The orchestra in its full strength will come to Buffalo Monday night, Oct. 24, opening the annual season of the Buffalo Musical foundation. As usual, its concert will be given in Elmwood Music hall.

This is the orchestra's 52d season, its eighth under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky. It makes its first trip outside of Boston the week of Oct. 24, and Buffalo gets the opening concert in the tour. Except for a single concert in Vienna, June 14, when he appeared as guest conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra, Koussevitzky made no public appearances in Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Evening Post

OCT 1 - 1932

Serge Koussevitzky will open the fifty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will be Koussevitzky's ninth season in America, and will make the longest continuous term of a Boston Symphony conductor. Save for a guest appearance as conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra on June 14, a brilliant occasion, Koussevitzky has given no concerts in Europe this summer—dividing his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest. The New York series in Carnegie Hall by this orchestra will be given on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons on the following dates: November 17 and 19; January 5 and 7; February 3 (Friday evening by exception) and 4; March 2 and 4, and April 6 and 8.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is using a fly swatter as a musical instrument. This should prove a help to mother next summer if she can get the children to stay home and practice their music lessons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

SEP 29 1932

Koussevitzky Back with New Novelties

Conductor of Boston Symphony to Present Compositions of Europeans.

NEW YORK, Sept. 29—Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived yesterday on the Ile de France after a summer spent in Europe, revealed that he was planning to present his usual quota of symphonic novelties this season, his ninth as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The new American works Mr. Koussevitzky will present are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, the composer of the opera "Emperor Jones," which the Metropolitan will present for the first time this season; two compositions, as yet unnamed, by John Alden Carpenter, and one untitled work by Roger Sessions.

The list of new compositions by European composers is also a distinguished one. It includes "Rebus," by the youthful Russian composer, Igor Markevitch, who is living in Paris; Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante, for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist; Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto, with Prokofieff as the soloist; a suite for full orchestra by Alban Berg; a new piano concerto by Arnold Bax, and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by a young British composer who has been highly praised by critics abroad. The Harvard and Radcliffe glee clubs will assist in the performance of Walton's work.

One of the most important novelties of the season will be Sibelius' eighth symphony, which Mr. Koussevitzky expects to present in February. This work was announced for performance last season, but Sibelius did not have the manuscript completed.

Mr. Koussevitzky said that it was a positive duty of American orchestras to perform American compositions, for the playing of native compositions was the strongest stimulus to the development of an indigenous art.

Except for a guest appearance with the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra in June, Mr. Koussevitzky did not conduct while abroad. He divided his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HANOVER, PA.
SUN

OCT 1 - 1932

Music

ORCHESTRAL SEASON OPENS

Serge Koussevitzky, who returned Wednesday after a Summer spent in Europe, revealed that he was planning to present his usual quota of symphonic novelties this season, his ninth as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new American works Mr. Koussevitzky will present are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, the composer of the opera "Emperor Jones," which the Metropolitan will present for the first time this season; two compositions, as yet unnamed, by John Alden Carpenter, and one untitled work by Roger Sessions.

The list of new compositions by European composers is also a distinguished one. It includes "Rebus," by the youthful Russian composer, Igor Markevitch, who is living in Paris; Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante, for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist; Serge Prokofieff's fourth piano concerto, with Prokofieff as the soloist; a suite for full orchestra by Alban Berg; a new piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by a young British composer, who has been highly praised by critics abroad.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

OCT 2 - 1932

ORCHESTRAL PROGRAMS AND AMERICAN MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, believes that it is the duty of American orchestras to give due representation to American music, and has said that he would be very happy if all our orchestras should do so. It is very important, he remarked last week when interviewed on his arrival from Europe, for a composer to be heard; if he does not hear his work performed, he will not know how it sounds.

Dr. Koussevitzky did not state just what proportion of an American orchestra's reportoire for a given season should be devoted to American compositions, but an idea of what he would consider a fair share for American music in a season's programs can probably be gained by a glance at the Bostonian repertoire for 1931-'32. In its home concerts the Boston Symphony gave eight works by eight American composers in a total repertoire of eighty-five works by forty-five composers. The Philadelphia Orchestra gave representation last season to the same number of American works and composers, but in a list of 136 works by sixty-two composers, so that the proportion of American music offered Philadelphian audiences was somewhat less. Our Philharmonic-Symphony, with a still larger repertoire of 168 works by sixty-three composers, played only five American works.

The repertoires referred to are those of the home concerts of the three orchestras, not counting their children's series, while the term American composer is used to include native-born citizens and naturalized citizens who have lived here for many years. The amount of American music offered by these and other orchestras varies, naturally, from season to season, but it has generally been the case during the last few years that, among the three major orchestras of the Atlantic seaboard, the Boston Symphony has been the most receptive to American composers and the Philharmonic-Symphony the least.

* * *

Nationality Only One Factor

AMERICAN composers will, naturally, agree warmly with Dr. Koussevitzky's sentiments in this matter, and regret, in some cases, that he does not carry them out in his program-making even further. Whether he average patron of symphony concerts is anxious to hear a large proportion of American music in his subscription series is a more debatable point. It is regrettable, but probably true, that few American works are played particularly often, and concertgoers, considered in general, do not yearn for a large percentage of unfamiliar items in their orchestral fare. But Dr. Koussevitzky's interest in American music has, for some time, merited the gratitude of those interested in the musical progress of this country, and is one of the factors in his prestige as an enlightened program-maker.

One can hardly deny that it is of inestimable value to a composer to have his music performed, not only in order that it may become known to the musical world, but so that in hearing how it actually sounds he can gain a better idea of its merits and defects, and thus advance in the mastery of his art. But, while the conductor of an American orchestra should give due consideration to the work of American composers, he must also consider his audiences; nationality is only one, and, in the last analysis, a minor one of the factors which he has to consider in choosing his repertoire.

* * *

Some Considerations

IN ATTEMPTING to define the relation between a conductor's duty toward his audiences and his duty toward American music, it might be enlightening to set forth certain general considerations. Obviously, a major, while not an exclusive part of an orchestral repertoire must be devoted to standard masterpieces. But, to vary and freshen the repertoire and give his hearers opportunity for personal acquaintance with significant contemporary creative work, a conductor should make a diligent search for new music, American and foreign, which he considers of sufficient value or importance to figure in his program. As he is in charge of an American orchestra, and serving an American musical public, he should devote a considerable part of his search for novelties to American scores, but the scope of his search should be catholic and international.

But, if American compositions are to gain a more prominent place than their present one in the repertoire of American orchestras, they must be heard more than once, and played by more than one orchestra. Thus a conductor wishing to do American composers a service should not limit his American selections to his list of novelties, but should occasionally offer other worthy works which have previously appeared in his own or in others' programs. In this connection, attention should be called to the pamphlet "American Composers of Today," compiled by Mrs. Claire Reis, of which the second edition was published last month by the United States Section of the International Society for Contemporary Music. This lists works in the larger forms produced by American composers during the last twenty years, along with information regarding the type and length of the various works, dates of completion or publication, times and places of performance, and other data of value.

* * *

What Can Be Claimed

OTHER things being equal—if it is a question, for instance, of choosing between an American and a foreign work of approximately equal merit —it is entirely legitimate to ask that the American work receive preference. But to claim that an American work should be preferred, on account of its nationality, to a foreign work of superior value would be unjustifiable from an artistic standpoint. Nor would such a chauvinistic claim prove, in the long run, advantageous to the American composer. This does not mean, of course, that a conductor can excuse himself from giving representation to American music by pointing out the superior merits of Bach, Beethoven, Brahms or Wagner.

But American composers might remark, at this point, that few, if any, have shown any tendency to be unduly kind to American music on account of its nationality, while there have been many cases in which American works have been neglected in favor of less valuable importations from abroad. And a reviewer who has heard some of the feebler specimens among the trans-Atlantic novelties played here in recent years may sometimes be inclined to wonder if there are not some American works at hand that are considerably better, and many which are at least no worse.

* * *

Handicaps Faced by American Composers

IT IS probable that American composers are still underrepresented in the programs of most of our principal symphony orchestras, not owing to actual hostility toward their music, but to circumstances which make it easier for the conductors to look for their new or unfamiliar offerings abroad. Several of our symphony leaders spend the time when they are not actively engaged in the direction of their orchestras in Europe; while here, they are busy conducting and rehearsing, and when they have leisure to contemplate new offerings for the next season they are likely to be in places where American composers and American works are rarely heard of. Conductors who have been here only for a season or two have had relatively little opportunity to become familiar with creative work here, and are naturally inclined to favor the music of their native land. Conductors who, like Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston or Mr. Stock in Chicago, devote considerable attention to the composers of their cities or neighborhoods are still in a minority.

In general, American composers stand the best chance of getting a liberal representation of their works on symphony programs from permanent conductors who have been associated with their orchestras for many years, and thus have had ample opportunity to survey the local musical field; they stand the least chance from orchestras conducted by a succession of leaders taking charge for only short periods, leaders who have had little time or opportunity thus far to become acquainted with what is going on here in the way of creative musical activity.

A conductor who should go too far in the other direction and overload his programs with third or fourth rate American works would prove no real friend of the American composer, and in the same way a music reviewer who, through a misguided friendship toward American music, should voluntarily lower his standards and hail a work which he really deems indifferent as a masterpiece would hinder rather than aid American composers in general. To be especially lenient in the appraisal of American music would be to imply that it needs to be judged by lower, less exacting standards than music from abroad, and that is the last thing that a clear-sighted American composer, in all probability, would wish. But the reviewers of this newspaper and, undoubtedly, their colleagues of other papers will be glad to hail a discriminating friendship toward American music such as that shown by Dr. Koussevitzky, to protest against undeserved handicaps in the way of American composers, and to bestow as vigorous as possible an acclaim on any American works which, in their opinion, deserve it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 2 - 1932

Many Added To Sponsors Of Concert

With the return of opera stars and symphony conductors from abroad this week, and the early approach of the concert season, interest increases in anticipation of hearing and seeing Maria Jeritza, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Sergei Koussevitzky, and such other ~~celebrities~~ as Lucrezia Bori, Jascha Heifetz and Escudero, all listed for the early season in Pittsburgh.

Among the recent patronesses added to an already long list are Mrs. George Wittmer, Mrs. Paul B. Mossman, Mrs. James G. Pontefract, Mrs. Robert B. Clark, Mrs. John Z. Collier, Mrs. Arthur E. Braun, Mrs. Henry Wittmer, Mrs. J. C. C. Holding, Mrs. Robert J. Frank, Mrs. Isaac Frank and Mrs. Inslee A. Bennett.

Others are Caroll Fitzhugh, E. W. Thomson, Judge and Mrs. W. H. McNaugher, Mrs. John B. Heron, Jr., Mrs. T. Raymond Evans, Mrs. J. O. Horning, Mrs. Charles D. Doll, Rev. and Mrs. A. G. Merkens, Mrs. Charles H. Johnston, Miss Margaret G. Sander, Mrs. Herbert G. Johns, Mrs. J. C. Nevin, Mrs. George Pearson, Mrs. W. L. Mellon, Jr., Mrs. T. F. Soles and Mrs. Charles T. Marsh.

Mrs. F. A. Merrick is on the list, and so are Mrs. Josiah Cohen, Miss Mary H. Morgan, Mrs. C. V. McKaig, Mrs. A. W. Demmler, Mrs. Mae Keller, Mrs. P. W. Jenkins and Mrs. Allen Kirkpatrick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 2 - 1932

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fifty-second season at Symphony Hall in Boston with a pair of concerts on Friday and Saturday. Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived from Europe last week, will open his ninth season in this country. He continues what constitutes the longest continuous term of a Boston Symphony conductor. Excepting for a guest appearance as conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in June, Mr. Koussevitzky has given no concerts in Europe this Summer, dividing his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest.

The New York series in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony will be presented on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons on the following dates: Nov. 17 and 19; Jan. 5 and 7; Feb. 3 (Friday by exception) and 4; March 2 and 4, and April 6 and 8.

Mr. Koussevitzky revealed that he has again selected a large and representative group of novelties for the Boston's programs this season. The new American works include a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, two compositions, as yet unnamed, by John Alden Carpenter; and a new composition, of a type not divulged, by Roger Sessions. The foreign noveltries include Sibelius's Eighth symphony; a new work by Igor Markevitch, the youthful Russian composer now living in Paris; Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist; Serge Prokofieff's Fourth piano concerto, with Mr. Prokofieff as soloist; a suite by Conrad Beck and one by Alban Berg, the composer of "Wozzeck"; new compositions by Jerzy Fitelberg and Bohuslav Martinu, a piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," in which the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs will take part.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

OCT 2 - 1932

Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived here last Wednesday, will conduct the first concerts of the fifty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Except for a concert with the Vienna Philharmonic on June 14, the Russian conductor made no orchestral appearances during his summer abroad, dividing his time between resting and the inspection of new scores. The coming season will be his ninth with the Boston Symphony, making a period of continuous service tied only by the second term of Wilhelm Gericke, 1897-1906.

For his Boston concerts Dr. Koussevitzky has a varied list of novelties, including the ballet suite "Rebus," by the nineteen-year-old Russian composer Igor Markevich, whose music has already made a marked impression abroad. Florent Schmitt will be represented by a Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra and Prokofieff by his fourth piano concerto, with both composers as soloists. Other new works to be introduced are a suite by Conrad Beck, performed last June in the Vienna festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music; a piano concerto by Arnold Bax, William Walton's oratorio "Belshazzar's Feast," to be sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs, and Sibelius's Eighth Symphony, whose world premiere is expected to take place in Boston next February.

Among new American works to be heard are a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, two compositions by John Alden Carpenter and a work by Roger Sessions.

The Boston Symphony will give its usual five evening and five afternoon concerts here at Carnegie Hall this season. The evening series will be given on Thursdays, November 17, January 5; Friday, February 3, and Thursdays, March 2 and April 6. The afternoon concerts will be given on Saturdays, November 19, January 7, February 4, March 4 and April 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

"Dr. Koussevitzky is of course a great dramatist of the symphony, an artist of true orchestral imagination, a master of color and of contrast in all its myriad inflections, whether instrumental or dynamic."—Chicago Herald & Examiner.

" 'Such power' dwelt yesterday in Dr. Koussevitzky; went forth from him upon his orchestra; from both upon their audience."—Boston Evening Transcript, April 30. 1932.

Opera House
Academy of Music

Opening Concert of Season
Friday Evening, November 18,

at 8:15 o'clock

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, and the following

CITIZENS' COMMITTEE

Chairman

Mr. Adrian Van Sinderen

Vice-Chairmen

Mr. Frank L. Babbott
Mrs. Edward C. Blum
Hon. Frederick E. Crane
Mr. Walter H. Crittenden
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. William H. Good
Mr. Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
Mr. R. Huntington Woodman

Mr. Frederick T. Aldridge
Dr. Joseph D. Allen
Mr. Juan A. Almirall
Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Jr.
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. Charles R. Buckley
Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D.
Hon. William M. Calder
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
Mr. J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. George W. Chauncey
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford
Hon. James C. Cropsey
Hon. Norman S. Dike
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. Guy DuVal
Mr. S. Raymond Estey
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Mr. Theodore L. Frothingham
Mr. William Peter Hamilton
Mr. Walter Hammitt
Mr. George Hewlett
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
Mr. William T. Hunter
Mr. Darwin R. James
Dr. William A. Jewett
Mr. James H. Jourdan
Mr. Charles D. Lay
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Hon. George V. McLaughlin
Mrs. William W. Marshall
Mr. W. S. Morton Mead
Mr. Frank C. Munson
Mr. Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. George Notman
Mr. Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
Mr. James H. Post
Mr. Charles E. Potts
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
Mrs. Donald Ross
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, Jr.
Mr. H. Stavely Sammond
Mrs. Henry Spelman
Mr. Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Miss Marion J. Terry
Mr. William Armour Thayer
Mr. Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mr. Paul E. Vernon
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Mr. Eugene A. Widman
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Hon. George A. Wingate
Mr. Cornelius D. Wood
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

REMAINING DATES

Friday Evening, January 6
Thursday Evening, February 2
Friday Evening, March 3
Friday Evening, April 7

SEASON TICKETS for the Series of Five Concerts: $6.00, $8.00, $10.00, $12.50; Boxes, $8.00, $10.00, $12.50.
SINGLE TICKETS for First Concert Only on Sale Monday, November 7, at 8:30 a.m., $1.25, $1.75, $2.25, $2.75; Boxes, $2.50, $3.00. No Tax.

"... the perfect union of heart and brain, that make for unforgettable achievement ..."—N.Y. Times.

FRITZ KREISLER

VIOLINIST

TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 1

at 8:15 o'clock

OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

To Members with Coupons	$1.00, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50	To Non-Members	$1.50, $2.00, $2.50, $3.00
Boxes	$2.00, $2.50	Boxes	$2.50, $3.00

Prices include Tax

AS OTHERS SEE US

The Boston Symphony Orchestra - Season 1932-1933

Pittsburgh

"Simply superb.

"There may be other and lengthier ways of describing it, but that is the Boston Symphony in one paragraph.

"When drawing up your list of the season's concerts, remember this opening program by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston men - and be grateful that we can still have such incomparable music."

- Post-Gazette, October 29, 1932

Columbus

"We thought that Boston had a great orchestra under Muck; we believed it had a great orchestra when Koussevitzky came here before, but last night so happily met were the talents of the band, the skill of the conductor and his enthusiasm for a great work, in the playing of the Fifth Symphony, that we could call it nothing less than a super-orchestra."

- Dispatch, October 28, 1932

Cincinnati

"Hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Music Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program of marvelous worth, made such a vivid impression, so overwhelmed the emotions, that anything less than fervent praise would amount to injustice. And there are 3,500 people who were in Music Hall last night and gave demonstrative expression totheir approval."

- Enquirer, October 27, 1932

Detroit (Ann Arbor)

"Music, played by an organization that can stand with the very best both in this country and abroad, was king here tonight, and the town paid proper tribute to it."

- Detroit Free Press, October 26,1932

Hartford

"Dr. Koussevitzky offered a program at Bushnell Memorial Hall Wednesday evening that was three-quarters familiar music with a new Sibelius tone-poem added for good measure - and played the whole list as if it were new; beautifully, zestfully, appreciatively in every measure; and the huge audience that welcomed him and the orchestra gave every evidence of the most entire satisfaction with the whole concert, as well it might."

- Courant, November 17, 1932

Providence

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night before a crowded house gave the first of its all too short series of concerts in the Albee theatre....Impeccable in their musical excellence they are ever welcome nor can one become too familiar with their sterling qualities. Each re-hearing reveals new features less well comprehended before and with each repetition they become more completely our own."

- Bulletin, December 7, 1932

AS OTHERS SEE US

New York

"The Boston orchestra has one conductor, whose appearances are interspersed occasionally with short visits of guest leaders or the conducting of the concertmaster. That the orchestra benefits by this arrangement is obvious. No other American orchestra has today such fineness of tone and consistency of style."
- Times, January 29, 1933

Washington

"One of the largest audiences of the season welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday on its only visit to Washington this season. That this hearing will not be repeated is to be regretted, since two hours of superb playing the like of which has not been achieved by any visiting orchestra this year was given.

"The audience broke forth into wildest enthusiasm and applauded for many minutes after the finish of the program and seemed loath to leave even after the many acknowledgements Mr. Koussevitzky came out to make."
- Star, February 1, 1933

Reading, Pa.

"With the marvelous background of 110 tried and experienced musicians, and a well balanced program of three masters, plus a vibrant and insatiable artist to lead them in their beautiful pianissimo and stirring fortissimo passages, who could fail to designate this concert as the climax of all the musical activities ever held in Reading?"
- Pottsville Morning Paper,
January 31, 1933

Baltimore

"Had there been any doubt that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was entrenched among the outstanding musical organizations of the time it would have been dispelled by the concert Mr. Serge Koussevitzky directed at the Lyric last night. The occasion had so many points of beauty that I find contemplation of it impossible without a sigh of regret for the days when its annual series of concerts were the glory of Baltimore's season.
- Post, February 2, 1933

- - - - -

The BULLETIN of the Institute of Arts and Sciences
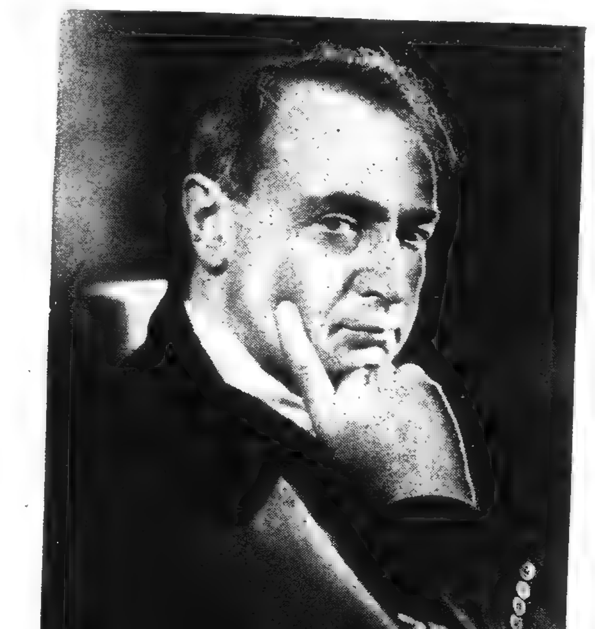
Brooklyn, New York City, October 8, 1932
NUMBER 3

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from Europe on the Ile de France on September 28. Dr. KOUSSEVITZKY went immediately to Boston to assemble the one hundred and ten musicians of the Orchestra for rehearsal in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 7 and 8. This will be the Orchestra's 52nd season and the 9th under the conductorship of KOUSSEVITZKY who will thus exceed any continuous term of a previous conductor of this famous Orchestra.



The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first trip outside of Boston next month for a week of concerts in the Middle West. The Orchestra will appear for its usual series of concerts at the Institute on the evenings of November 18, January 6, February 2, March 3 and April 7.

Save for a single concert in Vienna on June 14 when he appeared as guest of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and was given a brilliant reception, Dr. KOUSSEVITZKY has made no public appearances in Europe this summer. He has divided his time between rest in the mountains and his usual quest for new scores of importance.

The Conductor's baggage contained some precious new scores and the promise of others from eminent European and American composers. Among these are the new Eighth Symphony which SIBELIUS, Finnish composer, has just completed; "Rebus" by MAR-

(Continued on page 55)

(Continued from page 45)

KEVITCH, a mere boy but of extraordinary talent; new piano concertos by PROKOFIEFF and FLORENT SCHMITT, with the composers as soloist in each case. A notable English score will be WALTON's choral "Belshazzar's Feast." New American works will include a new symphony of GRUENBERG, two scores by JOHN ALDEN CARPENTER, and a composition by ROGER SESSIONS. Classical music will have its due predominance on his programs, however, and will include MAHLER's Sixth and BRUCKNER's Fourth Symphonies, together with BEETHOVEN's Ninth, BERLIOZ' "Damnation of Faust," and other more familiar masterpieces. A BRAHMS Festival next Spring will commemorate the hundredth anniversary of this composer's birth.

It is Dr. KOUSSEVITZKY's belief that while Vienna may still retain "the world's most wonderful atmosphere for music," America is assuming the world's leadership in the present phase of musical history.

"No country in the world is making so great an effort toward education in music," said Dr. KOUSSEVITZKY. "The interest in orchestral music in this country is so great that it remains in spite of every interference. Music in America is not something superficial," he continued, denying that there is any ground for the extensive popular belief that musical appreciation in this country lacks the depth of Europe's appreciation for the art. "The groundwork has been so well prepared that music is absolutely a necessity here."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 2 - 1932

Germany Applauds Doctor K.

Of Recitals and Musicians

SOME INKLING of the comparative importance of American musicians is frequently obtained only through criticism columns in newspapers abroad. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for instance, is the subject of the following published comment in the Vienna Neuigkeits-Welt-Blatt of June 15, this year:

"The end of Vienna's festival week brought yesterday, in the great Musikvereinssaal, a remarkable concert by the Vienna philharmonic, led by a conductor of the highest standing, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, of Boston. In the introductory D-major concerto of Philip Emmanuel Bach. . . . the audience pricked up its ears. Especially the second movement, with the song of the solo oboe and the full resonance of the strings, came as a revelation. That Koussevitzky is an authority on modern music (especially French) was soon manifest in the subtle phrasing of the two nocturnes of Debussy, and the suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," of Ravel. A sure instinct for the texture of tone painting brought the last work in particular to an impressive clarity.

Aroused by Bach, And Also Debussy

"Koussevitzky's distinctive qualities are a noble, pulsing rhythm, drawn into dramatic power by the cumulative intensification of the surging mass of sound. The Vienna Philharmonic, spurred to a sure response by the suggestive force of the master conductor, reached its fullest eloquence. Scarcely had the last measure sounded when audience, and orchestra as well, rose spontaneously and feted the inspired conductor."

Tickets for the Columbus concert of the Boston orchestra can be obtained from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

OCT 2 - 1932

Koussevitzky Rehearsing.

THE Ile de France brought to New York during the past week Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been sojourning in Europe, as is his custom, since the close of the 1931-32 orchestral season. Dr. Koussevitzky left New York at once for Boston to assemble the 110 musicians of the orchestra for a series of rehearsals in preparation for the opening of the orchestra's fifty-second season in Boston on Friday afternoon of the current week.

The Boston Symphony, which is ready to start its ninth consecutive season under Koussevitzky's baton, will be heard but once in Washington this coming season, when it will appear at Constitution Hall on Tuesday afternoon, January 31, at 4:30 o'clock, as the fifth and final attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's 1932-33 artists' series of afternoon concerts there. The orchestra will make its first out-of-town trip this month, when it invades the Middle West for a series of six or seven concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 2 - 1932

Modest Mr. Koussevitzky.

A few months ago, when Herbert Witherspoon journeyed east to Boston with the Chicago Civic Opera (of which he was artistic director) he dropped in to talk with Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony. As chairman of the approaching World's Fair celebration in the Windy City Witherspoon was arranging for the appearance there of various eminent musicians, as guest conductors of the Exposition Orchestra.

Mr. Witherspoon explained that no considerable sum of money was available for any fees, which would have to be nominal. The honor factor was one to be taken into consideration. The suave Koussevitzky was charmed, even delighted at the prospect of visiting Chicago in such circumstances; and he would write Mr. Witherspoon shortly.

In a few days a letter was received from the Russian former bass-viol player in which he said that he would be pleased to conduct four performances within a week to be selected; that his fee would be $2000 for each; and that he would also expect traveling and living expenses for himself and his suite. Oh yes! there was one thing more: since hotel accommodations would be at a premium it would be wise if Mr. Witherspoon reserved those accommodations immediately....in Chicago's most expensive hotel.

Up to date Mr. Koussevitzky hasn't received a reply to his letter and probably will not.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL

(2)

OCT 2 1932

Music & Drama

By MALCOLM MILLER

AMERICAN COMPOSITIONS

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who returned from Europe last Wednesday, says that the playing of American works is the only way to stimulate native composers to fine creative musical art, and he will feature a number of American compositions during the coming season in Boston.

Koussevitsky will play a symphonic number by Louis Gruenberg, composer of the opera "Emperor Jones," which will have its world premiere at the Metropolitan this season. He will feature two compositions by John Alden Carpenter, and one by Rogers Sessions.

Among the new European compositions to be presented by Koussevitsky this season, are: "Rebus," by Igor Markevitch, young Russian composer; Florent Schmitt's "Symphonie Concertante," for piano and orchestra, with the composer as guest soloist; Serge Prokofieff's "Fourth Piano Concerto," with Prokofieff as soloist; an orchestral suite by Alban Berg; a new piano concerto by Arnold Bax, and "Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by the young British composer, William Walton. The Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs will furnish the chorus for "Belshazzer's Feast."

Sibelius's "Eighth Symphony," which was postponed last season because Sibelius did not complete his manuscript in time, will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in February.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 3 - 1932

Koussevitzky Prepares For Coming Season

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was in his home city Thursday assembling his 110 musicians preparatory to the opening of the 1932-33 season in Boston, Oct. 7 and 8. He returned last week on the Ile de France from his customary summer in Europe.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in Memorial hall Oct. 27 in the first concert of the season offered by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. Program for the evening will receive the early attention of the conductor, who has been in communication with Mrs. B. G. Huntington, president of the Symphony club, concerning the always important selection of numbers.

This year marks the fifty-second season for the Boston orchestra and the ninth season under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

OCT 3 - 1932

Dividends In Art?

THE conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns from Europe with some new scores, also with kind words for American composers. He will present the works of several during the coming season, and regards them as full of promise for a new musical era in this country.

There may be something in it. It is a bromide of the musical world that an individual artist only attains to "soul" in his or her performances after experiencing deep sorrows and dire tribulations in personal life. This doctrine always smacks of treacly sentimentalism, but it has many advocates. Perhaps then, by this reasoning, our people as a whole have been tempered to both the production and the appreciation of great music by some of our recent national unpleasantness. Certainly the national spirit of 1932 is vastly different from that of which we used to boast. Gone is a good deal of bumptiousness and self-confidence. Whatever humility may be worth, many of us are ready to cash in upon it. If the dividend is to come in the form of noble symphonies and operas, that won't fill our purses, but it may be one of those spiritual compensations so many of our leaders have told us would proceed from the depression.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

4 - 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived in Boston last Wednesday will conduct the first concerts of the 52nd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

OCT 4 - 1932

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of Boston symphony, back with a lot of new music for his ninth season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 5 - 1932

Arthur Fiedler, who batons great music out of a large group of the Boston Symphony orchestra to make the Symphony hall "Pops" worth the trip to Boston and who gets great results out on the Hub's Esplanade, took a holiday yesterday. Just like the postman's, too. He came to Worcester to listen to last night's Festival rehearsal, and to see his old friend, Conductor Stoessel. Mr. Fiedler brought his cousin, Joseph Zimbler, a noted 'cellist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 6 - 1932

MUSIC NOTES.

A Tchaikovsky program, comprising the Andante from the Fifth symphony, a Russian dance and the "Marche Slav," will be played by Alexander D. Richardson at today's free midday organ concert at Carnegie Hall.

Doris A. Humphrey, Clara Novick and Ethel Peyser will be the speakers at a meeting of the Piano Teachers' Congress of New York today at 10 A. M. at Steinway Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-second season in Symphony Hall, Boston, tomorrow afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a program consisting of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for string orchestra, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Bach-Respighi's Passacaglia and Fugue and Brahms's Second symphony.

Page 17
[illegible] OCT_NOTICES

The BULLETIN of the n Institute of Arts and Sciences

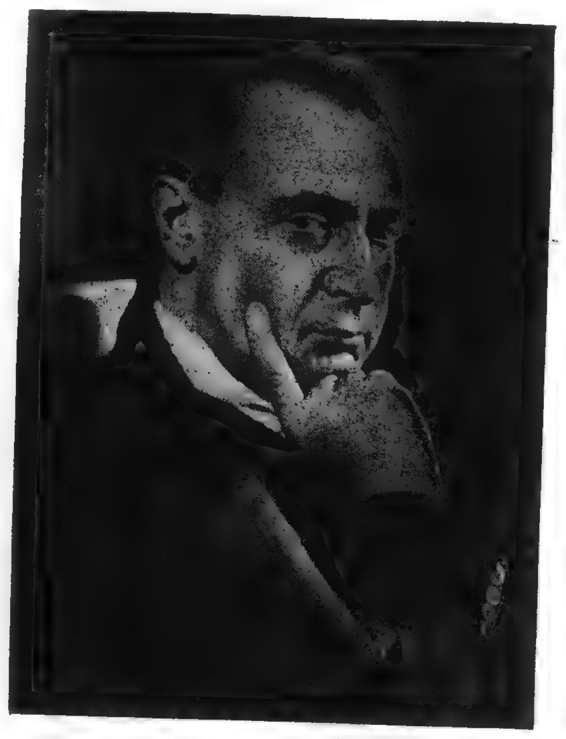
Brooklyn, New York City, October 8, 1932

NUMBER 3

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from Europe on the Ile de France on September 28. Dr. Koussevitzky went immediately to Boston to assemble the one hundred and ten musicians of the Orchestra for rehearsal in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 7 and 8. This will be the Orchestra's 52nd season and the 9th under the conductorship of Koussevitzky who will thus exceed any continuous term of a previous conductor of this famous Orchestra.



The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first trip outside of Boston next month for a week of concerts in the Middle West. The Orchestra will appear for its usual series of concerts at the Institute on the evenings of November 18, January 6, February 2, March 3 and April 7.

Save for a single concert in Vienna on June 14 when he appeared as guest of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and was given a brilliant reception, Dr. Koussevitzky has made no public appearances in Europe this summer. He has divided his time between rest in the mountains and his usual quest for new scores of importance.

The Conductor's baggage contained some precious new scores and the promise of others from eminent European and American composers. Among these are the new Eighth Symphony which Sibelius, Finnish composer, has just completed; "Rebus" by Markevitch, a mere boy but of extraordinary talent; new piano concertos by Prokofieff and Florent Schmitt, with the composers as soloist in each case. A notable English score will be Walton's choral "Belshazzar's Feast." New American works will include a new symphony of Gruenberg, two scores by John Alden Carpenter, and a composition by Roger Sessions. Classical music will have its due predominance on his programs, however, and will include Mahler's Sixth and Bruckner's Fourth Symphonies, together with Beethoven's Ninth, Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," and other more familiar masterpieces. A Brahms Festival next Spring will commemorate the hundredth anniversary of this composer's birth.

(Continued on page 55)

(Continued from page 45)

It is Dr. Koussevitzky's belief that while Vienna may still retain "the world's most wonderful atmosphere for music," America is assuming the world's leadership in the present phase of musical history.

"No country in the world is making so great an effort toward education in music," said Dr. Koussevitzky. "The interest in orchestral music in this country is so great that it remains in spite of every interference. Music in America is not something superficial," he continued, denying that there is any ground for the extensive popular belief that musical appreciation in this country lacks the depth of Europe's appreciation for the art. "The groundwork has been so well prepared that music is absolutely a necessity here."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 2 - 1932

Germany Applauds Doctor K.

◆ ◆ ◆

Of Recitals and Musicians

SOME INKLING of the comparative importance of American musicians is frequently obtained only through criticism columns in newspapers abroad. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for instance, is the subject of the following published comment in the Vienna Neuigkeits-Welt-Blatt of June 15, this year:

"The end of Vienna's festival week brought yesterday, in the great Musikvereinssaal, a remarkable concert by the Vienna philharmonic, led by a conductor of the highest standing, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, of Boston. In the introductory D-major concerto of Philip Emmanuel Bach. . . . the audience pricked up its ears. Especially the second movement, with the song of the solo oboe and the full resonance of the strings, came as a revelation. That Koussevitzky is an authority on modern music (especially French) was soon manifest in the subtle phrasing of the two nocturnes of Debussy, and the suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," of Ravel. A sure instinct for the texture of tone painting brought the last work in particular to an impressive clarity.

Aroused by Bach, And Also Debussy

"Koussevitzky's distinctive qualities are a noble, pulsing rhythm, drawn into dramatic power by the cumulative intensification of the surging mass of sound. The Vienna Philharmonic, spurred to a sure response by the suggestive force of the master conductor, reached its fullest eloquence. Scarcely had the last measure sounded when audience, and orchestra as well, rose spontaneously and feted the inspired conductor."

Tickets for the Columbus concert of the Boston orchestra can be obtained from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

OCT 2 - 1932

Koussevitzky Rehearsing.

The Ile de France brought to New York during the past week Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been sojourning in Europe, as is his custom, since the close of the 1931-32 orchestral season. Dr. Koussevitzky left New York at once for Boston to assemble the 110 musicians of the orchestra for a series of rehearsals in preparation for the opening of the orchestra's fifty-second season in Boston on Friday afternoon of the current week.

The Boston Symphony, which is ready to start its ninth consecutive season under Koussevitzky's baton, will be heard but once in Washington this coming season, when it will appear at Constitution Hall on Tuesday afternoon, January 31, at 4:30 o'clock, as the fifth and final attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's 1932-33 artists' series of afternoon concerts there. The orchestra will make its first out-of-town trip this month, when it invades the Middle West for a series of six or seven concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL

(2)

OCT 2 1932

Music & Drama

By MALCOLM MILLER

AMERICAN COMPOSITIONS

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who returned from Europe last Wednesday, says that the playing of American works is the only way to stimulate native composers to fine creative musical art, and he will feature a number of American compositions during the coming season in Boston.

Koussevitzky will play a symphonic number by Louis Gruenberg, composer of the opera "Emperor Jones," which will have its world premiere at the Metropolitan this season. He will feature two compositions by John Alden Carpenter, and one by Rogers Sessions.

Among the new European compositions to be presented by Koussevitzky this season, are: "Rebus," by Igor Markevitch, young Russian composer; Florent Schmitt's "Symphonie Concertante," for piano and orchestra, with the composer as guest soloist; Serge Prokofieff's "Fourth Piano Concerto," with Prokofieff as soloist; an orchestral suite by Alban Berg; a new piano concerto by Arnold Bax, and "Belshazzar's Feast," a work for chorus and orchestra by the young British composer, William Walton. The Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs will furnish the chorus for "Belshazzer's Feast."

Sibelius's "Eighth Symphony," which was postponed last season because Sibelius did not complete his manuscript in time, will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in February.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 2 - 1932

Modest Mr. Koussevitzky.

A few months ago, when Herbert Witherspoon journeyed east to Boston with the Chicago Civic Opera (of which he was artistic director) he dropped in to talk with Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony. As chairman of the approaching World's Fair celebration in the Windy City Witherspoon was arranging for the appearance there of various eminent musicians, as guest conductors of the Exposition Orchestra.

Mr. Witherspoon explained that no considerable sum of money was available for any fees, which would have to be nominal. The honor factor was one to be taken into consideration. The suave Koussevitzky was charmed, even delighted at the prospect of visiting Chicago in such circumstances; and he would write Mr. Witherspoon shortly.

In a few days a letter was received from the Russian former bass-viol player in which he said that he would be pleased to conduct four performances within a week to be selected; that his fee would be $2000 for each; and that he would also expect traveling and living expenses for himself and his suite. Oh yes! there was one thing more: since hotel accommodations would be at a premium it would be wise if Mr. Witherspoon reserved those accommodations immediately. . . in Chicago's most expensive hotel.

Up to date Mr. Koussevitzky hasn't received a reply to his letter and probably will not.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 3 - 1932

Koussevitzky Prepares For Coming Season

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was in his home city Thursday assembling his 110 musicians preparatory to the opening of the 1932-33 season in Boston, Oct. 7 and 8. He returned last week on the Ile de France from his customary summer in Europe.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in Memorial hall Oct. 27 in the first concert of the season offered by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. Program for the evening will receive the early attention of the conductor, who has been in communication with Mrs. B. G. Huntington, president of the Symphony club, concerning the always important selection of numbers.

This year marks the fifty-second season for the Boston orchestra and the ninth season under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

OCT 3 - 1932

Dividends In Art?

THE conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns from Europe with some new scores, also with kind words for American composers. He will present the works of several during the coming season, and regards them as full of promise for a new musical era in this country.

There may be something in it. It is a bromide of the musical world that an individual artist only attains to "soul" in his or her performances after experiencing deep sorrows and dire tribulations in personal life. This doctrine always smacks of treacly sentimentalism, but it has many advocates. Perhaps then, by this reasoning, our people as a whole have been tempered to both the production and the appreciation of great music by some of our recent national unpleasantness. Certainly the national spirit of 1932 is vastly different from that of which we used to boast. Gone is a good deal of bumptiousness and self-confidence. Whatever humility may be worth, many of us are ready to cash in upon it. If the dividend is to come in the form of noble symphonies and operas, that won't fill our purses, but it may be one of those spiritual compensations so many of our leaders have told us would proceed from the depression.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 4 - 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived in Boston last Wednesday will conduct the first concerts of the 52nd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

OCT 4 - 1932

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of Boston symphony, back with a lot of new music for his ninth season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 5 - 1932

Arthur Fiedler, who batons great music out of a large group of the Boston Symphony orchestra to make the Symphony hall "Pops" worth the trip to Boston and who gets great results out on the Hub's Esplanade, took a holiday yesterday. Just like the postman's, too. He came to Worcester to listen to last night's Festival rehearsal, and to see his old friend, Conductor Stoessel. Mr. Fiedler brought his cousin, Joseph Zimbler, a noted 'cellist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 6 - 1932

MUSIC NOTES.

A Tchaikovsky program, comprising the Andante from the Fifth symphony, a Russian dance and the "Marche Slav," will be played by Alexander D. Richardson at today's free midday organ concert at Carnegie Hall.

Doris A. Humphrey, Clara Novick and Ethel Peyser will be the speakers at a meeting of the Piano Teachers' Congress of New York today at 10 A. M. at Steinway Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-second season in Symphony Hall, Boston, tomorrow afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a program consisting of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for string orchestra, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Bach-Respighi's Passacaglia and Fugue and Brahms's Second symphony.

See Page 17
for more OCT_NOTICES

Dr. Koussevitzky on The Way to Boston

His Plans for the New Year As He Outlined Them In New York

Trans. Sept 28

Special to the Transcript:

New York, Sept. 28—Returning from Paris for a ninth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky landed in New York this morning. He proceeded directly to Boston where he may be expected this evening. He will settle again in the house at Jamaica Plain that he has lately occupied. Mme. Koussevitzky and his secretary accompanied him. He has called the first rehearsal of the orchestra for Monday next, Oct. 3. The first pair of concerts in the fifty-second season will follow at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 7 and Saturday evening Oct. 8.

Last June, as reported at the time in The Transcript, the conductor was guest at the Music Festival in Vienna where he led the Philharmonic Society through a concert notable in itself and notably well received. Otherwise, at his house at Passy in Paris or in quiet sojourn among mountains, he divided the summer between rest from the work of last season and preparation for the labor of the new symphonic year. Now he returns in full health and full ambition. He has conferred with composers and publishers; examined new scores from old and young hands; considered long-neglected music. Along these lines, with the usual leaven of "standard pieces," he has laid plans for the new season.

Continued on Page Three

Dr. Koussevitzky on The Way to Boston

Continued from Page One

The first of the notable events of the new season will be a cycle of Sibelius's symphonies, beginning with the First and ending with the new Eighth. They will be played at alternate pairs of concerts. Sibelius himself has altered his mind about a visit to the United States and will not come. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the new Eighth Symphony which is still in the composer's hands. The second notable event will be a Brahms Festival in March to mark the centenary of the composer's birth. The programs will include familiar and unfamiliar works; for example, the Double Concerto for violin and violoncello which has not been played at Symphony Hall for years. The Requiem will be repeated with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses.

In the course of the year there will be two remarkable choral concerts. At one of them Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" for chorus and orchestra—the piece by the young English composer which caused so much excitement in England last fall—will be produced for the first time in America. The Cecilia will provide the chorus. At the other concert Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," which has been long overlooked at the Symphony concerts, will be revived with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses.

Among the important new works to be played will be a new piano concerto by Prokofiev in which the composer will play the solo part. From Prokofiev comes also a suite from his opera "The Gambler," which is now practically an independent work for the concert hall it has been so much revised. From the festival of contemporary music at Vienna comes Conrad Beck's new piece, "Innominata," which was the success of the festival. Martinu has given to Dr. Koussevitzky his concerto for string quartet and orchestra to be played in Boston for the first times anywhere. Bax's long promised concerto for piano and orchestra will at last be heard with Harriet Cohen as pianist. The conductor also has in hand music by Jerzi Fitelberg and other young composers which he will distribute through his programs. From Americans he has received a symphony by Gruenberg and two pieces by Carpenter. All three will be played for the first times. The list of new music also includes three orchestral pieces by Alban Berg, the composer of "Wozzeck." Among the distinguished guests will be Florent Schmitt, who will play the piano part in his new "Symphonie Concertante," which will be done here for the first time anywhere.

From Bruckner, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen the Fourth Symphony, unplayed in Boston since 1899. From Mahler he will play the Sixth Symphony which is new to Boston. He intends also to revive Stravinsky's long-neglected "Sacre," and he will go back to Reger's "Hiller Variations," a celebrated piece in Dr. Muck's time. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be repeated at a regular pair of concerts. Among the revivals, Dr. Koussevitzky also has in mind the First Symphony of the Russian Taneiev, a work that is scarcely known in America.

In short the conductor will follow the courses that he has pursued through eight seasons in Boston. He will still encourage deserving new works, whether by old or young composers, because he believes that on such work depends the progress of music. He will choose from such relatively neglected composers as Mahler and Bruckner, for whom he has already made a public in Boston, but in no respect will he neglect the standard or classic pieces. They will have their usual honored place in the programs.

This season in particular Dr. Koussevitzky asks the warm support of the public because the concerts must in a measure contend against the depression. He believes that symphony music remains a necessity whether the times are good or bad. There will be no change in the orchestra. It remains the orchestra of last year. H. T. P.

Sept. 29-32

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR RETURNS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky acknowledged music lovers who gathered to [illegible] the Back Bay railroad station last night, to prepare for the 51st season of [illegible] orchestra, which opens Oct. 7.

Modern Music as Important as Old, Asserts Dr. Koussevitzky on Return

"Music must grow and improve like every living art," said Dr. Serge Koussevitzky last night in an interview at the Back Bay station when he arrived to inaugurate the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens Oct. 7.

Thus the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra placed himself in opposition last night to the announced policy of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Orchestra which will play almost entirely this season old masterpieces of orchestral music.

As if to illustrate his point that old music should be leavened with the new, Dr. Koussevitzky brought back with him a new piece he has named "Poem for Orchestra," which he composed during the summer. It will be played here this season. He also announced that the new "Symphonic Concertante" by Florent Schmitt, which Koussevitzky considers Schmitt's masterpiece to date, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

Many other announcements of intense interest to lovers of symphonic music were made by Dr. Koussevitzky after he was warmly greeted by a score of his musicians and others after he stepped from a train from Washington.

At the second concert of the orchestra, he said, the Fourth Symphony by Bruckner, which has not been played in Boston for more than 50 years, will be presented. For the first time in this city the Sixth Symphony by Mahler will be played. Berlig's "Damnation of Faust" will be given with a chorus of about 200 recruited from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Next spring in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the death of Brahms there will be a "Brahms Festival." Also after the first of the year, the 50th anniversary of the death of Wagner will be observed with a special Wagnerian program.

Regarding his summer, the famous orchestra conductor said, "I have travelled much—all over Europe. During my vacation I conducted only one concert, for the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra."

He was accompanied from New York by W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the assistant manager, George E. Judd.

The Eighth Symphony of Sibelius, never before played by a symphony orchestra, will receive its world premier during the present season. There will also be new compositions by Gruenberg and Carpenter.

Globe Sept 29

KOUSSEVITZKY SAYS U. S. TAKES WORLD'S LEADERSHIP IN MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Returns From Europe—Has Written Symphonic Poem During Vacation—Opens Season Here Oct 7

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra photographed by Globe staff photographer on his arrival at Back Bay Station last night

Confident that the future of orchestral music is brighter in this country than in any of the countries of Western Europe, because of the appreciation Americans entertain for musical culture, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, returned last night to this city, arriving at the Back Bay Station with his wife and members of his household.

He spent his Summer vacation in Europe and seemed both refreshed and eager for the opening of the symphony season here, scheduled for Friday night, Oct 7. That occasion will mark commencement of his ninth season, the longest consecutive leadership enjoyed by any leader of the noted orchestra.

It is his belief that, while Vienna may still retain "the world's most wonderful atmosphere for music," America is assuming the world's leadership in the present phase of musical history.

"No country in the world is making so great an effort toward education in music," said Mr Koussevitzky.

"The interest in orchestral music in this country is so great that it remains in spite of every interference. Music in America is not something superficial," he continued, denying that there is any ground for the extensive popular belief that musical appreciation in this country lacks the depth of Europe's appreciation for the art.

"The groundwork has been so well prepared that music is absolutely a necessity here."

His choice of programs for the coming season has been a constant thought with him during his Summer travels. Surprisingly, he said he would include no selections by Gershwin in this season's offerings because, he explained, Gershwin, while decidedly American, and also decidedly popular, has not written anything new during the past few months.

A great enthusiasm for an orchestral suite by Conrad Beck was expressed by Mr Koussevitzky, and he remarked that he intended to feature it in his programs. In addition he was attracted to several other novelties in music. He brought back a new symphony by Greenberg and an exceptional composition by a 19-year-old Russian, Igor Markevitch.

Among other surprises will be a new concerto by Sergei Prokofiev and the information that Florent Schmitt, prominent French composer, will come to this city in November to play a new concerto he has composed. Mr Schmitt plays the piano. The works of several young Americans will also be offered and two new works by Carpenter and Sessions.

Has Written Symphonic Poem

Upon urgent questioning, Mr Koussevitzky admitted reluctantly that he had written a symphonic poem for the orchestra during his vacation. He was quite undecided whether or not he would include the composition in his programs, remarking, "I am not essentially a composer. I write for myself—as a necessary outlet."

W. H. Brennan and G. E. Judd, executive officers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were with the leader. They met him in New York when he arrived aboard the Ile de France and accompanied him by train. After the party arrived at the Back Bay Station it proceeded to 88 Bruce st, Brookline, where Mr and Mrs Koussevitzky will make their home.

Dr. Koussevitzky on The Way to Boston

His Plans for the New Year As He Outlined Them In New York

Trans. Sept 28

Special to the Transcript:

New York, Sept. 28—Returning from Paris for a ninth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky landed in New York this morning. He proceeded directly to Boston where he may be expected this evening. He will settle again in the house at Jamaica Plain that he has lately occupied. Mme. Koussevitzky and his secretary accompanied him. He has called the first rehearsal of the orchestra for Monday next, Oct. 3. The first pair of concerts in the fifty-second season will follow at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 7 and Saturday evening, Oct. 8.

Last June, as reported at the time in The Transcript, the conductor was guest at the Music Festival in Vienna where he led the Philharmonic Society through a concert notable in itself and notably well received. Otherwise, at his house at Passy in Paris or in quiet sojourn among mountains, he divided the summer between rest from the work of last season and preparation for the labor of the new symphonic year. Now he returns in full health and full ambition. He has conferred with composers and publishers; examined new scores from old and young hands; considered long-neglected music. Along these lines, with the usual leaven of "standard pieces," he has laid plans for the new season.

Continued on Page Three

Dr. Koussevitzky on The Way to Boston

Continued from Page One

The first of the notable events of the new season will be a cycle of Sibelius's symphonies, beginning with the First and ending with the new Eighth. They will be played at alternate pairs of concerts. Sibelius himself has altered his mind about a visit to the United States and will not come. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the new Eighth Symphony which is still in the composer's hands. The second notable event will be a Brahms Festival in March to mark the centenary of the composer's birth. The programs will include familiar and unfamiliar works; for example, the Double Concerto for violin and violoncello which has not been played at Symphony Hall for years. The Requiem will be repeated with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses.

In the course of the year there will be two remarkable choral concerts. At one of them Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" for chorus and orchestra—the piece by the young English composer which caused so much excitement in England last fall—will be produced for the first time in America. The Cecilia will provide the chorus. At the other concert Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," which has been long overlooked at the Symphony concerts, will be revived with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses.

Among the important new works to be played will be a new piano concerto by Prokofiev in which the composer will play the solo part. From Prokofiev comes also a suite from his opera "The Gambler," which is now practically an independent work for the concert hall it has been so much revised. From the festival of contemporary music at Vienna comes Conrad Beck's new piece, "Innominata," which was the success of the festival. Martinu has given to Dr. Koussevitzky his concerto for string quartet and orchestra to be played in Boston for the first times anywhere. Bax's long promised concerto for piano and orchestra will at last be heard with Harriet Cohen as pianist. The conductor also has in hand music by Jerzi Fitelberg and other young composers which he will distribute through his programs. From Americans he has received a symphony by Gruenberg and two pieces by Carpenter. All three will be played for the first times. The list of new music also includes three orchestral pieces by Alban Berg, the composer of "Wozzeck." Among the distinguished guests will be Florent Schmitt, who will play the piano part in his new "Symphonie Concertante," which will be done here for the first time anywhere.

From Bruckner, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen the Fourth Symphony, unplayed in Boston since 1899. From Mahler he will play the Sixth Symphony which is new to Boston. He intends also to revive Stravinsky's long-neglected "Sacre," and he will go back to Reger's "Hiller Variations," a celebrated piece in Dr. Muck's time. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be repeated at a regular pair of concerts. Among the revivals Dr. Koussevitzky also has in mind the First Symphony of the Russian Taneiev, a work that is scarcely known in America.

In short the conductor will follow the courses that he has pursued through eight seasons in Boston. He will still encourage deserving new works, whether by old or young composers, because he believes that on such work depends the progress of music. He will choose from such relatively neglected composers as Mahler and Bruckner, for whom he has already made a public in Boston, but in no respect will he neglect the standard or classic pieces. They will have their usual honored place in the programs.

This season in particular Dr. Koussevitzky asks the warm support of the public because the concerts must in a measure contend against the depression. He believes that symphony music remains a necessity whether the times are good or bad. There will be no change in the orchestra. It remains the orchestra of last year.

H. T. P.

Sept. 29-32

THE BOSTON HERALD, THU

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR RETURNS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky acknowledged music lovers who gathered to [illegible] the Back Bay railroad station last night, to prepare for the 51st season of [illegible] orchestra, which opens Oct. 7.

Modern Music as Important as Old, Asserts Dr. Koussevitzky on Return

"Music must grow and improve like every living art," said Dr. Serge Koussevitzky last night in an interview at the Back Bay station when he arrived to inaugurate the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens Oct. 7.

Thus the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra placed himself in opposition last night to the announced policy of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Orchestra which will play almost entirely this season old masterpieces of orchestral music.

As if to illustrate his point that old music should be leavened with the new, Dr. Koussevitzky brought back with him a new piece he has named "Poem for Orchestra," which he composed during the summer. It will be played here this season. He also announced that the new "Symphonic Concertante" by Florent Schmitt, which Koussevitzky considers Schmitt's masterpiece to date, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

Many other announcements of intense interest to lovers of symphonic music were made by Dr. Koussevitzky after he was warmly greeted by a score of his musicians and others after he stepped from a train from Washington.

At the second concert of the orchestra, he said, the Fourth Symphony by Bruckner, which has not been played in Boston for more than 50 years, will be presented. For the first time in this city the Sixth Symphony by Mahler will be played. Berlig's "Damnation of Faust" will be given with a chorus of about 200 recruited from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Next spring in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the death of Brahms there will be a "Brahms Festival." Also after the first of the year, the 50th anniversary of the death of Wagner will be observed with a special Wagnerian program.

Regarding his summer, the famous orchestra conductor said, "I have travelled much—all over Europe. During my vacation I conducted only one concert, for the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra."

He was accompanied from New York by W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the assistant manager, George E. Judd.

The Eighth Symphony of Sibelius, never before played by a symphony orchestra, will receive its world premier during the present season. There will lso be new compositions by Gruenberg nd Carpenter.

Globe Sept 29

THE BO

KOUSSEVITZKY SAYS U. S. TAKES WORLD'S LEADERSHIP IN MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Returns From Europe—Has Written Symphonic Poem During Vacation—Opens Season Here Oct 7

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra photographed by Globe staff photographer on his arrival at Back Bay Station last night

Confident that the future of orchestral music is brighter in this country than in any of the countries of Western Europe, because of the appreciation Americans entertain for musical culture, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, returned last night to this city, arriving at the Back Bay Station with his wife and members of his household.

He spent his Summer vacation in Europe and seemed both refreshed and eager for the opening of the symphony season here, scheduled for Friday night, Oct 7. That occasion will mark commencement of his ninth season, the longest consecutive leadership enjoyed by any leader of the noted orchestra.

It is his belief that, while Vienna may still retain "the world's most wonderful atmosphere for music," America is assuming the world's leadership in the present phase of musical history.

"No country in the world is making so great an effort toward education in music," said Mr Koussevitzky.

"The interest in orchestral music in this country is so great that it remains in spite of every interference. Music in America is not something superficial," he continued, denying that there is any ground for the extensive popular belief that musical appreciation in this country lacks the depth of Europe's appreciation for the art.

"The groundwork has been so well prepared that music is absolutely a necessity here."

His choice of programs for the coming season has been a constant thought with him during his Summer travels.

Surprisingly, he said he would include no selections by Gershwin in this season's offerings because, he explained, Gershwin, while decidedly American, and also decidedly popular, has not written anything new during the past few months.

A great enthusiasm for an orchestral suite by Conrad Beck was expressed by Mr Koussevitzky, and he remarked that he intended to feature it in his programs. In addition he was attracted to several other novelties in music. He brought back a new symphony by Greenberg and an exceptional composition by a 19-year-old Russian, Igor Markevitch.

Among other surprises will be a new concerto by Sergei Prokofiev and the information that Florent Schmitt, prominent French composer, will come to this city in November to play a new concerto he has composed. Mr Schmitt plays the piano. The works of several young Americans will also be offered and two new works by Carpenter and Sessions.

Has Written Symphonic Poem

Upon urgent questioning, Mr Koussevitzky admitted reluctantly that he had written a symphonic poem for the orchestra during his vacation. He was quite undecided whether or not he would include the composition in his programs, remarking, "I am not essentially a composer. I write for myself—as a necessary outlet."

W. H. Brennan and G. E. Judd, executive officers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were with the leader. They met him in New York when he arrived aboard the Ile de France and accompanied him by train. After the party arrived at the Back Bay Station it proceeded to 88 Bruce st, Brookline, where Mr and Mrs Koussevitzky will make their home.

8

As Others See Us

The B. S. O.

Season 1932-1933

[illegible]

1 [illegible]

2 [illegible]

3 [illegible]

4 [illegible]

5 [illegible]

6 [illegible]

7 [illegible]

8 [illegible]

5 traffic flow

Monita Sept 15 '32

Economy vs. New Music

A PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA season without notable novelties is forecast by official announcement. The usual special performances of opera or ballet, given in recent years by the orchestra in the Metropolitan Opera houses of Philadelphia and New York, will be omitted. Programs for the thirty-third season will be devoted "almost entirely" to the "acknowledged masterpieces" of orchestral music. "This decision is based on the belief of the directors of the association that in times such as the present, audiences prefer music which they know and love, and that performances of debatable music should be postponed until a more suitable time. With these opinions the conductors fully concur."

Such a Philadelphia season is difficult to visualize. The Philadelphia Orchestra has a reputation which has been won not only by the excellence of its playing but also by the interest of its programs. Mr. Leopold Stokowski, its principal conductor, is famous not only for his interpretive powers but for his daring curiosity in new music. And the adventures of this orchestra and the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company in modern opera have made Philadelphia the musical center of the United States for those primarily interested in new productions on the lyric stage.

If Mr. Stokowski "fully concurs" in the decision to abandon all this prestige, his concurrence must have been obtained with some difficulty. For he and the management must know that no such policy is likely to be adopted by the orchestras of Boston, Chicago or New York. Dr. Koussevitzky, there can be little doubt, will continue to devise programs which keep his public familiar with the classics and introduce to them the most promising of the new scores. Dr. Stock in Chicago, although he has returned from Hollywood convinced of the increased strength of "serious" music, does not purpose to rely wholly on classic masterpieces. And Mr. Toscanini, no doubt, will continue to produce novelties by minor Italians, and his audiences will continue to receive with gratitude whatever he vouchsafes them.

The Philadelphia Orchestra announcement seems to connect this new attitude with a policy of "drastic economies." But surely the expenditure for new scores is among the least of orchestral expenses; one, it is possible to argue, that an important orchestra can hardly afford to curtail.

But possibly there is in the announcement what the legislators call a "joker." "Acknowledged masterpieces" is the term used to describe the music that will be heard in Philadelphia this season. Masterpieces acknowledged by whom? If by Mr. Stokowski, then we need apprehend no scarcity of novel pieces.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

9/6 '32

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the first symphony concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra (October seventh), will comprise compositions by Brahms, Strauss, Wagner, and possibly another piece. An orthodox program which undoubtedly will delight the audience.

The prospectus of the Philadelphia orchestra for this, its thirty-third season, contains a significant paragraph:

"The programs for the season will be almost entirely devoted to the acknowledged masterpieces of orchestral music. The directors of the association feel that in times such as the present the audiences prefer music which they know and love and that performances of debatable music should be postponed until a more suitable time. With these opinions the conductors fully concur."

It is also stated that "the Philadelphia Orchestra Association has not been immune to financial conditions due to the depression. In meeting these conditions the directors have made drastic economies, and all employes have willingly reduced their salaries. . . . Only the hearty support of the subscribers will make it possible for the association to overcome the difficulties of one of the most critical years of its history." And yet the Philadelphia orchestra, unlike the Boston, is heavily endowed.

It is known that some subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts have deplored the number of ultra-modern compositions that have been introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky. Some of the complaints have been unreasonable, even silly; other complaints have been justified. If there were noteworthy works in the list, works that imperatively called for a hearing, others, foreign and domestic, did not deserve attention. Thackeray in a proposed inscription in memory of George the First said in speaking of his tastes, that he "gave an enlightened patronage to bad oysters." The Boston public has at times been served compositions that might thus be classed.

Dr. Koussevitzky in his desire to enlarge the orchestra's repertory and acquaint the public with contemporaneous music has not infrequently, in his desire to afford foreign and even domestic composers a hearing, given evidence of his generous nature at the expense of his critical judgment; perhaps the novelty of expression appealed to him even when the musical ideas were non-existent, or the workmanship of poor or mediocre quality. But audiences welcome unfamiliar works only when their idiom is at first more or less familiar, when their beauty is not too hard to find, when they [illegible]peal to the heart and are not for the head [illegible]ne.

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HOME AGAIN

Post Sept 29

Dr. Koussevitzky Will Give New Music Hearings

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"The Symphony Orchestra will go on as usual." Thus spake Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, about to enter upon his ninth season as conductor of the Boston band, as he arrived at the Back Bay station last evening from New York, where he had disembarked yesterday morning from the Ile de France, his favorite liner.

Continued on Page 7 — Sixth Col.

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK FOR NINTH SEASON

Continued From First Page

By "as usual" the conductor meant not only that the customary number of concerts in and out of town would be given by an orchestra virtually unchanged as to personnel, but also that its musical policies would not be altered. The recent announcement that the Philadelphia Orchestra would perform no new music during the forthcoming season had prompted some to believe that the same conservative regime might be followed here.

As in the past, however, Dr. Koussevitzky's programmes, now world-renowned for their liberality and catholicity, will embrace every era of orchestral composition, including our own.

Composers as Soloists

New concertos for piano and orchestra are promised from Prokofieff and Florent Schmitt, with the composer in each case as soloist. The as yet unplayed Eighth Symphony of Sibelius will receive its world premier under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, and all of its predecessors will be heard in advance of it during the season. There will be new works from the pens of the Americans, Gruenberg and Carpenter, and from sundry Europeans of advanced tendencies.

During the summer Dr. Koussevitzky took his recreation in mountain climbing, gave thought to his new programmes and studied scores.

A Poem From Own Pen

He also found time to indulge in an activity rare for him, namely composing. A poem for orchestra is now ready, but the conductor would not say just when it will be played. As conductor, he made but one appearance during his absence from Boston, and that was in June when he was heard to general acclaim as leader of the Vienna Philharmonic.

After greeting those of his friends and colleagues that had gathered at the station to meet him, Dr. Koussevitzky, in company with Mme. Koussevitzky and his secretary, left for the house on Druce street, Brookline, that was his home last season.

Inadvertent omissions haunt long lists, especially when they are telephoned in haste from one city to another, two hundred miles apart. In The Transcript's announcement, last Wednesday, of Dr. Koussevitzky's new pieces for the Symphony Concerts, such an oversight passed by "Rebus," music for an imaginary ballet, by Igor Markevitch, the Russian, not yet in his twenties, who, these two years, has set the Parisians agog. Fortunately, he and it were described at length in The Transcript last June. There is a possibility also that his Concerto for Piano and Small Orchestra will be heard this season at Symphony Hall. . . . It should be added as well that the conductor confidently expects a new orchestral work from Roger Sessions, the composer out of New England, whose First Symphony did not pass unnoticed at these concerts a few years ago.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe Sept 1

A New Symphony Season Begins

Friday afternoon will see the beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 52d season, with Dr Koussevitsky returned for a ninth year as conductor. The program begins with a Handel Concerto Grosso in D minor for string orchestra, Op 6, No. 10; and includes Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Brahm's D major Symphony and a free transcription for orchestra by Respighi of Bach's Organ Passacaglia. This last score has not previously been played in Boston.

The orchestra this season remains practically unchanged. In this maintenance from year to year of virtually the same players, we have something for which to be grateful, for it is only through such long periods of working together that a first rate orchestra can be evolved. This has been the case in Boston for the past three seasons, and the Boston Symphony now stands recognized as one of the finest orchestras in the world, and one sensitive to the eloquent personal interpretations of Dr Koussevitzky.

Although at least one major symphony orchestra in the United States has declared for a policy of only familiar classic music this season, Dr Koussevitzky continues on his commendable path of presenting such new music as he thinks worthy of performance. He has promised for the coming season a new suite by Conrad Beck, an unspecified work by Igor Markevitch, 19-year-old Russian who has lately been a "sensation" of musical Paris; a new piano concerto by Prokofieff, and a new symphony by Gruenberg. Florent Schmitt will come here personally in November to be soloist in a performance of his new "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra. In addition, new music by John Alden Carpenter and Roger Sessions, both Americans, will figure on Dr Koussevitzky's programs.

Not all this new music will please everybody; it would, indeed, be strange if it should. Not all of it may ultimately prove to have been worthy of the great pains which the conductor always expends upon rehearsing new music. But modern composers will have been given hearings and Boston Symphony audiences will have had opportunity to follow the drift of modern music. That is what counts.

On the other hand, Dr Koussevitzky can be counted upon, from his record of eight years, to give us the best of music, which has proved its right to stay in the repertory. Not the least part of the conductor's success in this country has been gained through his exceptional ability as a program maker. The old and the new find place together on nearly all his programs, but seldom it is that his choices seem incongruous.

Beyond the engagement of Mr Schmitt, nothing has been said about soloists who may appear, or whether there will be any extended observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Johannes Brahms.

Performances of Roussel's G minor Symphony and Honegger's Symphony, both played during the orchestra's 50th anniversary year, and of Mahler's "Song of the Earth" would be doubly welcome, should Dr Koussevitzky find opportunity to play them.

University Extension Music Courses Begin This Week

Music courses for adults figure prominently this Fall in the Boston class schedule of the University Extension Division, State Department of Education. Of the 12 early evening courses which are offered, two will start this week in Music Appreciation and Appreciation of Symphonies. A special folder describing the complete music program is now available at the University Extension office, 217 State House.

New courses are offered in Narration in Music and The Use of the Singing Voice. In addition to these subjects there are classes in Modern Music, Harmony, Voice Training for Singing, Piano Playing, The Teaching of Public School Music, and Pre-School Music. Most of these courses carry collegiate credit.

Music Appreciation, which will open Tuesday at 6:30 p m in the Boston Public Library lecture hall, will be given by Alfred H. Meyer of the faculties of the Boston Conservatory of Music and the Boston University College of Music. The course consists of four parts of eight weekly lectures each, and will trace the development of music by considering in historical sequence the masterpieces of great composers. The lectures will be illustrated.

The course in appreciation of symphonies, which is offered for the ninth year, will start next Thursday at 5:15 p m in the lecture hall of the Boston Public Library. The course will, as usual, be based upon the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Visiting composers will again cooperate in explaining their own works. The complete course comprises three parts of eight weekly sessions each. Richard G. Appel, of the music division of the Boston Public Library, will serve as course leader.

The chief aims of the new course in narration in music will be to show in various familiar compositions the composer's method of telling his story.

Dorothy Tremble Moyer will instruct. She will give the first of the eight lectures on Friday, Oct 14, at 6 p m in the Boston Public Library lecture hall.

Stephen S. Townsend, of the Boston University College of Music, will instruct in the use of the singing voice. This new course, which will begin Tuesday, Nov 15, at 7:45 p m at the Crypt, 136 Tremont st, is intended especially for supervisors of music, choir masters, chorus conductors and members of choirs and choruses.

Kreisler to Open Symphony Hall Sunday Concerts

Fritz Kreisler will open the season of Sunday concerts in Symphony Hall on the afternoon of Oct 30. This will be the first concert of the course of five, which will include Lily Pons, Josef Hofmann, John McCormack and the English Singers. Fritz Kreisler is appearing instead of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, who was to give a double-bass recital on Oct 23, but has been compelled to cancel the engagement.

There will also be a course of five concerts on Tuesday and Saturday evenings, with the following artists: Lotte Lehmann, Yehudi Menuhin, John Charles Thomas, Sergei Rachmaninoff and the Don Cossacks.

6

Plays and Pl

The Chronicle Of the Waking Concert Halls

Koussevitzky's First Program, Wellesley and Worcester, The Times and Music

Trans. Oct. 3

THE prediction of one of our eldest soothsayers that Dr. Koussevitzky's first program for the Symphony Concerts would contain music of Wagner, Strauss and Brahms, along with a fourth number, hit the mark at only one piece. Brahms's lyrical Symphony in D major (No. 2) will end the concerts of next Friday and Saturday, as though to mark at the outset the composer's centenary year. Otherwise the conductor chooses Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor (Op. 6, No. 10)—long-familiar music in which the string choir of the orchestra excels; Debussy's Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," in which beauty of instrumental tone has often matched the beauty that the composer may have imagined as he wrote; the orchestral transcription of Bach's Passacaglia for organ, made by Mr. Respighi, handed to Mr. Toscanini, first heard at the Philharmonic Concerts in New York in the spring of 1930. In short, a program well within the tradition for the beginning of a new symphonic year—a classic German symphony that repetition has not staled and that gives immediate pleasure; a modern French masterpiece through which conductor and orchestra shine; the stately, songful Handel, virtuosi-fashion; one of the sonorous, rich-colored transcriptions from Bach, now in vogue.

Mr. Respighi labels his arrangement an "orchestral interpretation." He scores it for full modern orchestra, less the harps and the percussion; woodwinds in fours; six horns; an organ-pedal. After the statement of the theme, the advance through the first twelve variations are "a crescendo of orchestral richness and dynamic intensification." By the same testimony, the fourteenth and the fifteenth variations, suggesting the original draft of the Passacaglia for harpsichord, are "delightfully" handled. "The organ-pedal is added, at the seventeenth, to the wood and brass; while by the time we reach the nineteenth, the full orchestra, with timpani roll, is bearing us in a crescendo toward the climactic final variation, scored, of course, for all the instruments, fortissimo." In New York excited audiences heard the piece.

Comparisons

It is stimulating to find Dr. Koussevitzky beginning the symphonic year in the usual fashion and preparing to continue it with a second program that will contain a new and notable piece. It is also stimulating to hear no wailing from Symphony Hall as to the times. Out of experience most of us know what they are. The Symphony Orchestra, like every other orchestra in America and Europe, has not wholly escaped them. The powers that be prefer, however, to play the man's part; to face the hour resolutely, to proceed courageously; to do no repining in public. Ostentatious wringing of hands and quavering in the throat may be carried a bit too far, as witness these paragraphs from the prospectus of the Philadelphia Orchestra for the new season:

> The programs for the season will be almost entirely devoted to the acknowledged masterpieces of orchestral music. The directors of the association feel that in times such as the present the audiences prefer music which they know and love and that performances of debatable music should be postponed until a more suitable time. With these opinions the conductors fully concur. Soloists will be announced from time to time, and special performances will probably be given.
>
> The Orchestra Association has not been immune to financial conditions due to the depression. In meeting these conditions the Directors have made drastic economies, and all employees have willingly reduced their salaries. By planning wisely the Association has been enabled to make large savings without in any way sacrificing the high musical standard of past years. Only the hearty support of the subscribers will make it possible for the Association to overcome the difficulties of one of the most critical years of its history.

It is hard to imagine Mr. Stowkowski "fully concurring" in eighteen programs—his share of the Philadelphian concerts—that will contain no "debatable music," since violently "debatable music" has long been his habit and distinction. Cynics of the concert-hall might also suggest that much music which a subscription audience "knows and loves" is also music to which it usually listens impassively. Rather, the point is that these paragraphs run in the whining undertone with which Europeans, looking overseas, are wont to reproach us. As far as may be, why not keep out of music-making the depression that we still love to roll under our tongues?

Mr. Toscanini seems to be like-minded with Dr. Koussevitzky. He is proceeding as usual with the Philharmonic Concerts in New York, from Thursday and Friday next. Brahms, with the Symphony in F major (No. 3); Debussy, with "The Sea," also stand on his first program; while his novel numbers are four Polish Dances by Alexander Tansman. As Dr Koussevitzky borrows from Mr. Toscanini Respighi's arrangement of Bach's Passacaglia, so the Philharmonic Society takes from the Boston orchestra's repertory Schönberg's transcription of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, heard at Symphony Hall three years ago next winter.

"Discriminating Friendship"

Apropos Dr. Koussevitzky's return, last week, to New York and Boston, The Herald Tribune had a word to say about his cultivation of American composers: "Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, believes that it is the duty of American orchestras to give due representation to American music, and has said that he would be very happy if all our orchestras should do so. It is very important, he remarked, for a composer to be heard; if he does not hear his work performed, he will not know how it sounds. Dr. Koussevitzky did not state just what proportion of an American orchestra's repertory for a given season should be devoted to American compositions, but an idea of what he would consider a fair share for American music in a season's programs can probably be gained by a glance at the Bostonian repertory for 1931-'32.

"In its home concerts the Boston Symphony gave eight works by eight American composers in a total repertory of eighty-five works by forty-five composers. The Philadelphia Orchestra gave representation last season to the same number of American works and composers, but in a list of 136 works by sixty-two composers, so that the proportion of American music offered Philadelphian audiences was somewhat less. Our Philharmonic, with a still larger repertory of 163 works by sixty-three composers, played only five American works. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky's interest in American music has, for some time, merited the gratitude of those interested in the musical progress of this country, and is one of the factors in his prestige as an enlightened program-maker."

Gershwin

Trans. Oct. 5

John Alden Carpenter, the Chicagcan composer, best recalled by his Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," and his ballet of American life, "Skyscrapers," will be guest of the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts on Oct. 21 and 22. His new Suite for Piano and Orchestra will then be played for the first times, with Mr. Carpenter as pianist. "Skyscrapers," as tone-poem, will also have place. For four years it has not been heard at Symphony Hall. The new Suite was intended for the jubilee year of the orchestra.

For the second pair of Symphony Concerts, on Oct. 14 and 15. Dr. Koussevitzky announces the first performances in Boston through thirty years of Bruckner's Fourth Symphony, in E-flat major. He labelled it his 'Romantic" Symphony and legend rather than fact derives it from the woodlands around Vienna. More tangibly, all four parts spring from the chief theme of the First Movement.

Items of the Day Trans Oct 5

Sir Hamilton Harty, conductor of the Hallé Orchestra at Manchester and of the London Symphony Orchestra, will revisit the United States at midwinter. He is already engaged as guest in Cleveland and other Western cities. There is at least a possibility that he will conduct in Boston where he was well received when he led the orchestra of The Pops through a concert on a Sunday evening in June, 1931.

Foreword for The Incoming Musical Year

Trans — Oct 6

The First Symphony Concerts, The Public and the Times, Bach via Respighi

THE concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will begin the fifty-second year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For a ninth season Dr. Koussevitzky continues as conductor. Outside one minor replacement the personnel of the orchestra is unchanged. It remains at the height of the prestige to which, in New York as well as in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky has restored it. He keeps and enlarges his renown as a program-maker both catholic and discreet; as an encourager of young composers, even though they be American or modernist or both. Since Dr. Muck's years at Symphony Hall no conductor in Boston has so warmly revitalized ancient or modern classics; while none before him has been as vigilant, generous and open-minded toward music of this immediate day, expressing our time and ourselves, bearing witness to an art that from Apollo and Orpheus to Stravinsky and Sibelius has ever been in flux. No other has been more diligent in the recall to the active repertory of unduly neglected composers and compositions; in return to music by living hands that deserves more than first, and only, performance. The orchestra works in Dr. Koussevitzky's image. Since Dr. Muck's time, again, in ability, quality and reputation it has never stood so high. The present conductor has not only re-made it and the repertory. He has given the Symphony Concerts a policy and standards. None need go far from Boston by land or by sea, to discover that many know the city by the just fame of its orchestra.

The only change to be recorded at the outset of this fifty-second year is a slight and inevitable diminution of public support. The audience for symphony concerts of the first rank is necessarily limited. In a great capital like New York, it is estimated at no more than 12,000 persons. In the smaller, but singular, Boston, it may easily be less numerous. Whatever the numbers, it is a public bound to feel the stress of the times. Economies, willing, reluctant or unescapable, are the order of the day; among them the foregoing of tickets to the Symphony Concerts, or the division of them, as The Transcript's advertising columns bear weekly witness, among many holders. Yet the repercussion in the box-office at Symphony Hall has been less than there was reason to fear.

While there are no more waiting lists for the subscription concerts, nearly every available place has now been taken for the Friday matinées. For Saturday evenings hardly more than a hundred seats remain—a condition not wholly to be deplored since it gives opportunity at last to those who prefer the pleasures of symphonic music occasionally rather than serially. The audiences at the Symphony Concerts have so long been narrowly limited to subscribers that many may hardly realize that the doors are again open to a new and wider public. As it is, the trustees, the conductor and the management may proceed along usual or unusual courses with firm resolution and good hearts. In half a century of existence the Symphony Concerts have withstood more than one "depression." Again they are preserving themselves, though the test of the annual guarantee fund has still to come. By agreeing testimony, there is more money in Boston than in most American cities to spend on music and the theater—and more willingness so to spend it.

Dr. Koussevitzky's first program follows the tradition of inaugural concerts: a classic German symphony, well remembered and immediately pleasurable, the lyrical second Symphony, in D major, of Brahms; a French masterpiece of beauty to which stage and auditorium have long been responsive, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; return to the perennial ancients with a familiar Concerto Grosso for Strings by Handel, No. 10, in D minor; a new transcription for orchestra by Mr. Respighi of Bach's vast Passacaglia for Organ. When it was produced in the spring of 1930 by Mr. Toscanini at the Philharmonic Concerts in New York, Mr. Lawrence Gilman wrote at length about it in the Herald Tribune. He may now be quoted, passim, for the preparation of Bostonian hearers:

"Transcriptions of any kind are perilous things to offer a certain type of musician or music-lover. . . . You would think, to hear them talk, that transcriptions are always and necessarily disreputable. But surely it depends on the transcriber and the transcription. Esser's transcription of Bach's Passacaglia is one thing; Mr. Stokowski's is quite another thing, Mr. Respighi's yet another. . . . As for the impenitent Bach, he was probably the most persistent, if not the most skillful, transcriber in the history of music. He did not hesitate to arrange his own works and those of other composers as he saw fit. . . . So far as the Passacaglia is concerned, the work was transcribed by Bach himself. The version in which we possess it, for organ, was not its original form. Bach wrote it in the first instance for a two-manual clavicembalo, or harpsichord, with pedals, and afterward arranged it for organ.

"Mr. Respighi will probably be reproached ,as Mr. Stokowski has been for transcribing the work for orchestra. It may be said that what was permissible to Bach is not permissible to others. But the fact remains that Bach left us his towering Passacaglia, one of the greatest works of the musical imagination that we possess, in a form that restricts it to givers of and listeners to organ recitals—which, in this country at least, made it virtually unknown to the general musical public until its reincarnation as an orchestral work was accomplished by Mr. Stokowski, some eight years ago, and by Mr. Respighi the other day. As Mr. Stokowski has truly pointed out, 'the musical content of the work is so full and significant that the medium of expression is of relative unimportance.'

"Imitation of organ effects by the orchestra has not been the aim of Respighi. He calls his transcription an 'interpretazione orchestrale.' His translation of Bach's musical subject-matter into terms of the orchestra has been made with skill and with true orchestral imagination. . . . His scoring of the first twelve variations is a crescendo of orchestral richness and dynamic intensification. The statement of the theme, forte, is by the string basses, organ pedal, two trombones, bass tuba, three bassoons and double-bassoon. The first variation is scored for strings alone; the second adds clarinet and bassoons. The third is for solo viola, 'cellos, double-basses, flute, bassoon, horn and English horn. The fourth and fifth are for strings, woodwind and horn. All these are, for the most part, marked piano or pianissimo. At the sixth variation, Respighi brings in a trumpet, trombone and tuba, together with the string basses, and begins a long crescendo. The instrumentation becomes progressively fuller, and at the eleventh variation the theme (in the upper voice) is given to violins, violas and trumpet in unison, with the figuration for sixteenth-notes in the other strings. The twelfth variation is for full orchestra fortissimo. But for the thirteenth (where the theme is in a middle voice) Respighi withdraws most of his instruments and uses only strings and woodwind.

"At the fourteenth variation Bach has reminded us that his Passacaglia was composed originally for the harpsichord. This and the following variation, as Mr. Grace justly observes in his book on the organ works, 'so clearly belong to the cembalo that they seem mere fidgety trifling on the organ.' He even advocates the elimination of these two variations in performance—'as with superfluous numbers in any other set of variations.' They do not seem superfluous in Respighi's transfer of them to the orchestra. He scores the fourteenth, pianissimo, for divided strings, two flutes and bass clarinet, and the fifteenth for divided strings, woodwind, trombones and tuba, used softly. The effect is delightful.

"The sixteenth variation is given to woodwind, horns, trombones, tuba and double basses, fortissimo. The organ pedal is added, at the seventeenth, to the wood and brass, and by the time we reach the nineteenth, the full orchestra, with timpani roll, is bearing us in a crescendo toward the climactic final variation, scored, of course, for all the instruments, fortissimo. The beginning of the attendant Fugue is lost, as it is in the organ form of the piece. Respighi gives the opening note of the subject to a bassoon, which is buried in the fortissimo roar of the C-minor chord that closes the final variation. We hear it in the next measure, thanks to the sudden hushing of the music, against its counter-subject, which Respighi gives to the violas.

"The first half-hundred measures of the Fugue are scored with a moderate use of tone and orchestral color. Only the strings, woodwind and horn are employed. The double-shake at the 101st and 102d measures (scored for clarinet, bass-clarinet, oboes, and English horn) sounds better from the orchestra than it does on the organ—where, as a matter of fact, it is often grotesque. The final entry of the principal subject is given to the four trumpets in unison and from here to the end we get the full glory of the orchestra, triple forte, irradiating the topless grandeur of that edifice wherewith Bach proves to us once again that his music is 'builded of all heights, all depths, and all immensities.' "

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. [illegible]

Ourselves and Others

THE symphonic year begins this week in three major cities: Boston, New York, Philadelphia. In the fourth, Chicago, Mr. Stock and his orchestra will not be heard until next Thursday and Friday. Dr. Koussevitzky's program for the Boston Orchestra runs:

Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 10, in D minor for String Orchestra	Handel
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"	Debussy
Passacaglia for Organ (Scored for Orchestra by Respighi)	Bach
Symphony, No. 2, in D major	Brahms

In New York, Mr. Toscanni and the Philharmonic Society are playing:

Prelude and Fugue in E minor (Scored for Orchestra by Schönberg)	Bach
Symphony, No. 3, in F major	Brahms
Four Polish Dances	Tansman
Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea"	Debussy

From Mr. Stokowski and his orchestra the Philadelphians will hear:

Fugue in C minor (Scored for Orchestra by Stokowski)	Bach
Symphony, No. 7, in A major	Beethoven
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"	Debussy
Jungle	Josten

The curious in such matters may note that each of these "inaugural" programs contains an orchestral transcription from Bach; that all three find room for Debussy; that on two Brahms is preferred to Beethoven as ceremonial German symphonist.

Oct 7

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY

Plays and Playe

In The Daily Round

Serge Koussevitzky

From a Photograph Taken in Boston This Week by Boris, Which Pleases Those with Whom He Works at Symphony Hall

---

Symphony Opens 52d Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 52d season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who is now in his ninth year as conductor. The program, which was arranged on a more or less conservative basis befitting the occasion, was made up of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," the Bach Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, orchestrated by Respighi (first time in Boston) and the Brahms second symphony.

When Mr. Koussevitzky walked on the stage at the beginning of the concert he was enthusiastically applauded by the audience, which rose to do him honor. The good will continued throughout the concert, for the applause after each number gained in steady crescendo.

An unexpectedly loud outburst followed the concluding notes of the Respighi transcription, inspired by the sonorous finale. This orchestration, which was based on the organ version of the Bach work, but which—in Respighi's own words—did not attempt to imitate organ effects, was brilliantly conceived, and was, in fact, an "orchestral interpretation" of an old work written for another medium. That probably explains why it brought the house down, while the original might have left a modern audience cold.

In this work, as in the others making up the program, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra played brilliantly. The Handel Concerto displayed the brilliant and euphonious string section of the orchestra at its best. The various solo parts, also, were beautifully played. H. M.

Amusements

Trans. Oct 8

Play

Through Four Who Are Not To Be Denied

From Bach and Handel On To Brahms and Debussy Runs The Symphony Concert

IN the fitness of things went, yesterday, the first Symphony Concert of the new musical year. . . . In spite of forebodings, now happily put to rout, there were no signs of a diminished audience. An empty chair there, an empty chair here; but no more than is usual on any Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall from October to May. Frequent, however, were the tokens of a changed audience. Divide the floor into little squares, as maps are sometimes divided. Fill each square with a group of subscribers long accustomed to each other's weekly presence. Glance along those squares, at this beginning of the fifty-second year of the Symphony Concerts, and there were plentiful newcomers. So have renounced or divided subscriptions—the times in short—altered the face of these long-standing matinées.

But not the habits or the moods of those that frequent them. When Dr. Koussevitzky came to his place to join the risen orchestra, a partially rising audience greeted him with the clapping of familiar good will rather than of eager effusion. It renewed these plaudits at his every return to the podium; but for excitement in these things the onlooker must await the evening concert. Not one of the four pieces that filled the afternoon failed to please a company, warmest toward Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Brahms's Second Symphony; less stirred than was expected by the surging close of Respighi's transcription of Bach's Passacaglia in C-minor. The surprise of the day, however, the proof, perhaps, of newness, was the neglect to call the orchestra to its feet. Back came the conductor, once and twice, after the Passacaglia and the Symphony; but the applause was too brief to warrant the usual signal to the players. Perhaps the first audience of 1932-33 believed it had done its duty when it clapped the entering Burgin on his way to the Concert-Master's seat. Or let the fervent hand-clasping between conductor and leader speak for it.

For the occasion Dr. Koussevitzky was not only the admirable but the well-nigh perfect program-maker. Even at the first concert of a new symphonic year he did not forego his novel number. But the unimpeachable Bach had made and signed this Passacaglia in or about 1717; whereas Respighi, who does not often go unscathed, had "merely" clothed it in an orchestral dress of these nineteen-thirties. To Bach add Handel, in one of those Ten Concerti Grossi for Strings, oftener played in Symphony Hall than in any other symphonic seat that comes readily to mind. The choice lighted upon Number Ten, in D minor. As with much eighteenth-century music, it is hard for memory to distinguish among the set, but, alike from Dr. Koussevitzky and his predecessors, none is more familiar or better remembered. The grave and stately Overture sounds sonorously the note of ceremony. The succeeding air leads in Euterpe in singing robes. In the two lighter movements (as the conductor arranges the Concerto) her subjects, on stage and in auditorium, rejoice politely in her presence and works renewed. Bach and Handel, the everlasting, in a single concert! How much more to be desired than the dead and dying mediocrities—Dvorák and Grieg are convenient examples—that used to litter even "inaugural" programs!

And is Brahms displacing Beethoven as the symphonist par excellence for the beginning of a new musical year? Often in Dr. Koussevitzky's house, and oftener than not in Mr. Toscanini's. As Beethoven was to conductors and audiences in the Victorian generations so is Brahms in ours. No classic composer now exceeds him in public favor. Where is another upon whom the race of conductors more loves to exercise its powers? The Brahms Festivals to signal the centenary year of his birth promise to be as many and fervent as those that marked, within memory, the hundredth year after Beethoven's death. One for Boston, next spring, seems not only inevitable, but also desirable. . . . Debussy, too, is becoming French master and world master for these "inaugural" occasions. In New York yesterday Mr. Toscanini was playing his sea-pieces while Dr. Koussevitzky was transforming the stage of Symphony Hall into the Faun's bosky retreat. Debussy did his work and died his death and left no small treasure behind within easy recollection of men not yet old. It is tonic to be reminded that our over-belittled time has also produced eminent composers. There are Debussy . . . and Strauss . . . and Sibelius . . . and, maybe, at the top of his powers, a certain Igor Stravinsky.

Note as well with many a hearer, the unlessened freshness, the ever-renewed vitality, the persistent appeal to ear and imagination of this Faun of Debussy and this Symphony of Brahms. As we listeners ripen in them, so do we the more enjoy them. True, our enjoyment yesterday owed much to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The orchestral tone, throughout Debussy's Prelude, was at once luminous and sensuous. The pattern of the music, the melody, the rhythm, unfolded through the golden haze of the harmonic and instrumental color. Every element in the facture was justly blended in the performance. The conductor's pacing and phrasing, the orchestra's skill and sensibility, all contributed to the glamouring, poetizing end. "The Afternoon of a Faun" is forty years old; Debussy finished the manuscript in 1892. Through nearly thirty seasons it has been intermittent piece at Symphony Hall. A horde of composers have fastened upon the Debussyan inventions; assimilated, as best they might the Debussyan procedures. Yet it is still possible to hear the Prelude with the thrill of first acquaintance no less than the deeper delights of many meetings.

With Brahms's Symphony in D major conductor and orchestra likewise excelled. The tonal afterglow upon the end of the first movement; the drooping gesture with which the slow movement stills into pathos; the swift leaps of the

Continued on Following Page

Symphony Concert

Continued from Preceding Page

Allegretto out of lyric sweetness into rhythmic light; the crescendo of quickening pace and brightening color through the finale, were alike instant upon the listening ear, vivid upon the waiting imagination. If the orchestra had outspread Debussy's shimmering textures, it was not less susceptible to the more substantial and subdued Brahms. Dr. Koussevitzky, moreover, was perceptive and just in the reading of the Symphony. He does not play it as the pretty music that the composer, in ironic raillery, liked to call it. He will not hear it as the pastoral symphony for which label only the Allegretto gives warrant. Nor will he have it a music of serenity, sweetness, suavity—in the Brahmsian degrees of those qualities—which obviously through many a measure it is not. Rather, he divines the blending within of warmth and tenderness, resignation and energy, melancholy and ardor. The sun shines, but clouds are not far away. The summer earth sings; but sadness veils the watching eyes and touches the listening heart of the tone-poet. So conceiving the Symphony, the conductor found the just means to sustain its songful voice, to clarify its changing moods. (It were hard to imagine a performance more transparent of tone, more sensitive of phrase.) Fifty years on, Brahms's Second Symphony remains, like Debussy's Prelude, a timeless music.

For the novel number—to the debate over the wisdom or the unwisdom of orchestral arrangements of Bach's clavier and organ pieces this article shall not contribute. Of a truth and of a verity that quarrel has no end so long as pens may scratch paper and tongues wag in club-corners. In this particular instance suffice it to say that had not the Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor been transcribed by the handy Esser, the adequate Stock, the impetuous Stokowski, and now by the just and masterful Respighi, few frequenters of symphony concerts would have any acquaintance with a manifold and mighty music. Making his version, Respighi is more than mature master of orchestral resource. He uses that mastery with orchestral imagination. He is more also than the scholar searching out and pondering the original Passacaglia. As he transfuses it into a new medium, he is the fellow-composer who, in kind and degree, may enter penetratingly and with sympathy. Always there have been reservations when Respighi would draw his music out of himself. There have been next to none when he works up [illegible] the music of other men, be it written for lutes in a rich Italian palace or for organ in a poor German church.

Throughout the transcribed Passacaglia Respighi's orchestral means are abundant and flexible. Throughout he piles them with a rare mingling of readiness and discretion. By a fellow-composer's insight he preserves Bach's structure and substance. The impression is as though the original organ-piece had been melted down like an ingot; then reminted into the orchestral transcription. Blending composer's imagination with technician's skill, Respighi gives to each variation a distinctive color; yet through the twenty rarely falls into monotony. Never, besides, does he let the ear forget the persisting ground-bass. The mounting and deepening sonority of the final variations is foil to the preceeding richness and diversity of orchestral texture. Nowhere does Respighi stay Bach's flooding fertility, his propulsive sweep forward and upward. Save in two or three of the lighter variations, everywhere is splendor. For orchestra, as for organ, the Passacaglia rises in a passion of creation, mind and soul together. Through the Fugue, from the trumpet-proclamation of the principal subject to the surge of the final close sound "the surge and thunder of the Apocalypse." The sternest purist may agree that, if transcriptions are to be made at all, Respighi has made his superlatively well. In these days for the grandeurs of Bach no organ may suffice. The medium, if they are to strike home to us, is the multi-tongued and puissant orchestra.

H. T. P.

Oct 7

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY

Plays and Playe

In The Daily Round

Serge Koussevitzky

From a Photograph Taken in Boston This Week by Boris, Which Pleases Those with Whom He Works at Symphony Hall

---

Symphony Opens 52d Season

[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 52d season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who is now in his ninth year as conductor. The program, which was arranged on a more or less conservative basis befitting the occasion, was made up of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," the Bach Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, orchestrated by Respighi (first time in Boston) and the Brahms second symphony.

When Mr. Koussevitzky walked on the stage at the beginning of the concert he was enthusiastically applauded by the audience, which rose to do him honor. The good will continued throughout the concert, for the applause after each number gained in steady crescendo.

An unexpectedly loud outburst followed the concluding notes of the Respighi transcription, inspired by the sonorous finale. This orchestration, which was based on the organ version of the Bach work, but which—in Respighi's own words—did not attempt to imitate organ effects, was brilliantly conceived, and was, in fact, an "orchestral interpretation" of an old work written for another medium. That probably explains why it brought the house down, while the original might have left a modern audience cold.

In this work, as in the others making up the program, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra played brilliantly. The Handel Concerto displayed the brilliant and euphonious string section of the orchestra at its best. The various solo parts, also, were beautifully played.

H. M.

Amusements

Trans. Oct

Play

Through Four Who Are Not To Be Denied

From Bach and Handel On To Brahms and Debussy Runs The Symphony Concert

IN the fitness of things went, yesterday, the first Symphony Concert of the new musical year. . . . In spite of forebodings, now happily put to rout, there were no signs of a diminished audience. An empty chair there, an empty chair here; but no more than is usual on any Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall from October to May. Frequent, however, were the tokens of a changed audience. Divide the floor into little squares, as maps are sometimes divided. Fill each square with a group of subscribers long accustomed to each other's weekly presence. Glance along those squares, at this beginning of the fifty-second year of the Symphony Concerts, and there were plentiful newcomers. So have renounced or divided subscriptions—the times in short—altered the face of these long-standing matinées.

But not the habits or the moods of those that frequent them. When Dr. Koussevitzky came to his place to join the risen orchestra, a partially rising audience greeted him with the clapping of familiar good will rather than of eager effusion. It renewed these plaudits at his every return to the podium; but for excitement in these things the onlooker must await the evening concert. Not one of the four pieces that filled the afternoon failed to please a company, warmest toward Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Brahms's Second Symphony; less stirred than was expected by the surging close of Respighi's transcription of Bach's Passacaglia in C-minor. The surprise of the day, however, the proof, perhaps, of newness, was the neglect to call the orchestra to its feet. Back came the conductor, once and twice, after the Passacaglia and the Symphony; but the applause was too brief to warrant the usual signal to the players. Perhaps the first audience of 1932-33 believed it had done its duty when it clapped the entering Burgin on his way to the Concert-Master's seat. Or let the fervent hand-clasping between conductor and leader speak for it.

For the occasion Dr. Koussevitzky was not only the admirable but the well-nigh perfect program-maker. Even at the first concert of a new symphonic year he did not forego his novel number. But the unimpeachable Bach had made and signed this Passacaglia in or about 1717; whereas Respighi, who does not often go unscathed, had "merely" clothed it in an orchestral dress of these nineteen-thirties. To Bach add Handel, in one of those Ten Concerti Grossi for Strings, oftener played in Symphony Hall than in any other symphonic seat that comes readily to mind. The choice lighted upon Number Ten, in D minor. As with much eighteenth-century music, it is hard for memory to distinguish among the set, but, alike from Dr. Koussevitzky and his predecessors, none is more familiar or better remembered. The grave and stately Overture sounds sonorously the note of ceremony. The succeeding air leads in Euterpe in singing robes. In the two lighter movements (as the conductor arranges the Concerto) her subjects, on stage and in auditorium, rejoice politely in her presence and works renewed. Bach and Handel, the everlasting, in a single concert! How much more to be desired than the dead and dying mediocrities—Dvorák and Grieg are convenient examples—that used to litter even "inaugural" programs!

And is Brahms displacing Beethoven as the symphonist par excellence for the beginning of a new musical year? Often in Dr. Koussevitzky's house, and oftener than not in Mr. Toscanini's. As Beethoven was to conductors and audiences in the Victorian generations so is Brahms in ours. No classic composer now exceeds him in public favor. Where is another upon whom the race of conductors more loves to exercise its powers? The Brahms Festivals to signal the centenary year of his birth promise to be as many and fervent as those that marked, within memory, the hundredth year after Beethoven's death. One for Boston, next spring, seems not only inevitable, but also desirable. . . . Debussy, too, is becoming French master and world-master for these "inaugural" occasions. In New York yesterday Mr. Toscanini was playing his sea-pieces while Dr. Koussevitzky was transforming the stage of Symphony Hall into the Faun's bosky retreat. Debussy did his work and died his death and left no small treasure behind within easy recollection of men not yet old. It is tonic to be reminded that our over-belittled time has also produced eminent composers. There are Debussy . . . and Strauss . . . and Sibelius . . . and, maybe, at the top of his powers, a certain Igor Stravinsky.

Note as well with many a hearer, the unlessened freshness, the ever-renewed vitality, the persistent appeal to ear and imagination of this Faun of Debussy and this Symphony of Brahms. As we listeners ripen in them, so do we the more enjoy them. True, our enjoyment yesterday owed much to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The orchestral tone, throughout Debussy's Prelude, was at once luminous and sensuous. The pattern of the music, the melody, the rhythm, unfolded through the golden haze of the harmony and instrumental color. Every element in the facture was justly blended in the performance. The conductor's pacing and phrasing, the orchestra's skill and sensibility, all contributed to the glamouring, poetizing end. "The Afternoon of a Faun" is forty years old; Debussy finished the manuscript in 1892. Through nearly thirty seasons it has been intermittent piece at Symphony Hall. A horde of composers have fastened upon the Debussyan inventions; assimilated, as best they might the Debussyan procedures. Yet it is still possible to hear the Prelude with the thrill of first acquaintance no less than the deeper delights of many meetings.

With Brahms's Symphony in D major conductor and orchestra likewise excelled. The tonal afterglow upon the end of the first movement; the drooping gesture with which the slow movement stills into pathos; the swift leaps of the

Continued on Following Page

Symphony Concert

Continued from Preceding Page

Allegretto out of lyric sweetness into rhythmic light; the crescendo of quickening pace and brightening color through the finale, were alike instant upon the listening ear, vivid upon the waiting imagination. If the orchestra had outspread Debussy's shimmering textures, it was not less susceptible to the more substantial and subdued Brahms. Dr. Koussevitzky, moreover, was perceptive and just in the reading of the Symphony. He does not play it as the pretty music that the composer, in ironic raillery, liked to call it. He will not hear it as the pastoral symphony for which label only the Allegretto gives warrant. Nor will he have it a music of serenity, sweetness, suavity—in the Brahmsian degrees of those qualities—which obviously through many a measure it is not. Rather, he divines the blending within of warmth and tenderness, resignation and energy, melancholy and ardor. The sun shines, but clouds are not far away. The summer earth sings; but sadness veils the watching eyes and touches the listening heart of the tone-poet. So conceiving the Symphony, the conductor found the just means to sustain its songful voice, to clarify its changing moods. (It were hard to imagine a performance more transparent of tone, more sensitive of phrase.) Fifty years on, Brahms's Second Symphony remains, like Debussy's Prelude, a timeless music.

For the novel number—to the debate over the wisdom or the unwisdom of orchestral arrangements of Bach's clavier and organ pieces this article shall not contribute. Of a truth and of a verity that quarrel has no end so long as pens may scratch paper and tongues wag in club-corners. In this particular instance suffice it to say that had not the Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor been transcribed by the handy Esser, the adequate Stock, the impetuous Stokowski, and now by the just and masterful Respighi, few frequenters of symphony concerts would have any acquaintance with a manifold and mighty music. Making his version, Respighi is more than mature master of orchestral resource. He uses that mastery with orchestral imagination. He is more also than the scholar searching out and pondering the original Passacaglia. As he transfuses it into a new medium, he is the fellow-composer who, in kind and degree, may enter penetratingly and with sympathy. Always there have been reservations when Respighi would draw his music out of himself. There have been next to none when he works upon the music of other men, be it written for lutes in a rich Italian palace or for organ in a poor German church.

Throughout the transcribed Passacaglia Respighi's orchestral means are abundant and flexible. Throughout he piles them with a rare mingling of readiness and discretion. By a fellow-composer's insight he preserves Bach's structure and substance. The impression is as though the original organ-piece had been melted down like an ingot; then re-minted into the orchestral transcription. Blending composer's imagination with technician's skill, Respighi gives to each variation a distinctive color; yet through the twenty rarely falls into monotony. Never, besides, does he let the ear forget the persisting ground-bass. The mounting and deepening sonority of the final variations is foil to the preceeding richness and diversity of orchestral texture. Nowhere does Respighi stay Bach's flooding fertility, his propulsive sweep forward and upward. Save in two or three of the lighter variations, everywhere is splendor. For orchestra, as for organ, the Passacaglia rises in a passion of creation, mind and soul together. Through the Fugue, from the trumpet-proclamation of the principal subject to the surge of the final close sound "the surge and thunder of the Apocalypse." The sternest purist may agree that, if transcriptions are to be made at all, Respighi has made his superlatively well. In these days for the grandeurs of Bach no organ may suffice. The medium, if they are to strike home to us, is the multi-tongued and puissant orchestra.

H. T. P.

8.

Herald Oct 8

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, the opening concert of the orchestra's 52d season. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, D minor, for string orchestra, op. 6, No. 10 (Seiffert's edition). Debussy, prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun." Bach, Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, transcribed for orchestra by Respighi. Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

Dr. Koussevitzky was greeted with warm and long continued applause, and audience and orchestra paid him the compliment of standing as he came upon the platform.

Composers will not let Bach alone. They will transcribe his organ pieces for the piano or orchestra; miscellaneous smaller pieces for various instruments. If they are reproached for doing this, they reply: "Bach did not hesitate to arrange or transcribe the works of other composers and even some of his own pieces he arranged for other instruments than those he had originally chosen." Mr. Toscanini asked Respighi to transcribe Bach's Passaciglia. It was written originally for a two manual clavicembalo with pedals; later Bach turned it into an organ piece. There are other transcriptions of this work: Heinrich Esser's, Leopold Stokowski's, Frederick Stock's, but Mr. Toscanini wished one by Respighi, possibly for the glory of Italy. This new version was brought out by the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra at New York in April, 1930. Mr. Toscanini put it on programs when he conducted this orchestra on its European tour.

Esser endeavored to reproduce organ effects in his transcription. Respighi did not try to do this. He gave his version the high-sounding title "Interpretazione Orchestrale." He is acknowledged to be a master of instrumentation; perhaps he will be best known in years to come as an arranger of other men's works. One can hear him saying when he accepted the Passacaglia: "Now I'll show them what I can do to old man Bach." Well, to use a slang expression, he didn't do a thing to him. His "interpretation" is a swollen, monstrous affair, which in spite of his indisputable skill as a transcriber, is at times uninteresting if not actually dull; nor did his skill enable him to differentiate the variations so that they wholly escape the reproach of monotony. The brass may shout; the strings may alternately scrape or sigh—one is weary before the fugue is reached, and even forgets to count the variations. As at the end there is a general orchestral roar, with tumult at its height, the audience was naturally excited to rapturous applause, for even a Boston audience dearly loves an instrumental din.

It was Oliver Goldsmith who said that Dr. Johnson if he wrote about little fishes would turn them into whales. What was the need of laying violent hands on poor Bach's Passacaglia?

It is pleasanter to remember Respighi as the discreet arranger of the beautiful old Italian airs which have delighted hearers in Symphony hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky is always fortunate in his interpretation of Handel's music; the nobility, the quiet grandeur, the stirring allegros, the tenderness, and the solemnity peculiar to this composer appeal to him and he communicates his feeling to the audience.

There was a singularly poetic performance of Debussy's "Prelude," one of the most significant and charming compositions of the last 40 years.

In the first years of Brahms's Second Symphony, his admirers agreed in describing it as music of an idyllic character. They spoke of its tenderness, its serenity. Hanslick rejoiced that Brahms had returned to the earth, "the earth that laughs and blossoms in the vernal months." Yet there were some who demanded of Brahms music that was something more than "very pretty." Today deep thinkers in Germany find in this symphony an undercurrent of tragedy; music that at times is "ominous," with "ghostly elements, spectral and supernatural visions." One is tempted to change slightly the saying of a German philosopher a hundred or more years ago: "Next to hearing music the most disagreeable thing is to read opinions about it." The audience yesterday enjoyed the performance greatly and was not disturbed by "ominous" passages, nor did it shudder at the "spectral visions."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week, as now announced, will be as follows: Bruckner, Symphony No. 4 E flat, "Romantic." Strauss, "Don Juan," tone poem. Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Post Oct 8

SYMPHONY BEGINS ITS 52D YEAR

Respighi's Orchestration of Bach Fugue the Feature

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky's programme for the opening concerts of this, the 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the ninth of his conductorship, neither spectacular nor especially imposing, is a list which might have served for any pair of concerts in midseason. The symphonic year may hence be said to have begun soundly if not excitingingly. Yet there were memorable moments in the concert of yesterday afternoon.

BRAHM'S GREAT FINALE

One of these moments came in the great climax at the end of the Passacaglia in Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue as orchestrated by Respighi at Mr. Toscanini's behest and played yesterday for the first time in this city. The climax of the Fugue brought another, and that of the Finale of Brahm's Second Symphony, the last piece on the programme, a third.

Not always has the end of this Second Symphony seemed so completely to crown the work. Often it has been easy to take greater pleasure in the romantically songful first movement, the grave and brooding Adagio or the graceful Allegretto. Yesterday the Finale disclosed a new spiritedness and vigor, as of a Brahms become unexpectedly forceful and dynamic. An audience plainly stirred responded to the increasing intensities, the mounting sonorities of these final pages and could not hear the last ringing D major chord through before it let loose a tumult of applause.

Matchless Strings

A characteristic of Dr. Koussevitzky's programmes for occasions such as these opening concerts is the presence upon them of one piece for strings alone. Yesterday that piece, and incidentally the first music of the afternoon, was Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, the 10th of the familiar set of 12.

The performance of it, in which Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz and Bedetti shone as soloists, reminded us that the string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, in a degree which those of few other orchestras can match, possessed of all the virtues which properly belong to such a choir. And that their colleagues of the woodwind and horns can ravish the ears with euphonies exquisite was proved again in the ensuing piece, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."

Respighi's Task Well Done

Possibly it was a preoccupation with euphony for its own sake on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra that caused this Prelude yesterday to seem more tonal contrivance than tonal poetry. For once the music sounded quite definitely "dated" and remote, infinitely remoter than did that of Bach which immediately followed it, the natives splendor and majesty of his ideas enhanced by the sonorous and effective yet never incongruous orchestral dress fashioned for them by the resourceful Italian.

Let those who will protest against the orchestral transcription of the master's organ pieces. For some of us the modern orchestra has few nobler duties to perform than the clothing of these inspired thoughts in a fitting instrumental garb.

Globe Ed

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 52d season auspiciously in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

Dr Koussevitzky was greeted heartily by an audience which rose to its feet and applauded until the conductor, gesturing gracefully, requested order. The demonstration of approval which met his subsequent appearances upon the stage were significant of the esteem and affection with which he is regarded in Boston. He returns for his ninth consecutive year, the longest unbroken tenure of any conductor of the Boston Symphony, and one exceeded only by that of Wilhelm Gericke, who served altogether 12 years.

There are but few changes in the personnel of the orchestra this season. Dr Koussevitzky has fashioned his players into an ensemble sensitive to his wishes, one in which he and Bostonians may rejoice.

No diminution of the value of the Symphony has occurred in the minds of Boston music lovers, to judge by the subscriptions to the regular concerts. The Friday afternoon series is sold out, and only a few seats remain for the Saturday concerts.

The concert yesterday began with a familiar Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op 6, No. 10, by Handel, a work which Dr Koussevitzky has played frequently. The strings sounded with the wondrously rich tone and moved with the impeccable unanimity and flexibility that are to be had only from a first rank orchestra. Handel's sturdy counterpoint was at all times clear and his lyrical melodies were sunk with the intensity which is a salient part of all Dr Koussevitzky's readings.

Remaining numbers were the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" of Debussy, Ottorino Respighi's transcription for orchestra of Bach's mighty organ Passacaglia in C minor and its concluding Fague, and Brahms D major Symphony.

The flute melody in Debussy's ethereal masterpiece was played beautifully; the clarity of the performance and the delicacy of the evanescent harmonies evoked the suggestion of other worldliness—Louis Laloy called it a "better world"—which this music always creates.

Respighi's transcription had not before been played in Boston. It was written by request of Toscanini and was first performed by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra two years ago last April. This Passacaglia has been transcribed for orchestra by at least two others: Heinrich Esser, a 19th Century German musician, and Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Respighi's call his transcription an "interpretazione orchestrale," which may indicate that he has added orchestral detail to the original organ version. He scored with taste and skill, obtaining a wide variety of effects. In only one spot did his fondness for sonority get the best of him; the concluding variation for full orchestra including kettle drum, is played as loudly as possible, and in a few measures just before the beginning of the Fugue are turgid. But Respighi has otherwise proved that orchestral transcriptions, made by able hands, are not only justified but desirable, particularly in this case, for how often would this Passacaglia be heard, and by how many, as Bach left it?

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms' Symphony was the lyrical and powerful one which has long been familiar here. He is in sympathy with Brahms' music and plays it eloquently, minimizing the effect of those interludes when the composer's inspiration seemed to leave his science of composition to shift for itself. Particularly notable were the graceful moulding of the songlike melodies and the imperceptibility of the changes in rhythm.

Next week Bruckner's Fourth Symphony, called the "romantic," will be revived; Strauss' "Don Juan" and the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" are also scheduled.

C. W. D.

Boston Symphony Opens Season

Monitor Oct 8 '3

By L. A. SLOPER

WITH the initial program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-second season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, entering upon his ninth year as Duce, began the introduction of novelties. New to a Boston audience, that is, was the Respighi transcription of Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, heard on the afternoon of Oct. 7 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Mr. Respighi, whatever you may think of his marching Legions, Pines and Fountains, is without dispute a master of orchestration. His present contribution, first played by Mr. Toscanini in New York, is not perhaps so earth-shaking as Mr. Stokowski's version of the Passacaglia, nor so incandescent as the Schönberg instrumentation of the Prelude and Fugue in E flat; but it does sound, and above all, it marches.

The conductor, who was received with the usual rites by a standing orchestra and audience, began his program with the Handel Concerto Grosso in D minor, op. 6, No. 10, continued it with the Debussy "Afternoon of a Faun," and concluded it with Brahms's Second Symphony, in D major.

One of the many advantages of an orchestra which possesses a permanent conductor and a permanent personnel—only one or two minor alterations in the membership have been made this year—is that the concerts open with mid-season quality of performance. Thus, the Debussy Prelude was played with a beauty of tone and a subtlety of nuance that this chronicler does not remember to have heard surpassed. Nor does Dr. Koussevitzky allow anyone to go away with the notion that Debussy is a bloodless echo of Wagner; in his exposition, the Frenchman is seen as Gallic indeed in his restraint, but by no means anæmic.

Similarly, the conductor seems to agree with Niemann that the Brahms Second Symphony is not merely an expression of gayety, as some would have it. Do we call Tchaikovsky's Sixth Anacreontic because it contains scenes of merrymaking? The undertone of struggle is as apparent in the first two movements of the Brahms D major as is the note of triumph in the last.

At a time when so many musical institutions seem to be crumbling, and when Mr. Bodanzky apprehends that soon we may all be sitting in the trees, there is something very reassuring in seeing this orchestra starting as usual upon its new season with unlowered standards and with plans for a festival next spring in honor of the Brahms centenary. As Mr. Coolidge might have said, "The Boston Orchestra—there she stands!"

American Music in Prospect

Oct 9

By Morris Hastings

IN A DAY when the musician is prone to wear a face longer than his hair, it is heartening to hear the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, express his deep faith in the power of music to rise above present tribulations.

Balancing a cup of tea in one hand while describing graceful figures in the air with the other, the dynamic and eloquent conductor chatted with this correspondent about his plans for the coming season, which he believes will be one of considerable importance.

He talked of the public's enthusiastic response to the music of such late-romantic composers as Bruckner and Mahler and what that enthusiasm indicates..

More particularly, he spoke of music in America, a subject ever close to his heart.

"The growth of music in America," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "has been slow but none the less sure. It has already attained notable height in the unrivalled American symphony orchestra which, along with her architecture, constitute America's outstanding contribution to modern civilization. The support these marvelous orchestras have received shows that Americans have a profound love of music. They must not let that love wane even in times of stress.

"While it now may be argued that that love is a passive one (note the decline in sales of sheet music), I firmly believe that conditions will change. True, mechanical music has made it easier for people to listen rather than to perform for themselves. It has also led to a finer understanding of music. The good influences of mechanical music will remain; the more regrettable features are passing even now. The time will come again, and that very shortly, when amateurs will rediscover the incomparable joy of playing themselves, however badly, music they love."

Despite the fact that no American composer has yet produced a master-work, Dr. Koussevitzky is still his staunch and enkindling champion. Witness his schedule for the season, which lists new compositions by John Alden Carpenter, Aaron Copland, Roger Sessions and others.

"Although we expect nationalistic schools of music in Europe, we must not look for that sort of thing from American composers. Why?" Dr. Koussevitzky smiled. "Simply because America is peopled by representatives of all nations of the world. When American composers fully find themselves, their music will transcend boundaries; they will write a truly international music. In the meantime don't forget that you have here composers of exceptional ability, notably Sessions, Copland, Taylor and Carpenter.

"In the literature of America, it is true, one can detect qualities that are typically American. But music, like architecture, is an abstract art. One cannot say that either skyscrapers or music by American composers is representative of America. It may be that in a hundred or so years there will be an 'American school' of music; but I, for one, look for something greater."

At the Boston Symphony concerts this week Dr. Koussevitzky and his men play Bruckner's seldom heard fourth symphony. During the season there will be more music by this late-romanticist and by his pupil, Mahler.

"The great interest in these men's music at the present time," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "does not represent a reaction, as some would have it, against the 'unmelodic' trend of more recent music. It goes deeper than that. During the war and the years following it, audiences were too restless and unsettled to sit through the tremendous lengths of these composer's works. Now, the public is calmer and less impatient. It can better understand the beauties of this remarkable music."

Concert-Chronicl

Trans Oct

Second Beginning

CONDUCTOR, orchestra and audi outdid themselves at the Symph Concert of Saturday evening. was as though the new symphonic y had two beginnings—the second mu more inspiriting than the first. At cas al glance the audience seemed again t fill Symphony Hall. Closer scrutiny disclosed a few vacant chairs, almost all among the more costly seats. The two balconies presented the solid fronts of old. As for the floor, who may say whether an autumn week-end or lacking subscriptions gave reason for the empty seats. . . . Long, loud and nearly unanimously upon its feet the audience applauded the entering Koussevitzky; multiplied its plaudits at the end of each number; clapped congratulations to distinctive players in the Concerto Grosso of Handel and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; at the end of Bach's Passacaglia (according to Respighi) and of Brahms's Symphony hailed the standing orchestra. On Friday the collective mind of the audience seemed to wander from the concert. On Saturday it was intent on nothing else. The matinée audience hastens to escape from the weekly rite. The evening audience lingers to testify to the weekly pleasure.

Consequently an orchestra the more on its mettle. Resonance and breadth distinguished the string choir through Handel's stately Overture; warmth and depth of tone, curve upon curve, through the succeeding Air. With the quicker movements it was light-fingered and supple. Remarkable throughout was the precision of attack, release and rhythmic accent. . . . In Debussy's Prelude, sensuous tone and subtle shadings went hand in hand. The transition from the song of the flute to the echoing horns and the flooding harps was new-old impact of beauty. . . . Respighi taxes the orchestra through his arrangement of Bach's Passacaglia. It failed him neither in his largest sonorities nor his minutest suggestion. . . . In Brahms's Second Symphony there was reason again to marvel at the richness and fluidity of the orchestral tone, the precision and suppleness of the orchestral medium, the vitalizing quality within.

As for the conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky renewed the fine perception, the poetizing sensibility that have long distinguished him in Debussy's music of the faun. In the Passacoglia he could be the conductor of power unfolding a manifold music in larger and larger ascent, through Respighi's technical exactions, holding fast to the substance and structure, the sweep and the splendor of Bach's monumental music. With Brahms he found the golden mean that releases the singing voice and the brooding poetry, yet does not soften the rugged surfaces or tame the mental energies along the way. The performance was Brahms given voice, not Brahms overdone. In a single concert the range of musical speech, individuality and style from Bach and Handel, over Brahms, to Debussy. Yet each composer and each piece went charactered. At the outset of a ninth season together, conductor, orchestra and audience re-affirmed themselves.

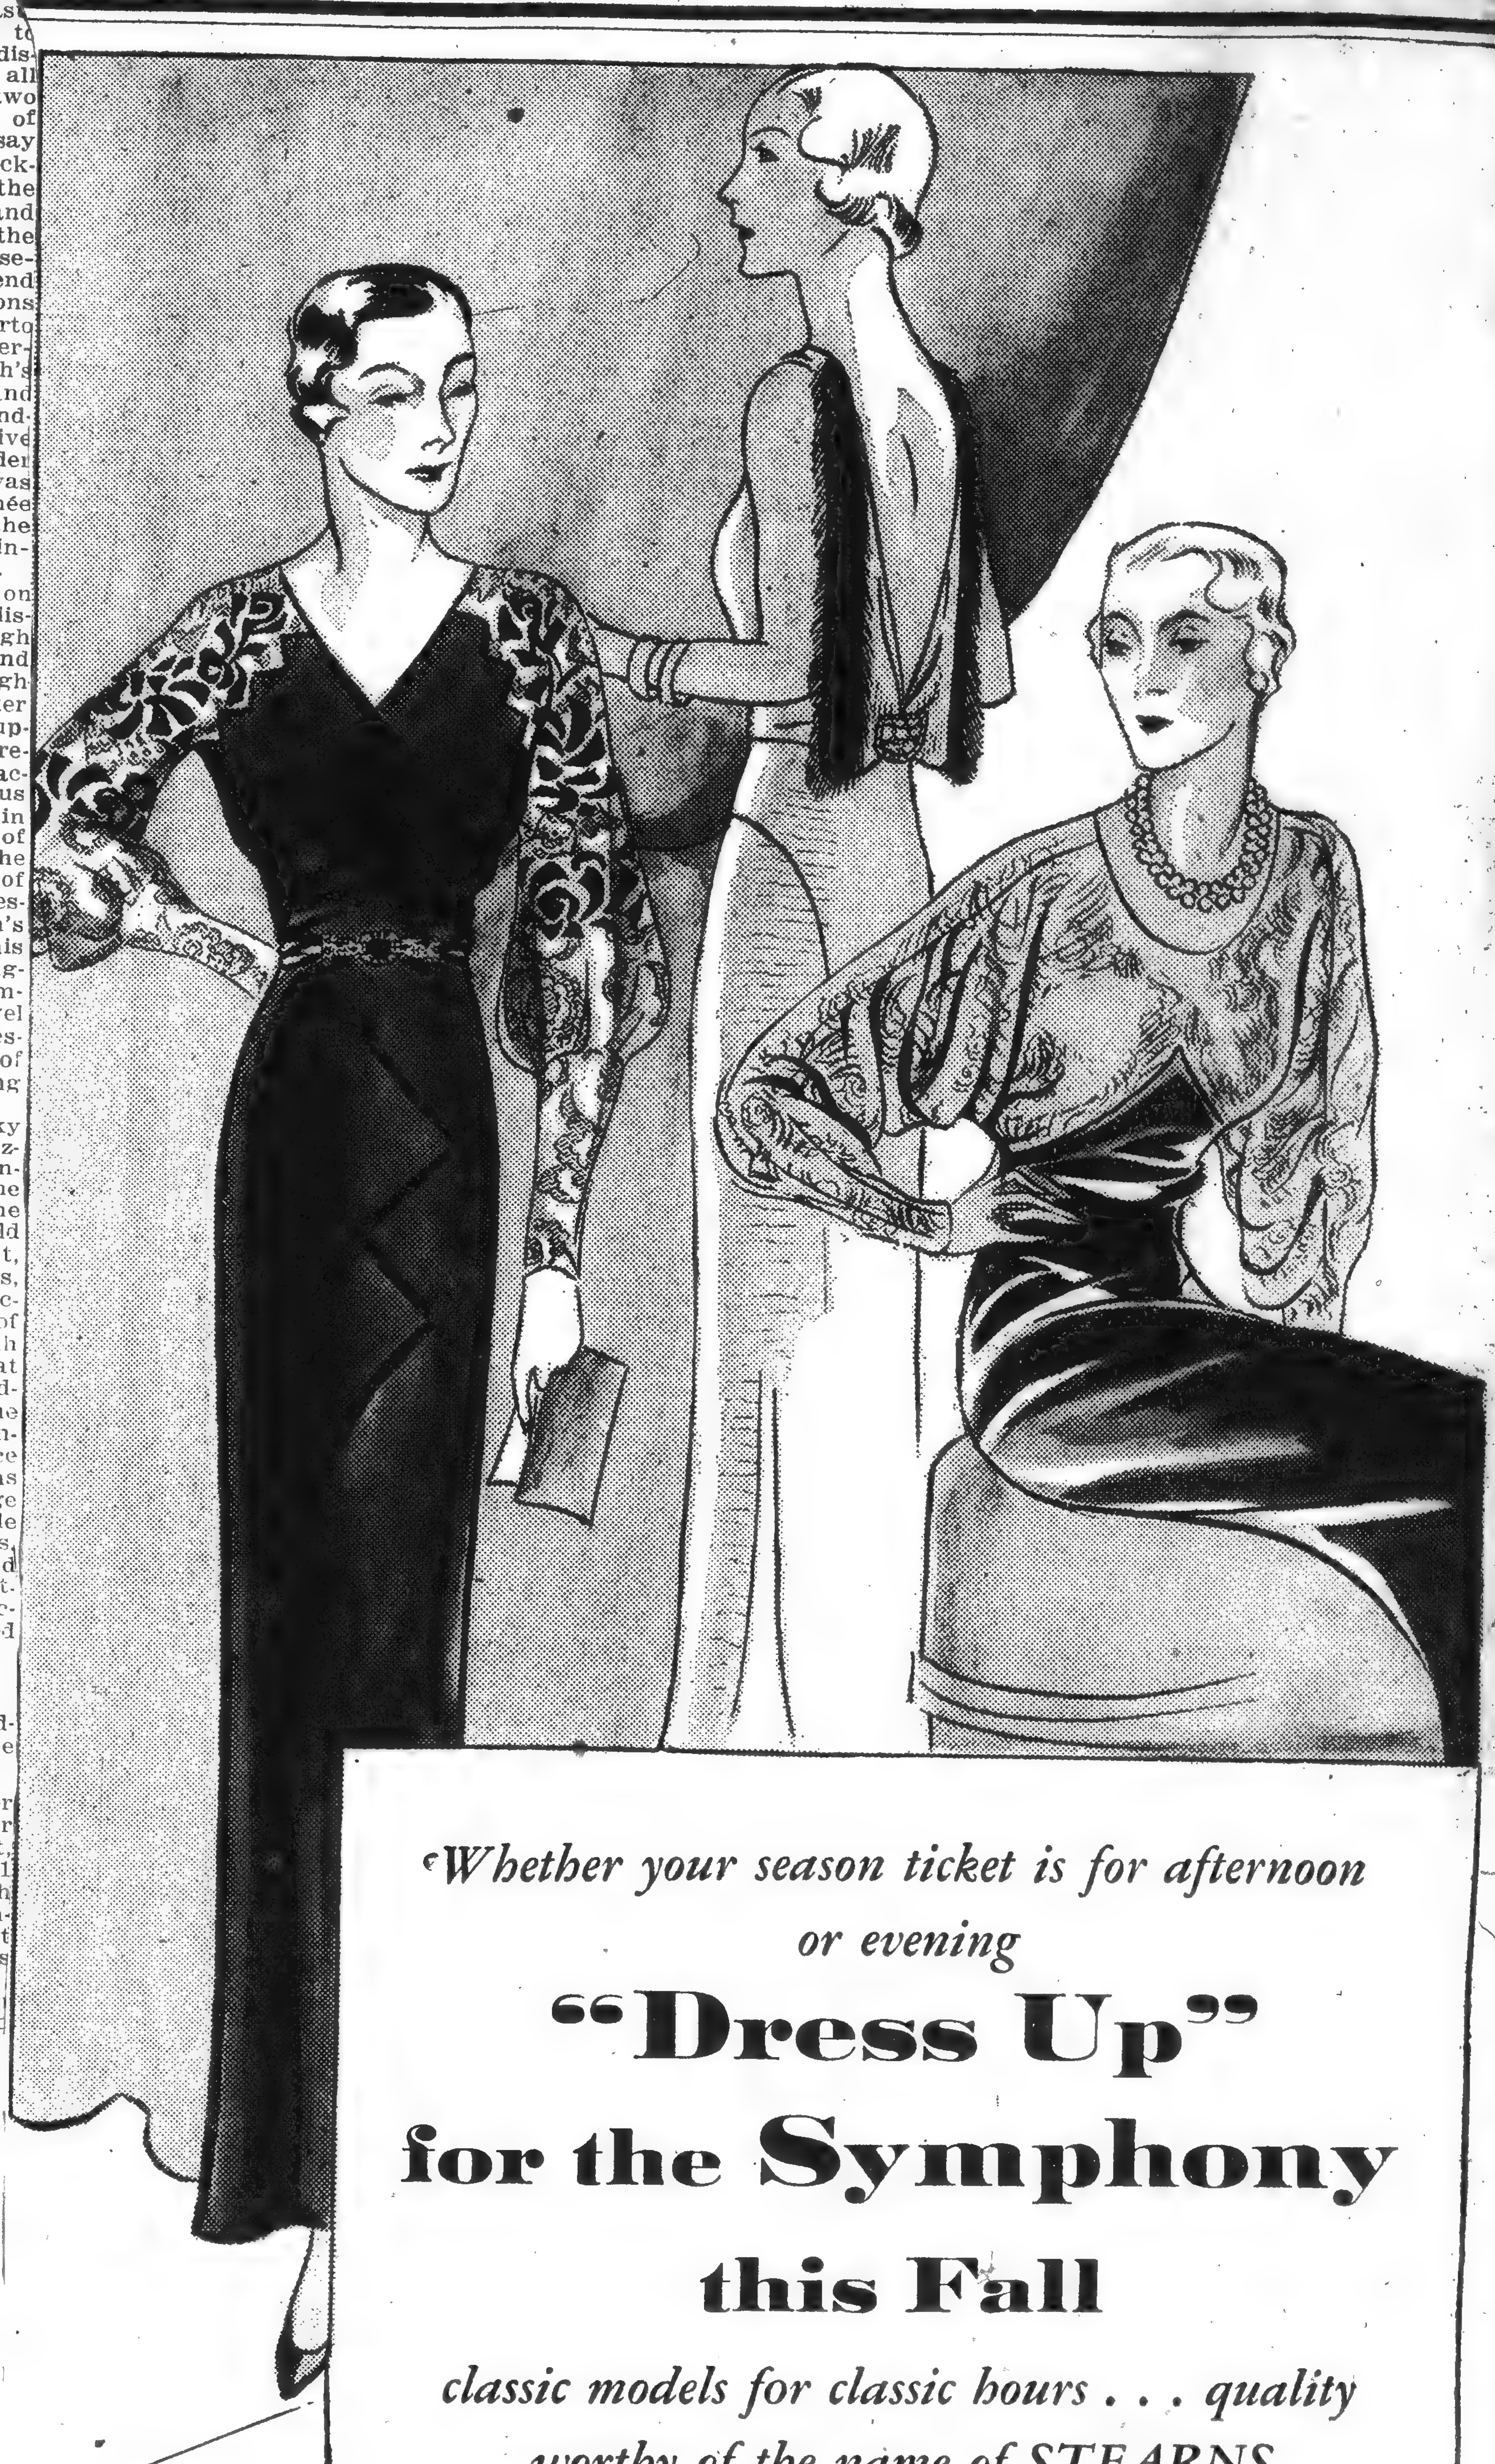
Memoranda

A table of contents now guides readers through the program-book of the Symphony Concerts.

With a little searching Mr. Carpenter has found a title that suits his piece for piano and orchestra, in one movement, to be played at the concerts of Oct. 21 and 22. He names it "Patterns," which is quite in the present fashion of nonpictorial labels. . . . Miss Harriet Cohen, the London pianist, who has played in Cambridge, but not in Boston, will come to Symphony Hall next month o play the piano-part in a new Concerto y Arnold Bax.

H. T. P.

Tran



BOSTON
SYMPHON
ORCHESTR
INC.
FIFTY-FIRST SEASON
1931-1932
PROGRAM

Whether your season ticket is for afternoon or evening

"Dress Up" for the Symphony this Fall

classic models for classic hours . . . quality worthy of the name of STEARNS

The love of beautiful things which is expressed in the appreciation of good music, also finds an outlet in the selection and wearing of graceful gowns. The three types of gowns sketched above are typical of our individual and few-of-a-kind fashions featuring velvets, rough satins, metal cloths, lace and sheers. Gowns, fourth floor.

Sketched at left: Heavy sheer Vionnet wrap-around sash, novelty buckle. Sapphire, brown, wine and black in women's sizes. $39.75

Sketched in center: Rough satin. Low back decolletage. Beige in sizes 16 and 44, pink in 42, white in 38. $49.75

Sketched at right: Velvet dress with top and sleeves of metal. Wine in size 38 and [illegible] in size 40. $69.75

R. H. STEARNS CO.

American Music in Prospect

OCT 7

By Morris Hastings

IN A DAY when the musician is prone to wear a face longer than his hair, it is heartening to hear the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, express his deep faith in the power of music to rise above present tribulations.

Balancing a cup of tea in one hand while describing graceful figures in the air with the other, the dynamic and eloquent conductor chatted with this correspondent about his plans for the coming season, which he believes will be one of considerable importance.

He talked of the public's enthusiastic response to the music of such late-romantic composers as Bruckner and Mahler and what that enthusiasm indicates..

More particularly, he spoke of music in America, a subject ever close to his heart.

"The growth of music in America," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "has been slow but none the less sure. It has already attained notable height in the unrivalled American symphony orchestra which, along with her architecture, constitute America's outstanding contribution to modern civilization. The support these marvelous orchestras have received shows that Americans have a profound love of music. They must not let that love wane even in times of stress.

"While it now may be argued that that love is a passive one (note the decline in sales of sheet music), I firmly believe that conditions will change. True, mechanical music has made it easier for people to listen rather than to perform for themselves. It has also led to a finer understanding of music. The good influences of mechanical music will remain; the more regrettable features are passing even now. The time will come again, and that very shortly, when amateurs will rediscover the incomparable joy of playing themselves, however badly, music they love."

Despite the fact that no American composer has yet produced a master-work, Dr. Koussevitzky is still his staunch and enkindling champion. Witness his schedule for the season, which lists new compositions by John Alden Carpenter, Aaron Copland, Roger Sessions and others.

"Although we expect nationalistic schools of music in Europe, we must not look for that sort of thing from American composers. Why?" Dr. Koussevitzky smiled. "Simply because America is peopled by representatives of all nations of the world. When American composers fully find themselves, their music will transcend boundaries; they will write a truly international music. In the meantime don't forget that you have here composers of exceptional ability, notably Sessions, Copland, Taylor and Carpenter.

"In the literature of America, it is true, one can detect qualities that are typically American. But music, like architecture, is an abstract art. One cannot say that either skyscrapers or music by American composers is representative of America. It may be that in a hundred or so years there will be an 'American school' of music; but I, for one, look for something greater."

At the Boston Symphony concerts this week Dr. Koussevitzky and his men play Bruckner's seldom heard fourth symphony. During the season there will be more music by this late-romanticist and by his pupil, Mahler.

"The great interest in these men's music at the present time," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "does not represent a reaction, as some would have it, against the 'unmelodic' trend of more recent music. It goes deeper than that. During the war and the years following it, audiences were too restless and unsettled to sit through the tremendous lengths of these composer's works. Now, the public is calmer and less impatient. It can better understand the beauties of this remarkable music."

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Oct 10

Second Beginning

CONDUCTOR, orchestra and audience outdid themselves at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. It was as though the new symphonic year had two beginnings—the second much more inspiriting than the first. At casual glance the audience seemed again to fill Symphony Hall. Closer scrutiny disclosed a few vacant chairs, almost all among the more costly seats. The two balconies presented the solid fronts of old. As for the floor, who may say whether an autumn week-end or lacking subscriptions gave reason for the empty seats. . . . Long, loud and nearly unanimously upon its feet the audience applauded the entering Koussevitzky; multiplied its plaudits at the end of each number; clapped congratulations to distinctive players in the Concerto Grosso of Handel and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; at the end of Bach's Passacaglia (according to Respighi) and of Brahms's Symphony hailed the standing orchestra. On Friday the collective mind of the audience seemed to wander from the concert. On Saturday it was intent on nothing else. The matinée audience hastens to escape from the weekly rite. The evening audience lingers to testify to the weekly pleasure.

Consequently an orchestra the more on its mettle. Resonance and breadth distinguished the string choir through Handel's stately Overture; warmth and depth of tone, curve upon curve, through the succeeding Air. With the quicker movements it was light-fingered and supple. Remarkable throughout was the precision of attack, release and rhythmic accent. . . . In Debussy's Prelude, sensuous tone and subtle shadings went hand in hand. The transition from the song of the flute to the echoing horns and the flooding harps was new-old impact of beauty. . . . Respighi taxes the orchestra through his arrangement of Bach's Passacaglia. It failed him neither in his largest sonorities nor his minutest suggestion. . . . In Brahms's Second Symphony there was reason again to marvel at the richness and fluidity of the orchestral tone, the precision and suppleness of the orchestral medium, the vitalizing quality within.

As for the conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky renewed the fine perception, the poetizing sensibility that have long distinguished him in Debussy's music of the faun. In the Passacoglia he could be the conductor of power unfolding a manifold music in larger and larger ascent, through Respighi's technical exactions, holding fast to the substance and structure, the sweep and the splendor of Bach's monumental music. With Brahms he found the golden mean that releases the singing voice and the brooding poetry, yet does not soften the rugged surfaces or tame the mental energies along the way. The performance was Brahms given voice, not Brahms overdone. In a single concert the range of musical speech, individuality and style from Bach and Handel, over Brahms, to Debussy. Yet each composer and each piece went charactered. At the outset of a ninth season together, conductor, orchestra and audience re-affirmed themselves.

Memoranda

A table of contents now guides readers through the program-book of the Symphony Concerts.

With a little searching Mr. Carpenter has found a title that suits his piece for piano and orchestra, in one movement, to be played at the concerts of Oct. 21 and 22. He names it "Patterns," which is quite in the present fashion of nonpictorial labels. . . . Miss Harriet Cohen, the London pianist, who has played in Cambridge, but not in Boston, will come to Symphony Hall next month o play the piano-part in a new Concerto by Arnold Bax.

H. T. P.

---

omen upon the Rain

vould have put 0 upon the co created enormo
. They would iveness of the would have led merican worker n the hands o
ing our tariff s nation. They very safeguar to prevent por we not been a they would they would foundations uilding.

gulation immediate second great es before us hose which abuses and ur economi en so vivid ssion you ar ears, and in Federal and ulated the banks and They have the electric ities. All ully accep

g a publi the sole qu itive profit which ha constructi s in a for ill give g ity to the which we and refor tiative o unish an nat we rnment fo the co not heal ability its own because nful to direct volve th ity of ur boy ich mea out res in this nity

blems hould amitie y to th annot our uch ntal s too
No depre had i s loos to as wra mitie past ty is orld.
ay in str pea veen enta in tu

Whether your season ticket is for afternoon or evening

"Dress Up" for the Symphony this Fall

classic models for classic hours . . . quality worthy of the name of STEARNS

The love of beautiful things which is expressed in the appreciation of good music, also finds an outlet in the selection and wearing of graceful gowns. The three types of gowns sketched above are typical of our individual and few-of-a-kind fashions featuring velvets, rough satins, metal cloths, lace and sheers. Gowns, fourth floor.

Sketched at left: Heavy sheer Vionnet wrap-around sash, novelty buckle. Sapphire, brown, wine and black in women's sizes. $39.75

Sketched in center: Rough satin. Low back decolletage. Beige in sizes 16 and 44, pink in 42, white in 38. $49.75

Sketched at right: Velvet dress with top and sleeves of metal. Wine in size 38 and [illegible] in size 40. $69.75

R. H. STEARNS CO.

10

Through Four Who Are Not To Be Denied

From Bach and Handel On To Brahms and Debussy Runs The Symphony Concert

Trans Oct 9

IN the fitness of things went, yesterday, the first Symphony Concert of the new musical year. . . . In spite of forebodings, now happily put to rout, there were no signs of a diminished audience. An empty chair there, an empty chair here; but no more than is usual on any Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall from October to May. Frequent, however, were the tokens of a changed audience. Divide the floor into little squares, as maps are sometimes divided. Fill each square with a group of subscribers long accustomed to each other's weekly presence. Glance along those squares, at this beginning of the fifty-second year of the Symphony Concerts, and there were plentiful newcomers. So have renounced or divided subscriptions—the times in short—altered the face of these long-standing matinées.

But not the habits or the moods of those that frequent them. When Dr. Koussevitzky came to his place to join the risen orchestra, a partially rising audience greeted him with the clapping of familiar good will rather than of eager effusion. It renewed these plaudits at his every return to the podium; but for excitement in these things the onlooker must wait for the evening concert. Not one of the four pieces that filled the afternoon failed to please a company, warmest toward Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Brahms's Second Symphony; less stirred than was expected by the surging close of Respighi's transcription of Bach's Passacaglia in C-minor. The surprise of the day, however, the proof, perhaps, of newness, was the neglect to call the orchestra to its feet. Back came the conductor, once and twice, after the Passacaglia and the Symphony; but the applause was too brief to warrant the usual signal to the players. Perhaps the first audience of 1932-33 believed it had done its duty when it clapped the entering Burgin on his way to the Concert-Master's seat. Or let the frevent hand-clasping between conductor and leader speak for it.

For the occasion Dr. Koussevitzky was not only the admirable but the well-nigh perfect program-maker. Even at the first concert of a new symphonic year he did not forego his novel number. But the unimpeachable Bach had made and signed this Passacaglia in or about 1717; whereas Respighi, who does not often go unscathed, had "merely" clothed it in an orchestral dress of these nineteen-thirties. To Bach and Handel, in one of those Ten Concerti Grossi for Strings, oftener played in Symphony Hall than in any other symphonic seat that comes readily to mind. The choice lighted upon Number Ten, in D minor. As with much eighteenth-century music, it is hard for memory to distinguish among the set, but, alike from Dr. Koussevitzky and his predecessors, none is more familiar or better remembered. The grave and stately Overture sounds sonorously the note of ceremony. The succeeding air leads in Euterpe in singing robes. In the two lighter movements (as the conductor arranges the Concerto) her subjects, on stage and in auditorium, rejoice politely in her presence and works renewed. Bach and Handel, the everlasting in a single concert! How much more to be desired than the dead and dying mediocrities—Dvorák and Grieg are convenient examples—that used to litter even "inaugural" programs!

And is Brahms displacing Beethoven as the symphonist par excellence for the beginning of a new musical year? Often in Dr. Koussevitzky's house, and oftener than not in Mr. Toscanini's. As Beethoven was to conductors and audiences in the Victorian generations so is Brahms in ours. No classic composer now exceeds him in public favor. Where is another upon whom the race of conductor more loves to exercise its powers? The Brahms Festivals to signal the centenary year of his birth promise to be as many and fervent as those that marked, within memory, the hundredth year after Beethoven's death. One for Boston, next spring, seems not only inevitable, but also desirable. . . . Debussy, too, is becoming French master and world master for these "inaugural" occasions. In New York yesterday Mr. Toscanini was playing his sea-pieces while Dr. Koussevitzky was transforming the stage of Symphony Hall into the Faun's bosky retreat. Debussy did his work and died his death and left no small treasure behind within easy recollection of men not yet old. It is tonic to be reminded that our over-belittled time has also produced eminent composers. There are Debussy . . . and Strauss . . . and Sibelius . . . and, maybe, at the top of his powers, a certain Igor Stravinsky.

Note as well with many a hearer, the unlessened freshness, the ever-renewed vitality, the persistent appeal to ear and imagination of this Faun of Debussy and this Symphony of Brahms. As we listeners ripen in them, so do we the more enjoy them. True, our enjoyment yesterday owed much to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The orchestral tone, throughout Debussy's Prelude, was at once humorous and sensuous. The pattern of the music, the melody, the rhythm, unfolded through the golden haze of the harmonic and instrumental color. Every element in the facture was justly blended in the performance. The conductor's pacing and phrasing, the orchestra's skill and sensibility, all contributed to the glamouring, poetizing end. "The afternoon of a Faun" is forty years old; Debussy finished the manuscript in 1892. Through nearly thirty seasons it has been intermittent piece at Symphony Hall. A horde of composers have fastened upon the Debussyan inventions; assimilated, as best they might, the Debussyan proceedures. Yet it is still possible to hear the Prelude with the thrill of first acquaintance no less than the deeper delights of many meetings.

With Brahms's symphony in D major conductor and orchestra likewise excelled. The tonal afterglow upon the end of the first movement; the drooping gesture with which the slow movement stills into pathos; the swift leaps of the Allegretto out of lyric sweetness into rhythmic light; the crescendo of quickening pace and brightening color through the finale were all instant upon the listening ear, vivid upon the answering imagination. If the orchestra had outspread Debussy's shimmering textures, it was not less susceptible to the more substantial and subdued Brahms. Dr. Koussevitzky, moreover, was perceptive and just in the reading of the Symphony. He does not play it as the pretty music that the composer, in ironic raillery, liked to call it. He will not hear it as the pastoral symphony for which label only the Allegretto gives warrant. Nor will he have it a music of serenity, sweetness, suavity—in the Brahmsian degrees of those qualities—which obviously through many a measure it is not. Rather, he divines the blending within of warmth and tenderness, resignation and energy, melancholy and ardor. The sun shines, but clouds are not far away. The summer earth sings; but sadness veils the watching eyes and touches the listening heart of the tone-poet. So conceiving the Symphony, the conductor found the just means to sustain its songful voice, to clarify its changing moods. (It were hard to imagine a performance more transparent of tone, more sensitive of phrase.) Fifty years on, Brahms's Second Symphony remains, like Debussy's Prelude, a timeless music.

For the novel number—to the debate over the wisdom or the unwisdom of orchestral arrangements of Bach's clavier and organ pieces this article shall not contribute. Of a truth and of a verity that quarrel has no end so long as pens may scratch paper and tongues wag in club-corners. In this particular instance suffice it to say that had not the Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor been transcribed by the handy Esser, the adequate Stock, the impetuous Stokowski, and now by the just and masterful Respighi, few frequenters of symphony concerts would have any acquaintance with a manifold and mighty music. Making his version, Respighi is more than mature master of orchestral resource. He uses that mastery with orchestral imagination. He is more also than the scholar searching out and pondering the original Passacaglia. As he transfuses it into a new medium, he is the fellow-composer who, in kind and degree, may enter penetratingly and with sympathy. Always there have been reservations when Respighi would draw his music out of himself. There have been next to none when he works upon the music of other men, be it written for lutes in a rich Italian palace or for organ in a poor German church.

Throughout the transcribed Passacaglia Respighi's orchestral means are abundant and flexible. Throughout he plies them with a rare mingling of readiness and discretion. By a fellow-composer's insight he preserves Bach's structure and substance. The impression is as though the original organ-piece had been melted down like an ingot; then re-minted into the orchestral transcription. Blending composer's imagination with technician's skill, Respighi gives to each variation a distinctive color; yet through the twenty rarely falls into monotony. Never, besides, does he let the ear forget the persisting ground-bass. The mounting and deepening sonority of the final variations is foil to the preceeding richness and diversity of orchestral texture. Nowhere does Respighi stay Bach's flooding fertility, his propulsive sweep forward and upward. Save in two or three of the lighter variations, everywhere is splendor. For orchestra, as for organ, the Passacaglia rises in a passion of creation, mind and soul together. Through the Fugue, from the trumpet-proclamation of the principal subject to the surge of the final close sound "the surge and thunder of the Apocalypse." The sternest purist may agree that, if transcriptions are to be made at all, Respighi has made his superlatively well. In these days for the grandeurs of Bach no organ may suffice. The medium, if they are to strike home to us, is the multi-tongued and puissant orchestra.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

By Mr. Loeffler Trans Oct 13

FOR not too distant performance at th Symphony Concerts Dr. Koussevit ky has in mind Mr. Loeffler's "Evo cation," the only one of his major o chestral works yet unheard in Bosto It was written for the dedication of th new hall of the Cleveland Symphony O chestra, a year ago last winter; has sinc been played nowhere else. If recollectio serves, it also enlists a small chorus o women's voices to sing the lines of a ancient poet. "Evocation" is at the op posite pole from the usual dedicator "pièce d'occasion." Characteristically Mr. Loeffler hallows, not a new music room, but the art of music that is t sound within it. So minded, he subl mates both the end and the means.

Incidents and Prospects

The Bostonian public that has lon heard with pleasure the music of Mo sieur Ravel, the fewer Bostonians t whom he is personally known in Par or by his visits to their city, will lear with sympathy that he was hurt, las Sunday, in a taxi-cab collision. His hea and chest were injured and he was take to a hospital. The wounds are sufficien ly grave but not critical.

The third pair of Symphony Concert on Friday and Saturday of next week wi be divided between two classics and tw pieces by Mr. John Alden Carpenter wh will be double guest—as composer an as pianist. The classics are Weber' Overture to his opera, "Oberon," an Franck's favorite Symphony in D mino For Mr. Carpenter, his new "Patterns for Piano and Orchestra and his Ameri can ballet, "Skyscrapers," as concert piece.

Among the concert-going public here abouts there is a discoverable desire t hear Mme. Sigrid Onegin when she r turns to America next winter. Her débu at Symphony Hall, some years ago, wa impressive. Yet she has returned seldom and then semi-privately, as last autum to the Morning Musicales at the Statle There she was warmly received.

The usual course of prefatory lecture on the programs of the Symphony Co certs is proceeding at the Public Librar on Thursday afternoons, before each pai at five-fifteen o'clock. Mr. Appel of th Brown Musical Library and Mr. Mey of The Transcript's staff are the expo tors with occasional assistance from co posers and resident "authorities." M sical illustrations intersperse each lectur

---

CLASSIC BILL AT SYMPHONY

Bruckner's imposing "Romantic" symphony, together with Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem and Wagner's "Mastersinginers" prelude, provided the Symphony Hall matinee audience with an all-classic second program. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men performed all three pieces with rousing artistry. The same program will be repeated tonight.

Next week John Alden Carpenter will be guest star at the Symphony concerts. The Chicago composer will play the piano part in his new work, "Patterns." His "Skyscrapers" ballet is also on the program. Weber's "Oberon" overture and Franck's D minor symphony are the other works listed.

Fourth Bruckner Symphony

By MOSES SMITH

The first important revival of the season graces the second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played at Symphony Hall under Serge Koussevitzky's direction yesterday afternoon, and to be repeated this evening. The novelty—for such it was to most persons in the audience, since it had not been heard here in many years—was the Fourth Symphony of Bruckner, the retiring German musician of the last century, whose music spoke for him, often in thundering tones.

In this work there is little thundering. There are brilliant climaxes, but they are exceptional. The prevailing style is lyric, musing, contemplative, even sentimental. Not without reason has the work been dubbed "Romantic." The call of the hunting horn is a dominant motive. There are rich harmonies from the brasses as well as strings. The orchestration is, on the whole, much lighter than is customary in a Bruckner score, but by its transparence is none the less charming.

The performance of yesterday seemed well-prepared, sympathetic, often eloquent. Especial mention ought to be made of the horn solos of Mr. Boettcher. But the orchestra as a whole, under Mr. Koussevitzky's illuminating and discerning influence, played beautifully. The work was received with great cordiality by the audience.

There are two other numbers on the program, which is well arranged with music of kindred styles—"Don Juan" by Strauss, and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner. The tone poem of Strauss was read by Mr. Koussevitzky imaginatively, with romantic ardor, with fire and brilliance. Nor did this ardor go to excess, as the temptation is in such a work. The conductor seemed particularly happy in his choice and maintenance of tempi.

A Best Seller And Much More

Just Plea for the Symphony Of Franck, To Be Heard Again Next Week

Trans Oct 15

THE popularity of Franck's Symphony — to be played anew at the Symphony Concerts next week—is not easily accounted for. What makes a symhpony prevail? Why do the great symphonic favorites hold their sway over the popular heart? It is the theory of Mr. Compton Mackenzie (a novelist who stoops to music) that the best loved symphonies have won their place because of a legend or a name that has commended them to the general fancy—the Fifth of Beethoven because of the story about Fate knocking at the door; the "Unfinished" because of its title; the "Pathetic," both because of the title and of the story that links it with Chaikovsky's legendary suicide; the "Eroica" because of the Napoleonic association; the Seventh because of Wagner's "Apotheosis of the Dance" tag. Frankly, we take little stock in this theory. The C minor of Brahms is as remote from legend, from any extra-musical suggestion, as any work in the symphonic list; yet in a Philadelphia voting contest it came within thirty-seven votes of tying Beethoven's C minor for second place; and today in New York and Boston this symphony of Bahms is prime favorite with audiences.

As for César Franck's symphony, which has so long held first position in the affections of Philadelphia's voters, what is its legend, name or tag? It has none. It is a symphony; it is in the key of D minor; that is all we know, or need to know, apparently, in order to hold it in our hearts. And what is there in the texture of the music itself to explain its popularity? This score has nothing of the overwhelming emotionalism of the "Pathetic"; nothing of the dramatic puissance and directness of Beethoven's Fifth. In this case, as in others, it might be said, in paraphrase of the comment in a different field, that here the public taste is itself part of the problem, and that the patience or impatience of three thousand auditors, shaking down into certain lines of liking or indifference, is a sort of artistic verdict. Yet the interest and the oddity of the verdict remain.

It is a little more than forty years since Gounod at the première of Franck's symphony (Paris, Feb. 17, 1889) delivered his amusing verdict upon the new score: "He fulminated," writes d'Indy, "a kind of papal decree to the effect that this symphony was the affirmation of incompetence pushed to dogmatic lengths." If only the music had had the grace to confirm the admirable wit of the composer of "Faust"! If this is "incompetence," how many a music-maker high-placed and valorous would not have prayed for a like disability!

The essential nature of Franck, the man and the musician, was very sim indicated by Claude Debussy in one of excursions as critic. "Franck," he sa "was a man without guile. The discove of a beautiful harmony was sufficient make him as happy as the day was lon . . . A great deal has been said abou his genius without ever mentioning it unique quality of ingenuousness. Thi man, who was unfortunate, unrecognized possessed the soul of a child, and one so ineradicably good that neither contradictory circumstances nor the wickedness of others could ever make him feel bitter . . . He wrote, . . . so to speak, face to face with the spirit of music, before whom he would kneel, uttering at the same time the most profoundly touching prayer that ever fell from human lips. César Franck served his art with steadfast devotion. . . . No power on earth could force him to break off a period which seemed to him right and necessary, however lengthy it might be. . . . In this, Franck affiliates himself with the great composers for whom sounds had distinct meaning in their sonorous phraseology. . . . He served music without ever asking it for renown."

It is necessary to remember, too, wha Debussy did not find it within the scop of his remarks to recall; namely, tha Franck was not French. In one o Flaubert's letters to Madame X, he com plains somewhat petulantly that "th French mind has such a rage for amuse ment that it is necessary for it alway to be seeing things!" Is there somethin in the French mind, some passion fo externalization and objectivity, that, o its musical side, has seemed to disincline it toward the essential inwardness of the symphony—that type of symphony which is an exposition of spiritual history; not the dramatizing, pictorializing symphony of Berlioz? "In France," said Duparc, pupil of Franck, "we have too great a love for dramatic music. Dramatic music is an . . . inferior species, which does not allow the artist to express himself directly, to reveal freely the beautiful soul."

Certainly it is a significant commentary upon the trend of the French musical mind that a symphony which was composed only six years after the aging necromancer of Bayreuth had added the last touches to the score of "Parsifal," should still remain, more than a generation later, in unchallenged pre-eminence as the crown of symphonic art in France. And this symphony was written by a composer born in Liège. There are, of course, other and variously admirable French symphonies besides the outstanding one that was composed by a Belgian. Among those of our time there are the symphonies of Lalo, Saint-Saëns, Magnard, Chausson, Ropartz, d'Indy, Dukas, Roussel, to name but a few. Yet the fact remains that, speaking with rough truth, there is still, for the contemporary concert-world, but one French symphony that is sufficiently compensating to reward inexhaustibly, year after year, the attention of performers and listeners, and that is the D-minor Symphony of Franck.

"Majestic, plastic, perfectly beautiful," are d'Indy's characterizing words for his master's score. But one can think of other symphonies that are majestic and plastic and perfect in beauty. It is less, one fancies, because of the quality of its musical tissue, than because of that which the music conveys to us, that music-lovers return to Franck's symphony again and again without satiety. "I shall go on with them as soon as I get better," said he on his deathbed thinking of the uncompleted versicles of his "Magnificat"—or else," he added in a lower tone, "perhaps God will let me finish them in His eternity to come."

In another man, the remark might have been the semi-mechanical repetition of a pious formula; but for Franck the words unquestionably corresponded to a deep and intense conviction of the spirit. Romain Rolland, who knew him well—"well enough to love him," as he says, "and to catch a glimpse of the beauty and serenity of his soul"—has told us how remarkable was the completeness and assurance of Franck's religious faith; a faith which knew no doubts, which was the mainspring of his life. The purity, the otherworldliness, the exalted mysticism of Franck the man, are reflected in much of his music—in the "Beatitudes," in the "Redemption," in portions of the symphony. Through this music, to the imagination of his pupil, d'Indy (himself a man of faith and aspiration, a medieval Christian), stream "troops of angels as purely imagined as Filippo Lippi's or Fra Angelico's."

It is easy for the sympathetic to perceive in this often spiritualized and touching music those luminous beings that brightened the shadows of the organ-loft where the devout and humb Franck mused and played and mus again. One visions him as he sat the for so many years, alone, but not alo companioned by ineffable presences, absorbed above his keyboard, "singing forth in a low voice," like that old mystic of so different a type, Jonathan Edwards, his "contemplations of the Creator"; for to Franck all life and all nature discoursed of divine and immortal things.

Continued on Following Page

A Best Seller

Continued from Preceding Page

Yet Monsieur Rolland thinks that perhaps there was more trouble in the depths of Franck's heart than the mysti-cal serenity of his exterior would lead one to believe, and he warns us particularly in the case of the Symphony to beware of seeking in it only the expression of a transfigured and rapturous exaltation. "I ask those who love this music because they find some of their own sadness reflected there," says Monsieur Rolland, "whether they have not felt the secret tragedies that some of his passages unfold—those phrases that seem to rise in supplication to God and often fall back in sadness and in tears? It is not all light in that soul; but the light that is there does not affect us less because it shines from afar."

No doubt it is the wide emotional range—the blend of passionate humanity, of exaltation, of spiritual tenderness—that everyone feels in this symphony of Franck. It is that which makes its appeal so sure and so constant. The meditations of Franck the mystical rhapsodist, of Franck the troubled dreamer, touch us again and again by their sincerity and their intensity; and in the loftiest moments of their tonal utterance his expression achieves an unforgettable noble distinction of contour and gesture—as in the concluding nine measures of the first movement, where the ancient device of imitation lifts the music to a magnificent peroration.

His singing-robes, at their best, were woven of cloth of gold pearl-strewn and gorgeous. How splendid is the texture of his music when it is most radiant, as in certain pages of this symphony, when Franck draws himself up to his full imaginative height, faces the morning sun and realizes that he himself, as Omar so hearteningly remarked, is Heaven and Hell! For here you get the Franck of perfect faith—that music-making Primitive, modest, lovable, divinely simple, who was so definitely the captain of his soul.

LAWRENCE GILMAN

(Reprinted from the New York Herald Tribune)

10

Through Four Who Are Not To Be Denied

From Bach and Handel On To Brahms and Debussy Runs The Symphony Concert

Trans Oct 9

IN the fitness of things went, yesterday, the first Symphony Concert of the new musical year. . . . In spite of forebodings, now happily put to rout, there were no signs of a diminished audience. An empty chair there, an empty chair here; but no more than is usual on any Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall from October to May. Frequent, however, were the tokens of a changed audience. Divide the floor into little squares, as maps are sometimes divided. Fill each square with a group of subscribers long accustomed to each other's weekly presence. Glance along those squares, at this beginning of the fifty-second year of the Symphony Concerts, and there were plentiful newcomers. So have renounced or divided subscriptions—the times in short—altered the face of these long-standing matinées.

But not the habits or the moods of those that frequent them. When Dr. Koussevitzky came to his place to join the risen orchestra, a partially rising audience greeted him with the clapping of familiar good will rather than of eager effusion. It renewed these plaudits at his every return to the podium; but for excitement in these things the onlooker must wait for the evening concert. Not one of the four pieces that filled the afternoon failed to please a company, warmest toward Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Brahms's Second Symphony; less stirred than was expected by the surging close of Respighi's transcription of Bach's Passacaglia in C-minor. The surprise of the day, however, the proof, perhaps, of newness, was the neglect to call the orchestra to its feet. Back came the conductor, once and twice, after the Passacaglia and the Symphony; but the applause was too brief to warrant the usual signal to the players. Perhaps the first audience of 1932-33 believed it had done its duty when it clapped the entering Burgin on his way to the Concert-Master's seat. Or let the frevent hand-clasping between conductor and leader speak for it.

For the occasion Dr. Koussevitzky was not only the admirable but the well-nigh perfect program-maker. Even at the first concert of a new symphonic year he did not forego his novel number. But the unimpeachable Bach had made and signed this Passacaglia in or about 1717; whereas Respighi, who does not often go unscathed, had "merely" clothed it in an orchestral dress of these nineteen-thirties. To Bach and Handel, in one of those Ten Concerti Grossi for Strings, oftener played in Symphony Hall than in any other symphonic seat that comes readily to mind. The choice lighted upon Number Ten, in D minor. As with much eighteenth-century music, it is hard for memory to distinguish among the set, but, alike from Dr. Koussevitzky and his predecessors, none is more familiar or better remembered. The grave and stately Overture sounds sonorously the note of ceremony. The succeeding air leads in Euterpe in singing robes. In the two lighter movements (as the conductor arranges the Concerto) her subjects, on stage and in auditorium, rejoice politely in her presence and works renewed. Bach and Handel, the everlasting in a single concert! How much more to be desired than the dead and dying mediocrities—Dvořák and Grieg are convenient examples—that used to litter even "inaugural" programs!

And is Brahms displacing Beethoven as the symphonist par excellence for the beginning of a new musical year? Often in Dr. Koussevitzky's house, and oftener than not in Mr. Toscanini's. As Beethoven was to conductors and audiences in the Victorian generations so is Brahms in ours. No classic composer now exceeds him in public favor. Where is another upon whom the race of conductors more loves to exercise its powers? The Brahms Festivals to signal the centenary year of his birth promise to be as many and fervent as those that marked, within memory, the hundredth year after Beethoven's death. One for Boston, next spring, seems not only inevitable, but also desirable. . . . Debussy, too, is becoming French master and world master for these "inaugural" occasions. In New York yesterday Mr. Toscanini was playing his sea-pieces while Dr. Koussevitzky was transforming the stage of Symphony Hall into the Faun's bosky retreat. Debussy did his work and died his death and left no small treasure behind within easy recollection of men not yet old. It is tonic to be reminded that our over-belittled time has also produced eminent composers. There are Debussy . . . and Strauss . . . and Sibelius . . . and, maybe, at the top of his powers, a certain Igor Stravinsky.

Note as well with many a hearer, the unlessened freshness, the ever-renewed vitality, the persistent appeal to ear and imagination of this Faun of Debussy and this Symphony of Brahms. As we listeners ripen in them, so do we the more enjoy them. True, our enjoyment yesterday owed much to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The orchestral tone, throughout Debussy's Prelude, was at once humorous and sensuous. The pattern of the music, the melody, the rhythm, unfolded through the golden haze of the harmonic and instrumental color. Every element in the facture was justly blended in the performance. The conductor's pacing and phrasing, the orchestra's skill and sensibility, all contributed to the glamouring, poetizing end. "The afternoon of a Faun" is forty years old; Debussy finished the manuscript in 1892. Through nearly thirty seasons it has been intermittent piece at Symphony Hall. A horde of composers have fastened upon the Debussyan inventions; assimilated, as best they might, the Debussyan procedures. Yet it is still possible to hear the Prelude with the thrill of first acquaintance no less than the deeper delights of many meetings.

With Brahms's Symphony in D major conductor and orchestra likewise excelled. The tonal afterglow upon the end of the first movement; the drooping gesture with which the slow movement stills into pathos; the swift leaps of the Allegretto out of lyric sweetness into rhythmic light; the crescendo of quickening pace and brightening color through the finale were all instant upon the listening ear, vivid upon the answering imagination. If the orchestra had outspread Debussy's shimmering textures, it was not less susceptible to the more substantial and subdued Brahms. Dr. Koussevitzky, moreover, was perceptive and just in the reading of the Symphony. He does not play it as the pretty music that the composer, in ironic raillery, liked to call it. He will not hear it as the pastoral symphony for which label only the Allegretto gives warrant. Nor will he have it a music of serenity, sweetness, suavity—in the Brahmsian degrees of those qualities—which obviously through many a measure it is not. Rather, he divines the blending within of warmth and tenderness, resignation and energy, melancholy and ardor. The sun shines, but clouds are not far away. The summer earth sings; but sadness veils the watching eyes and touches the listening heart of the tone-poet. So conceiving the Symphony, the conductor found the just means to sustain its songful voice, to clarify its changing moods. (It were hard to imagine a performance more transparent of tone, more sensitive of phrase.) Fifty years on, Brahms's Second Symphony remains, like Debussy's Prelude, a timeless music.

For the novel number—to the debate over the wisdom or the unwisdom of orchestral arrangements of Bach's clavier and organ pieces this article shall not contribute. Of a truth and of a verity that quarrel has no end so long as pens may scratch paper and tongues wag in club-corners. In this particular instance suffice it to say that had not the Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor been transcribed by the handy Esser, the adequate Stock, the impetuous Stokowski, and now by the just and masterful Respighi, few frequenters of symphony concerts would have any acquaintance with a manifold and mighty music. Making his version, Respighi is more than mature master of orchestral resource. He uses that mastery with orchestral imagination. He is more also than the scholar searching out and pondering the original Passacaglia. As he transfuses it into a new medium, he is the fellow-composer who, in kind and degree, may enter penetratingly and with sympathy. Always there have been reservations when Respighi would draw his music out of himself. There have been next to none when he works upon the music of other men, be it written for lutes in a rich Italian palace or for organ in a poor German church.

Throughout the transcribed Passacaglia Respighi's orchestral means are abundant and flexible. Throughout he plies them with a rare mingling of readiness and discretion. By a fellow-composer's insight he preserves Bach's structure and substance. The impression is as though the original organ-piece had been melted down like an ingot; then re-minted into the orchestral transcription. Blending composer's imagination with technician's skill, Respighi gives to each variation a distinctive color; yet through the twenty rarely falls into monotony. Never, besides, does he let the ear forget the persisting ground-bass. The mounting and deepening sonority of the final variations is foil to the preceeding richness and diversity of orchestral texture. Nowhere does Respighi stay Bach's flooding fertility, his propulsive sweep forward and upward. Save in two or three of the lighter variations, everywhere is splendor. For orchestra, as for organ, the Passacaglia rises in a passion of creation, mind and soul together. Through the Fugue, from the trumpet-proclamation of the principal subject to the surge of the final close sound "the surge and thunder of the Apocalypse." The sternest purist may agree that, if transcriptions are to be made at all, Respighi has made his superlatively well. In these days for the grandeurs of Bach no organ may suffice. The medium, if they are to strike home to us, is the multi-tongued and puissant orchestra.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

By Mr. Loeffler Trans Oct 13

FOR not too distant performance at th Symphony Concerts Dr. Koussevitzky has in mind Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation," the only one of his major or chestral works yet unheard in Boston It was written for the dedication of th new hall of the Cleveland Symphony Or chestra, a year ago last winter; has sinc been played nowhere else. If recollectio serves, it also enlists a small chorus o women's voices to sing the lines of a ancient poet. "Evocation" is at the op posite pole from the usual dedicator "pièce d'occasion." Characteristically Mr. Loeffler hallows, not a new music room, but the art of music that is t sound within it. So minded, he subli mates both the end and the means.

Incidents and Prospects

The Bostonian public that has lon heard with pleasure the music of Mon sieur Ravel, the fewer Bostonians t whom he is personally known in Pari or by his visits to their city, will lear with sympathy that he was hurt, las Sunday, in a taxi-cab collision. His hea and chest were injured and he was take to a hospital. The wounds are sufficien ly grave but not critical.

The third pair of Symphony Concert on Friday and Saturday of next week wi be divided between two classics and tw pieces by Mr. John Alden Carpenter wh will be double guest—as composer an as pianist. The classics are Weber' Overture to his opera, "Oberon," an Franck's favorite Symphony in D minor For Mr. Carpenter, his new "Patterns for Piano and Orchestra and his Ameri can ballet, "Skyscrapers," as concer piece.

Among the concert-going public here abouts there is a discoverable desire t hear Mme. Sigrid Onegin when she re turns to America next winter. Her débu at Symphony Hall, some years ago, wa impressive. Yet she has returned seldon and then semi-privately, as last autum to the Morning Musicales at the Statler There she was warmly received.

The usual course of prefatory lecture on the programs of the Symphony Con certs is proceeding at the Public Library on Thursday afternoons, before each pai at five-fifteen o'clock. Mr. Appel of th Brown Musical Library and Mr. Meye of The Transcript's staff are the expos tors with occasional assistance from com posers and resident "authorities." M sical illustrations intersperse each lectur

---

CLASSIC BILL AT SYMPHONY

Bruckner's imposing "Romantic" symphony, together with Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem and Wagner's "Mastersinginers" prelude, provided the Symphony Hall matinee audience with an all-classic second program. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men performed all three pieces with rousing artistry. The same program will be repeated tonight.

Next week John Alden Carpenter will be guest star at the Symphony concerts. The Chicago composer will play the piano part in his new work, "Patterns." His "Skyscrapers" ballet is also on the program. Weber's "Oberon" overture and Franck's D minor symphony are the other works listed.

Fourth Bruckner Symphony

Am Oct

By MOSES SMITH

The first important revival of the season graces the second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played at Symphony Hall under Serge Koussevitzky's direction yesterday afternoon, and to be repeated this evening. The novelty—for such it was to most persons in the audience, since it had not been heard here in many years—was the Fourth Symphony of Bruckner, the retiring German musician of the last century, whose music spoke for him, often in thundering tones.

In this work there is little thundering. There are brilliant climaxes, but they are exceptional. The prevailing style is lyric, musing, contemplative, even sentimental. Not without reason has the work been dubbed "Romantic." The call of the hunting horn is a dominant motive. There are rich harmonies from the brasses as well as strings. The orchestration is, on the whole, much lighter than is customary in a Bruckner score, but by its transparence is none the less charming.

The performance of yesterday seemed well-prepared, sympathetic, often eloquent. Especial mention ought to be made of the horn solos of Mr. Boettcher. But the orchestra as a whole, under Mr. Koussevitzky's illuminating and discerning influence, played beautifully. The work was received with great cordiality by the audience.

There are two other numbers on the program, which is well arranged with music of kindred styles—"Don Juan" by Strauss, and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner. The tone poem of Strauss was read by Mr. Koussevitzky imaginatively, with romantic ardor, with fire and brilliance. Nor did this ardor go to excess, as the temptation is in such a work. The conductor seemed particularly happy in his choice and maintenance of tempi.

A Best Seller And Much More

Just Plea for the Symphony Of Franck, To Be Heard Again Next Week

Trans Oct. 15

THE popularity of Franck's Symphony — to be played anew at the Symphony Concerts next week—is not easily accounted for. What makes a symhpony prevail? Why do the great symphonic favorites hold their sway over the popular heart? It is the theory of Mr. Compton Mackenzie (a novelist who stoops to music) that the best loved symphonies have won their place because of a legend or a name that has commended them to the general fancy—the Fifth of Beethoven because of the story about Fate knocking at the door; the "Unfinished" because of its title; the "Pathetic," both because of the title and of the story that links it with Chaikovsky's legendary suicide; the "Eroica" because of the Napoleonic association; the Seventh because of Wagner's "Apotheosis of the Dance" tag. Frankly, we take little stock in this theory. The C minor of Brahms is as remote from legend, from any extra-musical suggestion, as any work in the symphonic list; yet in a Philadelphia voting contest it came within thirty-seven votes of tying Beethoven's C minor for second place; and today in New York and Boston this symphony of Bahms is prime favorite with audiences.

As for César Franck's symphony, which has so long held first position in the affections of Philadelphia's voters, what is its legend, name or tag? It has none. It is a symphony; it is in the key of D minor; that is all we know, or need to know, apparently, in order to hold it in our hearts. And what is there in the texture of the music itself to explain its popularity? This score has nothing of the overwhelming emotionalism of the "Pathetic"; nothing of the dramatic puissance and directness of Beethoven's Fifth. In this case, as in others, it might be said, in paraphrase of a comment in a different field, that here the public taste is itself part of the problem, and that the patience or impatience of three thousand auditors, shaking down into certain lines of liking or indifference, is a sort of artistic verdict. Yet the interest and the oddity of the verdict remain.

It is a little more than forty years since Gounod at the première of Franck's symphony (Paris, Feb. 17, 1889) delivered his amusing verdict upon the new score: "He fulminated," writes d'Indy, "a kind of papal decree to the effect that this symphony was the affirmation of incompetence pushed to dogmatic lengths." If only the music had had the grace to confirm the admirable wit of the composer of "Faust"! If this is "incompetence," how many a music-maker high-placed and valorous would not have prayed for a like disability!

The essential nature of Franck, the man and the musician, was very sim indicated by Claude Debussy in one of excursions as critic. "Franck," he sa "was a man without guile. The discove of a beautiful harmony was sufficient make him as happy as the day was lon . . . A great deal has been said abo his genius without ever mentioning it unique quality of ingenuousness. Th man, who was unfortunate, unrecognized possessed the soul of a child, and one so ineradicably good that neither contradictory circumstances nor the wickedness of others could ever make him feel bitter . . . He wrote, . . . so to speak, face to face with the spirit of music, before whom he would kneel, uttering at the same time the most profoundly touching prayer that ever fell from human lips. César Franck served his art with steadfast devotion. . . . No power on earth could force him to break off a period which seemed to him right and necessary, however lengthy it might be. . . . In this, Franck affiliates himself with the great composers for whom sounds had distinct meaning in their sonorous phraseology. . . . He served music without ever asking it for renown."

It is necessary to remember, too, wha Debussy did not find it within the scop of his remarks to recall; namely, tha Franck was not French. In one o Flaubert's letters to Madame X, he com plains somewhat petulantly that "th French mind has such a rage for amuse ment that it is necessary for it alway to be seeing things!" Is there somethin in the French mind, some passion fo externalization and objectivity, that, o its musical side, has seemed to disincline it toward the essential inwardness of the symphony—that type of symphony which is an exposition of spiritual history; not the dramatizing, pictorializing symphony of Berlioz? "In France," said Duparc, pupil of Franck, "we have too great a love for dramatic music. Dramatic music is an . . . inferior species, which does not allow the artist to express himself directly, to reveal freely the beautiful soul."

Certainly it is a significant commentary upon the trend of the French musical mind that a symphony which was composed only six years after the aging necromancer of Bayreuth had added the last touches to the score of "Parsifal," should still remain, more than a generation later, in unchallenged pre-eminence as the crown of symphonic art in France. And this symphony was written by a composer born in Liège. There are, of course, other and variously admirable French symphonies besides the outstanding one that was composed by a Belgian. Among those of our time there are the symphonies of Lalo, Saint-Saëns, Magnard, Chausson, Ropartz, d'Indy, Dukas, Roussel, to name but a few. Yet the fact remains that, speaking with rough truth, there is still, for the contemporary concert-world, but one French symphony that is sufficiently compensating to reward inexhaustibly, year after year, the attention of performers and listeners, and that is the D-minor Symphony of Franck.

"Majestic, plastic, perfectly beautiful," are d'Indy's characterizing words for his master's score. But one can think of other symphonies that are majestic and plastic and perfect in beauty. It is less, one fancies, because of the quality of its musical tissue, than because of that which the music conveys to us, that music-lovers return to Franck's symphony again and again without satiety. "I shall go on with them as soon as I get better," said he on his deathbed thinking of the uncompleted versicles of his "Magnificat"—or else," he added in a lower tone, "perhaps God will let me finish them in His eternity to come."

In another man, the remark might have been the semi-mechanical repetition of a pious formula; but for Franck the words unquestionably corresponded to a deep and intense conviction of the spirit. Romain Rolland, who knew him well—"well enough to love him," as he says, "and to catch a glimpse of the beauty and serenity of his soul"—has told us how remarkable was the completeness and assurance of Franck's religious faith; a faith which knew no doubts, which was the mainspring of his life. The purity, the otherworldliness, the exalted mysticism of Franck the man, are reflected in much of his music—in the "Beatitudes," in the "Redemption," in portions of the symphony. Through this music, to the imagination of his pupil, d'Indy (himself a man of faith and aspiration, a medieval Christian), stream "troops of angels as purely imagined as Filippo Lippi's or Fra Angelico's."

It is easy for the sympathetic to perceive in this often spiritualized and touching music those luminous beings that brightened the shadows of the organ-loft where the devout and humble Franck mused and played and mused again. One visions him as he sat there for so many years, alone, but not alone, companioned by ineffable presences, absorbed above his keyboard, "singing forth in a low voice," like that old mystic of so different a type, Jonathan Edwards, his "contemplations of the Creator"; for to Franck all life and all nature discoursed of divine and immortal things.

Continued on Following Page

A Best Seller

Continued from Preceding Page

Yet Monsieur Rolland thinks that perhaps there was more trouble in the depths of Franck's heart than the mystical serenity of his exterior would lead one to believe, and he warns us particularly in the case of the Symphony to beware of seeking in it only the expression of a transfigured and rapturous exaltation. "I ask those who love this music because they find some of their own sadness reflected there," says Monsieur Rolland, "whether they have not felt the secret tragedies that some of his passages unfold—those phrases that seem to rise in supplication to God and often fall back in sadness and in tears? It is not all light in that soul; but the light that is there does not affect us less because it shines from afar."

No doubt it is the wide emotional range—the blend of passionate humanity, of exaltation, of spiritual tenderness—that everyone feels in this symphony of Franck. It is that which makes its appeal so sure and so constant. The meditations of Franck the mystical rhapsodist, of Franck the troubled dreamer, touch us again and again by their sincerity and their intensity; and in the loftiest moments of their tonal utterance his expression achieves an unforgettably noble distinction of contour and gesture—as in the concluding nine measures of the first movement, where the ancient device of imitation lifts the music to a magnificent peroration.

His singing-robes, at their best, were woven of cloth of gold pearl-strewn and gorgeous. How splendid is the texture of his music when it is most radiant, as in certain pages of this symphony, when Franck draws himself up to his full imaginative height, faces the morning sun and realizes that he himself, as Omar so hearteningly remarked, is Heaven and Hell! For here you get the Franck of perfect faith—that music-making Primitive, modest, lovable, divinely simple, who was so definitely the captain of his soul.

LAWRENCE GILMAN

(Reprinted from the New York Herald Tribune)

INFORMATION OBSCURED

10

Through Four Who Are Not To Be Denied

From Bach and Handel On To Brahms and Debussy Runs The Symphony Concert

Trans Oct 9

IN the fitness of things went, yesterday, the first Symphony Concert of the new musical year. . . . In spite of forebodings, now happily put to rout, there were no signs of a diminished audience. An empty chair there, an empty chair here; but no more than is usual on any Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall from October to May. Frequent, however, were the tokens of a changed audience. Divide the floor into little squares, as maps are sometimes divided. Fill each square with a group of subscribers long accustomed to each other's weekly presence. Glance along those squares, at this beginning of the fifty-second year of the Symphony Concerts, and there were plentiful newcomers. So have renounced or divided subscriptions—the times in short—altered the face of these long-standing matinées.

But not the habits or the moods of those that frequent them. When Dr. Koussevitzky came to his place to join the risen orchestra, a partially rising audience greeted him with the clapping of familiar good will rather than of eager effusion. It renewed these plaudits at his every return to the podium; but for excitement in these things the onlooker must wait for the evening concert. Not one of the four pieces that filled the afternoon failed to please a company, warmest toward Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Brahms's Second Symphony; less stirred than was expected by the surging close of Respighi's transcription of Bach's Passacaglia in C-minor. The surprise of the day, however, the proof, perhaps, of newness, was the neglect to call the orchestra to its feet. Back came the conductor, once and twice, after the Passacaglia and the Symphony; but the applause was too brief to warrant the usual signal to the players. Perhaps the first audience of 1932-33 believed it had done its duty when it clapped the entering Burgin on his way to the Concert-Master's seat. Or let the frevent hand-clasping between conductor and leader speak for it.

For the occasion Dr. Koussevitzky was not only the admirable but the well-nigh perfect program-maker. Even at the first concert of a new symphonic year he did not forego his novel number. But the unimpeachable Bach had made and signed this Passacaglia in or about 1717; whereas Respighi, who does not often go unscathed, had "merely" clothed it in an orchestral dress of these nineteen-thirties. To Bach and Handel, in one of those Ten Concerti Grossi for Strings, oftener played in Symphony Hall than in any other symphonic seat that comes readily to mind. The choice lighted upon Number Ten, in D minor. As with much eighteenth-century music, it is hard for memory to distinguish among the set, but, alike from Dr. Koussevitzky and his predecessors, none is more familiar or better remembered. The grave and stately Overture sounds sonorously the note of ceremony. The succeeding air leads in Euterpe in singing robes. In the two lighter movements (as the conductor arranges the Concerto) her subjects, on stage and in auditorium, rejoice politely in her presence and works renewed. Bach and Handel, the everlasting in a single concert! How much more to be desired than the dead and dying mediocrities—Dvorák and Grieg are convenient examples—that used to litter even "inaugural" programs!

And is Brahms displacing Beethoven as the symphonist par excellence for the beginning of a new musical year? Often in Dr. Koussevitzky's house, and oftener than not in Mr. Toscanini's. As Beethoven was to conductors and audiences in the Victorian generations so is Brahms in ours. No classic composer now exceeds him in public favor. Where is another upon whom the race of conductor more loves to exercise its powers? The Brahms Festivals to signal the centenary year of his birth promise to be as many and fervent as those that marked, within memory, the hundredth year after Beethoven's death. One for Boston, next spring, seems not only inevitable, but also desirable. . . . Debussy, too, is becoming French master and world master for these "inaugural" occasions. In New York yesterday Mr. Toscanini was playing his sea-pieces while Dr. Koussevitzky was transforming the stage of Symphony Hall into the Faun's bosky retreat. Debussy did his work and died his death and left no small treasure behind within easy recollection of men not yet old. It is tonic to be reminded that our over-belittled time has also produced eminent composers. There are Debussy . . . and Strauss . . . and Sibelius . . . and, maybe, at the top of his powers, a certain Igor Stravinsky.

Note as well with many a hearer, the unlessened freshness, the ever-renewed vitality, the persistent appeal to ear and imagination of this Faun of Debussy and this Symphony of Brahms. As we listeners ripen in them, so do we the more enjoy them. True, our enjoyment yesterday owed much to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The orchestral tone, throughout Debussy's Prelude, was at once humorous and sensuous. The pattern of the music, the melody, the rhythm, unfolded through the golden haze of the harmonic and instrumental color. Every element in the facture was justly blended in the performance, The conductor's pacing and phrasing, the orchestra's skill and sensibility, all contributed to the glamouring, poetizing end. "The afternoon of a Faun" is forty years old; Debussy finished the manuscript in 1892. Through nearly thirty seasons it has been intermittent piece at Symphony Hall. A horde of composers have fastened upon the Debussyan inventions; assimilated, as best they might, the Debussyan proceedures. Yet it is still possible to hear the Prelude with the thrill of first acquaintance no less than the deeper delights of many meetings.

With Brahms's Symphony in D major conductor and orchestra likewise excelled. The tonal afterglow upon the end of the first movement; the drooping gesture with which the slow movement stills into pathos; the swift leaps of the Allegretto out of lyric sweetness into rhythmic light; the crescendo of quickening pace and brightening color through the finale were all instant upon the listening ear, vivid upon the answering imagination. If the orchestra had outspread Debussy's shimmering textures, it was not less susceptible to the more substantial and subdued Brahms. Dr. Koussevitzky, moreover, was perceptive and just in the reading of the Symphony. He does not play it as the pretty music that the composer, in ironic raillery, liked to call it. He will not hear it as the pastoral symphony for which label only the Allegretto gives warrant. Nor will he have it a music of serenity, sweetness, suavity—in the Brahmsian degrees of those qualities—which obviously through many a measure it is not. Rather, he divines the blending within of warmth and tenderness, resignation and energy, melancholy and ardor. The sun shines, but clouds are not far away. The summer earth sings; but sadness veils the watching eyes and touches the listening heart of the tone-poet. So conceiving the Symphony, the conductor found the just means to sustain its songful voice, to clarify its changing moods. (It were hard to imagine a performance more transparent of tone, more sensitive of phrase.) Fifty years on, Brahms's Second Symphony remains, like Debussy's Prelude, a timeless music.

For the novel number—to the debate over the wisdom or the unwisdom of orchestral arrangements of Bach's clavier and organ pieces this article shall not contribute. Of a truth and of a verity that quarrel has no end so long as pens may scratch paper and tongues wag in club-corners. In this particular instance suffice it to say that had not the Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor been transcribed by the handy Esser, the adequate Stock, the impetuous Stokowski, and now by the just and masterful Respighi, few frequenters of symphony concerts would have any acquaintance with a manifold and mighty music. Making his version, Respighi is more than mature master of orchestral resource. He uses that mastery with orchestral imagination. He is more also than the scholar searching out and pondering the original Passacaglia. As he transfuses it into a new medium, he is the fellow-composer who, in kind and degree, may enter penetratingly and with sympathy. Always there have been reservations when Respighi would draw his music out of himself. There have been next to none when he works upon the music of other men, be it written for lutes in a rich Italian palace or for organ in a poor German church.

Throughout the transcribed Passacaglia Respighi's orchestral means are abundant and flexible. Throughout he plies them with a rare mingling of readiness and discretion. By a fellow-composer's insight he preserves Bach's structure and substance. The impression is as though the original organ-piece had been melted down like an ingot; then re-minted into the orchestral transcription. Blending composer's imagination with technician's skill, Respighi gives to each variation a distinctive color; yet through the twenty rarely falls into monotony. Never, besides, does he let the ear forget the persisting ground-bass. The mounting and deepening sonority of the final variations is foil to the preceeding richness and diversity of orchestral texture. Nowhere does Respighi stay Bach's flooding fertility, his propulsive sweep forward and upward. Save in two or three of the lighter variations, everywhere is splendor. For orchestra, as for organ, the Passacaglia rises in a passion of creation, mind and soul together. Through the Fugue, from the trumpet-proclamation of the principal subject to the surge of the final close sound "the surge and thunder of the Apocalypse." The sternest purist may agree that, if transcriptions are to be made at all, Respighi has made his superlatively well. In these days for the grandeurs of Bach no organ may suffice. The medium, if they are to strike home to us, is the multi-tongued and puissant orchestra.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

By Mr. Loeffler Trans Oct 13

FOR not too distant performance at th Symphony Concerts Dr. Koussevitzky has in mind Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation," the only one of his major o chestral works yet unheard in Bosto It was written for the dedication of th new hall of the Cleveland Symphony O chestra, a year ago last winter; has sinc been played nowhere else. If recollectio serves, it also enlists a small chorus o women's voices to sing the lines of a ancient poet. "Evocation" is at the opposite pole from the usual dedicator "piéce d'occasion." Characteristically Mr. Loeffler hallows, not a new musi room, but the art of music that is t sound within it. So minded, he subl mates both the end and the means.

Incidents and Prospects

The Bostonian public that has lon heard with pleasure the music of Mor sieur Ravel, the fewer Bostonians t whom he is personally known in Pari or by his visits to their city, will lear with sympathy that he was hurt, las Sunday, in a taxi-cab collision. His hea and chest were injured and he was take to a hospital. The wounds are sufficien ly grave but not critical.

The third pair of Symphony Concert on Friday and Saturday of next week wi be divided between two classics and tw pieces by Mr. John Alden Carpenter wh will be double guest—as composer an as pianist. The classics are Weber Overture to his opera, "Oberon," an Franck's favorite Symphony in D mino For Mr. Carpenter, his new "Patterns for Piano and Orchestra and his Amer can ballet, "Skyscrapers," as concer piece.

Among the concert-going public here abouts there is a discoverable desire t hear Mme. Sigrid Onegin when she r turns to America next winter. Her débu at Symphony Hall, some years ago, wa impressive. Yet she has returned seldon and then semi-privately, as last autum to the Morning Musicales at the Statle There she was warmly received.

The usual course of prefatory lecture on the programs of the Symphony Co certs is proceeding at the Public Librar on Thursday afternoons, before each pai at five-fifteen o'clock. Mr. Appel of th Brown Musical Library and Mr. Mey of The Transcript's staff are the expo tors with occasional assistance from co posers and resident "authorities." M sical illustrations intersperse each lectur

CLASSIC BILL AT SYMPHONY

Bruckner's imposing "Romantic" symphony, together with Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem and Wagner's "Mastersinginers" prelude, provided the Symphony Hall matinee audience with an all-classic second program. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men performed all ree pieces with rousing artistry. The same program will be repeated tonight.

Next week John Alden Carpenter will be guest star at the Symphony concerts. The Chicago composer will play the piano part in his new work, "Patterns." His "Skyscrapers" ballet is also on the program. Weber's "Oberon" overture and Franck's D minor symphony are the other works listed.

Fourth Bruckner Symphony

Am Oct 15

By MOSES SMITH

The first important revival of the season graces the second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played at Symphony Hall under Serge Koussevitzky's direction yesterday afternoon, and to be repeated this evening. The novelty—for such it was to most persons in the audience, since it had not been heard here in many years—was the Fourth Symphony of Bruckner, the retiring German musician of the last century, whose music spoke for him, often in thundering tones.

In this work there is little thundering. There are brilliant climaxes, but they are exceptional. The prevailing style is lyric, musing, contemplative, even sentimental. Not without reason has the work been dubbed "Romantic." The call of the hunting horn is a dominant motive. There are rich harmonies from the brasses as well as strings. The orchestration is, on the whole, much lighter than is customary in a Bruckner score, but by its transparence is none the less charming.

The performance of yesterday seemed well-prepared, sympathetic, often eloquent. Especial mention ought to be made of the horn solos of Mr. Boettcher. But the orchestra as a whole, under Mr. Koussevitzky's illuminating and discerning influence, played beautifully. The work was received with great cordiality by the audience.

There are two other numbers on the program, which is well arranged with music of kindred styles—"Don Juan" by Strauss, and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner. The tone poem of Strauss was read by Mr. Koussevitzky imaginatively, with romantic ardor, with fire and brilliance. Nor did this ardor go to excess, as the temptation is in such a work. The conductor seemed particularly happy in his choice and maintenance of tempi.

A Best Seller And Much More

Just Plea for the Symphony Of Franck, To Be Heard Again Next Week

Trans Oct 15

THE popularity of Franck's Symphony — to be played anew at the Symphony Concerts next week—is not easily accounted for. What makes a symhpony prevail? Why do the great symphonic favorites hold their sway over the popular heart? It is the theory of Mr. Compton Mackenzie (a novelist who stoops to music) that the best loved symphonies have won their place because of a legend or a name that has commended them to the general fancy—the Fifth of Beethoven because of the story about Fate knocking at the door; the "Unfinished" because of its title; the "Pathetic," both because of the title and of the story that links it with Chaikovsky's legendary suicide; the "Eroica" because of the Napoleonic association; the Seventh because of Wagner's "Apotheosis of the Dance" tag. Frankly, we take little stock in this theory. The C minor of Brahms is as remote from legend, from any extra-musical suggestion, as any work in the symphonic list; yet in a Philadelphia voting contest it came within thirty-seven votes of tying Beethoven's C minor for second place; and today in New York and Boston this symphony of Bahms is prime favorite with audiences.

As for César Franck's symphony, which has so long held first position in the affections of Philadelphia's voters, what is its legend, name or tag? It has none. It is a symphony; it is in the key of D minor; that is all we know, or need to know, apparently, in order to hold it in our hearts. And what is there in the texture of the music itself to explain its popularity? This score has nothing of the overwhelming emotionalism of the "Pathetic"; nothing of the dramatic puissance and directness of Beethoven's Fifth. In this case, as in others, it might be said, in paraphrase of a comment in a different field, that here the public taste is itself part of the problem, and that the patience or impatience of three thousand auditors, shaking down into certain lines of liking or indifference, is a sort of artistic verdict. Yet the interest and the oddity of the verdict remain.

It is a little more than forty years since Gounod at the première of Franck's symphony (Paris, Feb. 17, 1889) delivered his amusing verdict upon the new score: "He fulminated," writes d'Indy, "a kind of papal decree to the effect that this symphony was the affirmation of incompetence pushed to dogmatic lengths." If only the music had had the grace to confirm the admirable wit of the composer of "Faust"! If this is "incompetence," how many a music-maker high-placed and valorous would not have prayed for a like disability!

The essential nature of Franck, the man and the musician, was very simply indicated by Claude Debussy in one of his excursions as critic. "Franck," he said, "was a man without guile. The discovery of a beautiful harmony was sufficient to make him as happy as the day was long. . . . A great deal has been said about his genius without ever mentioning its unique quality of ingenuousness. This man, who was unfortunate, unrecognized possessed the soul of a child, and one so ineradicably good that neither contradictory circumstances nor the wickedness of others could ever make him feel bitter. . . . He wrote, . . . so to speak, face to face with the spirit of music, before whom he would kneel, uttering at the same time the most profoundly touching prayer that ever fell from human lips. César Franck served his art with steadfast devotion. . . . No power on earth could force him to break off a period which seemed to him right and necessary, however lengthy it might be. . . . In this, Franck affiliates himself with the great composers for whom sounds had distinct meaning in their sonorous phraseology. . . . He served music without ever asking it for renown."

It is necessary to remember, too, what Debussy did not find it within the scope of his remarks to recall; namely, that Franck was not French. In one of Flaubert's letters to Madame X, he complains somewhat petulantly that "the French mind has such a rage for amusement that it is necessary for it always to be seeing things!" Is there something in the French mind, some passion for externalization and objectivity, that, on its musical side, has seemed to disincline it toward the essential inwardness of the symphony—that type of symphony which is an exposition of spiritual history; not the dramatizing, pictorializing symphony of Berlioz? "In France," said Duparc, pupil of Franck, "we have too great a love for dramatic music. Dramatic music is an . . . inferior species, which does not allow the artist to express himself directly, to reveal freely the beautiful soul."

Certainly it is a significant commentary upon the trend of the French musical mind that a symphony which was composed only six years after the aging necromancer of Bayreuth had added the last touches to the score of "Parsifal," should still remain, more than a generation later, in unchallenged pre-eminence as the crown of symphonic art in France. And this symphony was written by a composer born in Liège. There are, of course, other and variously admirable French symphonies besides the outstanding one that was composed by a Belgian. Among those of our time there are the symphonies of Lalo, Saint-Saëns, Magnard, Chausson, Ropartz, d'Indy, Dukas, Roussel, to name but a few. Yet the fact remains that, speaking with rough truth, there is still, for the contemporary concert-world, but one French symphony that is sufficiently compensating to reward inexhaustibly, year after year, the attention of performers and listeners, and that is the D-minor Symphony of Franck.

"Majestic, plastic, perfectly beautiful," are d'Indy's characterizing words for his master's score. But one can think of other symphonies that are majestic and plastic and perfect in beauty. It is less, one fancies, because of the quality of its musical tissue, than because of that which the music conveys to us, that music-lovers return to Franck's symphony again and again without satiety. "I shall go on with them as soon as I get better," said he on his deathbed thinking of the uncompleted versicles of his "Magnificat"—or else," he added in a lower tone, "perhaps God will let me finish them in His eternity to come."

In another man, the remark might have been the semi-mechanical repetition of a pious formula; but for Franck the words unquestionably corresponded to a deep and intense conviction of the spirit. Romain Rolland, who knew him well—"well enough to love him," as he says, "and to catch a glimpse of the beauty and serenity of his soul"—has told us how remarkable was the completeness and assurance of Franck's religious faith; a faith which knew no doubts, which was the mainspring of his life. The purity, the otherworldliness, the exalted mysticism of Franck the man, are reflected in much of his music—in the "Beatitudes," in the "Redemption," in portions of the symphony. Through this music, to the imagination of his pupil, d'Indy (himself a man of faith and aspiration, a medieval Christian), stream "troops of angels as purely imagined as Filippo Lippi's or Fra Angelico's."

It is easy for the sympathetic to perceive in this often spiritualized and touching music those luminous beings that brightened the shadows of the organ-loft where the devout and humble Franck mused and played and mused again. One visions him as he sat there for so many years, alone, but not alone, companioned by ineffable presences, absorbed above his keyboard, "singing forth in a low voice," like that old mystic of so different a type, Jonathan Edwards, his "contemplations of the Creator"; for to Franck all life and all nature discoursed of divine and immortal things.

Continued on Following Page

A Best Seller

Continued from Preceding Page

Yet Monsieur Rolland thinks that perhaps there was more trouble in the depths of Franck's heart than the mysti-al serenity of his exterior would lead ne to believe, and he warns us particularly in the case of the Symphony to beware of seeking in it only the expression f a transfigured and rapturous exaltation. "I ask those who love this music cause they find some of their own sadss reflected there," says Monsieur Rolland, "whether they have not felt the secret tragedies that some of his passages unfold—those phrases that seem to rise in supplication to God and often fall back in sadness and in tears? It is not all light in that soul; but the light that is there does not affect us less because it shines from afar."

No doubt it is the wide emotional range—the blend of passionate humanity, of exaltation, of spiritual tenderness—that everyone feels in this symphony of Franck. It is that which makes its appeal so sure and so constant. The meditations of Franck the mystical rhapsodist, of Franck the troubled dreamer, touch us again and again by their sincerity and their intensity; and in the ftiest moments of their tonal utterance expression achieves an unforgettably distinction of contour and gesture in the concluding nine measures of t movement, where the ancient de imitation lifts the music to a mag peroration.

ging-robes, at their best, were cloth of gold pearl-strewn and How splendid is the texture when it is most radiant, as ges of this symphony, when himself up to his full imagi- faces the morning sun and e himself, as Omar so marked, is Heaven and you get the Franck of music-making Primi ble, divinely simple, ly the captain of his

LAWRENCE GILMAN

ew York Herald Tribune)

Trans

CTOBER 15, 1932

Musicians —

The Day Of Bruckner At Symphony Hall

His Fourth Symphony Revived And Superlatively Played, Contrasting Numbers

CONDUCTOR and orchestra, at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, spared neither zeal nor pains upon the resurrected Fourth Symphony of Bruckner. Never before had it sounded across Symphony Hall. The one preceding performance "at these concerts" dated back to February, 1899, in the old Music Hall, now the Orpheum Picture House, in the first year of Gericke's second reign. It was, therefore, new piece played in new circumstance to a new symphonic generation. Turn and turn about, advantage aided, disadvantage hampered, it. The Fourth is one of the shorter symphonies of Bruckner. Lessened by a few skillful, insignificant cuts, the performance fell within an hour—a length to which less debatable symphonists and tone-poets long since accustomed twentieth-century hearers. It is also one of Bruckner's earlier symphonies, composed in 1874, revised and re-written, especially in the last two movements, through the next six years, finally produced at Vienna in 1881. Being such, it differs appreciably from the Seventh. Eighth and Ninth that audiences of the present day are better accustomed to hear.

It is not only shorter, it is also slighter. Thereby it escapes the swollen proportions, the overblown substance, the too ponderous and too hollow climaxes that are recurring blemish upon the later works. Bruckner, the mystical seer who released his soul in music-making, was the composer of these symphonic monuments. Bruckner, the Austrian peasant who also wrote music, drew this Fourth Symphony from the naive romantic strain within him, from loved landscape and the folk upon it, from the simple-hearted visions with which his imagination also peopled it. A mystical tone-poet is relatively independent of time and place. He may prevail the world over. A peasant tone-poet, enkindled romantically by his own countryside, is circumscribed in comparison. The listener must project himself into the outflowing music or it is of none effect.

Therefore, as Dr. Koussevitzky readily perceived, Bruckner's "Romantic" Symphony, to an American audience in these days, requires a deal of playing. From first measure to last it received it. (Seemingly this assiduous preparation had so consumed rehearsals that the ensuing "Don Juan" of Strauss lacked the graphic detail, the flooding, driving fire, that usually animate its every repetition at Symphony Hall.) Here, there and everywhere in the symphony Bruckner employs the horns sympathetically, artfully, poetically. Mr. Boettcher and his colleagues of the choir have seldom played with more tonal beauty and sensibility; or Dr. Koussevitzky been finer-eared to their voices. Already Bruckner is cultivating his Wagnerian predilection for the other brass. It gave out a clear, mellowed sonority, rich to hear. Being an organist become composer and tone-poet, Bruckner loves pedal-points and the even flow of the melodic stream. In neither did the string choir fail him; while it was as swift as he would speed it through the so-called "Hunting Scherzo." In this Fourth Symphony, besides, Bruckner is unusually susceptible and fanciful with the wind choir. In flawless tone it gave him what he asked, even when in the slow movement the imitation of a singing bird in the forest momentarily, and childishly, delights him. Throughout the orchestra excelled itself as fused and plastic ensemble, quick to every sonority that sang in the composer's ear and heart.

The rest was the conductor's doing. He was notably apt in disguising the idiosyncrasies and mannerisms with which Bruckner wearies the eagerest and most sympathetic hearer. Through large parts of this Fourth Symphony, he composes in paragraphs, separated by pauses rather than linked by transitions. Dr. Koussevitzky measured these halts so adroitly that the overtones of the orchestra seemed to veil them. It is Bruckner's too frequent way to proceed in sequences and to overwork them. By skillful shading, by instinctive sympathy, the conductor often lessened that monotony. Bruckner strews the Fourth Symphony with measures that melt upon the ear, touch the heart, set imagination in answering glow. The conductor and his orchestra burnished or deepened this beauty and poetry. Between are the platitudes, the empty repetitions, the simplicities, bland, child-like and sometimes endearing, of this earlier Bruckner. The conductor misted them, as much as might be, with the orchestral tone; in the slow movement and the scherzo lent them a sort of apologetic grace.

Continued on Following Page

Day of Bruckner

Continued from Preceding Page

Unless genuine and sustained inspiration, as through many a page in the later symphonies, possessed Bruckner's mind, and turned it molten, it lacked the co-ordinating faculty. Too often it cannot assimilate, adjust, unify, progress. It sets upon the staves one thing after another, be it inventive or commonplace, charged or insignificant; then lets it go at that. This fault haunts the Fourth Symphony. Again the conductor's intensive sympathy, again the web of tone, half-hid such shortcoming. It was as though the conductor's ardor would achieve that in which the composer had failed. Dr. Koussevitzky almost persuaded us that Bruckner would transplant into his symphonies not only Wagnerian sonorities but unfolding Wagnerian line; that, like Franck, out of a few germinating notes, he would evolve first his theme, then his expanding melody. Bruckner's apocalyptic voice in his later symphonies commits him, in our habit and anticipation, to fervors everywhere. Yet this early Fourth is often gentle, musing, day-dreamish music. Once more Dr. Koussevitzky's warmths averted disillusion, while he tempered them to Bruckner's softer musical speech. For the hour the simple composer had found his prophet in the sophisticated conductor. The applause at the end testified as much.

This Fourth Symphony harked back to an earlier Bruckner than we usually hear; tapped him in fresh veins; reminded us that he was romantic before he was apocalyptic; that he could transfuse into music sensations from the world without as well as visions from the soul within. By so much it gave pleasure and deserved revival. The Parsifal of the cherished Wagner saw the knights down the forest-vistas, and his heart leapt within him. Simpler minded, Bruckner saw them threading the Vienna woods, and wove into his first movement the magic of the sight. The peasant in Bruckner walks the shady paths; hears in the filtering light the sounds around him; finds himself pensive, wistful, melancholy; goes home; turns composer; writes a slow movement. The hunt that of old flashed through the tree-trunks, the folk that danced in the glades—and he has the contrasts of the scherzo. Likely enough Bruckner forgot through the finale "the program" he thought to follow. The composer conquers both the peasant and the woodland poet. Patterns and sonorities possess and suffice him.

Winding here and there through the symphony the charm with which the Vienna woods and the Austrian forests spell the Vienna and the Austrian folk; the tenderness in which simple souls remember them. Schubert, who was also simple-minded composer, knew both and sang of both, as diffusely withal as the symphonic Bruckner. So far, so good. But the veritable and universal Bruckner, seer, mystic, tone-poet before whom the heavens opened that he might make music of celestial visions and divine things, abides in the final symphonies.

The other two numbers of the afternoon—Strauss's tone-poem of "Don Juan" and Wagner's prelude to his comedy of medieval Nuremberg—are the familiarest of repertory pieces. Times out of mind conductors and orchestra at Symphony Hall have proved their valor with Strauss's voluptuous scene, his fires of desire, his ashes of disgust. Or with Wagner's web of counterpoint woven rich, glamorous, inexhaustible, around master singers and apprentices, a poet-knight, a goldsmith's impetuous daughter, midsummer eve and midsummer day. Times out of mind listeners have thrilled to them as once more did yesterday's audience. But heard in sequence to Bruckner's Symphony both now pointed a contrast and a moral. Without designing mind, directed imagination, considered means, there is no making a masterpiece of music like Strauss's poem or Wagner's prelude. No doubt Wagner knew what we poorly and vaguely call inspiration, when, at his work-table above the sun-bathed Rhine, he put to paper in an afternoon his first draft. No doubt it came and went upon the younger Strauss, through a year in Munich "toiling terribly" at his score. But minds well-stocked, long-prepared and firm-disciplined, ordered and sifted the workings of that inspiration. It was the misfortune of Bruckner to possess a composing soul and to miss a composing intellect.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN BENEFIT CONCERT

For the benefit of the victims of the recent Puerto Rican hurricane, Arthur Fiedler and the full Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert in Symphony hall, Sunday afternoon, Oct. 23. Jesus Maria Sanroma, a noted Puerto Rican pianist, will add a recital to the orchestral program.

Fiedler and Sanroma called on Mayor Curley yesterday and to display his interest in the concert he purchased $100 worth of tickets which will be distributed among the boys forming the band of the House of Angel Guardian. The mayor also accepted the invitation to be honorary chairman of the committee which will sponsor the benefit concert.

Herald Oct 15

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, was as follows: Bruckner, Symphony No. 4 (The "Romantic"), E flat major; Strauss, Tone Poem "Don Juan"; Wagner, Prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Bruckner's symphony was performed by this orchestra in Boston on Feb. 10, 1899 under Wilhelm Gericke. It is known that after Bruckner had completed the symphony in 1874—it was not produced in Vienna until 1881—he revised it and wrote a wholly new Scherzo. The original Scherzo will be performed for the first time next Wednesday in Vienna. We have not heard it, of course; we have not seen the score; but we prefer it to the Scherzo heard yesterday, with its commonplace hunting-calls and general jubilation.

There has been a gallant effort of late to impress audiences with the worth of Bruckner's music. There is even an "International Bruckner Society." It has been said that conductors enjoy the symphonies of this man. They certainly put them on programs without regard for the feelings of the hearers. Bruckner, the man, was a singular and in many respects a pathetic character. He was outrageously abused by the Brahmsites led by the persecuting Hanslick. "In heavenly minds can such resentment dwell?" He was overpraised by the Wagnerites who opposed him as a symphonist to Brahms.

Personal characteristics of the man, as his simplicity, real and sometimes affected; his peasant shrewdness, his worship of Wagner, are revealed in certain pages of his works. He could be tiresome and common in the development of themes that had genuine force and beauty; he could also have splendid visions, but of lamentably short duration. He could be respectably trivial. When a hearer is led for the moment to echo the praise of his fanatical admirers, he is quickly disappointed, for Bruckner often commits the unpardonable sin in music, the sin not to be forgiven by Apollo, nor by Jones, Brown, and Robinson: he is irritatingly dull. He lacked the art of building a firm and enduring structure. He would fritter away the effect of a fine thought by meaningless pauses, by tiresome repetitions, by insignificant episodes when there should be continuity moving toward grandeur or an intensely emotional outburst. Nor in the symphony played yesterday is there knit strength or a long flight of beauty. To say that Bruckner had honorable intentions, that he at times succeeded in surprising his enemies in art, is no more to the purpose than the dwelling on his "sincerity"—how many musical crimes are committed with this word!—or the reminder that he was a devout man who purposed to dedicate his incomplete and last symphony to God.

It is possible that Strauss will be remembered gratefully in the years to come by his "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel" and his opera the "Rosenkavalier." Some might add his songs, though they are uneven in quality and many of them are too evident bids for popular favor. The performance of "Don Juan" yesterday may fairly be described as spirited, dramatic, strenuous, applause-inciting, but a little more relief from the vigor and the brilliance would have been welcome. Even in the love-song sung expressively by the oboe, the orchestral accompaniment should have been more subdued, an amorous murmur. But the performance aroused the audience from the apathy, if not to say the somnolence incited by the symphony—in spite of the intervening intermission—and a rousing—that is the word for it—reading of Wagner's overture dismissed the audience in a happy mood.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Franck, Symphony; Carpenter, "Patterns" for orchestra and piano, first performance (the composer will play the piano part), and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," a ballet of modern American life.

Globe Oct 15

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Anton Bruckner's Fourth Symphony, in E-flat, was heard at a Boston Symphony concert, yesterday afternoon, for the first time in 33 years, Dr Koussevitzky having given it the place of honor on the program of the second concert of the season. The two remaining numbers were Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan," and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

This "Romantic" symphony, as it is called, was performed here only once previously, by Mr Gericke in February, 1899. It then met with a generally favorable reception, according to printed record, although some expressed their failure to understand what the composer was driving at in the last movement. Today the symphony is no longer in the "extreme modern style," but the finale remains as obscure as ever.

The work has been popularly referred to as a "nature" symphony, and Bruckner himself gave out a "program" for it. Whether or not it succeeds in conveying to listeners the thoughts that Bruckner claimed for it is beside the point, for most listeners commendably make their own mental "programs." Indeed Bruckner might well have called it "Field Day of a Brass Section," for those instruments are used unsparingly in all four movements. At the conclusion of the work yesterday, a row of crimson faces in the rear of the orchestra testified to the pulmonary exertion which had been necessary.

Bruckner was during his life a subject of controversy, and conflict regarding the merits of his music has reigned since he died. Brahms, according to Richard Specht, in 1897 called Bruckner a "swindle" and referred contemptuously to his music as "symphonic boa constrictors." Like most extreme views, this is probably unjust, but Bruckner is not now generally regarded as one of the major German composers of the 19th Century, nor does it seem likely that he will be accorded such place in the future. His music, to one listener, does not have the distinction of material, the profundity, or the vitality to be expected of a first-rank composer, such as Brahms. And while Bruckner may have written out of a full heart, his emotion is by no means expressed as clearly and forcefully as that of Brahms.

The "Romantic" symphony is very long, requiring nearly an hour to play. The four movements have a certain unity, in that all are built more or less on one theme, a horn call. This call, however, is repeated too frequently, and by the end of the work is done to death. The first movement is the most interesting in development, the most consistently moving, and the most sustained in mood.

Although the symphony is said to reach a climax in the finale, this last movement, for all its pretentious, bombastic sounding of brass, is singularly empty of feeling and substance. The storm and stress is relieved intermittently by quasi-pastoral interludes, which not only interrupt the continuity, but appear, in contrast, ridiculously out of proportion. Bruckner, when outlining his "program," said he had forgotten just what he was thinking about when he composed this finale. The andante, however, is very tastefully and delicately written, and paradoxically suggests the spirit, if not the style of 18th Century music.

Strauss' "Don Juan" has as much fire and vigor as on the day it was finished. It is one of the master's greatest compositions and takes rank with "Till Rulenspiegel," "Thus Spake Zarathrusta" and "Death and Transfiguration." For all its echoes of Wagner and Liszt, it heralds eloquently the audacious, pioneering Strauss of maturity.

The performance of all these works was, of course, of extraordinarily high order. Dr Koussevitzky strove valiantly with the symphony and made it resplendent and sonorous if not forceful. The glorious soarings of the strings and the infectious rhythms in "Don Juan" were something to cherish in memory. And one would have to go far to hear a better performance of Wagner's prelude than that of yesterday. For once the intricate polyphony was perfectly clear.

John Alden Carpenter will be piano soloist next week in the first public performance of his new "Patterns." His ballet "Skyscrapers," Franck's D minor Symphony, and the overture to Weber's "Oberon" will also be played.

C. W. D.

Post

DAY, OCTOBER 15,

SYMPHONY RESTORES BRUCKNER

Fourth, Unheard Since 1899, Well Liked in 1932

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

On Feb. 10 and 11, 1899, Wilhelm Gericke conducted at a pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Anton Bruckner's Fourth Symphony in E flat major, styled the "Romantic." Yesterday afternoon at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men that symphony received its third hearing in this city. Will this evening's performance be both its fourth and its last?

IS MELODIOUS MUSIC

That this Symphony should have gone unplayed during the interim is not altogether understandable. It contains much that is agreeable; and passages which today sound old-fashioned might not have made that impression 20 years ago. But for those whose practical acquaintance with Bruckner's symphonies is confined to the Seventh, Eighth and Ninth, this Symphony of yesterday may have brought its surprises. In it are neither the majesty, the profundity, the rich and glowing harmonies, nor yet that involved form, which the unthinking mistake for formlessness, typical of those mighty works, save perhaps, in the last movement and in portions of the first, where come hints of the true and characteristic Bruckner.

Instead yesterday's audience heard a straightforward and melodious music, truly romantic as that word was understood in the Vienna of the seventies and betraying in certain passages for the woodwind, or brass, a knowledge of and sympathy with what was then known as the orchestral methods of one Richard Wagner.

Powerful Last Movement

In the later Bruckner symphonies, the outstanding movements are always the second and the third. Such Adagios and Scherzos had been written by no other composer since Beethoven. In the Symphony of yesterday, the first and last movements—and particularly the latter, with its chief theme that none of Bruckner's contemporaries could possibly have imagined—are the strongest.

The second movement, a Schubertian Andante, is pleasant, but of no especial significance. The famous "Hunting" Scherzo is, as the New Englander says, "no great shakes."

Second Theme Cut

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted this Symphony with understanding and enthusiasm, and the applause at the end, which returned him to the platform until he bade the players rise and bow, proved that his efforts had not been in vain. Yet granted that the Symphony is full long—it consumed nearly an hour yesterday—Dr. Koussevitzky's omission of the second theme in the recapitulation of the first Allegro did violence to the formal structure of this movement. And here the composer deserved better of one who may be numbered among his contemporary champions and disciples.

Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers" completed an afternoon of orchestral sumptuousness and of brilliant playing.

12

Dr. Koussevitzky's Bow to Cambridge

Trans Oct 14

THE opening of the Cambridge series of symphony concerts last evening was ceremonial occasion comparable to that of the first concert of the Saturday series in Boston. A floral piece of dark red rosebuds backed by lace-like greenery hung suspended from the conductor's stand. The orchestra was standing when Dr. Koussevitzky reached the podium. At his first bow the audience rose to a man to extend its greeting; resumed seats only at the repeated gesture of the conductor. Quickly the orchestra swung into the grave strains of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor—and the new season was under way. The program assembled numbers from that of last week and of this week at Symphony Hall—Handel's concerto for strings already mentioned; Debussy's prelude, "To the Afternoon of a Faun"; the prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersinger's of Nürnberg"; Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major.

Dr. Koussevitzky has long been at his best in the concertos of Handel. Last evening he once more gave evidence of the kindling spirit which he can and does infuse into them. Be it in solemn introductory gravities, or in crisp sparkling Allegros, now the frank play and interplay of contrapuntal "voices," now the capricious cavortings of the dance measures of the day, now the whimsies of slight-textured muted strings, or be it in an air proceeding in large and ever more largely conceived phrases that culminate eventually in chorale-like periods—the conductor seems to be the very spirit of this music, to create (with the men) it over again in the likeness of the composer who with his mind's ear first heard it. Nor must one forget the players upon solo instruments—the "concertino"—whose polished tones furnish so important a detail in the whole scheme of the Handelian concerto—violinists Burgin and Theodorowicz, and 'cellist Bedetti.

Likewise with Debussy is Dr. Koussevitzky most sympathetic interpreter. Debussyian suavities and subtleties are also Koussevitzkian suavities and subtleties. One reveled last night in the kaleidescopic successions of tonal colors, in the gentle play of light and shade, in the modulations of pace and rhythm, until one felt the illusion of being at one with the half-conscious, crazy imaginings of the sodden, sleepy woodland faun who was first Mallarmé's, then Debussy's, and for us last evening, Koussevitzky's. Once more one records the skill and sensibility of a solo player of more than casual importance in this music—Flutist Laurent.

Always suitable for an opening night is the music of Wagner's great prelude. It is a music ceremonial in nature, a music of pomp and circumstance, but also a music of the overpowering vitality and force of fresh and youthful inspiration as opposed to pedantry and traditionalism. In a long crescendo this music went last evening beginning at a point already high, but mounting higher and ever higher to climax supreme.

And what of Brahms? No music, not even that of his beloved "moderns," does the conductor favor more than that of Brahms. With loving care he makes his players "sing" it, with the warmth of his own heart he causes them to color it, until this music, once thought "gray" and "drab" in its colorings, assumes tonal richness, generates passion. Last evening was no exception. Last evening served only to renew impressions long since made. And this Second Symphony brought to conclusion an evening of masterful Brahms, masterful Wagner, masterful Debussy, masterful Handel.

A. H. M.

Bruckner and Boston

Mon Oct 15

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

A FAVORITE pastime in central Europe is to dispute over the merits of Bruckner and Mahler. The heats of these controversies are not felt on the barbarous shores of North America. There the natives think of Mahler as a great conductor who had a queer notion that he was also a great composer; and of Bruckner, if at all, as that quaint old Austrian peasant who had such a gift, you know, but hardly knew what to do with it. And indeed, if you happen not to be Austrian, your feeling toward both these composers is likely to be marked by more respect than enthusiasm.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in his commendable purpose to keep his audiences acquainted with all worthy music, old and new, went back nearly 60 years to find his novelty for the second pair of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at home (Oct. 14-15). Bruckner's Fourth Symphony, in E flat, was novel, that is to say, in the sense that it had not been heard in Boston for 33 years. If we add that this score seems destined to gather dust on the shelves of Symphony Hall for 33 years longer, we do not mean to condemn it as music. Its integrity and sincerity do honor to its author. It says with faithfulness that which has been said much better by Beethoven and Schubert and Brahms and Wagner.

But how could it have been thought, even in 1881, that Bruckner was a dangerous innovator? Those who so judged him must have been influenced by his reputed theories rather than by this score. This is truly "Romantic" music, but it is not exciting. Later, Bruckner wrote music far more individual, such as the Eighth Symphony, which has been played in Boston by Dr. Koussevitzky, and the Ninth, which was announced by him and withdrawn. But the conductor should not be blamed for placing the "Romantic" Symphony on his programs, especially since he and his virtuoso orchestra played it most persuasively. It is music that the generation should hear—once.

One of the most vital creations of the early-blooming Richard Strauss ("Don Juan") and that other orchestral masterpiece, the "Meistersinger" Overture of Richard Wagner, both brilliantly performed, concluded the program.

L. A. S.

Asked recently what were the things she liked best about the Barrymores, Miss Ethel Barrymore is reported to have replied: "The Drews."

AUSTIN
Organ Company
HARTFORD, CONN.

DESIGNERS and Builders of Pipe Organs of the Finest Quality and Character.

THREE CELEBRATED MUSICAL ARTISTS who are to appear in the series of concerts to be given during the coming season in Alumni Hall, Wellesley College, beginning on Wednesday of this week, and continuing through until March 16, 1933. (Above, left) Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will open the season. (Above, right) Ignace Jan Paderewski, the famous Polish pianist. (At right) Sophie Braslau, the noted contralto singer.

(Boston Herald-Koussevitsky, Bachrach; Paderewski, NBC Artists' service. Braslau, NBC Artists' service.)

Post Oct 16

More than once in the past the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have given their services in behalf of worthy charities. Next Sunday afternoon they will play at Symphony Hall for the benefit of the sufferers from the Puerto Rican hurricane of Sept. 26. The one directly responsible for this concert is the Boston pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, himself a native of Puerto Rico, to whom came a direct appeal from Covernor James J. Beverly for assistance in raising the required sum of $180,000. Of this amount only $80,000 has thus far been forthcoming. Mr. Sanroma will be the soloist next Sunday and he is giving his services, as does Arthur Fiedler, who will conduct. The programme will comprise Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi" and "Siegfried Idyl," Ravel's "Bolero" and the two pieces in which Mr. Sanroma will be the soloist; Rachmaninoff's Second Pianoforte Concerto, and Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue. Tickets priced at 50 cents, $1 and $1:50, tax free, will be on sale at Symphony Hall tomorrow.

* * * *

Due to arrive today from Europe for his autumn tour of America, Fritz Kreisler will shortly be returning thither for the premiere in Vienna this winter of his new operetta, "Sissy." Meanwhile he will be heard at Symphony Hall two weeks from today, Oct. 30, in one of the first appearances of this curtailed visit to our shores.

* * * *

The performances at Symphony Hall last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of Bruckner's Fourth or "Romantic" Symphony very nearly coincided with the Bruckner Festival to be held in Vienna under the auspices of the International Bruckner Society from the 19th through the 23d of this month. The opening concert there will present this same Fourth Symphony with the inclusion of an earlier version of the Scherzo, replaced in the published score and in ordinary performances of the work by the one heard in Symphony Hall last week. Dr. Koussevitzky has now become an active participant in the widely spreading movement to give the Austrian composer his due as symphonist.

* * * *

Impending at the Symphony concerts is a performance of the only important orchestral composition of Charles Martin Loeffler yet unheard in this city, the piece entitled, "Evocation," which the Boston composer wrote for the dedication of the new home of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra some two years ago.

* * * *

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the Symphony concerts of this week the distinguished Chicagoan composer, John Alden Carpenter, will be both soloist and guest of honor. Mr. Carpenter will play the solo part in a new piece for piano and orchestra which he calls "Patterns," expressly written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and but lately completed. Mr. Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," already familiar to frequenters of the Symphony concerts, likewise has place on the programme, and the list also includes the "Oberon" Overture of Weber and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Prologue to The Revival Of Bruckner

Thirty-Three Years Afterward His 'Romantic Symphony' To Be Re-Played

Trans Oct 18

FOR his first unfamiliar symphony, this season, Dr. Koussevitzky does not essay a "modern," but makes his selection from the half-forgotten but notable music of the past. Fate, chance—call it what you will—has been none too kind to more than one composer who deserved better than he got. Anton Bruckner (whose Fourth Symphony, called the "Romantic," will be played this week) was such a composer. He lived in the day when in Austria and Germany the "progressive" Lisztians and Wagnerians, and the "conservative" Brahmsians made violent war upon each other. Poor honest Bruckner found himself unable fully to satisfy the expectations of either camp. His sympathies were wholly with the progressives. His Third Symphony is actually dedicated to Richard Wagner, who was to Bruckner the "master" of the time. In novel harmonies and musical ideas, to some extent in the treatment of the orchestra, Wagner and Bruckner trod paths by no means unrelated. In fact, in the minds of many, Bruckner is regarded as a disciple of Wagner working in the symphonic field. Such may be surprised to learn that modern musical scholarship has proved more than one of Bruckner's "Wagnerian" passages to date earlier than the passages in Wagner which they resemble!

Though Bruckner was of the progressive camp, he was congenitally indisposed, and by education and early environment unfitted, to travel the whole road with his progressive colleagues. At the pinnacle of progressive doctrine of the day stood the esthetic theory of the ever widening expressive powers as exemplified in the symphonic poem, the program-symphony, program-music in general. Bruckner had great faith in the correctness of these theories, but was by nature unsuited to practise them. Speaking the language of the moderns of his day, he was unable to use it in the service of the forms in which that language most aptly expressed itself. Thus to many a progressive he was not of the vanguard; while to the conservatives he remained one of the opposing camp. The unfortunate composer fell between two stools. He was too conservative for the group with which he allied himself; too progressive for the conservatives. With only a few partisans among progressives and none among conservatives, his works were not too often heard, established no tradition.

Especially in America, a later age championing its own heroes and its own new ideas, has not found time to yield him the belated deserts which his peculiar position denied him during his lifetime. Result: to the general musical public in America Bruckner is more a name than a living reality. Thanks, then, to Dr. Koussevitzky for making him further known to us.

Boston has heard six of Bruckner's symphonies, Nos. 7, 8, 9, in several performances; Nos. 3 4, 5 once each. The Fourth, or Romantic, Symphony, was played at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Gericke in 1899. It was first heard in this country in 1888 under Seidl; was also made known in Chicago by Thomas. The first performance anywhere occurred in 1881 at Vienna under Richter. It was composed in 1874. A drastic revision, through the years 1878-80, discarded the original scherzo in favor of a wholly new one.

This Fourth Symphony comes as near to being program-music as anything Bruckner ever wrote. Wherefore Bruckner's attitude toward program-music may well be more closely examined. Ernst Decsey in his "Bruckner, Versuch eines Lebens," has this to say: "Bruckner lacked sufficient literary background (perhaps fortunately) to be a composer of program-music. . . . A less steadfast nature would hardly have resisted the then modern symphonic poem. Nevertheless, Bruckner was continually intrigued by the tendency to increase the range of musical expression. He held this new type of music as probably the 'higher' and 'nobler,' and thus, occasionally, here and there, he supplied programs, or rather, naively imagined fantasias which he took to be programs. He sometimes proffered 'explanations' which did not explain anything; but these were always addressed to the laity, never to musicians. And they were always made with an air of the greatest mystery, as if Bruckner were imparting some weighty secret."

Decsey illustrates his point by citing an explanation which Bruckner once made of the beginning of the "Romantic Symphony" (the only existing "program" of this reputedly "programmatic" work) "'A medieval city—dawn—morning fanfares from the city towers—the city portals open—mounted on proud steeds the knights dash out into the open, the magic of nature surrounding them—forest murmurs—bird-songs—and thus the romantic picture continues to develop. . . .' "And the other movements," continues Decsey, "also had a sort of 'program,' for in his own hand Bruckner designated the Ländler-like trio of the scherzo as

………

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Oct 17

The Turn to Bruckner

STRANGE as it seems, in both Boston and New York, to the elder generation of reviewers and listeners, a new audience is now hearing the symphonies of Bruckner, hearing them without prepossession or prejudice, seemingly receiving pleasure from them. Frequenters of the Symphony Concerts know by heart the signs of boredom or distaste—the recurring rustle through the auditorium, the reading of the program-book page by page, the wandering eyes, the vacant faces, the waning attention. Not one was conspicuous when Dr. Koussevitzky revived the Fourth Symphony last Friday afternoon; while on Saturday evening composer, conductor and orchestra held the audience intent. On both occasions applause answered generally and warmly. The two performances, last spring, of Bruckner's longer, more exacting, more uneven, Eighth Symphony, brought no less interested and cordial response. In New York Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic Society were as fortunate with the Seventh; while within a few weeks they will set out the Fourth as well.

At the beginnings of Bruckner in America, as some like to believe, his symphonies displeased reviewers more than they did lay listeners. Soon the scribes—and a few Pharisees—evolved a formula for discourse about them. It arrayed at length the composer's limitations and weaknesses. It noted less spaciously, with a certain air of weariness, the signal and highly individual qualities that offset them. It implied, and usually asserted, that he and all his works were dull. Whatever the symphony in hand, this formula returned. There was no attempt to examine each one as a separate entity with its own particular quality. By dint of repetition upon hearers with little discernment and less courage of their own, the formula gradually prevailed as the verdict of American audiences upon Bruckner.

Pause ensued during which conductors next to never ventured his symphonies. Then the present return to them—by Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini annually in Boston and New York; by Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Stock more occasionally in Philadelphia and Chicago. Forthwith, a new generation that knew nothing of the old reviewing formula, and shared none of the prejudices it had bred, listened to Bruckner for himself; heard each proffered symphony according to its kind and degree, usually took pleasure in it. Enlightened and persevering conductors have not kept in vain their faith in Bruckner. In Boston and in New York in these nineteen-thirties, he has, decidedly, a present and a future—the "old crowd" (as the young amiably call it) to the contrary notwithstanding.

Incidents and Prospects

The soothsayers have believed that the only centenary or semi-centenary likely to alter the course of symphony concerts this season was the hundredth anniversary in May next of the birth of Brahms. The Germans—trust them for it!—have discovered another. Fifty years ago, on Feb. 13, 1883, Wagner died in Venice. By much precedent Dr Koussevitzky should not fail to remember at Symphony Hall. There are Symphony Concerts on Feb. 17 and 18.

Mr. Kreisler has returned to Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata and is likely to play it at his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 30. In December he will suspend his present tour that he may return to Vienna and oversee the final rehearsals of his operetta, "Sissy," about the Empress Elizabeth of Austria.

H. T. P.

12

Dr. Koussevitzky's Bow to Cambridge

14

THE opening of the Cambridge series of symphony concerts last evening was ceremonial occasion comparable to that of the first concert of the Saturday series in Boston. A floral piece of dark red rosebuds backed by lace-like greenery hung suspended from the conductor's stand. The orchestra was standing when Dr. Koussevitzky reached the podium. At his first bow the audience rose to a man to extend its greeting; resumed seats only at the repeated gesture of the conductor. Quickly the orchestra swung into the grave strains of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor—and the new season was under way. The program assembled numbers from that of last week and of this week at Symphony Hall—Handel's concerto for strings already mentioned; Debussy's prelude, "To the Afternoon of a Faun"; the prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersinger's of Nürnberg"; Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major.

Dr. Koussevitzky has long been at his best in the concertos of Handel. Last evening he once more gave evidence of the kindling spirit which he can and does infuse into them. Be it in solemn introductory gravities, or in crisp sparkling Allegros, now the frank play and interplay of contrapuntal "voices," now the capricious cavortings of the dance measures of the day, now the whimsies of slight-textured muted strings, or be it in an air proceeding in large and ever more largely conceived phrases that culminate eventually in chorale-like periods—the conductor seems to be the very spirit of this music, to create (with the men) it over again in the likeness of the composer who with his mind's ear first heard it. Nor must one forget the players upon solo instruments—the "concertino"—whose polished tones furnish so important a detail in the whole scheme of the Handelian concerto—violinists Burgin and Theodorowicz, and 'cellist Bedetti.

Likewise with Debussy is Dr. Koussevitzky most sympathetic interpreter. Debussyian suavities and subtleties are also Koussevitzkian suavities and subtleties. One reveled last night in the kaleidescopic successions of tonal colors, in the gentle play of light and shade, in the modulations of pace and rhythm, until one felt the illusion of being at one with the half-conscious, crazy imaginings of the sodden, sleepy woodland faun who was first Mallarmé's, then Debussy's, and for us last evening, Koussevitzky's. Once more one records the skill and sensibility of a solo player of more than casual importance in this music—Flutist Laurent.

Always suitable for an opening night is the music of Wagner's great prelude. It is a music ceremonial in nature, a music of pomp and circumstance, but also a music of the overpowering vitality and force of fresh and youthful inspiration as opposed to pedantry and traditionalism. In a long crescendo this music went last evening beginning at a point already high; but mounting higher and ever higher to climax supreme.

And what of Brahms? No music, not even that of his beloved "moderns," does the conductor favor more than that of Brahms. With loving care he makes his players "sing" it, with the warmth of his own heart he causes them to color it, until this music, once thought "gray" and "drab" in its colorings, assumes tonal richness, generates passion. Last evening was no exception. Last evening served only to renew impressions long since made. And this Second Symphony brought to conclusion an evening of masterful Brahms, masterful Wagner, masterful Debussy, masterful Handel.

A. H. M.

Bruckner and Boston

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

A FAVORITE pastime in central Europe is to dispute over the merits of Bruckner and Mahler. The heats of these controversies are not felt on the barbarous shores of North America. There the natives think of Mahler as a great conductor who had a queer notion that he was also a great composer; and of Bruckner, if at all, as that quaint old Austrian peasant who had such a gift, you know, but hardly knew what to do with it. And indeed, if you happen not to be Austrian, your feeling toward both these composers is likely to be marked by more respect than enthusiasm.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in his commendable purpose to keep his audiences acquainted with all worthy music, old and new, went back nearly 60 years to find his novelty for the second pair of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at home (Oct. 14-15). Bruckner's Fourth Symphony, in E flat, was novel, that is to say, in the sense that it had not been heard in Boston for 33 years. If we add that this score seems destined to gather dust on the shelves of Symphony Hall for 33 years longer, we do not mean to condemn it as music. Its integrity and sincerity do honor to its author. It says with faithfulness that which has been said much better by Beethoven and Schubert and Brahms and Wagner.

But how could it have been thought, even in 1881, that Bruckner was a dangerous innovator? Those who so judged him must have been influenced by his reputed theories rather than by this score. This is truly "Romantic" music, but it is not exciting. Later, Bruckner wrote music far more individual, such as the Eighth Symphony, which has been played in Boston by Dr. Koussevitzky, and the Ninth, which was announced by him and withdrawn. But the conductor should not be blamed for placing the "Romantic" Symphony on his programs, especially since he and his virtuoso orchestra played it most persuasively. It is music that the generation should hear—once.

One of the most vital creations of the early-blooming Richard Strauss ("Don Juan") and that other orchestral masterpiece, the "Meistersinger" Overture of Richard Wagner, both brilliantly performed, concluded the program.

L. A. S.

Asked recently what were the things she liked best about the Barrymores, Miss Ethel Barrymore is reported to have replied: "The Drews."

AUSTIN
Organ Company
HARTFORD, CONN.
DESIGNERS and Builders of Pipe Organs of the Finest Quality and Character.

THREE CELEBRATED MUSICAL ARTISTS who are to appear in the series of concerts to be given during the coming season in Alumni Hall, Wellesley College, beginning on Wednesday of this week, and continuing through until March 16, 1933. (Above, left) Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will open the season. (Above, right) Ignace Jan Paderewski, the famous Polish pianist. (At right) Sophie Braslau, the noted contralto singer.

(Boston Herald-Koussevitsky, Bachrach; Paderewski, NBC Artists' service, Braslau, NBC Artists' service.)

---

night

Post 10-16

More than once in the past the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have given their services in behalf of worthy charities. Next Sunday afternoon they will play at Symphony Hall for the benefit of the sufferers from the Puerto Rican hurricane of Sept 26. The one directly responsible for this concert is the Boston pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, himself a native of Puerto Rico, to whom came a direct appeal from Covernor James J. Beverly for assistance in raising the required sum of $180,000. Of this amount only $80,000 has thus far been forthcoming. Mr. Sanroma will be the soloist next Sunday and he is giving his services, as does Arthur Fiedler, who will conduct. The programme will comprise Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi" and "Siegfried Idyl," Ravel's "Bolero" and the two pieces in which Mr. Sanroma will be the soloist; Rachmaninoff's Second Pianoforte Concerto, and Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue. Tickets priced at 50 cents, $1 and $1:50, tax free, will be on sale at Symphony Hall tomorrow.

* * * *

Due to arrive today from Europe for his autumn tour of America, Fritz Kreisler will shortly be returning thither for the premiere in Vienna this winter of his new operetta, "Sissy." Meanwhile he will be heard at Symphony Hall two weeks from today, Oct. 30, in one of the first appearances of this curtailed visit to our shores.

* * * *

The performances at Symphony Hall last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of Bruckner's Fourth or "Romantic" Symphony very nearly coincided with the Bruckner Festival to be held in Vienna under the auspices of the International Bruckner Society from the 19th through the 23d of this month. The opening concert there will present this same Fourth Symphony with the inclusion of an earlier version of the Scherzo, replaced in the published score and in ordinary performances of the work by the one heard in Symphony Hall last week. Dr. Koussevitzky has now become an active participant in the widely spreading movement to give the Austrian composer his due as symphonist.

* * * *

Impending at the Symphony concerts is a performance of the only important orchestral composition of Charles Martin Loeffler yet unheard in this city, the piece entitled, "Evocation," which the Boston composer wrote for the dedication of the new home of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra some two years ago.

* * * *

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the Symphony concerts of this week the distinguished Chicagoan composer, John Alden Carpenter, will be both soloist and guest of honor. Mr. Carpenter will play the solo part in a new piece for piano and orchestra which he calls "Patterns," expressly written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and but lately completed. Mr. Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," already familiar to frequenters of the Symphony concerts, likewise has place on the programme, and the list also includes the "Oberon" Overture of Weber and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Prologue to The Revival Of Bruckner

Thirty-Three Years Afterward His 'Romantic Symphony' To Be Re-Played

Trans Oct 18

FOR his first unfamiliar symphony, this season, Dr. Koussevitzky does not essay a "modern," but makes his selection from the half-forgotten but notable music of the past. Fate, chance—call it what you will—has been none too kind to more than one composer who deserved better than he got. Anton Bruckner (whose Fourth Symphony, called the "Romantic," will be played this week) was such a composer. He lived in the day when in Austria and Germany the "progressive" Lisztians and Wagnerians, and the "conservative" Brahmsians made violent war upon each other. Poor honest Bruckner found himself unable fully to satisfy the expectations of either camp. His sympathies were wholly with the progressives. His Third Symphony is actually dedicated to Richard Wagner, who was to Bruckner the "master" of the time. In novel harmonies and musical ideas, to some extent in the treatment of the orchestra, Wagner and Bruckner trod paths by no means unrelated. In fact, in the minds of many, Bruckner is regarded as a disciple of Wagner working in the symphonic field. Such may be surprised to learn that modern musical scholarship has proved more than one of Bruckner's "Wagnerian" passages to date earlier than the passages in Wagner which they resemble!

Though Bruckner was of the progressive camp, he was congenitally indisposed, and by education and early environment unfitted, to travel the whole road with his progressive colleagues. At the pinnacle of progressive doctrine of the day stood the esthetic theory of the ever widening expressive powers as exemplified in the symphonic poem, the program-symphony, program-music in general. Bruckner had great faith in the correctness of these theories, but was by nature unsuited to practise them. Speaking the language of the moderns of his day, he was unable to use it in the service of the forms in which that language most aptly expressed itself. Thus to many a progressive he was not of the vanguard; while to the conservatives he remained one of the opposing camp. The unfortunate composer fell between two stools. He was too conservative for the group with which he allied himself; too progressive for the conservatives. With only a few partisans among progressives and none among conservatives, his works were not too often heard, established no tradition.

Especially in America, a later age championing its own heroes and its own new ideas, has not found time to yield him the belated deserts which his peculiar position denied him during his lifetime. Result: to the general musical public in America Bruckner is more a name than a living reality. Thanks, then, to Dr. Koussevitzky for making him further known to us.

Boston has heard six of Bruckner's symphonies, Nos. 7, 8, 9, in several performances; Nos. 3 4, 5 once each. The Fourth, or Romantic, Symphony, was played at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Gericke in 1899. It was first heard in this country in 1888 under Seidl; was also made known in Chicago by Thomas. The first performance anywhere occurred in 1881 at Vienna under Richter. It was composed in 1874 A drastic revision, through the years 1878-80, discarded the original scherzo in favor of a wholly new one.

This Fourth Symphony comes as near to being program-music as anything Bruckner ever wrote. Wherefore Bruckner's attitude toward program-music may well be more closely examined Ernst Decsey in his "Bruckner, Versuch eines Lebens," has this to say: "Bruckner lacked sufficient literary background (perhaps fortunately) to be a composer of program-music. . . . A less steadfast nature would hardly have resisted the then modern symphonic poem. Nevertheless, Bruckner was continually intigued by the tendency to increase the range of musical expression. He held this new type of music as probably the 'higher' and 'nobler,' and thus, occasionally, here and there, he supplied programs, or rather, naively imagined fantasias which he took to be programs. He sometimes proffered 'explanations' which did not explain anything; but these were always addressed to the laity, never to musicians. And they were always made with an air of the greatest mystery, as if Bruckner were imparting some weighty secret."

Decsey illustrates his point by citing an explanation which Bruckner once made of the beginning of the "Romantic Symphony" (the only existing "program" of this reputedly "programmatic" work) " 'A medieval city—dawn—morning fanfares from the city towers—the city portals open—mounted on proud steeds the knights dash out into the open, the magic of nature surrounding them—forest murmurs—bird-songs—and thus the romantic picture continues to develop. . . .' "And the other movements," continues Decsey, "also had a sort of 'program,' for in his own hand Bruckner designated the Ländler-like trio of the scherzo as

……

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

Oct 17

The Turn to Bruckner

STRANGE as it seems, in both Boston and New York, to the elder generation of reviewers and listeners, a new audience is now hearing the symphonies of Bruckner, hearing them without prepossession or prejudice, seemingly receiving pleasure from them. Frequenters of the Symphony Concerts know by heart the signs of boredom or distaste—the recurring rustle through the auditorium, the reading of the program-book page by page, the wandering eyes, the vacant faces, the waning attention. Not one was conspicuous when Dr. Koussevitzky revived the Fourth Symphony last Friday afternoon; while on Saturday evening composer, conductor and orchestra held the audience intent. On both occasions applause answered generally and warmly. The two performances, last spring, of Bruckner's longer, more exacting, more uneven, Eighth Symphony, brought no less interested and cordial response. In New York Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic Society were as fortunate with the Seventh; while within a few weeks they will set out the Fourth as well.

At the beginnings of Bruckner in America, as some like to believe, his symphonies displeased reviewers more than they did lay listeners. Soon the scribes—and a few Pharisees—evolved a formula for discourse about them. It arrayed at length the composer's limitations and weaknesses. It noted less spaciously, with a certain air of weariness, the signal and highly individual qualities that offset them. It implied, and usually asserted, that he and all his works were dull. Whatever the symphony in hand, this formula returned. There was no attempt to examine each one as a separate entity with its own particular quality. By dint of repetition upon hearers with little discernment and less courage of their own, the formula gradually prevailed as the verdict of American audiences upon Bruckner.

Pause ensued during which conductors next to never ventured his symphonies. Then the present return to them—by Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini annually in Boston and New York; by Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Stock more occasionally in Philadelphia and Chicago. Forthwith, a new generation that knew nothing of the old reviewing formula, and shared none of the prejudices it had bred, listened to Bruckner for himself; heard each proffered symphony according to its kind and degree, usually took pleasure in it. Enlightened and persevering conductors have not kept in vain their faith in Bruckner. In Boston and in New York in these nineteen-thirties, he has, decidedly, a present and a future—the "old crowd" (as the young amiably call it) to the contrary notwithstanding.

Incidents and Prospects

The soothsayers have believed that the only centenary or semi-centenary likely to alter the course of symphony concerts this season was the hundredth anniversary in May next of the birth of Brahms. The Germans—trust them for it!—have discovered another. Fifty years ago, on Feb. 13, 1883, Wagner died in Venice. By much precedent Dr Koussevitzky should not fail to remember at Symphony Hall. There are Symphony Concerts on Feb. 17 and 18.

Mr. Kreisler has returned to Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata and is likely to play it at his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 30. In December he will suspend his present tour that he may return to Vienna and oversee the final rehearsals of his operetta, "Sissy," about the Empress Elizabeth of Austria.

H. T. P.

13

'Dance during the meal at the hunt,' and a copy of the finale bears the title, 'Folk-festival.' Decsey also quotes an earlier biographer, Theodore Helm, as having serious misgivings about this last designation, in that the music obviously goes far beyond that of folk-festival. Max Auer, one of the most recent and most complete of Bruckner's biographers, adds amusingly that later, when Bruckner was one pressed for a fuller explanation of this last movement, he replied in his Austrian German, "Und im letzten Satz, ja da weisz i selber nimmer mehr, was i dabei denkt hab' " ("In the last movement I don't remember myself just what I thought.") And Decsey himself, at the end of his study of this phase of Bruckner's activity, comes to the sensible conclusion that "Many of the programmatic explanations of the master must be taken only cum grano salis."

This last movement was the only one to which American reviewers took exception when the symphony was first played in this country toward the end of the last century. They found it too long, too complicated, in some cases unintelligible. But it must be remembered that Bruckner's symphonies are of the finale-type, in which the last movement is true climax and culmination of all that has gone before. Bruckner himself felt strongly on this point. Decsey writes, concerning the finale of the Fourth Symphony: "It was one of Bruckner's greatest pleasures to have some one prefer the last movement of this symphony to the others, which, however, happened infrequently. With transfigured countenance he was quick to confirm such an opinion with 'Es ist der beste Satz' ('It is the best movement')."

All commentators appear to be in agreement that the Fourth Symphony is a nature symphony, that its romance is that of forest-mystery and forest-charm. The magic of the dawn, the glamour of the forest may indeed be heard in the trembling strings, the horn-motif with which the first movement begins. This four-note motif is at the basis of the principal themes of all four movements. In the first movement a solo-horn weaves spell with it. In the second it forms the beginning of an expressive 'cello melody. In the hunting scherzo, in livelier rhythm, its intervals form the dominating trumpet-figure. In the finale, it again enters near the beginning, in further modified form, with a trio of horns. Once more in heavy brass as climax of the section devoted to the principal theme.

In the first movement, after horns and wood-winds have completed their romancing with this motif, another, for full orchestra, is heard—probably the one that Bruckner had in mind when he spoke of knights charging from city gates on fiery steeds. Its peculiar rhythm (two quarters followed by three triplet-quarters) is also much used in succeeding movements. Following this, a long-sustained "F" ushers in the group of contrasting themes. As is so often the ase in Bruckner's second-theme sections, is in the form of a duet. His own improvised explanations again give a cue. y report he was accustomed to call the per voice (strings) the "Vogel Zi-zi-be," e., the Austrian titmouse. Beneath his twittering bird-music one hears a blissful melody in the violas, which Bruckner interpreted as "the feeling of joy which flowed through the human heart at hearing this bird-song. Nature and man are both portrayed." Development and recapitulation are fairly regular. A proud, stately choral, in itself climax of the development, ushers in the reprise. In this re-statement, the two voices of the duet are inverted—the song of human emotion is heard in a higher voice than that of Bruckner's bird! There is a considerable coda on the principal motif.

The slow movement is an Andante rather than the more usual Brucknerian Adagio. The 'cello melody is set against a slow, march-like background. Violas sing the principal contrasting melody, still supported by similar rhythms. These two melodies alternate rondo-fashion, with strong climax at the last appearance of the principal theme. The "hunting scene" Scherzo moves with great rapidity. The origin of theme and the character of trio have already been indicated.

The finale is superb example of how a last movement may rise above and include all that has gone before; how it may be true climax. The first-theme section includes the theme of the first movement and the rhythm of the scherzo; yet is dominated by its own mighty theme (measure 43, unison of the whole orchestra). The second-theme section returns to the march-like rhythm and general mood of the slow movement, though it, too, has its own independent group of themes. The sonata-form is used. It is to be noted that the main theme of the movement, as it appears in the recapitulation, is an inversion of the form in which it is found in the exposition; that, whereas it enters fortissimo in the exposition after a long, cumulative introduction, it now begins the recapitulation at once, without further introduction, and pianissimo. The theme of the movement rather than of the symphony is the chief basis of the coda. A. H. M.

The Return of Mr. Carpenter, Bearing Gifts

His "Patterns" To Be Heard At the Symphony Concerts, Opera Again in Chicago

THIS week the Symphony Concerts bring to first performance a new piece from a notable American composer—"Patterns" by Mr. John Alden Carpenter. . . . "Patterns" is just itself. It is neither symphony, suite, concerto, overture, nor tone-poem. It runs in a single movement of, say, seventeen or eighteen minutes' duration; is therefore neither symphony nor suite. Following the tendencies of the day, it is a self-contained music, wholly without program, and therefore not a tone-poem. Again, as a child of its age, the formal scheme is far less pre-determined, far more spontaneous than that of an overture. "Patterns" is written for solo-piano and orchestra. But the piano-part is less prominent than that of a solo-instrument in a concerto, though of considerably more importance than an orchestral voice. In short, "Patterns" is entirely itself, a piece of music original in matter, in treatment, in the details of the formal scheme it employs.

Mr. Carpenter gives information that he chose the title with much care, after considerable thought. A look at the score, a hurried ramble through it at the elbow of the composer, persuade one that he chose shrewdly and well. For the third time one refers to the piece as exemplifying the era out of which it grew—this time for the frankness of title. After all, is not a thoroughly self-contained music always a pattern-music? Certainly much of the music of Mozart, and of Bach, is unalloyed play with patterns. In Bach's Inventions, Preludes and shorter Fugues, this quality is almost too obvious to mention. In the larger Fugues the process of patterning is carried along on more extensive lines. The purely classical symphony carries the matter still farther. One need only cite the play of an exceedingly small pattern in Mozart's G-minor symphony or in Beethoven's Fifth. And the very kernal of the modern "cyclic" symphony is the process of employing a "pattern" throughout the several movements. It has remained for an American composer of these nineteen-thirties to acknowledge all this frankly by a title for one of his own compositions.

Mr. Carpenter himself contributes this program-note to The Transcript: "The title, 'Patterns,' has no literary or programatic significance, but it is my hope that the suitability of the title will be as apparent to the average auditor as it is to me. The piece is in one movement and plays about eighteen minutes. It is not primarily a show-piece for the pianist. The strictly 'solo' bits are short and infrequent. There is a slow middle section for solo-violin with the piano as the principal element in the orchestral support. There is a highly sentimental waltz-bit, and short fleeting passages with jazz implications, as well as an absurd bubbling-up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this that the 'patterns' are at least various.

"The work was begun two years ago, but there were interruptions and I was unable to complete it in time for the anniversary programs [of the Boston Orchestra]. I took it up again in March of ths year and completed it in June."

"Patterns" is, therefore, as far as the design in the large is concerned, substantially an expanded three-part song-form. The "pattern" which is most frequently used is found at the very beginning, and has the shape of a "wedge." The direction of the several notes is up, down, up, down, each "up" and each "down" a tone or a semi-tone higher or lower than the preceding one. This wedge-pattern is not an entirely new one. (What motif in this day and age can be entirely new?) An organ Fugue of Bach in E minor is built, for example, on a rigorously constructed "wedge" subject. But Mr. Carpenter's treatment of his pattern (the all-important matter) is highly original. Indeed the subject itself is more flexible, more subtle, less mechanically a "wedge" than that of Bach. The many uses to which Mr. Carpenter puts it proceed in kind. A second "pattern," a smiling little theme with lilting rhythm, marked "Grazioso" in the score, follows shortly; is also frequently and charmingly used in subsequent developments. A third, with gently persistent rhythmic reiteration and gently delicious dissonances, completes the list of "patterns" in this first portion of the piece.

It is not to the point to expand the composer's list of patterns in the slow division—the violin solo, the waltz (introduced by English horn), the slight references to jazz (which is apparently taking proper place as merely one among many colors or designs in composers' palettes, rather than as matter for separate treatment), or the Spanish suggestions. Be it said, however, that the piano-support to the solos, of which Mr. Carpenter writes, is colorful, rippling embellishment, delightfully conceived passage-work. The final division brings new developments of the "patterns" of the first, somewhat enlarged and expanded, climactically treated in general.

The orchestra of "Patterns" is used colorfully, but is not notably large: wood-winds in twos, four horns, three trumpets, the usual quartet of trombones and tuba, strings. The percussion "choir" includes bass-drum, snare-drum, cymbals, tympani, gong, glockenspiel, bells. Mr. Carpenter will be soloist at a piano which he modestly places in the orchestra, in the position where it is usuall found when used as an orchestral voic

Of especial interest is Mr. Carpenter free, supple and fanciful treatment rhythm. Igor the Great, the outstandin example in such matters, has never gor farther in rhythmic flexibility and va ety—all along the line from minute d tail to broad aspects. Not only are the frequent measures of 5-8 and similar regular units, there are also such tric measures as 2½-8. The writer has nev seen a score in which changes of tem are more frequent. The middle divisi is marked by numerous phrases sat rated with dynamic force and vigor, swellings of tone often proceeding great speed. The effect is bound to one of full freedom and flexibility, the untrammeled play of pure imagition. One harks back to the fantasia of Bach and of Mozart as a possib parallel, and only a partial parallel a that.

In "Patterns" form is made to take th place of servant, doing the bidding c the imaginative processes, not once mas tering or cramping them. Flights o imaginative fancy, often becoming im passioned, are here in control. Forma considerations may no longer dictat matter or manner; must take secondar place. This, in short, is the gospel o the neo-classicism of the present day affirming that music may be entirely self contained, yet as free and spontaneous as ever was tone-poem or rhapsody.

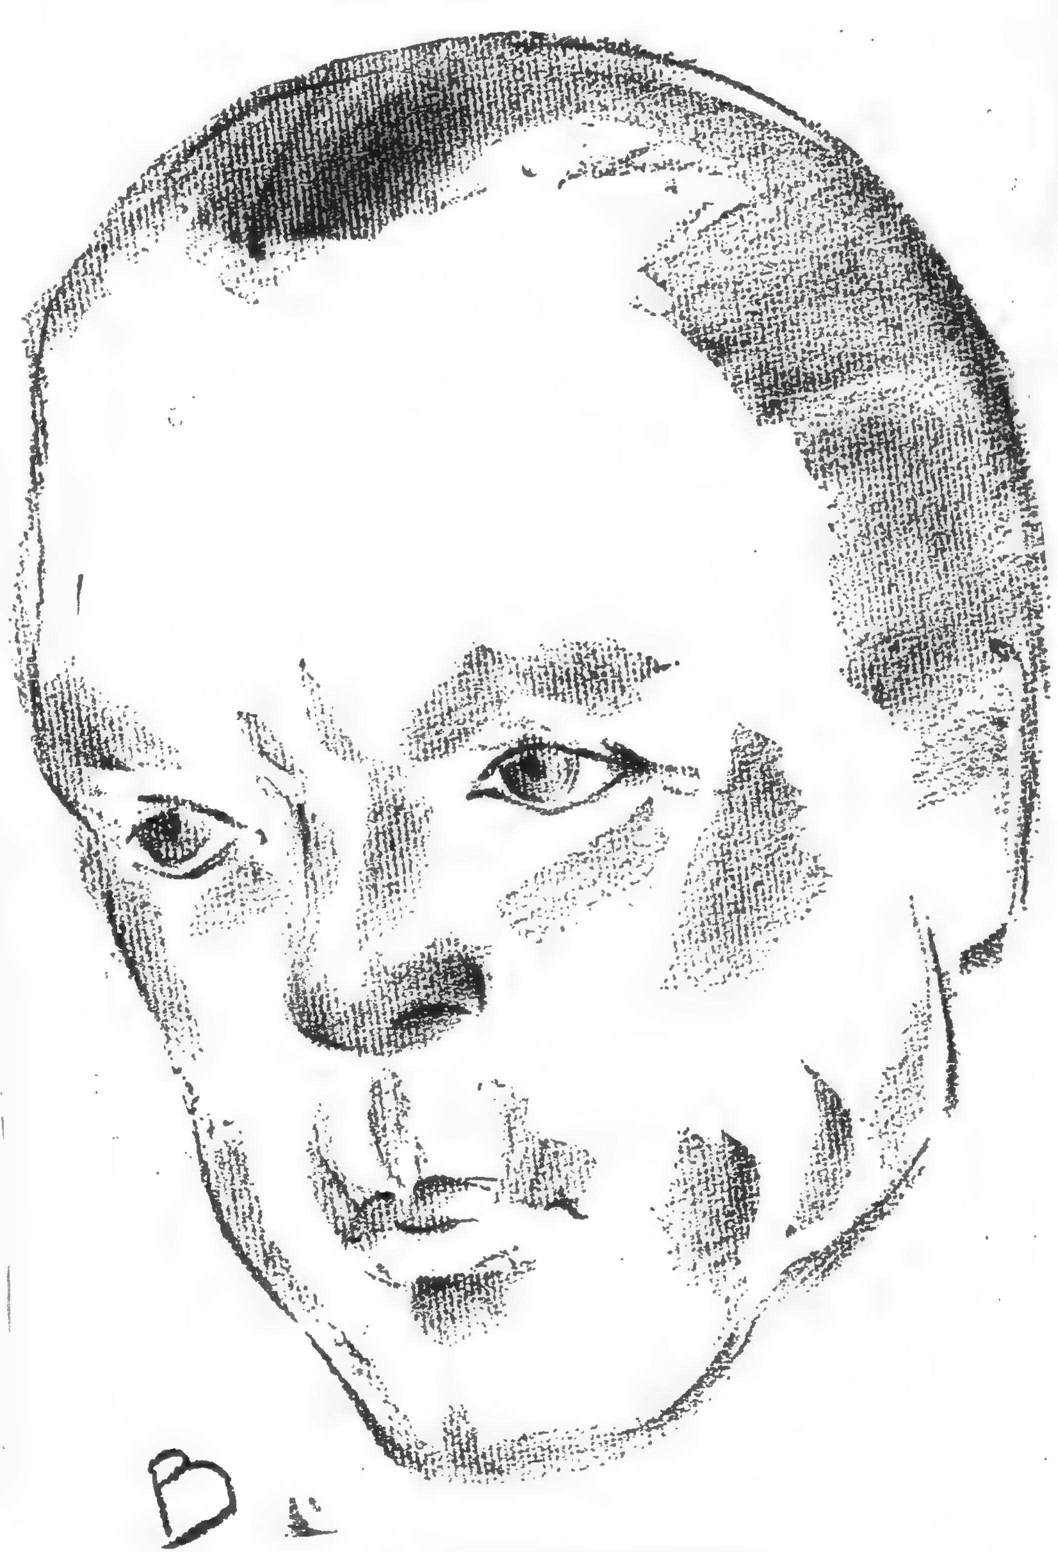
Since Mr. Carpenter is a Chicagoan, a director of the Chicago Opera Company, and since Bostonians are particularly interested in all matters pertaining to opera in Chicago, the interviewer ventured a cautious question. Mr. Carpenter answered without hesitation and without reluctance. From the conversation emerged these points: (1) that in any case after the Insull debacle it would have been impossible to effect the necessary re-organiztaion in time to make opera possible for the present season; (2) that a competent committee is at present hard at work upon a comprehensive study of all matters relating to opera in Chicago; (3) that he himself feels, beyond a doubt, that the Chicago Opera Company will resume in the season of 1933-34; (4) that opera in Chicago in the future will probably proceed in a new direction. (Asked whether he meant a new repertory by this phrase, he replied. "Yes, but only incidentally. What I mean is opera that will be thoroughly restudied and remounted so as to make it better theater; opera in which the staging will receive much more careful attention than in the past, taking all the more recent developments and experiments into consideration.") (5) That, in his opinion, opera in Chicago is unlikely to return to the huge mausoleum in Wacker Drive. A. H. M.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY,

Oct 21

Plays and Playe

Chicago's Child



John Alden Carpenter

Guest-Composer, Today and Tomorrow, at the Symphony Concerts. From a Quick Sketch Made at Rehearsal

---

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Oct 21

New: from Sibelius

ONE of the later and larger works of Sibelius is announced for first performance in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 4 and 5—"Tapiola: Tone-Poem for Full Orchestra Op. 112," published in 1925. In his recent book about the composer, Mr. Cecil Gray says of it:

" 'Tapiola' is in many respects the culminating point of Sibelius's entire creative activity, and a consummate masterpiece which could only be the outcome of a long process of spiritual growth and development. It is music of extraordinary simplicity and directness, yet there is not one bar in it, from first to last, that could possibly have been written by any other composer.

"The work takes its name from Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology—the Old Man of the Woods, the Elder of the Hills, the Master of the Wasteland—and the motto prefixed to the score is:

Widespread they stand, the Northlands dusky forests,
Ancient, mysterious, brooding savage dreams,
Within them dwells the Forest's mighty God
And woodsprites in the gloom weave magic secrets.

"No words can hope to convey one tithe of the grandeur and sublimity, the sheer originality and imaginative power, which inform the whole work both in broadest outline and in the minutest details of the scoring."

Ourselves and Others

For the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow, Dr. Koussevitzky proposes these pieces:

Overture to the Opera, "Oberon"........Weber
Symphony in D minor..................Franck
"Patterns," for Piano and Orchestra..Carpenter
(Pianist: The Composer)
"Skyscrapers," Ballet of American Work and Play.............................Carpenter

For the Philharmonic Concerts in New York, Mr. Toscanini sets this program:

Symphony in C major, No. 28..........Mozart
Variations for Orchestra and Piano, "An Artist's Life"....................Schelling
(Pianist: The Composer)
Prelude, Chorale and Fugue............Franck
(Scored for Orchestra by G. Pierné)
Siegfried's Rhine-Journey from the Opera, "Götterdämmerung"................Wagner

The Philadelphia Orchestra, Mr. Ormandy of Minneapolis conducting, will be heard in these numbers:

Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe"....Weber
Symphony in D major ("The Clock")..Haydn
Variations over an Hungarian Theme....Zador
Tone-Poem, "Pines of Rome"..........Respighi

For the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra, Mr. Stock chooses these items:

Suite, No. 2, in B minor for Flute and Strings
Bach
Symphony, No. 1, in E minor..........Sibelius
Tone-Poem, "Traffic"...................Eppert
Spanish Caprice ....Rimsky-Korsakov

From Symphony Hall

From Dr. Koussevitzky comes this program for the fourth pair of Symphony Concerts on Nov. 4 and 5 next:

Suite from the Opera, "The Gamblers" Prokofiev
(After Dostoievsky)
Tone-Poem, "Tapiola"..................Sibelius
Tone-Poem, "A Hero-Life"...............Strauss

Dr. Koussevitzky Now at Wellesley

Trav- Oct 20

IN every respect, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Alumnæ Hall at Wellesley last evening followed a conservative course. Dr. Koussevitzky and the players received the cordial welcome customarily extended to frequent and familiar visitors; it might have been more effusive, but it could not have conveyed more of mutual confidence and understanding. Despite the storm, which is a seldom-failing presence on symphonic Wednesdays in Wellesley, the usual capacity audience attended. Rather less familiar than these other circumstances was the background of light-green hangings behind the orchestra. Whether they softened the body of sound, particularly as regards the brass, was a question which the listener frequently considered. The program contained repertory pieces which have contributed greatly to Dr. Koussevitzky's distinctive reputation as a conductor.

The five repertory pieces were ordered with familiar Koussevitzkian discernment. The brief "Classical" Symphony of Prokofiev was an ideal opening piece—good-humored, sparkling, and exhibiting an urbane polish which derives from its sophisticated, twentieth-century imitation of eighteenth-century simplicities. The two Nocturnes of Debussy ("Clouds" and "Fêtes") displayed the special talents of the Boston musicians in tone-painting. Strauss's "Don Juan" furnished dramatic contrast. Brahms's First Symphony (in C minor), finally, renewed, in a performance of sustained eloquence the more substantial virtues of an orchestra which has become the sensitively-responsive instrument of its single directing genius.

With Prokofiev's little symphony, players and audience alike have become perhaps too familiar. When played in the smaller confines of Sanders Theater at Harvard, it still exerts an intimate and stimulating appeal. Last evening it seemed to have lost some of its familiar lustre. At least, the applause for this number, in view of its important first-place upon the program, was of disappointing volume.

The performance of the two Nocturnes from Debussy was a Koussevitzkian model of delicate shading, exquisite tonal blending and captivating motion. In "Clouds," the misty shapes of sound dispelled, from wood winds and strings, their wispy vapors; with the basses and 'cellos, dimly gave image to larger and darker forms moving distantly. In "Fêtes," sound became the aural impression of a festival; made tonal patterns of the fantastic soldier parade; with fanciful harmonies, pictured bizarre scenes. In the exacting and pleasure-making services which this music required, the players renewed their special skill of previous years. At the close, the increase in applause was instant and noteworthy.

With Strauss's tone-poem, Dr. Koussevitzky was more conservative than is his wont. He invoked the soaring ardors, the softer love-melodies, the recurring moods of disgust in due Straussian order and style. But the familiar brilliance and vigor were lacking.

The Symphony of Brahms made the memorable impression of the evening. Dr. Koussevitsky applied himself to the interpretative task with intense concentration. From the outset, the opening movement obtained and held the attention. The sustained melodies of the Andante flowed in close-linked and ever more meaningful continuity. The delightful tempo of the Allegretto was maintained with the most refined feeling for pulse. The joyous final movement exhibited Dr. Koussevitzky's powers to excellent advantage. N. M. J.

~~Trav. Oct 22~~

Symphony Plays Carpenter Works

With John Alden Carpenter, Chicagoan, as guest composer and soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, yesterday presented a program of bright newness, tempered with the hallowed old, in which the offerings ran the gamut from the time-honored compositions of another century to the vibrant, living art of today.

From the mellow note of Oberon's horn in Weber's overture to the opera, through the mystery-shrouded tones in the first movement of Franck's symphony in D minor, to the massive chords in the climax of this great hymn of triumphant faith, the program was standard. Beyond the intermission it became highly provocative, and at length, exhilarating.

In its first performance, Mr. Carpenter's "Patterns," with the composer at the piano, was unimpressive. Gently, even half-heartedly dissonant, and aspiring to no particular form, it proved commonplace music. And the piano part, intentionally subdued, was strangely plain even in the few brief solo passages. Despite an efficient, if not enthusiastic performance, "Patterns" was only politely received.

The same composer's ballet, "Skyscrapers," however, on the occasion of its third reading in Boston, demonstrated that though the novelty has worn away, it is still capable of arousing enthusiasm in an audience. True the vocal soloists, Clara Shear and Rulon Y. Robison, were at times lost in the clash of the off-beat cymbal, but with its striking figures, its saxophone solos and its muted trumpet "breaks" in the accepted jazz fashion, "Skyscrapers" proved refreshing.

Mr. Carpenter walks the middle path. A modern, still he avoids the lean hardness, the utterly irritating idiom of the radical; and a firm believer in jazz, still he escaped the lush romanticism of

---

Afternoon Of New Carpenter Vs. Old Franck

"Patterns" and "Skyscrapers" Fresh from the American, A Staled Symphony

Oct 22 Trans

FOR a second time within easy memory, John Alden Carpenter was guest-composer, yesterday, at the Symphony Concerts. It is Dr. Koussevitzky's wisdom and pleasure so to distinguish American music-makers, setting them, in the rites of symphonic hospitality, on equal terms with European. Join to Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Hill from the middle generation, Mr. Loeffler from the elder, Mr. Copland from the younger, and the conductor may appear more fortunate with major native than with minor foreign guests. For this occasion, as stately worded progarms like to say, Mr. Carpenter brought with him a new composition, "Patterns," officially described at last as "for Orchestra with Piano Obbligato." In his honor also the concert-version of his ballet, "Skyscrapers," was played for the fifth time within five years at Symphony Hall. So, again, it is Dr. Koussevitzky's wisdom and pleasure to give the representative work of American composers place in the "standard repertory"—a deserved position too often lacking.

For the first time, also, playing this "obbligato" and taking his place within, and not outside the orchestra, Mr. Carpenter appeared in public as pianist. A professional, or an orchestral, pianist would undoubtedly have made the phrases for the instrument more resonant, and therefore more salient. On the other hand, he would hardly have fitted them so sensitively and felicitously into the design of the piece. For a composer, playing his own piano-part, may have in his head a sensibility that an assisting pianist, however illustrious, knows only in his fingers. At his entrance, to begin the second part of the concert, Mr. Carpenter was familiarly and warmly received. His new work is not of the obvious sort; here and there it may have baffled hearers; but the applause at the end was general and cordial. As for "Skyscrapers," it won, even from a matinée audience, the ovation that music and performance both deserved. Ovation, a word out of the American vernacular, goes well with a ballet derived from the common American life.

"Patterns," originally invited for the jubilee year of the Symphony Concerts but put to paper only last spring, is excellent and individualized example of the so-called "neo-classicism" now suffusing the European and the American air. (Mr. Carpenter has long been sensitive to the tendencies of the musical hour.) That is to say, it is a self-contained piece, with no substance or suggestion outside itself, proceeding by purely musical means to purely musical impression. In form it is a plastic design expanding internally into the patterns of the artful title, along the way co-ordinating and unifying them. In substance it is the development and inter-relation of a few well-invented motivs as the composer's thought and mood play progressively upon them, as his creative resource and technical sensibility answer to the expressive means.

As Mr. Carpenter shuns programatic or external suggestion, so he renounces the ardent courses, the lush procedures, of what we call romantic music. While he is no assertive modernist, thumb at nose or, maybe, tongue in cheek, he writes in distinctively modern idiom. So doing he prefers to be adroit, rather than flagrant, with dissonance; to take no atonal or polytonal chances. (Are not both slipping perceptibly out of fashion?) None the less his sense and appliance of harmonic and instrumental color are unmistakably of the present hour; while he is by no means insensitive to his American disposition and environment. If he is a "neo-classicist" in "Patterns," he is also an American practitioner within that school.

To write these things is not to invite the inference that Mr. Carpenter has written a dryly cerebral music or arrayed along his staves a species of mathematics in tones. Into that pit which more than one European composer is now digging assiduously for himself, he is too mature, too sensitive, too American, to fall. He is aware that, while music is an action of the creative mind upon the receiving minds of those that hear, it is also addressed—and often primarily—to their imaginations and emotions. If there is a mental and a technical mechanism in play—to put it at the lowest terms—there must also be thought or fantasy to animate it, warmths of the creative spirit to invest and propel it. Consequently, the listener finds the "patterns" of the first division of Mr. Carpenter's piece pleasurable, as well as logical, flow of forms and fancies, imaginatively conceived and artfully accomplished—no work of genius such as we are all too often and all too fondly seeking, but the product of a the "popular" writer. Whether the way he has chosen will lead to the heights or to oblivion, who would now dare venture to say? H. C. C.

while the fancies become as a ripple and a spray of ornament, from the piano, upon the eddies into quasi-solo measures. Nor will he fail to note the hint of jazz caught for an instant out of the American air; the brief flash of the Spanish idiosyncrasy that Mr. Carpenter likes to effect; the sense of rhythm as still the essential attribute to a music of American flavor and suggestion. In the third and climactic division this listener will observe the composer working by larger means, in ampler voice, with warmer feeling, as though he would concentrate and in measure glorify his materia musica before he and his audience take leave of it. Throughout, moreover, the connoisseur will have noted frequent felicities of harmonic and instrumental color, in particular the alert and adroit flair for strokes from the percussion corner. Once and for all, finally, he will bless our American stars for an American composer who, at will, can ply a light mind, imagination and hand—seriously, which is to say without cheapness, commonness or emptiness in matter or means. Mr. Carpenter escapes altogether the frequent American—and European—delusion that a vast ferment of superficial musical energy is prevailing substitute for an inner musical life.

Of "Skyscrapers" there is only to renew the familiar praises. Even in the concert-hall, here sounds one of the musics, as yet few on either side of the Atlantic, refuting the notion that the long-standing, time-worn forms of stage-music—the opera and the ballet—may not be adapted to the life of the present place and hour. We work vehemently—or we believe we do—in this America of ours. Mr. Carpenter's rhythms at beginning and end rise and fall with this vehemence. We make awkward, restless, transitions from work to play, lacking the English savoir faire, the French ease, the German plunge, in such matters. In form, rhythm and color Mr. Carpenter's transitional passages are mirrors to our habit. We play energetically, insistently, but without an easeful gayety; in crowds for a common, restless, nervous excitement. Graphically, recognizably, the "Coney-Island" pages of "Skyscrapers" concentrate and diffuse this American temper. When we are "fed up," we loll about, lazy and hazy, waiting for something to catch our ears and soothe our over-exertion. Mr. Carpenter's answer is the brief interlude of wistful negro song. (Yesterday Miss Shear and Mr. Robison were the singers.)

All this in our American atmosphere, resonant with rhythm, flagrant with sentiment. The "Coney-Island" music beats hard with the one; sways and drips with the other; thins not a whit with repetition. "Gorgeous" the young gentlemen from the university were saying as they emerged semi-articulate with pleasant excitement. More critically, "Skyscrapers" is one of the few American attempts at stage-music—except in the lighter forms—that is also achievement. In the concert-hall into which the inertia of our opera companies has let it lapse, it is stout and significant enough musically to maintain itself. Besides, Dr. Koussevitzky once more released it with an insight and sympathy rare in a Parisian-Russian. But in his cosmopolitan temperament, as his performances of our music have often shown, America is also one of his countries. As for the orchestra, what other in America is comparable with it when jazz-tinged rhythms and melodies are in hand? For Mr. Carpenter, by ingrained instinct, refines musically upon the matter he would assimilate. Wisely he leaves a jazz less tempered to our Mr. Gershwin and his various compeers.

Two "repertory pieces" filled the first half of the concert: Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon"; Franck's Symphony. Once more the overture began, in introduction, with the songful mysteries of romantic music; ended, in peroration, with the rushing, glowing ardors thereof. Yet again, the crashing staccato chord for full orchestra divided them; was sounded flawlessly; brought thrill to many an old ear and young imagination. The implacable forerunners of a new musical age have already, and with shouts, proclaimed Wagner as old, and tedious, "hat." Yet for their stern ears the romantic fires of the lesser Weber are not quite extinguished. Lobby gossip said that they were to be discovered openly clapping this overture to "Oberon."

In point of fact, Franck and his Symphony, as the brief and slender applause testified, are in far worse case. The Symphony has been over-repeated until it has staled; over-extolled until many that hear have ceased to believe even their ears. It needs retirement as preface to recovery. As it is, the too accustomed listener notes only defects; hears oftenest banalities; repines under the repetitious Franckian formula; forgets the purity and elevation of the Franckian spirit; is deaf to a music that veritably ascends from brooding tonal darkness into gladsome tonal light. For such, sheer surfeit damns that principal and too recurrent theme. But in their ennui they may give thanks for a Koussevitzky who still prefers to over-dramatize rather than over-sentimentalize a too tempting music. H T. P.

Post

DAY, OCTOBER 22,

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW MUSIC

Carpenter's "Patterns" With Composer at Piano

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The most stimulating Symphony concert that the present season has offered, that of yesterday afternoon, brought the first performance anywhere of John Alden Carpenter's new piece for orchestra, with piano obbligato, "Patterns," in which the composer was the pianist, together with a repetition of the music for his ballet, "Skyscrapers," now familiar at Symphony Hall.

AN EXCITING FRANCK

Mr. Carpenter's compositions filled the second half of the concert. In the first came Weber's Overture to "Oberon," once more poetized and romanticized, and here and there a trifle inflated, by Dr. Koussevitzky, and after it the Symphony of Cesar Franck.

For all its flagrant heterodoxy the performance of Franck's Symphony was a singularly enthralling one. When Dr. Koussevitzky's highly individual version of the music was first made known to us many rebelled at what might be described as the transforming of a Gothic cathedral into a sort of Aladdin's palace.

Made Very Human

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, now more unified and coherent, deserves respectful consideration even if the unconvinced might dub the Symphony as it emerges from his hands the Belgian "Pathetique." The Franck of Dr. Koussevitzky is a man who, as other men, loved, suffered and aspired, whose thoughts were not always of angels.

From yesterday's performance there emerged an absorbing tonal document and the orchestra, as though in complete sympathy with the conductor's conception of the music, played like men inspired. Very possibly it was not the true Franck that we listeners heard yesterday, but it was moving and exciting none the less.

Carpenter's Music

It was not altogether kind to Mr. Carpenter to place his "Patterns," which seemed better to deserve the title "Patchwork," immediately after the masterpiece of Franck. But the ensuing "Skyscrapers" has played an important part in the movement to give our music a distinctive national flavor.

The music of "Skyscrapers" is American, not merely in its occasional jazz, which sounds triter on each hearing, but in its suggestion both of our industrial energy and of the vision behind it. The vocal parts yesterday were entrusted to Clara Shear, soprano, and Rulon Robison, tenor, resident singers of competence, who had not been publicly paired since they sang in Anglicized opera at the Arlington Theatre some 10 years ago. Miss Shear, whose voice has grown since she was heard here with the Chicago Opera Company, sang yesterday with infectious gusto.

"Patterns" Brisk, Anyway

"Patterns" will not add materially to Mr. Carpenter's reputation. It fills 18 minutes pleasantly enough. The music evinces an exhiliarating briskness offset by a lush but not particularly distinguished lyricism. Structurally, however, the piece is overmuch of a hodgepodge, and its melodic ideals are by no means memorable. Like many another composer, Mr. Carpenter needs a poetic idea to give wings to his musical fancy. As a composer of absolute music he has never been more than half successful.

Yesterday's audience received him warmly both as pianist and as composer.

Herald

TURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 19

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon." Franck, Symphony in D minor. Carpenter, "Patterns" for orchestra with piano obbligato (first performance), and "Skyscrapers." Mr. Carpenter played the piano part in "Patterns"; Clara Shear, soprano and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, sang the few measures for voices in "Skyscrapers."

It was a great pleasure to hear Weber's overture again, familiar as it is. There is a chivalric spirit in Weber's music that is peculiar to him. William Foster Apthorp used to speak of the "Weberisch flourish"—that entered in to the expression of this spirit. Not even Mendelssohn was so much at home in fairyland as Weber: The horns of Elfland faintly blowing. Only Berlioz in his "Queen Mab" Scherzo is unrivalled; Mendelssohn's fairies in comparison wear rubber boots when they trip it in the dew. And we were glad to find Dr. Koussevitzky going back to the old fashioned order in the program: Overture—if possible a lively, merry one to put the audience in a happy, receptive mood. Then the symphony. There are so many overtures worth the hearing, nor should the better ones of Auber be thought beneath the dignity of the occasion. Conductors and orchestras in these days are inclined to take music too seriously.

Mr. Carpenter's "Patterns" was intended, it is said, for the jubilee of the orchestra, but it was not completed in time. He wrote modestly about the composition for the program book and naturally did not find much to say about the music. He spoke of a "highly sentimental waltz bit"—there is a decidedly sentimental rather than emotional streak in this composer's musical nature—of "short fleeting passages with jazz implications"—one could wish longer passages with jazz prominent; not merely implied—and "an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood"; for some of us the Spanish blood was not concealed; it was congealed. As Mr. Carpenter says "Patterns" is not a show piece for the piano. He might add that when the piano has the say what is says is of little significance. The audience enjoyed this music, which, unfortunately perhaps, was crushed, obliterated by "Skyscrapers" following immediately.

For "Skyscrapers" is a joyous, at times rowdy, often noisy expression of American life. The music no doubt would be still more effective if the ballet were on the stage. Perhaps the putting of the orchestra in overalls to remind the audience of riveters and other laborers would be an aid to appreciation, though the music itself is here adroitly imitative; but for the scenes in "any Coney Island" stage settings and characters are essential. Here music alone gives no illusion of the island life: the Negro sweeper going to sleep, comic policemen, or tingle-tangle booths and barkers. Even ultra-modern music has its limitations in suggesting, much less expressing, scenes in everyday life. But as a suite "Skyscrapers" is amusing; it is a genuine contribution to American music and not merely because it was composed by a man who happened to be born and educated in this country.

Cesar Franck's symphony has been played here many times; by various conductors who have as many ideas about the tempi and the degrees of dynamic force. There might be a discussion concerning the pace at which the last movement was taken yesterday. Some might have wished a slightly slower tempo as indicated by the composer; allowing a more majestic song of triumph over doubt. There were times when the brass did not allow the violin passages to be heard. It was a great day for the brass choir, especially in "Skyscrapers." There were moments when one longed for a banjo solo (Mr. Carpenter included one in his orchestra), with the men from Harlem dancing a double shuffle, cutting pigeon-wings with other Harlemities "patting Juba."

One might ask, now that the fanatical Franckites are comparatively quiet, if the first movement of the symphony could not bear judicious cutting: for example, the repetition of the opening, questioning measures. In the performance yesterday the second and third movements—in spite of the excited pace of the finale—gave unalloyed pleasure.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concert next week. The program of Nov. 4-5 will be as follows: Prokofieff, Four Character Portraits from the Opera, "The Gambler" (first time in the United States). Sibelius, tone poem "Tapiola" (first time in Boston). Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben." This program is subject to a slight change.

Dr. Koussevitzky Now at Wellesley

Trans. Oct 21

In every respect, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Alumnæ Hall at Wellesley last evening followed a conservative course. Dr. Koussevitzky and the players received the cordial welcome customarily extended to frequent and familiar visitors; it might have been more effusive, but it could not have conveyed more of mutual confidence and understanding. Despite the storm, which is a seldom-failing presence on symphonic Wednesdays in Wellesley, the usual capacity audience attended. Rather less familiar than these other circumstances was the background of light-green hangings behind the orchestra. Whether they softened the body of sound, particularly as regards the brass, was a question which the listener frequently considered. The program contained repertory pieces which have contributed greatly to Dr. Koussevitzky's distinctive reputation as a conductor.

The five repertory pieces were ordered with familiar Koussevitzkian discernment. The brief "Classical" Symphony of Prokofiev was an ideal opening piece—good-humored, sparkling, and exhibiting an urbane polish which derives from its sophisticated, twentieth-century imitation of eighteenth-century simplicities. The two Nocturnes of Debussy ("Clouds" and "Fêtes") displayed the special talents of the Boston musicians in tone-painting. Strauss's "Don Juan" furnished dramatic contrast. Brahms's First Symphony (in C minor), finally, renewed, in a performance of sustained eloquence the more substantial virtues of an orchestra which has become the sensitively-responsive instrument of its single directing genius.

With Prokofiev's little symphony, players and audience alike have become perhaps too familiar. When played in the smaller confines of Sanders Theater at Harvard, it still exerts an intimate and stimulating appeal. Last evening it seemed to have lost some of its familiar lustre. At least, the applause for this number, in view of its important first-place upon the program, was of disappointing volume.

The performance of the two Nocturnes from Debussy was a Koussevitzkian model of delicate shading, exquisite tonal blending and captivating motion. In "Clouds," the misty shapes of sound dispelled, from wood winds and strings, their wispy vapors; with the basses and 'cellos, dimly gave image to larger and darker forms moving distantly. In "Fêtes," sound became the aural impression of a festival; made tonal patterns of the fantastic soldier parade; with fanciful harmonies, pictured bizarre scenes. In the exacting and pleasure-making services which this music required, the players renewed their special skill of previous years. At the close, the increase in applause was instant and noteworthy.

With Strauss's tone-poem, Dr. Koussevitzky was more conservative than is his wont. He invoked the soaring ardors, the softer love-melodies, the recurring moods of disgust in due Straussian order and style. But the familiar brilliance and vigor were lacking.

The Symphony of Brahms made the memorable impression of the evening. Dr. Koussevitsky applied himself to the interpretative task with intense concentration. From the outset, the opening movement obtained and held the attention. The sustained melodies of the Andante flowed in close-linked and ever more meaningful continuity. The delightful tempo of the Allegretto was maintained with the most refined feeling for pulse. The joyous final movement exhibited Dr. Koussevitzky's powers to excellent advantage. N. M. J.

Trans. Oct 22

Symphony Plays Carpenter Works

With John Alden Carpenter, Chicagoan, as guest composer and soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, yesterday presented a program of bright newness, tempered with the hallowed old, in which the offerings ran the gamut from the time-honored compositions of another century to the vibrant, living art of today.

From the mellow note of Oberon's horn in Weber's overture to the opera, through the mystery-shrouded tones in the first movement of Franck's symphony in D minor, to the massive chords in the climax of this great hymn of triumphant faith, the program was standard. Beyond the intermission it became highly provocative, and at length, exhilarating.

In its first performance, Mr. Carpenter's "Patterns," with the composer at the piano, was unimpressive. Gently, even half-heartedly dissonant, and aspiring to no particular form, it proved commonplace music. And the piano part, intentionally subdued, was strangely plain even in the few brief solo passages. Despite an efficient, ithusiastic perfor

swers to New England women's questions make up the New England Kitchen program.

are the only parts not eaten. The green substance is the liver.

still capable of arousing enthusiasm in an audience. True the vocal soloists, Clara Shear and Rulon Y. Robison, were at times lost in the clash of the off-beat cymbal, but with its striking figures, its saxophone solos and its muted trumpet "breaks" in the accepted jazz fashion, "Skyscrapers" proved refreshing.

Mr. Carpenter walks the middle path. A modern, still he avoids the lean hardness, the utterly irritating idiom of the radical; and a firm believer in jazz, still he escaped the lush romanticism of

---

Afternoon Of New Carpenter Vs. Old Franck

"Patterns" and "Skyscrapers" Fresh from the American, A Staled Symphony

Oct 22 Trans

For a second time within easy memory, John Alden Carpenter was guest-composer, yesterday, at the Symphony Concerts. It is Dr. Koussevitzky's wisdom and pleasure so to distinguish American music-makers, setting them, in the rites of symphonic hospitality, on equal terms with European. Join to Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Hill from the middle generation, Mr. Loeffler from the elder, Mr. Copland from the younger, and the conductor may appear more fortunate with major native than with minor foreign guests. For this occasion, as stately worded progarms like to say, Mr. Carpenter brought with him a new composition, "Patterns," officially described at last as "for Orchestra with Piano Obbligato." In his honor also the concert-version of his ballet, "Skyscrapers," was played for the fifth time within five years at Symphony Hall. So, again, it is Dr. Koussevitzky's wisdom and pleasure to give the representative work of American composers place in the "standard repertory"—a deserved position too often lacking.

For the first time, also, playing this "obbligato" and taking his place within, and not outside the orchestra, Mr. Carpenter appeared in public as pianist. A professional, or an orchestral, pianist would undoubtedly have made the phrases for the instrument more resonant, and therefore more salient. On the other hand, he would hardly have fitted them so sensitively and felicitously into the design of the piece. For a composer, playing his own piano-part, may have in his head a sensibility that an assisting pianist, however illustrious, knows only in his fingers. At his entrance, to begin the second part of the concert, Mr. Carpenter was familiarly and warmly received. His new work is not of the obvious sort; here and there it may have baffled hearers; but the applause at the end was general and cordial. As for "Skyscrapers," it won, even from a matinée aud'ence, the ovation that music and performance both deserved. Ovation, a word out of the American vernacular, goes well with a ballet derived from the common American life.

"Patterns," originally invited for the jubilee year of the Symphony Concerts but put to paper only last spring, is excellent and individualized example of the so-called "neo-classicism" now suffusing the European and the American air. (Mr. Carpenter has long been sensitive to the tendencies of the musical hour.) That is to say, it is a self-contained piece, with no substance or suggestion outside itself, proceeding by purely musical means to purely musical impression. In form it is a plastic design expanding internally into the patterns of the artful title, along the way co-ordinating and unifying them. In substance it is the development and inter-relation of a few well-invented motivs as the composer's thought and mood play progressively upon them, as his creative resource and technical sensibility answer to the expressive means.

As Mr. Carpenter shuns programatic or external suggestion, so he renounces the ardent courses, the lush procedures, of what we call romantic music. While he is no assertive modernist, thumb at nose or, maybe, tongue in cheek, he writes in distinctively modern idiom. So doing he prefers to be adroit, rather than flagrant, with dissonance; to take no atonal or polytonal chances. (Are not both slipping perceptibly out of fashion?) None the less his sense and appliance of harmonic and instrumental color are unmistakably of the present hour; while he is by no means insensitive to his American disposition and environment. If he is a "neo-classicist" in "Patterns," he is also an American practitioner within that school.

To write these things is not to invite the inference that Mr. Carpenter has written a dryly cerebral music or arrayed along his staves a species of mathematics in tones. Into that pit which more than one European composer is now digging assiduously for himself, he is too mature, too sensitive, too American, to fall. He is aware that, while music is an action of the creative mind upon the receiving minds of those that hear, it is also addressed—and often primarily—to their imaginations and emotions. If there is a mental and a technical mechanism in play—to put it at the lowest terms—there must also be thought or fantasy to animate it, warmths of the creative spirit to invest and propel it. Consequently, the listener finds the "patterns" of the first division of Mr. Carpenter's piece pleasurable, as well as logical, flow of forms and fancies, imaginatively conceived and artfully accomplished—no work of genius such as we are all too often and all too fondly seeking, but the product of a sensitive and still fertile musical mind and temperament, of an apt and refining hand.

Through the second division, the hearer will discover that flow enlarged and enriched with the sentiment that often in the arts is our American substitute for emotion; while the fancies become as a ripple and a spray of ornament, from the piano, upon the eddies into quasi-solo measures. Nor will he fail to note the hint of jazz caught for an instant out of the American air; the brief flash of the Spanish idiosyncrasy that Mr. Carpenter likes to effect; the sense of rhythm as still the essential attribute to a music of American flavor and suggestion. In the third and climactic division this listener will observe the composer working by larger means, in ampler voice, with warmer feeling, as though he would concentrate and in measure glorify his materia musica before he and his audience take leave of it. Throughout, moreover, the connoisseur will have noted frequent felicities of harmonic and instrumental color, in particular the alert and adroit flair for strokes from the percussion corner. Once and for all, finally, he will bless our American stars for an American composer who, at will, can ply a light mind, imagination and hand—seriously, which is to say without cheapness, commonness or emptiness in matter or means. Mr. Carpenter escapes altogether the frequent American—and European—delusion that a vast ferment of superficial musical energy is prevailing substitute for an inner musical life.

Of "Skyscrapers" there is only to renew the familiar praises. Even in the concert-hall, here sounds one of the musics, as yet few on either side of the Atlantic, refuting the notion that the long-standing, time-worn forms of stage-music—the opera and the ballet—may not be adapted to the life of the present place and hour. We work vehemently—or we believe we do—in this America of ours. Mr. Carpenter's rhythms at beginning and end rise and fall with this vehemence. We make awkward, restless, transitions from work to play, lacking the English savoir faire, the French ease, the German plunge, in such matters. In form, rhythm and color Mr. Carpenter's transitional passages are mirrors to our habit. We play energetically, insistently, but without an easeful gayety; in crowds for a common, restless, nervous excitement. Graphically, recognizably, the "Coney-Island" pages of "Skyscrapers" concentrate and diffuse this American temper. When we are "fed up," we loll about, lazy and hazy, waiting for something to catch our ears and soothe our over-exertion. Mr. Carpenter's answer is the brief interlude of wistful negro song. (Yesterday Miss Shear and Mr. Robison were the singers.)

All this in our American atmosphere, resonant with rhythm, flagrant with sentiment. The "Coney-Island" music beats hard with the one; sways and drips with the other; thins not a whit with repetition. "Gorgeous" the young gentlemen from the university were saying as they emerged semi-articulate with pleasant excitement. More critically, "Skyscrapers" is one of the few American attempts at stage-music—except in the lighter forms—that is also achievement. In the concert-hall into which the inertia of our opera companies has let it lapse, it is stout and significant enough musically to maintain itself. Besides, Dr. Koussevitzky once more released it with an insight and sympathy rare in a Parisian-Russian. But in his cosmopolitan temperament, as his performances of our music have often shown, America is also one of his countries. As for the orchestra, what other in America is comparable with it when jazz-tinged rhythms and melodies are in hand? For Mr. Carpenter, by ingrained instinct, refines musically upon the matter he would assimilate. Wisely he leaves a jazz less tempered to our Mr. Gershwin and his various compeers.

Two "repertory pieces" filled the first half of the concert: Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon"; Franck's Symphony. Once more the overture began, in introduction, with the songful mysteries of romantic music; ended, in peroration, with the rushing, glowing ardors thereof. Yet again, the crashing staccato chord for full orchestra divided them; was sounded flawlessly; brought thrill to many an old ear and young imagination. The implacable forerunners of a new musical age have already, and with shouts, proclaimed Wagner as old, and tedious, "hat." Yet for their stern ears the romantic fires of the lesser Weber are not quite extinguished. Lobby gossip said that they were to be discovered openly clapping this overture to "Oberon."

In point of fact, Franck and his Symphony, as the brief and slender applause testified, are in far worse case. The Symphony has been over-repeated until it has staled; over-extolled until many that hear have ceased to believe even their ears. It needs retirement as preface to recovery. As it is, the too accustomed listener notes only defects; hears oftenest banalities; repines under the repetitious Franckian formula; forgets the purity and elevation of the Franckian spirit; is deaf to a music that veritably ascends from brooding tonal darkness into gladsome tonal light. For such, sheer surfeit damns that principal and too recurrent theme. But in their ennui they may give thanks for a Koussevitzky who still prefers to over-dramatize rather than over-sentimentalize a too tempting music.

H. T. P.

Post

DAY, OCTOBER 22,

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW MUSIC

Carpenter's "Patterns" With Composer at Piano

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The most stimulating Symphony concert that the present season has offered, that of yesterday afternoon, brought the first performance anywhere of John Alden Carpenter's new piece for orchestra, with piano obbligato, "Patterns," in which the composer was the pianist, together with a repetition of the music for his ballet, "Skyscrapers," now familiar at Symphony Hall.

AN EXCITING FRANCK

Mr. Carpenter's compositions filled the second half of the concert. In the first came Weber's Overture to "Oberon," once more poetized and romanticized, and here and there a trifle inflated, by Dr. Koussevitzky, and after it the Symphony of Cesar Franck.

For all its flagrant heterodoxy the performance of Franck's Symphony was a singularly enthralling one. When Dr. Koussevitzky's highly individual version of the music was first made known to us many rebelled at what might be described as the transforming of a Gothic cathedral into a sort of Aladdin's palace.

Made Very Human

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, now more unified and coherent, deserves respectful consideration even if the unconvinced might dub the Symphony as it emerges from his hands the Belgian "Pathetique." The Franck of Dr. Koussevitzky is a man who, as other men, loved, suffered and aspired, whose thoughts were not always of angels.

From yesterday's performance there emerged an absorbing tonal document and the orchestra, as though in complete sympathy with the conductor's conception of the music, played like men inspired. Very possibly it was not the true Franck that we listeners heard yesterday, but it was moving and exciting none the less.

Carpenter's Music

It was not altogether kind to Mr. Carpenter to place his "Patterns," which seemed better to deserve the title "Patchwork," immediately after the masterpiece of Franck. But the ensuing "Skyscrapers" has played an important part in the movement to give our music a distinctive national flavor.

The music of "Skyscrapers" is American, not merely in its occasional jazz, which sounds triter on each hearing, but in its suggestion both of our industrial energy and of the vision behind it. The vocal parts yesterday were entrusted to Clara Shear, soprano, and Rulon Robison, tenor, resident singers of competence, who had not been publicly paired since they sang in Anglicized opera at the Arlington Theatre some 10 years ago. Miss Shear, whose voice has grown since she was heard here with the Chicago Opera Company, sang yesterday with infectious gusto.

"Patterns" Brisk, Anyway

"Patterns" will not add materially to Mr. Carpenter's reputation. It fills 18 minutes pleasantly enough. The music evinces an exhiliarating briskness offset by a lush but not particularly distinguished lyricism. Structurally, however, the piece is overmuch of a hodgepodge, and its melodic ideals are by no means memorable. Like many another composer, Mr. Carpenter needs a poetic idea to give wings to his musical fancy. As a composer of absolute music he has never been more than half successful.

Yesterday's audience received him warmly both as pianist and as composer.

Herald

URDAY, OCTOBER 22, 19

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon." Franck, Symphony in D minor. Carpenter, "Patterns" for orchestra with piano obbligato (first performance), and "Skyscrapers." Mr. Carpenter played the piano part in "Patterns"; Clara Shear, soprano and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, sang the few measures for voices in "Skyscrapers."

It was a great pleasure to hear Weber's overture again, familiar as it is. There is a chivalric spirit in Weber's music that is peculiar to him. William Foster Apthorp used to speak of the "Weberisch flourish"—that entered in to the expression of this spirit. Not even Mendelssohn was so much at home in fairyland as Weber: The horns of Elfland faintly blowing. Only Berlioz in his "Queen Mab" Scherzo is unrivalled; Mendelssohn's fairies in comparison wear rubber boots when they trip it in the dew. And we were glad to find Dr. Koussevitzky going back to the old fashioned order in the program: Overture—if possible a lively, merry one to put the audience in a happy, receptive mood. Then the symphony. There are so many overtures worth the hearing, nor should the better ones of Auber be thought beneath the dignity of the occasion. Conductors and orchestras in these days are inclined to take music too seriously.

Mr. Carpenter's "Patterns" was intended, it is said, for the jubilee of the orchestra, but it was not completed in time. He wrote modestly about the composition for the program book and naturally did not find much to say about the music. He spoke of a "highly sentimental waltz bit"—there is a decidedly sentimental rather than emotional streak in this composer's musical nature—of "short fleeting passages with jazz implications"—one could wish longer passages with jazz prominent; not merely implied—and "an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood"; for some of us the Spanish blood was not concealed; it was congealed. As Mr. Carpenter says "Patterns" is not a show piece for the piano. He might add that when the piano has the say what is says is of little significance. The audience enjoyed this music, which, unfortunately perhaps, was crushed, obliterated by "Skyscrapers" following immediately.

For "Skyscrapers" is a joyous, at times rowdy, often noisy expression of American life. The music no doubt would be still more effective if the ballet were on the stage. Perhaps the putting of the orchestra in overalls to remind the audience of riveters and other laborers would be an aid to appreciation, though the music itself is here adroitly imitative; but for the scenes in "any Coney Island" stage settings and characters are essential. Here music alone gives no illusion of the island life: the Negro sweeper going to sleep, comic policemen, or tingle-tangle booths and barkers. Even ultra-modern music has its limitations in suggesting, much less expressing, scenes in everyday life. But as a suite "Skyscrapers" is amusing; it is a genuine contribution to American music and not merely because it was composed by a man who happened to be born and educated in this country.

Cesar Franck's symphony has been played here many times; by various conductors who have as many ideas about the tempi and the degrees of dynamic force. There might be a discussion concerning the pace at which the last movement was taken yesterday. Some might have wished a slightly slower tempo as indicated by the composer; allowing a more majestic song of triumph over doubt. There were times when the brass did not allow the violin passages to be heard. It was a great day for the brass choir, especially in "Skyscrapers." There were moments when one longed for a banjo solo (Mr. Carpenter included one in his orchestra), with the men from Harlem dancing a double shuffle, cutting pigeon-wings with other Harlemities "patting Juba."

One might ask, now that the fanatical Franckites are comparatively quiet, if the first movement of the symphony could not bear judicious cutting: for example, the repetition of the opening, questioning measures. In the performance yesterday the second and third movements—in spite of the excited pace of the finale—gave unalloyed pleasure.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concert next week. The program of Nov. 4-5 will be as follows: Prokofieff, Four Character Portraits from the Opera, "The Gambler" (first time in the United States). Sibelius, tone poem "Tapiola" (first time in Boston). Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben." This program is subject to a slight change.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

John Alden Carpenter's new "Patterns" was given a first performance yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The composer came here from Chicago to play the solo piano part. Dr Koussevitzky also conducted Mr Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," in which Clara Shear and Rulon Y. Robison sang the incidental soprano and tenor solos; Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Cesar Franck's immortal D minor Symphony.

"Patterns," according to the composer, has no "literary or programmatic significance." Presumably it likewise does not attempt to describe anything or even to establish a mood in the listener. It is "absolute" music, purest of the pure, and its substance is a series of short motives. These themes are varied and include one of Spanish character, one in the manner of a waltz and one which resembles jazz. Another is a sturdy phrase which Bach might conceivably have worked out in a fugue. The piece is in one movement and requires about 20 minutes to play.

Mr Carpenter refers to the piano part as an obligato. The instrument is treated very nearly as one of the orchestral voices, and it is heard in short, highly rhythmic interludes. The composer is much more lyrical in "Patterns" than he was in "Skyscrapers," and gives to the strings many passages of broad, sustained melody. His harmonic scheme is on the whole less rigorously modern than that of the Ballet. "Patterns" is further unlike most modern music in that it has moments of repose, something which many present-day composers apparently regard as unnecessary. It is greatly to Mr Carpenter's credit that he has written a piece which does not depend entirely for its effect upon short-breathed, driving rhythms.

"Patterns" is ingratiating, but not profound. Like a great deal of modern music, it is evocative of thought but not of emotion. "Patterns" does not have the vitality, the genial humor, or the intellectual point of "Skyscrapers." Structurally its greatest weakness seems to lie in the fact that the themes are not developed; they are presented in all their refreshing variety, but are not worked upon and reiterated sufficiently to make them seem part of a balanced, ordered whole.

Mr Carpenter was warmly applauded after his appearance as soloist, and received an added ovation at the conclusion of "Skyscrapers."

Cesar Frank's only symphony is of the great masterpieces of the last 50 years. Whether the gentle Belgian organist would ever have attained the symphonic stature of Brahams or Beethoven had he written additional works in this form, will forever be unknown. At any rate, this D minor symphony remains a monument to his genius. It is distinguished in material and style, and in its lucidity and organic strength. Above all it is noble, elevating music eloquently expressed.

Dr. Koussevitzky accorded it a masterly performance yesterday, in which the tone of the strings and brass was marvelously rich. His reading of "Skyscrapers" was the best performance of a jazz score one has ever heard from him. Miss Shear and Mr Robinson, singing from the rear of the stage, did creditable work.

There will be no Symphony concerts here next week, since the orchestra will be away on tour. On Nov 4 and 5 Dr Koussevitzky will give the first American performance of Prokofieff's "The Gambler" and the first Boston performance of Sibelius' tone poem "Tapiola." Richard Strauss' "A Hero's Life" will also be played. C. W. D.

CARPENTER STAR WITH SYMPHONY

John Alden Carpenter fills the dual role of pianist and composer at this week's Symphony concerts. His "Patterns," a modernistic work for piano and orchestra, is the novelty on Dr. Koussevitzky's third program. The Chicago composer has been represented several times on Symphony bills, but this is his first appearance as soloist. He got a cordial reception. The orchestra is also heard in his familiar "Skyscrapers" work, which he describes as a "ballet of modern American life."

The classic works on the program are Weber's sparkling "Oberon" overture and Cesar Franck's unique Symphony in D minor.

The orchestra goes on tour next week.

SANROMA PLAYS AT CONCERT TO AID PORTO RICO VICTIMS

Globe Oct 24

Jesus Maria Sanroma, Porto Rican pianist, who was graduated from the New England Conservatory of Music several years ago, was the soloist yesterday afternoon at a concert in Symphony Hall to raise funds for the relief of sufferers from the hurricane of Sept 26 in Porto Rico. The program, which was given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was directed by Arthur Fiedler.

Mr. Sanroma's numbers included the Rachmaninoff Concerto No. 2, in C minor for pianoforte and orchestra; and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." The orchestral numbers included Ravel's "Bolero;" "A Siegfried Idyll," and "Overture to Rienzi," by Wagner.

New Work by Carpenter Played for First Time at Symphony

By MOSES SMITH Amer Oct 22

"Patterns," the latest orchestral work of John Alden Carpenter, Chicago composer, who is also a business man, is given its first performances at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky.

As further tribute to one of our foremost American musicians Mr. Koussevitzky pairs the same composer's "Skyscrapers" with the novelty.

Mr. Carpenter's new work, scored for modern orchestra with an important piano obligato (played by the composer at these concerts), is about 20 minutes of continuous music, without division into movements or sections. There are, however, many changes in mood through the composition, though the prevailing tone is sentimental—in a long passage for violin solo and in a fragmentary waltz. There is also more than a suggestion of jazz.

The title which Mr. Carpenter chose is a deliberate and explicit indication that the music is to be heard for itself, not with any literary or descriptive program in mind. By implication, too, it takes the sting out of any possible criticism that the work is too fragmentary in character, that it lacks continuity—which is exactly the criticism I should like to make.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were similarly—perhaps even more—at home with "Skyscrapers," the rowdy tunes and rhythms of which sent the matinee audience away in exuberant spirits.

With the Orchestras

Oct 22

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Mr. John Alden Carpenter, Chicago composer, was represented on the third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season by two of his compositions, the "Skyscrapers" Ballet music and "Patterns," for orchestra with piano obbligato. The latter work had its first public performance on Oct. 21, in Symphony Hall. The composer was at the piano.

Most of Mr. Carpenter's output heretofore has been classifiable as program music, and much of it has been topical. "Skyscrapers," heard in conjunction with the stage setting and action, is effectively descriptive of phases of American life; in the concert hall it does not achieve its full success.

"The title 'Patterns,'" the composer assures us in a program note, "has no literary or programmatic significance, but it is my hope that the suitability of the title will be as apparent to the average auditor as it is to me."

The work is in one movement, but there is a slow middle section which may be regarded as dividing it into three parts. Its author confesses to a "highly sentimental waltz bit," short passages "with jazz implications" and an "absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this," he adds, "that the patterns are at least various."

The form of this pattern music, while free, seems to correspond most closely to the fantasia. Neither material nor treatment is striking for its originality. The listener is reminded of many predecessors, from Schumann to Ravel. The music is pleasantly reflective, the agreeable reverie of a cultivated musician. Since the piano part is not prominent, the cordial applause was presumably intended to reward Mr. Carpenter's effort—as it turned out, somewhat belated—to contribute to the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary.

The other items of the program were Weber's "Oberon" Overture and the Franck Symphony. Both were highly dramatized by Dr. Koussevitzky. In the overture in particular, one felt that the performance tended to exhibit the virtuosity of the orchestra more than the content of the score. L. A. S.

Music and Musicians === Plays and Player

Good Deed Of Samroma And Fiedler

Generous Response to Their Puerto Rican Concert, Both Advancing

It would be impertinent to inquire how many of the substantial audience that filled four-fifths of Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, came thither out of sympathy for distressed Puerto Ricans; how many from interest in Mr. Sanromá and Mr. Fiedler, the initiators and the principal figures of the concert. Say, rather, that in most the two impulses ran mated. On the Puerto Rican side, when all bills have been paid and all contributions added to the account, they should increase the relief fund, for the havoc of the hurricane, by some $2000—a considerable sum in our "insular" possessions." On the musical side, the assembled company was fresh evidence of the warm interest and regard in which the concert-going community holds these two young musicians as they advance in deserving.

It was also proof, especially in the full upper balcony, of the response of this public to modest prices. There should be added to these good works those of the seventy-odd members of the Symphony Orchestra who, without money and without price, played in all five numbers. It should be noted also that the only conspicuous absence was that of our august master, the Honorable James Michael Curley, who, it may be recalled, sat in the Democratic National Convention last June as an alternate from Puerto Rico. He had, however, made amends by a generous purchase of tickets as addition to the relief fund.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra joined hands with Mr. Sanromá in the performance of Rakhmaninov's Piano-Concerto in C minor and of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." By themselves they played the Overture to Wagner's early opera, "Rienzi;" the "Siegfried Idyl" of his full maturity; by the courteous permission of the American agents for Messrs Durand of Paris, Ravel's Bolero. Mr. Fiedler, conducting, and the players with him, made the old, reliable Overture sound as forthright and flambouyant as both symphonic and "popular" audiences now expect. Once in so often we listeners hear it willingly enough; add to it faint memories of "Gerechter Gott," that altos still sing occasionally in concerts; wonder, between whiles, what Wagner's early opera à la Meyerbeer may have been like. Probably we shall never know, since even in faithful Germany it is now seldom revived. In the Bolero again, conductor and orchestra gained every effect proper to a changeless, reiterated, sharply rhythmed motif, clothed in ever-changing instrumental color, carried to climax through every dynamic intensity at the masterful Ravel's command. Three years ago the purists of the concert-hall averred that such a "trick" could not survive more than one performance before the same public. Yet here it is, after many repetitions, still flourishing at Symphony Hall.

In overture and show-piece the listener received what he expected from Mr. Fiedler. In the "Siegfreid Idyl," the conductor gave proof of a finer insight, ear and skill than are always his custom. Though he used a considerable orchestra, he sounded the music as the intimate and precious gift bestowed by Wagner upon his Cosima. He made clear the strands of a symphonic piece that is nearly perfect composition in the unfolding of one after another, in the interweaving into a manifold, expanding web. He also perceived and conveyed—the players assisting—many of the finer shadings with which Wagner wrought around his new born son a tonal aureole from his imagined hero. Never was there a music more lighted by an inner and tender glory of rejoicing emotion. In routine performances Mr. Fiedler has seemed insensitive to the fineness and the subtlety in both texture and mood of Wagner's tone-poem in little. Yesterday he was more receptive and alert. Through ten years the "Siegfred Idyl" was left to gather dust in a library-carton at Symphony Hall. Now it engrosses a "popular" audience.

For the first time hereabouts Mr. Sanromá played the piano-part in Rakhmaninov's Concerto in C minor, of old familiar piece until the composer and all his works fell into current disuse at the Symphony Concerts. From first measure to last it is Rakhmaninov unalloyed and unmitigated. A somberly romantic invention and imagination, a virtuoso's abounding resource, join together to make it. The first movement is a symphonic piece, grand, gloomy and, in these days, a bit glum, in which the piano is permitted, rather than encouraged, to bear a part. The slow division is steeped with grave and songful melancholy. Instead of Mr. Sanromá, memory saw the remote, impassive mask of the composer brooding over it. In the finale the pianist may launch his virtuosity; but never once in the exercise thereof forsake dignity for exhilaration.

The whole concerto seemed far enough from Mr. Sanromá's native temperament and usual predilections. Never before has he courted the grand style in piano-playing or sought to absorb and transmit such darksome, austere and passioned music. He, and the conductor with him, might have sounded the first movement in larger periods, with more sonorous tone. In the second Mr. Sanromá merged his Latin and modernistic temperament as best he might in the Russian's nostalgic song. In the third, a shared and masterful virtuosity bridged the gulf between Latin modernist and Slav romanticist, and for the while the two were as one. . . . Which of us in the late twenties and well launched in oue of the arts would not accomplish our tour de force? As likely as not Mr. Sanromá is on the way to his in this Concerto of the antipodal Rakhmaninov.

To conclude, the "Rhapsody in Blue" of our Mr. Gershwin with which Mr. Sanromá and Mr. Fiedler have long been past masters. It sounded bigger, brighter and more ebullient than ever played con amore by an orchestra nearly eighty strong and more responsive than any other of symphonic rank to a jazzy tune. As for Mr. Sanromá, he outflung the piano-part with a sympathy, a sheen, a high-rhythmed propulsive flood that only the composer himself may equal. At the end some elated spirit upstairs emitted something between a sigh and a shout of ineffable satisfaction, and the whole house heard. Yes: it is like that on a Sunday afternoon in October, 1932, at Symphony Hall, when Sanromá, Fiedler and three-fourths of the Boston Symphony Orchestra play Master Gershwin.

H. T. P.

Generous Son

J. M. Sanromá

Who Initiated and Took Leading Part in the Concert, Yesterday in Symphony Hall, for the Relief of Suffering, under the Recent Hurricane, in his Native Island of Puerto Rico. From a New Photograph Taken There Last Summer

* * * *

The suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Gambler," after the autobiographical novel of Dostoievski, which Dr. Koussevitsky will introduce to Boston—and to America—at the Symphony Concerts of this week, runs in five movements of which four, entitled respectively, "Alexis," "The Grandmother," "The General," and "Pauline," are musical character studies of the principal personages in the drama. The concluding movement bears the title "Denouement."

Globe Oct 30

Considerable interest attaches to the first Boston performance, at this same pair of Symphony Concerts, of Sibelius' tone-poem of Finnish forests, "Tapiola." Written on commission for Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, "Tapiola" did not greatly please the New York reviewers, who found the music drab and monotonous. On the other hand, the piece, which is now some seven years old, is well-liked in England, and Cecil Gray, the composer's recent and highly-enthusiastic biographer, holds the work in such high esteem as to regard it a climactic point in Sibelius' development.

* * * *

MUSIC

Oct 22

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

John Alden Carpenter's new "Patterns" was given a first performance yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The composer came here from Chicago to play the solo piano part. Dr Koussevitzky also conducted Mr Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," in which Clara Shear and Rulon Y. Robison sang the incidental soprano and tenor solos; Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Cesar Franck's immortal D minor Symphony.

"Patterns," according to the composer, has no "literary or programmatic significance." Presumably it likewise does not attempt to describe anything or even to establish a mood in the listener. It is "absolute" music, purest of the pure, and its substance is a series of short motives. These themes are varied and include one of Spanish character, one in the manner of a waltz and one which resembles jazz. Another is a sturdy phrase which Bach might conceivably have worked out in a fugue. The piece is in one movement and requires about 20 minutes to play.

Mr Carpenter refers to the piano part as an obligato. The instrument is treated very nearly as one of the orchestral voices, and it is heard in short, highly rhythmic interludes. The composer is much more lyrical in "Patterns" than he was in "Skyscrapers," and gives to the strings many passages of broad, sustained melody. His harmonic scheme is on the whole less rigorously modern than that of the Ballet. "Patterns" is further unlike most modern music in that it has moments of repose, something which many present-day composers apparently regard as unnecessary. It is greatly to Mr Carpenter's credit that he has written a piece which does not depend entirely for its effect upon short-breathed, driving rhythms.

"Patterns" is ingratiating, but not profound. Like a great deal of modern music, it is evocative of thought but not of emotion. "Patterns" does not have the vitality, the genial humor, or the intellectual point of "Skyscrapers." Structurally its greatest weakness seems to lie in the fact that the themes are not developed; they are presented in all their refreshing variety, but are not worked upon and reiterated sufficiently to make them seem part of a balanced, ordered whole.

Mr Carpenter was warmly applauded after his appearance as soloist, and received an added ovation at the conclusion of "Skyscrapers."

Cesar Frank's only symphony is of the great masterpieces of the last 50 years. Whether the gentle Belgian organist would ever have attained the symphonic stature of Brahams or Beethoven had he written additional works in this form, will forever be unknown. At any rate, this D minor symphony remains a monument to his genius. It is distinguished in material and style, and in its lucidity and organic strength. Above all it is noble, elevating music eloquently expressed.

Dr Koussevitzky accorded it a masterly performance yesterday, in which the tone of the strings and brass was marvelously rich. His reading of "Skyscrapers" was the best performance of a jazz score one has ever heard from him. Miss Shear and Mr Robinson, singing from the rear of the stage, did creditable work.

There will be no Symphony concerts here next week, since the orchestra will be away on tour. On Nov 4 and 5 Dr Koussevitzky will give the first American performance of Prokofieff's "The Gambler" and the first Boston performance of Sibelius' tone poem "Tapiola." Richard Strauss' "A Hero's Life" will also be played. C. W. D.

New Work by Carpenter Played for First Time at Symphony

By MOSES SMITH Amer Oct 22

"Patterns," the latest orchestral work of John Alden Carpenter, Chicago composer, who is also a business man, is given its first performances at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky.

As further tribute to one of our foremost American musicians Mr. Koussevitzky pairs the same composer's "Skyscrapers" with the novelty.

Mr. Carpenter's new work, scored for modern orchestra with an important piano obligato (played by the composer at these concerts), is about 20 minutes of continuous music, without division into movements or sections. There are, however, many changes in mood through the composition, though the prevailing tone is sentimental—in a long passage for violin solo and in a fragmentary waltz. There is also more than a suggestion of jazz.

The title which Mr. Carpenter chose is a deliberate and explicit indication that the music is to be heard for itself, not with any literary or descriptive program in mind. By implication, too, it takes the sting out of any possible criticism that the work is too fragmentary in character, that it lacks continuity—which is exactly the criticism I should like to make.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were similarly—perhaps even more—at home with "Skyscrapers," the rowdy tunes and rhythms of which sent the matinee audience away in exuberant spirits.

With the Orchestras

Oct 22

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Mr. John Alden Carpenter, Chicago composer, was represented on the third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season by two of his compositions, the "Skyscrapers" Ballet music and "Patterns," for orchestra with piano obbligato. The latter work had its first public performance on Oct. 21, in Symphony Hall. The composer was at the piano.

Most of Mr. Carpenter's output heretofore has been classifiable as program music, and much of it has been topical. "Skyscrapers," heard in conjunction with the stage setting and action, is effectively descriptive of phases of American life; in the concert hall it does not achieve its full success.

"The title 'Patterns,'" the composer assures us in a program note, "has no literary or programmatic significance, but it is my hope that the suitability of the title will be as apparent to the average auditor as it is to me."

The work is in one movement, but there is a slow middle section which may be regarded as dividing it into three parts. Its author confesses to a "highly sentimental waltz bit," short passages "with jazz implications" and an "absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this," he adds, "that the patterns are at least various."

The form of this pattern music, while free, seems to correspond most closely to the fantasia. Neither material nor treatment is striking for its originality. The listener is reminded of many predecessors, from Schumann to Ravel. The music is pleasantly reflective, the agreeable reverie of a cultivated musician. Since the piano part is not prominent, the cordial applause was presumably intended to reward Mr. Carpenter's effort—as it turned out, somewhat belated—to contribute to the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary.

The other items of the program were Weber's "Oberon" Overture and the Franck Symphony. Both were highly dramatized by Dr. Koussevitzky. In the overture in particular, one felt that the performance tended to exhibit the virtuosity of the orchestra more than the content of the score. L. A. S.

CARPENTER STAR WITH SYMPHONY

John Alden Carpenter fills the dual role of pianist and composer at this week's Symphony concerts. His "Patterns," a modernistic work for piano and orchestra, is the novelty on Dr. Koussevitzky's third program. The Chicago composer has been represented several times on Symphony bills, but this is his first appearance as soloist. He got a cordial reception. The orchestra is also heard in his familiar "Skyscrapers" work, which he describes as a "ballet of modern American life."

The classic works on the program are Weber's sparkling "Oberon" overture and Cesar Franck's unique Symphony in D minor.

The orchestra goes on tour next week.

SANROMA PLAYS AT CONCERT TO AID PORTO RICO VICTIMS

Oct 24

Jesus Maria Sanroma, Porto Rican pianist, who was graduated from the New England Conservatory of Music several years ago, was the soloist yesterday afternoon at a concert in Symphony Hall to raise funds for the relief of sufferers from the hurricane of Sept 26 in Porto Rico. The program, which was given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was directed by Arthur Fiedler.

Mr Sanroma's numbers included the Rachmaninoff Concerto No. 2, in C minor for pianoforte and orchestra; and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." The orchestral numbers included Ravel's "Bolero;" "A Siegfried Idyll," and "Overture to Rienzi," by Wagner.

GOOD-WILL CONCERT AT SYMPHONY

Sanroma, Fiedler and Orchestra in Aid of Puerto Rico

Pst Oct 24

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Mr. Sanroma playing the piano part of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" to the accompaniment of an orchestra of Symphony players, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, the concert at Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, for the benefit of the sufferers in the recent hurricane in Puerto Rico, was for a moment strikingly remniscent of the Pops.

RACHMANINOFF'S SECOND

Naturally there was much applause for the pianist's sympathetic performance of what is unquestionably Mr. Gershwin's most successful effort at formal composition. One enthusiastic individual gave vent to a whoop of joy as the final chord was sounded. Yet the reviewer can not conceal a certain pleasure in reporting that an even warmer reception had been accorded the performance immediately before of the Second Concerto of Rachmaninoff.

It has more than once been noted that the musicians at Symphony Hall, being human, invariably rise to a special occasion. The concert of yesterday, prompted by an appeal made to the distinguished ex-Puerto Rican, Mr. Sanroma, by the commissioner of education on that island, undoubtedly made a strong sentimental appeal to all those concerned in it—and incidentally one and all gave their services. And in Rachmaninoff's Concerto conductor, pianist and orchestra seemed lifted above themselves. Always an admirable pianist, Mr. Sanroma was yesterday to an unprecedented degree a persuasive one, while Mr. Fiedler led his forces as a conductor to the manner born. There have been notable performances of this Concerto in Symphony Hall when Mr. Rachmaninoff was himself the pianist, yet that of yesterday did not pale beside them.

From Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra alone came three pieces—Wagner's youthful and obstreperous Overture to "Rienzi," the tender "Siegfried Idyll" and Ravel's still popular Bolero. One outstanding virtue of Mr. Fiedler as conductor is his happy sense of the appropriate tempo, a gift that was manifest yesterday in both of Wagner's pieces as well as in the other numbers on the programme. In every respect, for that matter, the performance of the Idyll was a most felicitous one, and the audience, which incidentally filled nearly every seat, applauded that performance so insistently that Mr. Fiedler bade the players bow their acknowledgments.

Page Nine 4 BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,

=== Plays and Player

Generous Son

J. M. Sanromá

Who Initiated and Took Leading Part in the Concert, Yesterday in Symphony Hall, for the Relief of Suffering, under the Recent Hurricane, in his Native Island of Puerto Rico. From a New Photograph Taken There Last Summer

* * * *

The suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Gambler," after the autobiographical novel of Dostoievski, which Dr. Koussevitsky will introduce to Boston—and to America—at the Symphony Concerts of this week, runs in five movements of which four, entitled respectively, "Alexis," "The Grandmother," "The General," and "Pauline," are musical character studies of the principal personages in the drama. The concluding movement bears the title "Denouement." Oct 30

Considerable interest attaches to the first Boston performance, at this same pair of Symphony Concerts, of Sibelius' tone-poem of Finnish forests, "Tapiola." Written on commission for Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, "Tapiola" did not greatly please the New York reviewers, who found the music drab and monotonous. On the other hand, the piece, which is now some seven years old, is well-liked in England, and Cecil Gray, the composer's recent and highly-enthusiastic biographer, holds the work in such high esteem as to regard it a climactic point in Sibelius' development.

* * * *

16

Concert-Chronicle

Self-Defence Trans Oct 24

THE reviewer who rebels under one more performance of a long-familiar and long-liked piece of "standard" music, risks his personal comfort. Alpha, whom he encounters the next evening in Symphony Hall chides him more in sorrow than in anger. Omega, possessed by t' latter emotion, writes in haste to the Managing Editor suggesting dismissal, not for dull ears and dull wits but for nonconformity to the general will. Only little Omicron, who is too young to know better, and a few musicians subject to intensive likes and dislikes, praise him behind their hands, for candor and independence. Nothing is lacking to the present reviewer's discomfort except the inevitable letter, unsigned, saying that on Friday last, when he heard and reproached Franck's Symphony, he must have lunched badly. Probably it wi' arrive in the course of the day. Meanwhile, for the good name of his hotel, he hastens to say that he seldom lunched better

Furthermore: he recants not one of the heresies that he set down in these columns last Saturday. Since Franck's Symphony is no impregnable and—so far—imperishable masterpiece, like Beethoven's "Eroica" or Brahms's First, but only a popular French symphony, he makes bold to say again that too frequent repetition has staled it to frequenters of the Symphony Concerts. There, through twenty years, it has been played in ever second season, sometimes oftener. Th same fate would have overtaken Chaiko sky's "Pathetic" Symphony, were another conductor than Dr. Koussevitzk now administering it to us. It has i other American concert-halls, Mr. Stoko ski's Philadelphian Academy include Long ago, at Symphony Hall, it descende upon Dvorák's over-praised, over-repeat "New World" Symphony and remanded i fragments to The Pops.

Yet again: the tradition of performanc at the Symphony Concerts—for it has b come nothing less—is at odds with th true nature of Franck's Symphony. I was Dr. Muck who set the fashion of r leasing the brass vehemently in the firs and the final movement; he who began t externalize and dramatize a music ofte contemplative, unmistakably of inner an spiritual states, until it gains the gla some ascent of the finale. Even there, i sings out from the strings rather tha crashes up from an over-driven bras choir. Dr. Muck's successors walked i his ways, each according to his kind an degree until Mr. Monteux tended audibl to sentimentalize his Franck. Dr. Kousevitzky redressed the balance, and mor His brass outshouts even Dr. Muck's (No wonder, on Saturday evening, tha master-trumpeter, Mr. Mager, succumbe to the strain.) He also outdoes all hi predecessors in the transformation o Franck's introspective music of spiritua stress into a grandiose dramatic poem in three parts, for full orchestra. N doubt audiences prefer it so. The lon and loud applause of the choice compan of Saturday evening is present proof But one reviewer, climbing, like St. Simon Stylites, up his solitary pillar will continue to insist not only tha Franck's Symphony has been played to frequently at the Symphony Concerts but that upon nearly every occasion it has been mis-played.

Incidents and Prospects

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra left town last evening on a week's journey to Buffalo on Monday; Ann Arbor on Tuesday; Cincinnati on Wednesday; Columbus on Thursday; Pittsburg on Friday; Ithaca on Saturday They are due in Boston again next Sunday morning. The six programs include Brahms's First and Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony; Prokoqev's "Classical" Symphony; Debussy's "Clouds," "Fêtes" and Prelude of the Faun; Strauss's "Don Juan"; the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë"; Corelli's Suite.

Concert-Chronicle

Over-Often Trans Oct 31

THOSE that should know say that Dr. Koussevitzky receives with interest any valid report about the moods of the public of the Symphony Concerts toward his programs. It seems, then, the moment to say that a considerable number of serious, responsive, remembering listeners in both the matinée and the evening audience is surprised and a little resentful at the announcement of another repetition of Strauss's tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben," for next Friday and Saturday. After three years—a reasonable interval—it was played at the Symphony Concerts of Jan. 2 and 3, 1931. It was repeated at the concerts of Oct. 23 and 24, 1931. Now it is to be played yet again at the concerts of Nov. 4 and 5, 1932. That is to say, if present plans hold, it will have been heard at Symphony Hall six times in twenty-two months.

Every musical year in every orchestra's repertory deserving pieces go regrettably unheard because there is no room for them. Under this pressure so many repetitions, at such short intervals, of a single tone-poem by Strauss may well seem disproportionate and excessive. The audience hears him gladly; conductor and orchestra play him magnificently; by the works of his prime he remains the most eminent living composer. On that score only Sibelius may challenge him. Even so need "Ein Heldenleben" be re-played in three successive seasons? If Strauss is to be the order of the day next Friday and Saturday, why not return to "Don Quixote," unheard for ten years at Symphony Hall until Dr. Koussevitzky revived it last autumn? With two novel pieces to prepare, one from Sibelius, one from Prokofiev, the conductor evidently wishes his third number to be "repertory." But neither he nor the orchestra can have forgotten "Don Quixote"; while even "Death and Transfiguration" might sound fresher than the over-repeated "Heldenleben." Possibly, also, Sibelius's "splendid 'Tapiola,'" as the Europeans unanimously hail it, might desirably stand alone as novel number.

Mr. Carpenter's new piece, "Patterns," heard last Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall, will be played by the Chicago Orchestra, before the composer's fellow-townsmen, this evening and tomorrow afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky will also find room for it in one of the concerts of the Boston Orchestra in New York toward the end of November. Wherever it is played, Mr. Carpenter will take the piano-part.

In and Around The Bostonian Concert-Halls

Trans. Oct. 28

Matters That Invite Debate, People's Orchestra Again, Programs in Prospect

WITHIN the past three days more than one who has heard Franck's Symphony to satiety at the Symphony Concerts has said as much to this department by letter or by word of mouth. The complaining voices come from the matinée and from the evening audience. Among them are both teachers and students at Harvard—an appreciable element in the public of Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky, who is not above the consideration of the public in his program-making, might be surprised at the number and the warmth of these protests, in particular from the musically minded. Some of them, like this department, have also noted the conductor's recent tendency to over-drive the brass choir. A resident composer, for example, recalls how, at the close of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" (in the second pair of concerts) the too sonorous energies of horns, trumpets and trombones made the underbody of Wagner's climax quite inaudible. When The Transcript raised debate about Franck's Symphony and overpowering brass, it believed itself a voice crying in the wilderness. Now it is discovering that those woods are not a lonesome place.

Tibbett Postpones Symphony Date for Opera—Music Notes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since he is to open the Metropolitan Opera season in Verdi's "Simon Boccanegra" immediately after the announced date of his Boston recital on Nov. 20, Lawrence Tibbett has postponed his Symphony Hall appearance until Sunday afternoon, Dec. 4. No singer wants to risk a journey from Boston to New York just before so important an occasion as the opening of New York's operatic season. And incidentally that will be the opening of the only major opera company to be heard in America this winter east of California.

* * * *

The Metropolitan has added to its roster this season, as was to be expected, various members of the inactive Chicago organization: Frida Leider, Maria Olzcewska and Eide Norena, Tito Schipa and Richard Bonelli. Richard Crooks, well known to Boston as recital singer, will be with the Metropolitan during the second half of the winter; other names new to the Metropolitan list and as yet unfamiliar to Bostonian ears are those of Helen Gleason and Rose Bampton, Gustaaf de Loor and Ludwig Hofmann. Whether or not Boston, deprived of its Chicagoan operatic fortnight, will have the opportunity to hear the Metropolitan assemblage in the spring is still a matter of uncertainty—and of hope.

* * * *

Announcements from Symphony Hall include the information that Lily Pons, outstanding coloratura soprano of these days in America, will be heard there on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 11.

* * * *

The group to be heard in Symphony Hall on the afternoon of Sunday, Nov. 27, long known and admired as the English Singers, is now, it appears, to be known as the New English Singers. Whether or not this signifies any change in personnel or in the type of programme is not stated.

* * * *

Armenian symphonic music is to have its day in Boston Sunday, Nov. 13, with some 50-odd members of the Symphony Orchestra and the Armenian National Chorus to set it forth. A detailed programme is not yet at hand, but Rose Zulalian, mezzo-soprano of distinction in her own right, and incidentally the most eminent of the women singers of her race, will be soloist with chorus and orchestra, and Charles Garo will be the conductor.

lish short stories, also shows us in his illuminating and readable volume that Nietzsche's subsequent antipathy began much earlier than is generally supposed, and that jealousy of a successful rival had at the outset as much to do with his alienation from Wagner as had his disagreement with him in philosophical and aesthetic matters. The importance of Cosima Wagner in Mr. O'Brien's narrative is suggested by the fact that it is her likeness, rather than that of Nietzsche's, which makes the frontispiece.

* * * *

Jesus Maria Sanroma, resident pianist, whose last and most successful appearance here was at the concert a week ago for the benefit of the Puerto Rican hurricane, will be the soloist next Wednesday at the concert of the Philadelphia Sinfonietta, the conductor of which is Fabien Sevitzky, musical director of Boston's Metropolitan Theatre. He will be heard in a Concerto of Bach.

Francesco Scarpetti, baritone, who makes his first public appearance here at Jordan Hall this evening, came to this country from Italy as a boy of 13 and received the larger part of his musical training at the New England Conservatory of Music. Mr. Scarpetti has been singing of late in New York, Philadelphia and Providence.

* * * *

Samuel Gardner, violinist, who plays at Jordan Hall next Wednesday evening, will be remembered as the composer of the tone-poem, "Broadway," a musical picture of New York, heard at the Symphony Concerts a season or two ago, under the composer's own direction.

* * * *

That Friedrich Nietzsche idolized Richard Wagner—for a time—is well known. That for a much longer period he adored Cosima von Buelow, later the composer's wife, is a matter of less common knowledge, and the relationship between the two is given new emphasis and importance in Edward J. O'Brien's biography or, as he prefers to call it, portrait of the German philosopher, "Son of the Morning," lately published by Brewer, Warren and Putnam. Mr. O'Brien, who is best known to the American reading public through his yearly collection of the outstanding American and Eng-

---

Dr. Koussevitzky has reconstructed the program for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. It now stands in order: Overture to the Opera, "The Magic Flute" from Mozart; "Tapiola," tone-poem from Sibelius; "The Gamblers," character-pictures from Prokofiev's like-named opera; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The announced repetition of "Ein Heldenleben" is deferred to another occasion. Possibly it might suit the anniversary concerts for the semicentenary of Wagner's death.

Trans. Nov. 1

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
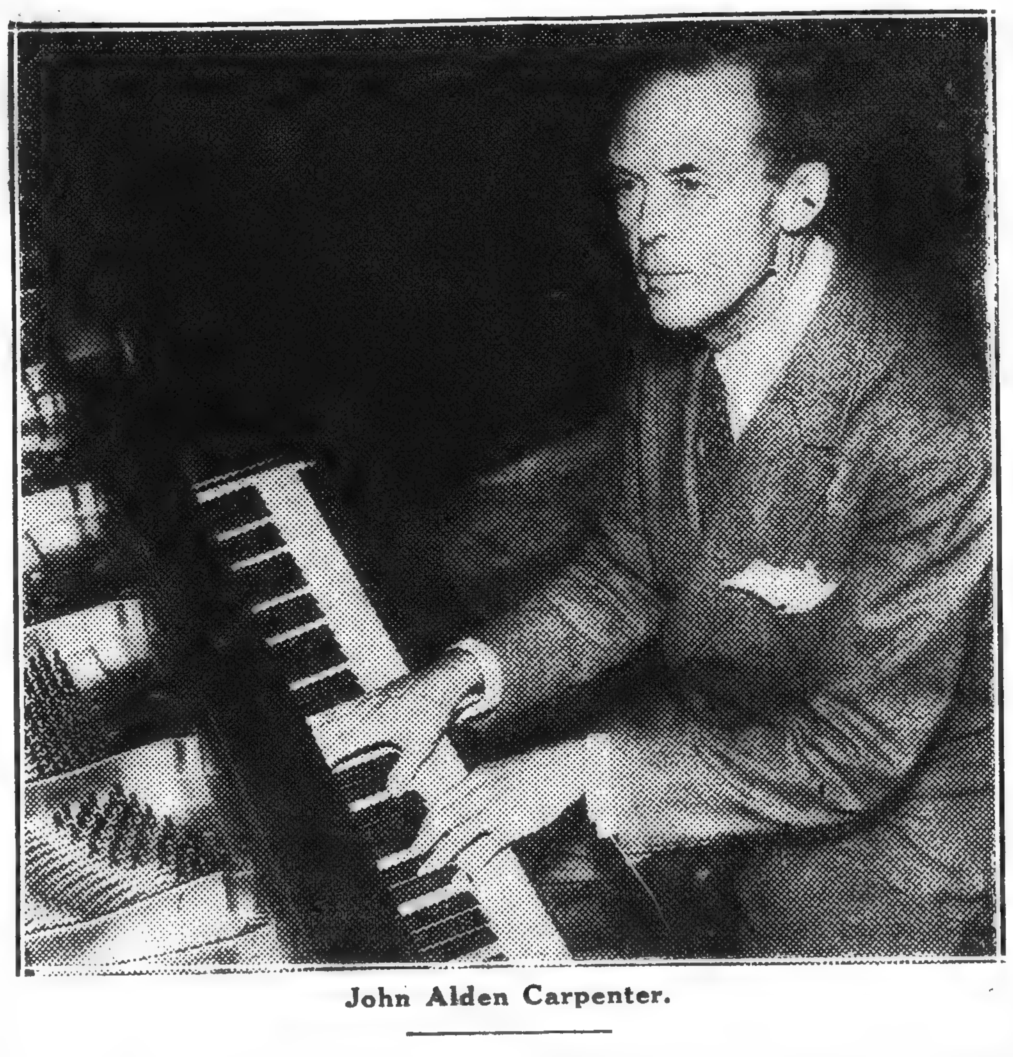
POST

OCT 27 1932

Is John Alden Carpenter a Bit Nervous? Don't Be Silly. Of Course



John Alden Carpenter.

By Karleton Hackett.

John Alden Carpenter had just finished rehearsing with Mr. Stock and the orchestra his "Patterns," which are to be heard this evening for the first time in Chicago. He was evidently keyed up to high pitch. "Nervous! I should say so; and why not? This is the first time in my life that I have ever appeared as a pianist."

Mr. Carpenter was just back from Boston, where the first performance of "Patterns" was given last week by the Boston symphony under Koussevitzky. "And was I nervous? I certainly was; in fact, I felt almost prima donnaish. If the time should ever come when we could take public performance as a matter of course without nervous tension it would surely be a thing without life or meaning.

"Well, in Boston they seemed to like 'Patterns' pretty well. The applause was cordial, and it sounded as though they meant it. I think that Koussevitzky liked it; you cannot go so much by what people say as by the atmospheric quality that somehow surrounds them, and it seemed to me that he really liked it.

"The Transcript was quite laudatory, but then the Transcript always has been favorable toward my music. The other newspapers were not so complimentary, but they never have been. They have always touched me up a bit, doubtless for my own good.

"These 'Patterns' form the first piece of music I have ever written without some sort of a story, some literary background, in my mind. I began work on them—or it—something over two years ago, when Koussevitzky sent out a request for music to aid in celebrating the half century of the Boston orchestra. I then wrote about a third of it, lost interest and put it aside. Last March I took it up again, feeling an urge to write something for piano with orchestra.

"After you let music lie by for a space you never know what it will sound like to you when you take it up again. You are pretty apt to be tired of it, or disgusted with it, but this time I found that I was still interested. I found myself desiring to think just tone. No story, no program, but merely designs, patterns, in tone."

No man ever appears more self-possessed than John Alden Carpenter. An Anglo-Saxon, he has his outward seeming thoroughly under control. But when you look at him tonight you may be sure that within he is taut as the proverbial bowstring with all his nervous energy concentrated on the moment. As he himself said: "Nervous? I should say so"

John Alden may have himself firmly in his Anglo-Saxon hand and show nothing to the casual observer. But he had a brother, Ben, of Gallic exuberance. Once many years ago at a Harvard dinner there was an [illegible] erner who was something of a [illegible] and after urging he was quite willing to sing. But he had no music with him—and what could be done about that in Chicago?

"Tell that bird," said Ben, "that if he will hum two bars of his dinky tune to John he will go right ahead and play him a better accompaniment than he ever heard before in his life. John will do his part—but can that bird sing?"

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

OCT 6 1932

Musical Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The fifty-second ~~season of the~~ Boston Symphony Orchestra commences at Symphony Hall in Boston with two concerts on Friday and Saturday.

Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived from Europe last week, will open his ninth season in this country. He continues what constitutes the longest continuous term of a Boston Symphony conductor. Excepting for a guest appearance as conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in June, Mr. Koussevitzky has given no concerts in Europe this summer, dividing his time between rest in the mountains and the pursuit of new scores of interest.

The New York series in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony will be presented on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons on the following dates: Nov. 17 and 19; Jan. 5 and 7; Feb. 3 (Friday by exception) and 4; March 2 and 4, and April 6 and 8.

Mannes to Conduct Manhattan Orchestra

Mr. Koussevitzky revealed that he has again selected a large and representative group of novelties for the Boston's programs this season. The new American works include a symphony by Louis Gruenberg, two compositions, as yet unnamed, by John Alden Carpenter; and a new composition, of a type not divulged, by Roger Sessions. The foreign novelties include Sibelius's Eighth symphony; a new work by Igor Markevitch, the youthful Russian composer now living in Paris; Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist; Serge Prokofieff's Fourth piano concerto, with Mr. Prokofieff as soloist; a suite by Conrad Beck and one by Alban Berg, the composer of "Wozzeck"; new compositions by Jerzy Fitelberg and Bohuslav Martinu, a piano concerto by Arnold Bax and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," in which the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs will take part.

David Mannes will make his first appearance as conductor of the Manhattan Symphony Orchestra on Sunday evening, Nov. 20, at the Waldorf-Astoria, where this organization, until this season under the direction of Henry Hadley, will give a season of six concerts. The first program will include the Beethoven triple concerto with Elsa, Greta and Maria Hilger as the soloists; Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, the theme and variations from Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3 and Cesar Franck's D minor symphony. These concerts will be broadcast over WOR and will begin promptly at 9 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 7 - 1932

Orchestra Conductor Composes First Bit

Friends of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to appear Oct. 27, in Memorial Hall, under auspices of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, have elicited from him the reluctant admission he has written a symphonic poem, his first essay in the field of composition.

He has not decided, however, whether the number ever will be included in his programs, he says. "I am not essentially a composer. I write for myself—a necessary outlet," he told reporters in Boston last week, following his return from Europe.

Whether or not the symphonic poem is heard this year, several quite new numbers will be, he promises. Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky will direct for the first time in this country, Sibelius' Eighth Symphony, now in the Boston repertory and just completed by the Finnish composer. New piano concertos by Prokofieff and Florent Schmitt, and a notable English chorale, "Belshazzar's Feast," by Walton, also are among his acquisitions.

The Boston orchestra and the Chicago, with Dr. Frederick Stock, in January, complete the offerings of the Symphony Club this year. Reservations are available from Mrs. Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood Ave.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 7 - 1932

MUSIC IN THE DEPRESSION

[Philip Hale in Boston Herald.]

The prospectus of the Philadelphia orchestra for this, its 33d season, contains a significant paragraph:—

"The programs for the season will be almost entirely devoted to the acknowledged masterpieces of orchestral music. The directors of the association feel that in times such as the present the audiences prefer music which they know and love and that performances of debatable music should be postponed until a more suitable time. With these opinions the conductors fully concur."

It is known that some subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts have deplored the number of ultra-modern compositions that have been introduced by Dr Koussevitzky. Some of the complaints have been unreasonable, even silly; other complaints have been justified. If there were noteworthy works in the list, works that imperatively called for a hearing, others, foreign and domestic, did not deserve attention. Thackeray in a proposed inscription in memory of George the First said in speaking of his tastes, that he "gave an enlightened patronage to bad oysters." The Boston public has at times been served compositions that might thus be classed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 7 - 1932

The Observat

By Walter Brown, Dr

Dr. Koussevitzky's Return.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has had his usual summer abroad, has had a week of intensive rehearsing of his Boston Symphony Orchestra for its season, which will begin in Symphony Hall, Boston, this evening. The new season will be the conductor's ninth with the orchestra—and at its conclusion Dr. Koussevitzky will have had the longest consecutive term of service of any of the distinguished musicians who have been the orchestra's leaders. A Western trip by the organization will begin very soon after the first concerts in Boston and we, of course, will get our Bushnell Hall concert by the orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 16—when the players will have had time to get well into their season's stride.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Evening Post

OCT 8 - 1932

Serge Koussevitzky, who opened the ~~fifty-second~~ season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday, announces a revival for next week's program in Bruckner's "Romantic" Symphony No. 4. This score has not been played for many years, the last performance by the orchestra having been in 1899 under Wilhelm Gericke. At the third pair of concerts, John Alden Carpenter wil lbe the guest of honor, playing the piano part in his new suite for piano and orchestra, which is then to have its first performance. Carpenter intended this music for the orchestra's anniversary season, but was unable to complete it in time. His "Skyscrapers" will also be played on this program. The program of the opening concerts this week consisted of Handel's Concerto Grosso, Opus 6, No. 10; Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Bach's Passacaglia in Respighi's arrangement and Brahms's Second Symphony. With Bruckner's Symphony at the next concerts, Strauss's "Don Juan" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude will also be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

OCT 8 - 1932

Koussevitzky and Stokowski.

Having returned to their posts after Summer vacations, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Leopold Stokowski, director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, have been saying something about the works which will employ their forces this season.

Mr. Koussevitzky believes in bringing forward American compositions when he finds creations of enough merit to warrant performance. The plans for the Boston orchestra include a new symphony by Louis Gruenberg, who has completed the score for an operatic version of Eugene O'Neill's drama, "Emperor Jones," two new works by John Alden Carpenter, who composed "Skyscraper," and one by Roger Sessions, all of them Americans.

Of new foreign compositions he will present "Rebus" written by Igor Mankevitch, a young Russian; Florent Schmitt's Symphonic Concertante for piano and orchestra; a piano concerto by Serge Prokofieff, who wrote the opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," produced by the Chicago Company several years ago; a suite for full orchestra by Alban Berg, composer of the opera, "Wozzek;" Arnold Bax's piano concerto; William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" for orchestra and chorus and a suite by Conrad Becker.

Mr. Stokowski is firmly convinced that the patrons of the Philadelphia Orchestra should hear the most advanced modern music, whether they like it or not. Obeying that conviction, he has presented works so distasteful to some of the subscribers in the Quaker City that they indulged in hisses and left the hall last season.

This year he intends to put the modern novelties after the tried and true works on his programs so that those, who do not care to listen to the strange gods need not do so. Among the works to which he will call attention will be "The Jungle" by Werner Josten, who was born in Germany, but has lived in this country for some years and is a member of the music department's faculty in Smith College.

Mr. Stokowski is right in insisting that audiences today should become acquainted with the work being done by modern creative musicians. Until their productions are heard there can be no telling what the new thought in music is.

The Philadelphia Orchestra will give the first concert in its New York season at Carnegie Hall, Tuesday night, October 18. The program includes Brahms's symphony No. 1 in C minor, and the Vorspiel, Liebesnacht and Liebestod from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde."

Musical Art Forum of Orange.

The Musical Art Forum of Orange will open its twelfth season in Wilson Lamb's studio, 310 Main street, Orange, tomorrow afternoon at 5 o'clock, with a concert to be given under Mr. Lamb's direction.

The Forum intends to give one concert every month this season and in some of them the Wilson Lamb Male Quartet and the choir singers Mr. Lamb is instructing will assist. Music lovers who may wish to join the Forum may send their applications to the studio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

OCT 9 - 1932

In his second pair of programs of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bruckner's fourth symphony, known as the "romantic," which has not been played by this orchestra since 1899, in the regime of Wilhelm Gericke. The work is more familiar here, where its last performance in the regular music season was given by the Philharmonic under Wilhelm Furtwaengler on March 26, 1926. Willem van Hoogstraten gave it at the Lewisohn Stadium in the summers of 1928 and 1930. Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" will also be played next Friday and Saturday.

In the third pair of concerts, October 20 and 21, John Alden Carpenter will be represented by his "Skyscrapers" and his new suite for piano and orchestra, in which he will be the soloist. The Chicago composer designed his suite, which will be played for the first time in public on October 20, for the Boston Symphony's anniversary season, 1930-'31, but was unable to finish the work in time for it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

OCT 9 - 1932

Koussevitzky to Visit Ann Arbor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA of 110 players, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will make a brief western tour this month, playing its only Michigan concert in Ann Arbor, October 25.

Doctor Koussevitzky opened his Boston season last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is the orchestra's fifty-second season and the ninth under the conductorship of this renowned leader. Doctor Koussevitzky will thus exceed any continuous term of a previous conductor of this orchestra.

As in the past, Doctor Koussevitzky's programmes, now world-renowned for their liberality and catholicity, will embrace every era of orchestral composition.

New concertos for piano and orchestra are promised from Prokofieff and Florent Schmitt, with the composer in each case as soloist. The as yet unplayed Eighth Symphony of Sibelius will receive its world premiere under Doctor Koussevitzky's direction, and all of its predecessors will be heard in advance of it during the season. There will be new works from the pens of the Americans, Gruenberg and Carpenter, and from sundry Europeans of advanced tendencies.

During the Summer Doctor Koussevitzky found time to indulge in an activity rare for him, namely composing. A poem for orchestra is now ready, but the conductor would not say just when it will be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 9 - 1932

With its membership unchanged in number and personnel and its musical prospectus continuing as of yore, the Boston Symphony Orchestra "will go on as usual," in the words of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted the opening concerts in Boston last week.

The "as usual" means not only the carrying out of the customary concert schedule at home and abroad, but the continued introduction of works news to this country, some of which will have their premieres in the United States. Hand in hand the new will go with the old. The keeping up of this policy is of interest in view of the proclamation from Stokowski's Philadelphians that they will eschew the modernistic this season and consort only with the classics.

"As usual" again, Dr. Koussevitzky brought back with him from Europe a number of new scores and has in hand new works from American composers as well. Not to mention one of his own, a poem for orchestra he wrote during his vacation abroad. He hasn't said when it would be played.

The new American works include a symphony by Gruenberg, two scores by John Alden Carpenter and a composition by Roger Sessions. The European scores number an Eighth Symphony by Sibelius, which that composer has just finished and which will have its premiere in this country; "Rebus," by Igor Markevitch, hardly more than a boy but whose extraordinary talent has made him a "sensation" of Paris; new piano concertos by Florent Schmitt and Prokofieff, with the composers as soloists in each case. A notable English score is Walton's choral, "Belshazzar's Feast."

Classical music will have its due predominance on the programs, however, and will include Mahler's sixth and Bruckner's fourth symphonies, Beethoven's Ninth, Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and other more familiar masterpieces. A Brahms festival will be given next spring to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

It is Dr. Koussevitzky's belief that, while Vienna may still retain "the world's most wonderful atmosphere for music," America is assuming the world's leadership in the present phase of musical history. "No country in the world," he said, "is making so great an effort toward education in music.

"The interest in orchestral music in this country is so great that it remains in spite of every interference. Music in America is not something superficial," he continued, denying that there is any ground for the extensive popular belief that musical appreciation in this country lacks the depth of Europe's appreciation for the art.

"The groundwork has been so well prepared that music is absolutely a necessity here."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 9 - 1932

Boston Symphony

In a veritable blaze of glory and before a capacity house the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 53d ~~season in~~ Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday afternoon, the vast audience cheering to the echo, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its inspiring and magnetic conductor, and his men.

Glad news it is to Buffalo music lovers that the famous orchestra and its conductor will play in Buffalo on Monday night, October 24th, giving a concert in Elmwood Music Hall under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, which for several years has made the Boston Orchestra the opening attraction of its season. The only exception was the orchestra's jubilee year, when a Beethoven week in Washington took the place of its customary Mid-Western tour. Dr. Koussevitzky, who spent the summer abroad and dicided his time between rest in his beloved mountains and a quest for new and vital scores, has brought back a wealth of interesting material, which will be included in the orchestra's repertoire, music new and old, expressive of the spirit and taste of the time.

The program he is preparing for Buffalo will be one of the most brilliant and interesting in the long list of memorable programs the Boston Orchestra has given Buffalo in the many years that its visit has been one of the high lights of the city's musical season.

Coming by special train, with its full force of 110 virtuosi, the orchestra will open its Mid-Western tour in Buffalo. A week on tour and the orchestra will confine its travel for the rest of the season to New York, where its series is completely sold out with a long waiting list, and a few cities in the East.

Mail orders for seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be sent now to the office of the Musical Foundation, Denton, Cottier & Daniels. The Foundation makeup of attractions for the rest of the season will be announced shortly, but season subscribers are assured of their regular seats for the Boston Orchestra. These will be filled in advance of the public sale.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 9 - 1932

America Leading World in Music

THAT America, so often compared unfavorably with Europe by critics in every field of art, is now assuming the leadership of the world in music, was the opinion expressed by Director Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra on his recent return from a summer of study, observation, and rest in Europe. Koussevitsky brings his orchestra to Columbus on October 27, for the first concert in the season of the Symphony club of central Ohio.

"Although Vienna," he says, "may still retain the world's most wonderful atmosphere for music, America has moved to the front as a musical nation." Koussevitsky denied that musical appreciation in this country is more superficial than that found in western Europe. "No country in the world," he continued, "is making so great an effort toward education in music. The groundwork has been so well prepared that music is absolutely a necessity here."

Although a fair place will be accorded the moderns, the classics will not be neglected. Mahler's Sixth Symphony and Bruckner's Fourth Symphony will be played, together with the Beethoven Ninth, Berliozs' "Damnation of Faust," and other familiar works.

In asking his public to support another season of symphony concerts, Koussevitsky does not offer art as a luxury to be maintained in spite of depression. He considers good music as one of the real necessities of life.

The program for the Columbus concert by the Boston orchestra has not yet been announced. Tickets are available from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 9 - 1932

Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ will present Bruckner's Fourth symphony in Boston this week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has not performed this work since 1899, when Wilhelm Gericke directed it. The program will also include Strauss's "Don Juan" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

At the third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony in Boston, John Alden Carpenter will be the soloist, playing the piano part in his new suite for piano and orchestra, which will have its first performance at this time. Carpenter intended this music for the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary season, but was unable to complete it in time. His "Skyscrapers" will also be played on this program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

OCT 1 1 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER PRAISES HOUSTON PROGRAM

A visit with Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was one of the highlights of the summer European trip enjoyed by Dr. Joseph A. Mullen, president of the Houston Symphony Orchestra Association, and Mrs. Mullen.

The interview occurred during their homeward trip aboard the Ile de France. "Mr. Koussevitsky was graciousness itself and expressed himself as intensely interested in the Houston Symphony situation as I outlined it to him," said Doctor Mullen. "When I told him that we had supplied Houstonians with symphonic music of high order at 50 and 85 cents a seat and completed the season with a deficit of only $292, he was astounded."

Koussevitsky was very interested in the future of the local organization, and when Doctor Mullen submitted this season's programs to him, he declared them excellent. He said that they indicated the director had in mind a gradual development of the musical possibilities of the orchestra which would culminate in programs that would do credit to any such organization.

There were a number of Boston and New York Symphony Orchestra men on the boat, Doctor Mullen said, as was Grace Moore, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company and of movie fame.

In Paris, Doctor and Mrs. Mullen met an old friend, Isadore de Lara, composer of the opera "Messalina," who spoke very highly of the ability of the new Houston Symphony conductor, Frank St. Leger, whom he had known in London.

In New York, Doctor and Mrs. Mullen visited with their son, Joseph Mullen, Jr., and his wife. The younger Mullen is quite a well-known artist and is doing some very interesting stage settings for a Baltimore theatre at present. In their apartment, the Houstonians met a number of celebrities of the New York stage and screen, among them Rose Hobart, who is being married Sunday to an old friend of the Mullens, William R. Grosvenor.

Doctor Mullen announced during the interview that Harry R. Bourne has been engaged as manager for the orchestra this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 1 6 1932

SYMPHONY LECTURES BY DR. CHAPMAN

Dr. W. Louis Chapman will again lecture this season on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Through the courtesy of the Providence Public Library, as in previous years, the lectures will be given in the children's room of the library on the Sunday prior to each concert, and are under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. They will be illustrated by music and are free to the public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 1 4 1932

WORDS AND MUSIC

by R.L.F. McCOMBS

THE manifold excellences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the romantic eloquence of its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, have become familiar to Columbus concert-goers in the seasons that the famous organization has paused here at the behest of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

The limpid smoothness and the singing sonority which the orchestra has achieved under his baton as well as the vividness of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting, the catholicity of his programs and the charm of his presence are twice-told tales.

The solitary items of news that remain for this season's announcements are concerned then with the program in prospect for Oct. 27 at Memorial Hall. Long distance conferences on the matter between Mrs. B. G. Huntington, president of the Symphony Club, and the Boston management were concluded this week.

The resulting program lists these four composers and works:

Suite	Corelli
Sarabande; Gigue; Badinerie
Two Nocturnes	Debussy
Nuages; Fetes
Don Juan, Tone Poem, Op. 20	Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 5, E minor, Op. 64	Tchaikowsky

Mr. Koussevitzky's readings of Tchaikowsky are internationally famous. In 1912 he organized a Tchaikowsky festival in Moscow at which time modest Tchaikowsky said, "So long as Koussevitzky performs my brother's composition, the music of Tchaikowsky will live."

In the early days of the century it was the fashion for the young modernist circle to scoff at the great Russian symphonist of the 70's and 80's, and Koussevitzky, himself of the inner circle of modernists, undertook to champion the elder composer.

His interpretations have undergone an evolution in the 30 years of his conducting. Of late years they have grown away from the emotional aspect on which they were once based. He conceals the morbidity with which the unhappy composer's work is infused and brings out with consummate force the tonal splendor, the songfulness, the masterly form of the symphonies.

Tickets for the symphony series, this year made up of the impending concert by the Bostonians and one in January by the Chicago Symphony, are available from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue, at Mrs. Eugene Gray's shop and at the Sarah E. Pye shop, 11 S. Fourth street. The box office at the Carl Koch Company, Third and Broad streets, will open next Wednesday.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 1 4 1932

Suite	Corelli
Sarabande, Geigue, Badinerie.
Two Nocturnes	Debussy
Nuages.
Fetes.
"Don Juan," tone poem, Op. 20 (After Lenau)	Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Op. 64.	Tschaikowsky
Andante.
Andante Cantabile, con alcuma licenza.
Valse (Allegro Moderato).
Finale—Andante Maesoso, Allegro vivave.

The Boston Symphony orchestra program for Columbus is announced today by Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. As given above, it will be heard Thursday evening, Oct. 27, when this orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, makes its third Columbus appearance under auspices of the Symphony club.

Indeed, it is surprising to reflect that only one other appearance of this famous orchestra was ever enjoyed by Columbus, and that one is older than the memory of many of the present concert-goers here. About 20 years ago, when the orchestra was led by Dr. Muck, it was heard here in a memorial program for Mr. C. Christian Born.

In its two concerts of recent years, the orchestra, and particularly its gifted conductor, have endeared themselves to local music lovers so greatly that when a choice had to be made this fall from among all the available orchestras there was no doubt in the minds of the Symphony club officers that the Boston must be one of the two to be heard.

The concert marks the opening of the club's ninth season in Columbus. The program will begin at 8:15, and an intermission of 10 minutes will precede the playing of the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SUN

A Puzzle

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, passed through New York the other day on his return from Europe. The famous conductor brought with him several new scores and symphonic works for performance by his orchestra this season, and to reporters made a number of statements complimentary to American music and its composers.

Of course, Mr. Koussevitzky, being an orchestra man, had this to say to a New York Herald-Tribune reporter, concerning his favorite medium of musical expression. "The United States has the world's best orchestras. Take care of them," he advised, "they are among America's greatest achievements in its art." Every effort, he added, should be made to keep them going during these hard times.

Very well said, Mr. Koussevitzky, but how, "during these hard times" when no one is spending any money?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 1 5 193

Boston Symphony To Include Modern And Classic Music

Serge Koussevitzky Arranges Varied Program for Oct. 24 Concert.

OPENING with a Corelli suite, and closing with the Brahms first symphony in C Minor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will play a superb program for the Buffalo concert Monday night, Oct. 24, in Elmwood Music hall.

Announcement that the Boston Symphony's concert here will bring both modern and classic music to Buffalo music-lovers, was made yesterday by Marian de Forest, secretary-manager of the Buffalo Musical foundation under whose auspices the Boston Symphony orchestra will appear here. The varied program which Director Koussevitzky has prepared for the first concert of his orchestra's winter season, is a taxing one, which, for sheer musical beauty and variety would be difficult to duplicate, Miss de Forest said.

Brahms who was only 22 years old when he began the Symphony in C Minor, on frequent occasions said it was no laughing matter to write a symphony after Beethoven.

The movements of the Symphony follow:

Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky gave its first season concert in Symphony hall, in Boston, on Oct. 7. The conductor was greeted heartily by an audience which rose to its feet and applauded.

This is Dr. Koussevitzky's ninth consecutive season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 1 5 1932

Symphony

Boston Orchestra Plays in Artist Series Here Oct. 26

The program for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Cincinnati Oct. 26 in Music Hall, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was announced Saturday by J. Herman Thuman, who is presenting this concert as the second of his Artist Series this season.

This is the first time in 24 years that the Boston Orchestra has appeared in Cincinnati, the last concert being given here on Jan. 31, 1908, in Music Hall, under conductorship of Dr. Karl Muck. The premier concert here was in 1887, with Wilhelm Gericke conducting, six years after the orchestra was formed. The same conductor brought the orchestra to the Odeon in 1889.

Three visits were made in the regime of Arthur Nikisch in 1890, 1891 and 1892. There was a concert led by Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster and assistant conductor, in 1893. This orchestra did not return until 1907, when Dr. Muck was conductor. The appearance in 1908, mentioned above, completes the list of past concerts in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Many out-of-town music lovers are coming to Cincinnati Oct. 26 to join Cincinnatians at Music Hall that evening at 8:15 o'clock to hear the Boston artists in the following program:

Prokofieff: "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25
Debussy: Two Nocturnes
a. "Nauges"
b. "Fetes"
Ravel:
"Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet: Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
"Lover du Jour"—Pantomime—Danse Generale
Intermission
Brahms:
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68.

* * *

THE SECOND symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

16 1932

MUSIC

By MARY B. SWAN.

Boston Symphony

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given at the Elmwood Music Hall on Monday evening, October 24th, will begin tomorrow morning at the boxoffice in Denton, Cottier & Daniels, Miss Marion de Forest, secretary-manager of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, under whose auspices the orchestra is being brought to Buffalo, announced yesterday.

Music lovers who wish to attend the first symphony concert given in Buffalo this season by one of the most outstanding orchestras of the world, are urged to reserve their seats as soon as possible. A brilliant and varied program, rich in both modern and classic music, has been prepared for the opening concert of his orchestra's winter tour, by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. A musical novelty, a Corelli suite, will open the program, which will include Brahm's first symphony in C minor, Miss de Forest announces.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now more than a half century old, began as one man's dream, which 30 years after a young Bostonian student in Europe, listened to excellent music in Vienna and Berlin, became a reality. The young man who dreamed that the people of his home city, Boston, might some day have a good orchestra, was Henry L. Higginson. When he made a fortune, he brought together the best musicians he could find in Europe and America for a permanent orchestra. At first the Boston Symphony had 60 men, and Georg Henschel, was leader.

In 1924, Serge Koussevitzky became conductor of the orchestra. He came to Boston with a magnificent reputation. He had given a new impetus to music in Russia and had electrified Western Europe with his Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris and by his guest appearances in other cities.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 1 6 1932

SERGE KOSSEVITZKY, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra coming soon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 1 6 1932

The third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's present season under Serge Koussevitzky includes Weber's overture to "Oberon," Franck's symphony in D minor, John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" ballet, and a first performance of his "Patterns" for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Carpenter as soloist. The performance will be given Friday in Boston. Harriet Cohen, London pianist, will play the piano part of a new Arnold Bax concerto with the orchestra next month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 1 7 1932

First on Tour

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct that body in Elmwood Music Hall Monday evening, October 24th. Playing what has been called the ugly duckling of instruments at many concerts both here and in Europe, has won for Dr. Koussevitzky a fame as a double bass virtuoso that is comparable to that achieved by him as an orchestra leader, according to Miss Marian de Forest, secretary-manager of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. In 1924 he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his appearance in this city next Monday evening will be the first during this season's tour. On October 7th the orchestra opened its season with a concert in its home

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 9 - 1932

Serge Koussevitzky will present
Bruckner's Fourth symphony i ton this week with th phony Orches formed this Wilhelm Geri program will
"Don Juan" to
"Die Meistersinger."

ational

At the third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony in Boston, John Alden Carpenter will be the soloist, playing the piano part in his new suite for piano and orchestra, which will have its first performance at this time. Carpenter intended this music for the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary season, but was unable to complete it in time. His "Skyscrapers" will also be played on this program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

OCT 1 1 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER PRAISES HOUSTON PROGRAM

A visit with Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was one of the highlights of the summer European trip enjoyed by Dr. Joseph A. Mullen, president of the Houston Symphony Orchestra Association, and Mrs. Mullen.

The interview occurred during their homeward trip aboard the Ile de France. "Mr. Koussevitsky was graciousness itself and expressed himself as intensely interested in the Houston Symphony situation as I outlined it to him," said Doctor Mullen. "When I told him that we had supplied Houstonians with symphonic music of high order at 50 and 85 cents a seat and completed the season with a deficit of only $292, he was astounded."

Koussevitsky was very interested in the future of the local organization, and when Doctor Mullen submitted this season's programs to him, he declared them excellent. He said that they indicated the director had in mind a gradual development of the musical possibilities of the orchestra which would culminate in programs that would do credit to any such organization.

There were a number of Boston and New York Symphony Orchestra men on the boat, Doctor Mullen said, as was Grace Moore, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company and of movie fame.

In Paris, Doctor and Mrs. Mullen met an old friend, Isadore de Lara, composer of the opera "Messalina," who spoke very highly of the ability of the new Houston Symphony conductor, Frank St. Leger, whom he had known in London.

In New York, Doctor and Mrs. Mullen visited with their son, Joseph Mullen, Jr., and his wife. The younger Mullen is quite a well-known artist and is doing some very interesting stage settings for a Baltimore theatre at present. In their apartment, the Houstonians met a number of celebrities of the New York stage and screen, among them Rose Hobart, who is being married Sunday to an old friend of the Mullens, William R. Grosvenor.

Doctor Mullen announced during the interview that Harry R. Bourne has been engaged as manager for the orchestra this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 1 6 1932

SYMPHONY LECTURES
BY DR. CHAPMAN

Dr. W. Louis Chapman will again lecture this season on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Through the courtesy of the Providence Public Library, as in previous years, the lectures will be given in the children's room of the library on the Sunday prior to each concert, and are under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. They will be illustrated by music and are free to the public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 1 4 1932

xcellences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the romantic eloquence of its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, have become familiar to Columbus concert-goers in the seasons that the famous organization has paused here at the behest of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

The limpid smoothness and the singing sonority which the orchestra has achieved under his baton as well as the vividness of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting, the catholicity of his programs and the charm of his presence are twice-told tales.

The solitary items of news that remain for this season's announcements are concerned then with the program in prospect for Oct. 27 at Memorial Hall. Long distance conferences on the matter between Mrs. B. G. Huntington, president of the Symphony Club, and the Boston management were concluded this week.

The resulting program lists these four composers and works:

Suite .... Corelli
Sarabande; Gigue; Badinerie
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
Nuages; Fetes
Don Juan, Tone Poem, Op. 20 .... Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 5, E minor, Op. 64 .... Tchaikowsky

Mr. Koussevitzky's readings of Tchaikowsky are internationally famous. In 1912 he organized a Tchaikowsky festival in Moscow at which time modest Tchaikowsky said, "So long as Koussevitzky performs my brother's composition, the music of Tchaikowsky will live."

In the early days of the century it was the fashion for the young modernist circle to scoff at the great Russian symphonist of the 70's and 80's, and Koussevitzky, himself of the inner circle of modernists, undertook to champion the elder composer.

His interpretations have undergone an evolution in the 30 years of his conducting. Of late years they have grown away from the emotional aspect on which they were once based. He conceals the morbidity with which the unhappy composer's work is infused and brings out with consummate force the tonal splendor, the songfulness, the masterly form of the symphonies.

Tickets for the symphony series, this year made up of the impending concert by the Bostonians and one in January by the Chicago Symphony, are available from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue, at Mrs. Eugene Gray's shop and at the Sarah E. Pye shop, 11 S. Fourth street. The box office at the Carl Koch Company, Third and Broad streets, will open next Wednesday.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN

OCT 1 [illegible] 193

A Puzzle

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, passed through New York the other day on his return from Europe. The famous conductor brought with him several new scores and symphonic works for performance by his orchestra this season, and to reporters made a number of statements complimentary to American music and its composers.

Of course, Mr. Koussevitzky, being an orchestra man, had this to say to a New York Herald-Tribune reporter, concerning his favorite medium of musical expression. "The United States has the world's best orchestras. Take care of them," he advised, "they are among America's greatest achievements in its art." Every effort, he added, should be made to keep them going during these hard times.

Very well said, Mr. Koussevitzky, but how, "during these hard times" when no one is spending any money?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 1 4 1932

Boston Symphony Sets Its Program

Suite .... Corelli
Sarabande, Geigue, Badinerie.
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
Nuages.
Fetes.
"Don Juan," tone poem, Op. 20
(After Lenau) .... Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Op. 64.
.... Tschaikowsky
Andante.
Andante Cantabile, con alcuma licenza.
Valse (Allegro Moderato).
Finale—Andante Maesoso, Allegro vivave.

The Boston Symphony orchestra program for Columbus is announced today by Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. As given above, it will be heard Thursday evening, Oct. 27, when this orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, makes its third Columbus appearance under auspices of the Symphony club.

Indeed, it is surprising to reflect that only one other appearance of this famous orchestra was ever enjoyed by Columbus, and that one is older than the memory of many of the present concert-goers here. About 20 years ago, when the orchestra was led by Dr. Muck, it was heard here in a memorial program for Mr. C. Christian Born.

In its two concerts of recent years, the orchestra, and particularly its gifted conductor, have endeared themselves to local music lovers so greatly that when a choice had to be made this fall from among all the available orchestras there was no doubt in the minds of the Symphony club officers that the Boston must be one of the two to be heard.

The concert marks the opening of the club's ninth season in Columbus. The program will begin at 8:15, and an intermission of 10 minutes will precede the playing of the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 15 193

Boston Symphony To Include Modern And Classic Music

Serge Koussevitzky Arranges Varied Program for Oct. 24 Concert.

OPENING with a Corelli suite, and closing with the Brahms first symphony in C Minor, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will play a superb program for the Buffalo concert Monday night, Oct. 24, in Elmwood Music hall.

Announcement that the Boston Symphony's concert here will bring both modern and classic music to Buffalo music-lovers, was made yesterday by Marian de Forest, secretary-manager of the Buffalo Musical foundation under whose auspices the Boston Symphony orchestra will appear here. The varied program which Director Koussevitzky has prepared for the first concert of his orchestra's winter season, is a taxing one, which, for sheer musical beauty and variety would be difficult to duplicate, Miss de Forest said.

Brahms who was only 22 years old when he began the Symphony in C Minor, on frequent occasions said it was no laughing matter to write a symphony after Beethoven.

The movements of the Symphony follow:
Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma non brio.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky gave its first season concert in Symphony hall, in Boston, on Oct. 7. The conductor was greeted heartily by an audience which rose to its feet and applauded.

This is Dr. Koussevitzky's ninth consecutive season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 15 1932

Visiting Symphony

Boston Orchestra Plays in Artist Series Here Oct. 26

The program for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Cincinnati Oct. 26 in Music Hall, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was announced Saturday by J. Herman Thuman, who is presenting this concert as the second of his Artist Series this season.

This is the first time in 24 years that the Boston Orchestra has appeared in Cincinnati, the last concert being given here on Jan. 31, 1908, in Music Hall, under conductorship of Dr. Karl Muck. The premier concert here was in 1887, with Wilhelm Gericke conducting, six years after the orchestra was formed. The same conductor brought the orchestra to the Odeon in 1889.

Three visits were made in the regime of Arthur Nikisch in 1890, 1891 and 1892. There was a concert led by Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster and assistant conductor, in 1893. This orchestra did not return until 1907, when Dr. Muck was conductor. The appearance in 1908, mentioned above, completes the list of past concerts in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Many out-of-town music lovers are coming to Cincinnati Oct. 26 to join Cincinnatians at Music Hall that evening at 8:15 o'clock to hear the Boston artists in the following program:

Prokofieff: "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25
Debussy: Two Nocturnes
a. "Nauges"
b. "Fetes"
Ravel:
"Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet: Orchestral. Excerpts (Second Suite)
"Lover du Jour"—Pantomime—Danse Generale
Intermission
Brahms:
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68.

* * *

THE SECOND symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

16 1932

MUSIC

By MARY B. SWAN.

Boston Symphony

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given at the Elmwood Music Hall on Monday evening, October 24th, will begin tomorrow morning at the boxoffice in Denton, Cottier & Daniels, Miss Marion de Forest, secretary-manager of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, under whose auspices the orchestra is being brought to Buffalo, announced yesterday.

Music lovers who wish to attend the first symphony concert given in Buffalo this season by one of the most outstanding orchestras of the world, are urged to reserve their seats as soon as possible. A brilliant and varied program, rich in both modern and classic music, has been prepared for the opening concert of his orchestra's winter tour, by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. A musical novelty, a Corelli suite, will open the program, which will include Brahm's first symphony in C minor, Miss de Forest announces.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now more than a half century old, began as one man's dream, which 30 years after a young Bostonian student in Europe, listened to excellent music in Vienna and Berlin, became a reality. The young man who dreamed that the people of his home city, Boston, might some day have a good orchestra, was Henry L. Higginson. When he made a fortune, he brought together the best musicians he could find in Europe and America for a permanent orchestra. At first the Boston Symphony had 60 men, and Georg Henschel, was leader.

In 1924, Serge Koussevitzky became conductor of the orchestra. He came to Boston with a magnificient reputation. He had given a new impetus to music in Russia and had electrified Western Europe with his Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris and by his guest appearances in other cities.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 1 6 1932

SERGE KOSSEVITZKY, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra coming soon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 1 6 1932

The third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's present season under Serge Koussevitzky includes Weber's overture to "Oberon," Franck's symphony in D minor, John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" ballet, and a first performance of his "Patterns" for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Carpenter as soloist. The performance will be given Friday in Boston. Harriet Cohen, London pianist, will play the piano part of a new Arnold Bax concerto with the orchestra next month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 1 7 1932

First on Tour

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct that body in Elmwood Music Hall Monday evening, October 24th. Playing what has been called the ugly duckling of instruments at many concerts both here and in Europe, has won for Dr. Koussevitzky a fame as a double bass virtuoso that is comparable to that achieved by him as an orchestra leader, according to Miss Marian de Forest, secretary-manager of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. In 1924 he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his appearance in this city next Monday evening will be the first during this season's tour. On October 7th the orchestra opened its season with a concert in its home

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 17 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE OCT. 24

Only One Concert by Visiting Orchestra on Buffalo's Program This Year.

Buffalo's symphony season this fall will consist of one concert by a visiting orchestra, the Boston Symphony under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, which will be heard in Elmwood Music hall Monday evening, Oct. 24, under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

It will be Buffalo's only opportunity this year to hear a visiting symphony orchestra. This one visit will replace the foundation's usual fall series, it was announced Monday by Miss Marian de Forest, secretary-manager.

Sale of tickets for next Monday evening's concert began Monday at the box office of Denton, Cottier & Daniels, Pearl and Court streets.

A brilliant program, which includes Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," as well as an unusual Corelli suite, and Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor," has been prepared by Dr. Koussevitzky for the Buffalo appearance.

"The Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, first was played at a concert of the National Society of Music in Paris, on Dec. 23, 1894.

The first performance in the United States took place in Boston, at a concert of the Boston Orchestral club, in April, 1902.

The poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," was written by Stephen Mallarme, and it was after this poem that Debussy wrote his brilliant musical composition. "The Afternoon of a Faun" is scored for three flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two harps, small antique cymbals and strings.

Corelli, the composer of the suite with which the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its concert here, was a violinist, conductor and teacher. Little was known about him until he went to Rome in 1671 and became a member of the Capranica Theater orchestra. He reached great fame as a violinist. As a composer, his style was distinguished by breadth, emotion and nobility.

The suite which the Boston Symphony orchestra will play is composed of three movements: "Sarabande, Gigue and Badineri."

A composition by Strauss also will be included in the Boston Symphony concert, Miss de Forest said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 17 1932

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WILL PLAY IN CITY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the only out-of-town orchestra to appear here this season, will be heard in the Elmwood Music hall Monday evening, Oct. 24.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

The orchestral program includes Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, a Corelli Suite and Brahm's symphony No. 1, in C Minor, all prepared by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Tickets for the concert may be purchased at the box office of Denton, Cottier & Daniels, Pearl and Court streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 19 1932

Harriet Cohen, London pianist, will play the piano part of a new Concerto by Arnold Bax, English composer, with the Boston Symphony orchestra at one of the concerts next month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 19 1932

Koussevitzky's Ovation Still Echoes

◇ ◇ ◇

Orchestra Under New Leadership at Arabian--Gowns Cited

By H. E. Cherrington

WITH the rather tumultuous applause of the Boston multitude for its musical hero, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, still ringing in his ears, and the symphony season there only well under way, the revered conductor and his organization of 110 musicians will leave for Columbus next week to fulfill an engagement with the Symphony club of central Ohio. They will play Thursday evening, Oct. 27, in Memorial hall, the opening concert in the local club's ninth season.

The Christian Science Monitor says of the opening concert's ovation: "At a time when so many musical institutions seem to be crumbling, and when Mr. Bodanzky apprehends that soon we may all be sitting in trees, there is something very reassuring in seeing this orchestra starting as usual upon its new season with unlowered standards and with plans for a festival next spring in honor of the Brahms centennial. As Mr. Coolidge might have said: 'The Boston orchestra—there she stands!'"

Tickets at greatly reduced prices are available at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, and from Mrs. Eugene Gray's and Sarah E. Pye's shops.

Season tickets include admission to the concert in January by the Chicago Symphony orchestra under Dr. Frederick A. Stock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON JOURNAL

OCT 19 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT ANN ARBOR

Many Battle Creek music lovers and musicians will take advantage of the opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Ann Arbor next Tuesday. The full complement will be present and the famous conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who was called from Russia in 1924, will present the following program:

"Classical" Symphony Op. 25 Prokofieff
  I. Allegro
  II. Larghetto
  III. Gavotte
  IV. Finale
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
  Nuages
  Fetes
Tone Poem "Don Juan" Op. 20 (after Lenau) .... Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64 .... Tchaikovsky
  I. Andante
  II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
  III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
  IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace

This orchestra, now in its fifty-second year, at first numbered 70 players, but has grown until at the present time there are 110 on the roster. The orchestra has visited Ann Arbor many times and is always given a royal reception. Owing to its heavy series of concerts in its home city, the Boston Symphony Orchestra finds little opportunity for tours. The only cities hearing it this season are Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 19 1932

Boston Programs.

Further proof of Mr. Koussevitzky's desire to give American musicians a hearing will be furnished at the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in the appearance of John Alden Carpenter as guest composer and pianist. He will play the piano passages in his new suite for that instrument and orchestra, originally designed for presentation during the orchestra's anniversary year. In addition his ballet "Skyscrapers" will be heard. Sharp contrast with these pieces will undoubtedly be Cesar Franck's Symphony. Weber's Overture to "Oberon" will round out the programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

on Numbers Lister for Concert Oct. 25

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra has just forwarded copy for revised program which will be given by the 110 players in his organization, in the opening Choral Union concert Tuesday evening, Oct. 25, in Hill auditorium, as follows:

"Classical" Symphony...Prokofieff
  I. Allegro
  II. Larghetto
  III. Gavotte
  IV. Finale.
Two Nocturnes..........Debussy
  Nuages
  Fetes
Tone poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20 (after Lenau) ....Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64 .... Tchaikovsky
  I. Andante
  II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
  III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
  IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace

These numbers constitute a program of unusual musical interest. The following analytical notes from the official programs for the orchestra in its home concerts, will be of interest.

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25.. .... Prokofieff

This Symphony, begun in 1916, was completed in 1917. The first performance was at Leningrad by the orchestra now known as the State orchestra. The first performance in the United States was at a concert of the Russian Symphony orchestra in New York. In December, 1918.

The symphony, scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, and strings is dedicated to Boris Assafieff, who, as "Igor Gleboff" has written much about music. "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores" (Felix Bororwski).

1. Allegro, D major, 4-4 time. The chief theme is given to first violins. A transitional passage has material for the flutes. Development follows. The second theme is for first violins. Development follows. The second theme is for first violins. The development begins with use of the first subject. The transitional measures are taken up, later the second theme. The recapitulation opens in C major (strings). Then follows the transitional passage (D major) for the flute. The second theme is again for the strings. There is a short coda.

II. Larghetto, A major, 2-2 time. First violins announce the chief theme. There are episodes.

III. Gavotta, Non troppo allegro, D major, 4-4 time. The subject is given at once to strings and woodwind. The trio is in G major (flutes and clarinets above an organ point for violincellos and double basses). This subject is repeated by the strings.

IV. Finale, Molto vivace, D major, 2-2 time. The first theme is for the strings; the second, A major, for wood-wind.

III. Gavotta, Non troppo allegro, D major, 4-4 time. Johann Mathewson in 1737 considered the "gavotta," as sung by a solo voice or by a chorus played on the harpsichord, violin, etc., and danced: "The effect is most exultant joy. Hopping, not running, is a peculiarity of this species of melody, French and Italian composers write a kind of gavotta for the violin that often fills whole pages with their degressions and deviations. If a foreign fiddler can excite wonder by his speed alone, he puts it before everything. The gavotta with great liberties is also composed for the harpsichord, but is not so bad as those for the fiddle."

The gavotte was originally a peasant dance. It takes its name from Gap in Dauphine: the inhabitants of Gap are called "gavots." The dance "was introduced at court in the sixteenth century, when, to amuse the Royal circle, entertainments were given consisting of dances in national costume, performed by natives of the various provinces, and to the sound of appropriate instruments." It was originally a sort of branle. The dancers were in line or in a circle; after some steps made together a couple separated, danced alone, and embraced; then the women kissed at the courts of the gavotte was not then the dignified, pompous and chaste dance of the eighteenth century, with slow and measured postures and low bows and curtsies.' At the balls of Louis XIV. and XV. the gavotte was preceded by a menuet, composed of the first repetition of the menuet de la cour and danced by one couple; and some say that the menuet itself was preceded by the offer of a bouquet and a rewardng kiss. The best and most minute description of the court gavotte, with all its steps, is in Desrat's "Dictionnaire de la Danse."

Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
  Nuages
  Fetes

The Nocturnes by Debussy are three in number. The first two, "Nuages" and "Fetes" were produced at a Lamoureux concert, C. Chevillard conductor, Paris, Dec. 9, 1900, and they were played by the same orchestra Jan. 6, 1901. The third, "Sirenes" was first produced in company with the other two, at a Lamoureaux concert, Oct. 27, 1901. The third is for orchestra with chorus and female voices. At this last concert the friends of Debussy were so exuberant in manifestations of delight that there was sharp hissing as a corrective. The nocturnes were composed in 1898, and published in 1899.

The first performance of the three Nocturnes in the United States was at a Chickering "Production" Concert in Boston, Feb. 10, 1904, when Mr. Lang conducted. The Nocturnes were played twice at this concert. Nocturnes Nos. 1 and 2 were played by the Boston Syphony orchestra, led by Vincent d'Indy as guest, at Philadelphia, Dec. 4, 1905, Washington, D. C., Dec. 5, 1905, New York, Dec. 9, 1905. The three were played at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston Dec. 12, 1908. Mr. Fiedler conducted, and the Choral Union of the New England Conservatory of Music sang the vocal parts in the third Nocturne.

Tone poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20 (after Lenau) ....Strauss

Don Juan, composed at Munich 1887-88 is known as the first of Strauss' symphonic or tone poems, but "Macbeth," Op. 23, was composed at Munich 1886-87 (revised in 1890 at Weimar) and published later (1891). Don Juan was published in 1890. The first performance of Don Juan was at the second subscription concert of the Grand Ducal Court orchestra of Weimar in the fall 1889. The Signale No. 67 (November, 1889) stated that the tone poem was performed under the direction of the composer, and was received with great applause. The first performance in Boston was at a Symphony concert, led by Mr. Nikisch, Oct. 31, 1891.

Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64 .... Tchaikovsky

Tchaikovsky, about the end of April, 1888, took possession of a country house at Frolovskoe, which had been prepared for him, while he was at Paris and London, by his servant Alexis. Frolovskoe is a picturesque place on a wooded hill on the way from Moscow to Klin. The house was simple. "Here he (Tchaikovsky) could be alone, to enjoy the little garden. The German name is said to find its derivation in an old proverb: "Man sees his own faults as little as a moneky or an owl recognizes his ugliness in looking into a mirror.

When Dr. Franz Wullner, who conducted the firts performance at Cologne, asked the composer for an explanatory program of the poetical intent of the piece, Strauss replied: "It is impossible for me to furnish a program to "Eulenspiegel" were I to put into words the thoughts which its several incidents suggested to me, they would seldom suffice, and might even give rise to offence. Let me leave it, therefore, to my hearers to crack the hard nut which the Rogue has prepared for them. By way of helping them to a better understanding, it seeems sufficient to point out the two "Eulenspiegel" motives, which, in the most manifold disguises, moods, and stituations, pervade the whole up to the catastrophe, when after he has been condemned to death, Till is strung up to the gibget. For the rest, let them guess at the musical joke which a Rogue has offered them. Strauss indicated in notation three motives, the opening theme of the introduction, the horn theme that follows almost immediately, and the descending interval expressive of condemnation and the scaffold.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 17 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE OCT. 24

Only One Concert by Visiting Orchestra on Buffalo's Program This Year.

Buffalo's symphony season this fall will consist of one concert by a visiting orchestra, the Boston Symphony under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, which will be heard in Elmwood Music hall Monday evening, Oct 24, under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

It will be Buffalo's only opportunity this year to hear a visiting symphony orchestra. This one visit will replace the foundation's usual fall series, it was announced Monday by Miss Marian de Forest, secretary-manager.

Sale of tickets for next Monday evening's concert began Monday at the box office of Denton, Cottier & Daniels, Pearl and Court streets.

A brilliant program, which includes Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," as well as an unusual Corelli suite, and Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor," has been prepared by Dr. Koussevitzky for the Buffalo appearance.

"The Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, first was played at a concert of the National Society of Music in Paris, on Dec. 23, 1894.

The first performance in the United States took place in Boston, at a concert of the Boston Orchestral club, in April, 1902.

The poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," was written by Stephen Mallarme, and it was after this poem that Debussy wrote his brilliant musical composition. "The Afternoon of a Faun" is scored for three flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two harps, small antique cymbals and strings.

Corelli, the composer of the suite with which the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its concert here, was a violinist, conductor and teacher. Little was known about him until he went to Rome in 1671 and became a member of the Capranica Theater orchestra. He reached great fame as a violinist. As a composer, his style was distinguished by breadth, emotion and nobility.

The suite which the Boston Symphony orchestra will play is composed of three movements: "Sarabande, Gigue and Badineri."

A composition by Strauss also will be included in the Boston Symphony concert, Miss de Forest said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 17 1932

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WILL PLAY IN CITY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge K[illegible]itzky, the only out-of-town orchestra to appear here this season, will be heard in the Elmwood Music hall Monday evening, Oct. 24.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

The orchestral program includes Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, a Corelli Suite and Brahm's symphony No. 1, in C Minor, all prepared by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Tickets for the concert may be purchased at the box office of Denton, Cottier & Daniels, Pearl and Court streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 19 1932

Harriet Cohen, London pianist, will play the piano part of a new Concerto by Arnold Bax, English composer, with the Boston Symphony orchestra at one of the concerts next month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 19 1932

K

Orc

By H. E. Cherrington

WITH the rather tumultuous applause of the Boston multitude for its musical hero, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, still ringing in his ears, and the symphony season there only well under way, the revered conductor and his organization of 110 musicians will leave for Columbus next week to fulfill an engagement with the Symphony club of central Ohio. They will play Thursday evening, Oct. 27, in Memorial hall, the opening concert in the local club's ninth season.

The Christian Science Monitor says of the opening concert's ovation: "At a time when so many musical institutions seem to be crumbling, and when Mr. Bodanzky apprehends that soon we may all be sitting in trees, there is something very reassuring in seeing this orchestra starting as usual upon its new season with unlowered standards and with plans for a festival next spring in honor of the Brahms centennial. As Mr. Coolidge might have said: 'The Boston orchestra—there she stands!'"

Tickets at greatly reduced prices are available at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, and from Mrs. Eugene Gray's and Sarah E. Pye's shops.

Season tickets include admission to the concert in January by the Chicago Symphony orchestra under Dr. Frederick A. Stock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON JOURNAL

OCT 19 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT ANN ARBOR

Many Battle Creek music lovers and musicians will take advantage of the opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Ann Arbor next Tuesday. The full complement will be present and the famous conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who was called from Russia in 1924, will present the following program:

"Classical" Symphony Op. 25
Prokofieff
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
Nuages
Fetes
Tone Poem "Don Juan" Op. 20
(after Lenau) .... Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64 .... Tchaikovsky
I. Andante
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace

This orchestra, now in its fifty-second year, at first numbered 70 players, but has grown until at the present time there are 110 on the roster. The orchestra has visited Ann Arbor many times and is always given a royal reception. Owing to its heavy series of concerts in its home city, the Boston Symphony Orchestra finds little opportunity for tours. The only cities hearing it this season are Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 19 1932

Boston Programs.

Further proof of Mr. Koussevitzky's desire to give American musicians a hearing will be furnished at the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in the appearance of John Alden Carpenter as guest composer and pianist. He will play the piano passages in his new suite for that instrument and orchestra, originally designed for presentation during the orchestra's anniversary year. In addition his ballet "Skyscrapers" will be heard. Sharp contrast with these pieces will undoubtedly be Cesar Franck's Symphony. Weber's Overture to "Oberon" will round out the programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 19 1932

Boston Orchestra to Present Unusual Program Here

Analytical Notes Offered on Numbers Lister for Concert Oct. 25

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has just forwarded copy for revised program which will be given by the 110 players in his organization, in the opening Choral Union concert Tuesday evening, Oct. 25, in Hill auditorium, as follows:

"Classical" Symphony...Prokofieff
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale.
Two Nocturnes..........Debussy
Nuages
Fetes
Tone poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20
(after Lenau) ....Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64 .... Tchaikovsky
I. Andante
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace

These numbers constitute a program of unusual musical interest. The following analytical notes from the official programs for the orchestra in its home concerts, will be of interest.

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25.. .... Prokofieff

This Symphony, begun in 1916, was completed in 1917. The first performance was at Leningrad by the orchestra now known as the State orchestra. The first performance in the United States was at a concert of the Russian Symphony orchestra in New York. In December, 1918.

The symphony, scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, and strings is dedicated to Boris Assafieff, who, as "Igor Gleboff" has written much about music. "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores" (Felix Bororwski).

1. Allegro, D major, 4-4 time. The chief theme is given to first violins. A transitional passage has material for the flutes. Development follows. The second theme is for first violins. Development follows. The second theme is for first violins. The development begins with use of the first subject. The transitional measures are taken up, later the second theme. The recapitulation opens in C major (strings). Then follows the transitional passage (D major) for the flute. The second theme is again for the strings. There is a short coda.

II. Larghetto, A major, 2-2 time. First violins announce the chief theme. There are episodes.

III. Gavotta, Non troppo allegro, D major, 4-4 time. The subject is given at once to strings and woodwind. The trio is in G major (flutes and clarinets above an organ point for violincellos and double basses). This subject is repeated by the strings.

IV. Finale, Molto vivace, D major, 2-2 time. The first theme is for the strings; the second, A major, for wood-wind.

III. Gavotta, Non troppo allegro, D major, 4-4 time. Johann Mathewson in 1737 considered the "gavotta," as sung by a solo voice or by a chorus played on the harpsichord, violin, etc., and danced: "The effect is most exultant joy. Hopping, not running, is a peculiarity of this species of melody, French and Italian composers write a kind of gavotta for the violin that often fills whole pages with their degressions and deviations. If a foreign fiddler can excite wonder by his speed alone, he puts it before everything. The gavotta with great liberties is also composed for the harpsichord, but is not so bad as those for the fiddle."

The gavotte was originally a peasant dance. It takes its name from Gap in Dauphine: the inhabitants of Gap are called "gavots." The dance "was introduced at court in the sixteenth century, when, to amuse the Royal circle, entertainments were given consisting of dances in national costume, performed by natives of the various provinces, and to the sound of appropriate instruments." It was originally a sort of branle. The dancers were in line or in a circle; after some steps made together a couple separated, danced alone, and embraced; then the women kissed all the male dancers, and the men all the female dancers Each couple in turn went through this performance. Ludovic Celler informs us that this was the gavotte known at the courts of the Valois: "The gavotte was not then the dignified, pompous and chaste dance of the eighteenth century, with slow and measured postures and low bows and curtsies.' At the balls of Louis XIV. and XV. the gavotte was preceded by a menuet, composed of the first repetition of the menuet de la cour and danced by one couple; and some say that the menuet itself was preceded by the offer of a bouquet and a rewardng kiss. The best and most minute description of the court gavotte, with all its steps, is in Desrat's "Dictionnaire de la Danse."

Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
Nuages
Fetes

The Nocturnes by Debussy are three in number. The first two, "Nuages" and "Fetes" were produced at a Lamoureux concert, C. Chevillard conductor, Paris, Dec. 9, 1900, and they were played by the same orchestra Jan. 6, 1901. The third, "Sirenes" was first produced in company with the other two, at a Lamoureaux concert, Oct. 27, 1901. The third is for orchestra with chorus and female voices. At this last concert the friends of Debussy were so exuberant in manifestations of delight that there was sharp hissing as a corrective. The nocturnes were composed in 1898, and published in 1899.

The first performance of the three Nocturnes in the United States was at a Chickering "Production" Concert in Boston, Feb. 10, 1904, when Mr. Lang conducted. The Nocturnes were played twice at this concert. Nocturnes Nos. 1 and 2 were played by the Boston Syphony orchestra, led by Vincent d'Indy as guest, at Philadelphia, Dec. 4, 1905, Washington, D. C., Dec. 5, 1905, New York, Dec. 9, 1905. The three were played at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston Dec. 12, 1908. Mr. Fiedler conducted, and the Choral Union of the New England Conservatory of Music sang the vocal parts in the third Nocturne.

Tone poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20
(after Lenau) ....Strauss

Don Juan, composed at Munich 1887-88 is known as the first of Strauss' symphonic or tone poems, but "Macbeth," Op. 23, was composed at Munich 1886-87 (revised in 1890 at Weimar) and published later (1891). Don Juan was published in 1890. The first performance of Don Juan was at the second subscription concert of the Grand Ducal Court orchestra of Weimar in the fall 1889. The Signale No. 67 (November, 1889) stated that the tone poem was performed under the direction of the composer, and was received with great applause. The first performance in Boston was at a Symphony concert, led by Mr. Nikisch, Oct. 31, 1891.

Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64 .... Tchaikovsky

Tchaikovsky, about the end of April, 1888, took possession of a country house at Frolovskoe, which had been prepared for him, while he was at Paris and London, by his servant Alexis. Frolovskoe is a picturesque place on a wooded hill on the way from Moscow to Klin. The house was simple. "Here he (Tchaikovsky) could be alone, to enjoy the little garden. The German name is said to find its derivation in an old proverb: "Man sees his own faults as little as a moneky or an owl recognizes his ugliness in looking into a mirror.

When Dr. Franz Wullner, who conducted the firts performance at Cologne, asked the composer for an explanatory program of the poetical intent of the piece, Strauss replied: "It is impossible for me to furnish a program to "Eulenspiegel" were I to put into words the thoughts which its several incidents suggested to me, they would seldom suffice, and might even give rise to offence. Let me leave it, therefore, to my hearers to crack the hard nut which the Rogue has prepared for them. By way of helping them to a better understanding it seeems sufficient to point out the two "Eulenspiegel" motives, which, in the most manifold disguises, moods, and stituations, pervade the whole up to the catastrophe, when after he has been condemned to death, Till is strung up to the bigget. For the rest, let them guess at the musical joke which a Rogue has offered them. Strauss indicated in notation three motives, the opening theme of the introduction, the horn theme that follows almost immediately, and the descending interval expressive of condemnation and the scaffold.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

OCT 21 1932

Composition Of John Alden Carpenter to be Played by Symphony Ochestra at Boston; Composer Makes Public Debut

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph T. Winterbotham, Jr., of 163 South Willard street, left yesterday for Boston where the symphony concerts is bring to its first performance this week a new piece from the notable American composer, John Alden Carpenter, of Chicago and Charlotte, and brother-in-law of Mr. Wintherbotham. Mr. Carpenter, who but recently closed his Charlotte summer home, is himself playing with the symphony.

"Patterns," the title of the new composition having its debut in Boston this week, is neither symphony, suite, concerto, overture, nor tone-poem, critics aver. It is a single movement of seventeen or eighteen minutes duration and following the tendencies of the day, is a self-contained music, far more spontaneous than an overture, and in all therefore, does not come under the directory of the foregoing classifications. "Patterns 'is written for solo-Piano and orchestra, the piano-part being less prominent than that of a solo instrument in a concerto and of less importance than an orchestra voice.

Mr. Carpenter contributing a program-note to the Boston Transcript says of his own work:

"The title, "Patterns," has no literary or programatic significance, but it is my hope that the suitability of the title will be as apparent to the average auditor as it is to me. The piece is in one movement and plays about eighteen minutes. It is not primarily a show-piece for the pianist. The strictly 'solo' bits are short and infrequent. There is a slow middle section for solo-violin with the piano as the principal element in the orchestral support. There is a highly sentimental waltz-bit, and short fleeting passages with jazz implications, as well as an absurd bubbing-up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this that the 'patterns' are at least various.

"The work was begun two years ago, but there were interruptions and I was unable to complete it in time for the anniversary programs (of the Boston Orchestra). I took it up again in March of this year and completed it in June."

"Patterns" is, therefore, as far as the design in the large is concerned sul sol mo vei

a

eral notes is up, down, up, down each "up" and each "down" a tone or a semi-tone higher or lower that the preceding one. This wedge-pattern is not an entirely new one (What motif in this day and age can be entirely new?) An organ Fugue of Bach in E minor is built, for example, on a rigorously constructed "wedge" about. But Mr. Carpenter's treatment of his pattern (the al-important matter) is highly original. Indeed the subject itself is more flexible, more subtle, less mechanically a "wedge" than that of Bach. The many uses to which Mr. Carpenter puts it proceed in kind. A second "pattern," a smiling little theme with lilting rhythm, marked "Grazioso" in the score, follows shortly; is also frequently and charmingly used in subsequent developments. A third, with gently persistent rhythmic reiteration and gentily delicious dissonances, completes, the list of "patterns" in this first portion of the piece.

It is not to the point to expand the composer's list of patterns in the slow division—the violin solo, the waltz (introduced by English horn), the slight references to jazz (which is apparently taking proper place as merely one among many colors or designs in composers' palettes, rather than as matter for seperate treatment), or the Spanish suggestions. But it said, however, that the piano-support to the solos, of which Mr. Carpenter writes, is colorful, rippling embellishment, delightfully conceived passage-work. The final division brings new developments of the "patterns" of the first, somewhat enlarged and expanded, climatically treated in general.

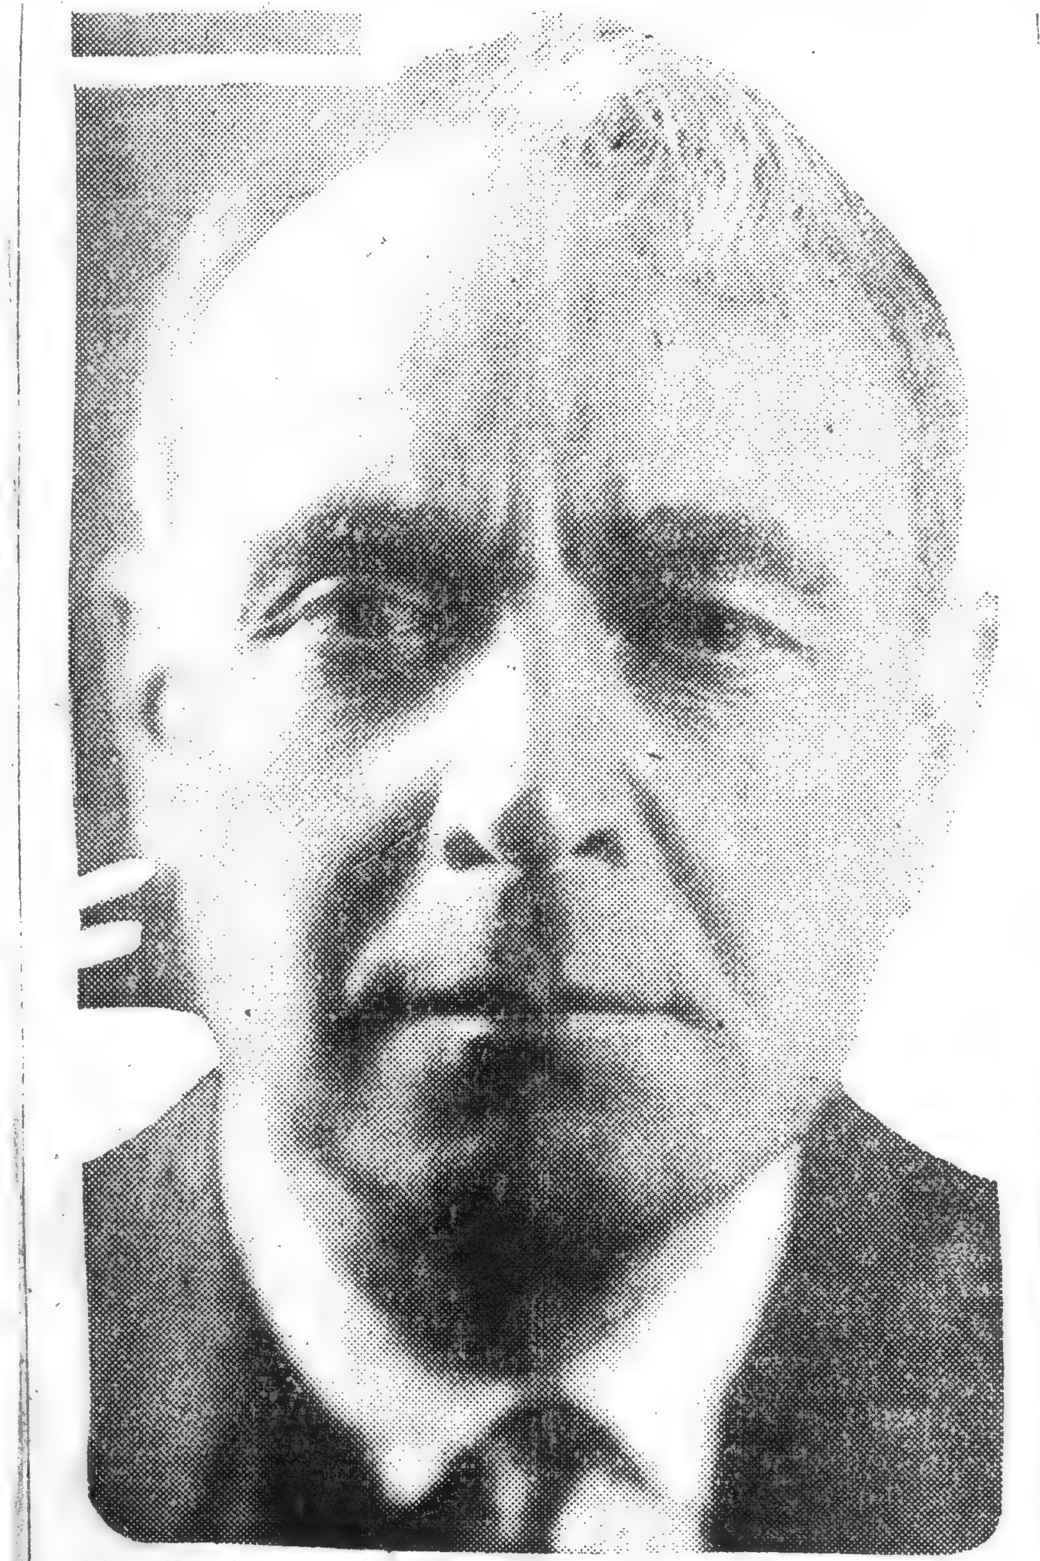
John Alden Carpenter was born at Park Ridge, Ill., February 28, 1876, and was graduated from Harvard in 1897, from which institution he also received an honorary degree of Master of Arts in 1922. He studied music under Bernard Ziehn and Sir Edward Elgar.

With Mrs. Carpenter, whose death occurred a year ago, he has been the author of numerous songs, sonatas, and of himself has composed and published suites for orchestras, concertos, symphonies. He was decorated with the French Legion of Honor in 1921. Mr. Carpenter was designated by the ommittee and was the composer of e official ode for the Washington i-Centennial this year.

Mr. and Mrs. Winterbotham will rern tomorrow morning from Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 2 1932



The all-seeing eye, the all-comprehending mind, musically speaking, seem here to be embodied in the thoughtful countenance of Serge Koussevitzky, who brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Memorial Hall Oct. 27 for the first concert in the Symphony Club series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 22 1932

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22

Music Notes and C

Boston Symphony Friday; Boyd Speaks on Schweitzer; Earl Truxell and Aneurin Bodycombe; Beaver Conservatory; Kwalwasser Book; New Book on Mahler.

Next Friday night ushers in our season of visiting orchestras and the admirable Serge Koussevitsky of Boston inaugurates the season.

The Boston Symphony skipped us last year, due to centenary affairs in the Back Bay, and this year the men as formerly come back and sound the prelude for our season.

A marvelous orchestra they have up there on Huntingdon avenue, and Serge Koussevitsky has proven himself a worthy successor to the conductors who have gone before.

Fine things are expected on Friday night's program—and some twice told tales. Opening with Arcangelo Corelli's suite, Koussevitsky pays homage to one of the illustrious fiddling geniuses of the middle seventeenth century.

Then come Debussy's oft-heard "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" (to be heard here every season—and a fortnight ago Marshall Bidwell played it at Carnegie) and, despite the town's familiarity, it will be well to hear again that ravishing flute cadenza.

Maurice Ravel's ballet, "Daphne et Chloe," compliments the "Faun" prelude and further carries on the idiom.

The closing work is Brahms' magnificent No. 1 symphony, the C Minor, a work of glorious proportions and the composition that is sometimes (though erroneously) hailed as "Beethoven's Tenth."

Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.
Conductor of the Boston Symphony, who will open the series of visiting orchestras next Friday night at the Mosque.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 22 1932

A Suite from Prokofieff's opera "The Gambler" will have its first hearing in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of November 4 and 5 in that city. Other numbers will include Sibelius's "Tapiola" and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 22 1932

To Bring Boston Orchestra Here

DR. GEORGE KOUSSEVITZKY

AFTER an absence of almost a quarter of a century the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Cincinnati to give a concert in Music Hall next Wednesday evening as the second attraction in the artist series.

The orchestra will be under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It will be the first appearance here of this much-discussed conductor. The program is typical of this conductor and affords an excellent opportunity to display the various qualities of the Boston Orchestra which have made it famous the world over. Seats still remaining are on sale at Baldwin's. The program in detail is as follows:

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25...Prokofieff
Allegro.
Larghetto.
Gavotte.
Finale.
Two Nocturnes........ Debussy
Nuages.
Fetes.
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Ecerpts from Second Suit........ Ravel
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

INTERMISSION

Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68. Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Orders Flooding In For Boston Orchestra

Although symphony fare in Columbus this year is limited in quantity, music lovers will appreciate the fact that the lack is only in quantity. When the Symphony Club of Central Ohio selected the Boston and Chicago orchestra to constitute its series, club members felt they were offering the greatest possible service to the community, under the circumstances. With radio and phonograph, the year might somehow be filled out musically, if only the two greatest orchestras made their regular appearance in Memorial hall, it was believed.

That the Symphony club chose wisely is apparent this week, with the opening of the box office in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, where ticket orders are flooding in. Next Thursday evening, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his organization of 110 musicians will play in Memorial hall.

The Chicago orchestra is scheduled for Jan. 16.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
POST

OCT 22 1932

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which annually makes a tour of one week of middlewestern cities, is including Cincinnati in its itinerary this year, coming to Music Hall next Wednesday evening.

The entire orchestra of 110 men will be under the direction of Dr. Serge Kussewitzky, making its first appearance here in almost a quarter of a century and marking the initial bow here of its much discussed conductor. Seats still remaining are on sale at the Baldwin store.

The program includes Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony; Two Nocturnes of Debussy; Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," and for the second half of the program, the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

23 1932

Boston Orchestra Director

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays its first visit to Cincinnati in almost a quarter of a century next Wednesday evening. On this occasion it comes to Music Hall as the second attraction in the Artist Series. The last time the Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Cincinnati was January 31, 1908. It was brought to this city that season under auspices of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Association, which presented several out-of-town orchestras to replace the Cincinnati orchestra which was suspended that season. Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor at that time.

The Boston organization first came here in the spring of 1887, under direction of Wilhelm Gericke. It came again under his direction in 1889. Then followed three visits under Arthus Nikisch, 1890, 1891 and 1892. In 1893 the orchestra came again, this concert being directed by Franz Kneisel, concertmaster and assistant conductor. Fourteen years then intervened until the next visit, which was in 1907, the first year of Dr. Muck's leadership. It returned the following year, and has not been here since, though it has come occasionally to the neighboring cities of Dayton and Columbus.

This time the orchestra, with its 110 men, is under direction of Serge Kussewitzky. Seats which still remain after the season sale for the Artist Series are on sale at Baldwin's, 142 West Fourth Street.

The program for the concert is as follows:

Classical Symphony, Op. 25.....Prokofieff
Allegro, larghetto, gavotte, finale.
Two Nocturnes ....Debussy
Nuages Fetes.
Daphnis et Chloe, Ballet, Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite).........Ravel
Lever du jour, Pantomime, Danse Generale.

INTERMISSION.

Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68 Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

OCT 21 1932

Composition Of John Alden Carpenter to be Played by Symphony Ochestra at Boston; Composer Makes Public Debut

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph T. Winterbotham, Jr., of 163 South Willard street, left yesterday for Boston where the symphony concerts is bring to its first performance this week a new piece from the notable American composer, John Alden Carpenter, of Chicago and Charlotte, and brother-in-law of Mr. Wintherbotham. Mr. Carpenter, who but recently closed his Charlotte summer home, is himself playing with the symphony.

"Patterns," the title of the new composition having its debut in Boston this week, is neither symphony, suite, concerto, overture, nor tone-poem, critics aver. It is a single movement of seventeen or eighteen minutes duration and following the tendencies of the day, is a self-contained music, far more spontaneous than an overture, and in all therefore, does not come under the directory of the foregoing classifications. "Patterns 'is written for solo-Piano and orchestra, the piano-part being less prominent than that of a solo instrument in a concerto and of less importance than an orchestra voice.

Mr. Carpenter contributing a program-note to the Boston Transcript says of his own work:

"The title, "Patterns," has no literary or programatic significance, but it is my hope that the suitability of the title will be as apparent to the average auditor as it is to me. The piece is in one movement and plays about eighteen minutes. It is not primarily a show-piece for the pianist. The strictly 'solo' bits are short and infrequent. There is a slow middle section for solo-violin with the piano as the principal element in the orchestral support. There is a highly sentimental waltz-bit, and short fleeting passages with jazz implications, as well as an absurd bubbing-up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this that the 'patterns' are at least various.

"The work was begun two years ago, but there were interruptions and I was unable to complete it in time for the anniversary programs (of the Boston Orchestra). I took it up again in March of this year and completed it in June."

"Patterns" is, therefore, as far as the design in the large is concerned, substantially an expanded three-part song-form. The "pattern" which is most frequently used is found at the very beginning, and has the shape of a "wedge." The direction of the several notes is up, down, up, down each "up" and each "down" a tone or a semi-tone higher or lower than the preceding one. This wedge-pattern is not an entirely new one (What motif in this day and age can be entirely new?) An organ Fugue of Bach in E minor is built, for example, on a rigorously constructed "wedge" about. But Mr. Carpenter's treatment of his pattern (the al-important matter) is highly original. Indeed the subject itself is more flexible, more subtle, less mechanically a "wedge" than that of Bach. The many uses to which Mr. Carpenter puts it proceed in kind. A second "pattern," a smiling little theme with lilting rhythm, marked "Grazioso" in the score, follows shortly; is also frequently and charmingly used in subsequent developments. A third, with gently persistent rhythmic reiteration and gentily delicious dissonances, completes, the list of "patterns" in this first portion of the piece.

It is not to the point to expand the composer's list of patterns in the slow division—the violin solo, the waltz (introduced by English horn), the slight references to jazz (which is apparently taking proper place as merely one among many colors or designs in composers' palettes, rather than as matter for seperate treatment), or the Spanish suggestions. But it said, however, that the piano-support to the solos, of which Mr. Carpenter writes, is colorful, rippling embellishment, delightfully conceived passage-work. The final division brings new developments of the "patterns" of the first, somewhat enlarged and expanded, climatically treated in general.

John Alden Carpenter was born at Park Ridge, Ill., February 28, 1876, and was graduated from Harvard in 1897, from which institution he also received an honorary degree of Master of Arts in 1922. He studied music under Bernard Ziehn and Sir Edward Elgar.

With Mrs. Carpenter, whose death occurred a year ago, he has been the author of numerous songs, sonatas, and of himself has composed and published suites for orchestras, concertos, symphonies. He was decorated with the French Legion of Honor in 1921. Mr. Carpenter was designated by the committee and was the composer of the official ode for the Washington Bi-Centennial this year.

Mr. and Mrs. Winterbotham will return tomorrow morning from Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 22 1932

TURDAY, OCTOBER 22

Music Notes and

Boston Symphony Friday; Boyd Speaks on Schweitzer; Earl Truxell and Aneurin Bodycombe; Beaver Conservatory; Kwalwasser Book; New Book on Mahler.

Next Friday night ushers in our season of visiting orchestras and the admirable Serge Koussevitsky of Boston inaugurates the season.

The Boston Symphony skipped us last year, due to centenary affairs in the Back Bay, and this year the men as formerly come back and sound the prelude for our season.

A marvelous orchestra they have up there on Huntingdon avenue, and Serge Koussevitsky has proven himself a worthy successor to the conductors who have gone before.

Fine things are expected on Friday night's program—and some twice told tales. Opening with Arcangelo Corelli's suite, Koussevitsky pays homage to one of the illustrious fiddling geniuses of the middle seventeenth century.

Then come Debussy's oft-heard "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" (to be heard here every season—and a fortnight ago Marshall Bidwell played it at Carnegie) and, despite the town's familiarity, it will be well to hear again that ravishing flute cadenza.

Maurice Ravel's ballet, "Daphne et Chloe," compliments the "Faun" prelude and further carries on the idiom.

The closing work is Brahms' magnificent No. 1 symphony, the C Minor, a work of glorious proportions and the composition that is sometimes (though erroneously) hailed as "Beethoven's Tenth."

Other

Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Conductor of the Boston Symphony, who will open the series of visiting orchestras next Friday night at the Mosque.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 22 1932

A Suite from Prokofieff's opera "The Gambler" will have its first hearing in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of November 4 and 5 in that city. Other numbers will include Sibelius's "Tapiola" and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 22 1932

To Bring Boston Orchestra Here

DR. GEORGE KOUSSEVITZKY

AFTER an absence of almost a quarter of a century the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Cincinnati to give a concert in Music Hall next Wednesday evening as the second attraction in the artist series.

The orchestra will be under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It will be the first appearance here of this much-discussed conductor. The program is typical of this conductor and affords an excellent opportunity to display the various qualities of the Boston Orchestra which have made it famous the world over. Seats still remaining are on sale at Baldwin's. The program in detail is as follows:

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25...Prokofieff
Allegro.
Larghetto.
Gavotte.
Finale.
Two Nocturnes....................Debussy
Nuages.
Fetes.
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Ecerpts from Second Suit.........Ravel
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

INTERMISSION

Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68. Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

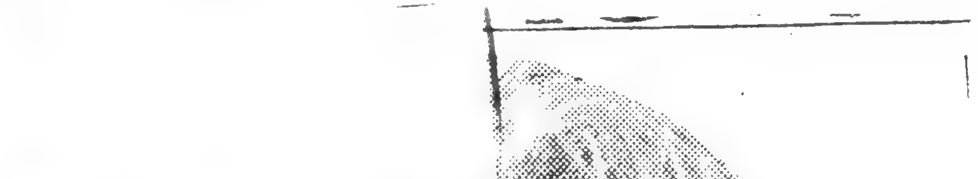
THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Orders Flooding In For Boston Orchestra

Although symphony fare in Columbus this year is limited in quantity, music lovers will appreciate the fact that the lack is only in quantity. When the Symphony Club of Central Ohio selected the Boston and Chicago orchestra to constitute its series, club members felt they were offering the greatest possible service to the community, under the circumstances. With radio and phonograph, the year might somehow be filled out musically, if only the two greatest orchestras made their regular appearance in Memorial hall, it was believed.

That the Symphony club chose wisely is apparent this week, with the opening of the box office in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, where ticket orders are flooding in. Next Thursday evening, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his organization of 110 musicians will play in Memorial hall.

The Chicago orchestra is scheduled for Jan. 16.



The all-seeing eye, the all-comprehending mind, musically speaking, seem here to be embodied in the thoughtful countenance of Serge Koussevitzky, who brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Memorial Hall Oct. 27 for the first concert in the Symphony Club series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
POST

OCT 22 1932

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which annually makes a tour of one week of middlewestern cities, is including Cincinnati in its itinerary this year, coming to Music Hall next Wednesday evening.

The entire orchestra of 110 men will be under the direction of Dr. Serge Kussewitzky, making its first appearance here in almost a quarter of a century and marking the initial bow here of its much discussed conductor. Seats still remaining are on sale at the Baldwin store.

The program includes Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony; Two Nocturnes of Debussy; Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," and for the second half of the program, the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 23 1932

Boston Orchestra Director

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays its first visit to Cincinnati in almost a quarter of a century next Wednesday evening. On this occasion it comes to Music Hall as the second attraction in the Artist Series. The last time the Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Cincinnati was January 31, 1908. It was brought to this city that season under auspices of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Association, which presented several out-of-town orchestras to replace the Cincinnati orchestra which was suspended that season. Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor at that time.

The Boston organization first came here in the spring of 1887, under direction of Wilhelm Gericke. It came again under his direction in 1889. Then followed three visits under Arthus Nikisch, 1890, 1891 and 1892. In 1893 the orchestra came again, this concert being directed by Franz Kneisel, concertmaster and assistant conductor. Fourteen years then intervened until the next visit, which was in 1907, the first year of Dr. Muck's leadership. It returned the following year, and has not been here since, though it has come occasionally to the neighboring cities of Dayton and Columbus.

This time the orchestra, with its 110 men, is under direction of Serge Kussewitzky. Seats which still remain after the season sale for the Artist Series are on sale at Baldwin's, 142 West Fourth Street.

The program for the concert is as follows:

Classical Symphony, Op. 25.....Prokofieff
Allegro, larghetto, gavotte, finale.
Two Nocturnes ....Debussy
Nuages Fetes.
Daphnis et Chloe, Ballet, Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)..........Ravel
Lever du jour, Pantomime, Danse Generale.

INTERMISSION.

Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68 Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 23 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FRIDAY

Orchestra at Top Of 'Career' Under Koussevitzsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays at Syria Mosque next Friday evening, has been a cultural force in America through half a century. It began in 1881, when there was no such abundance of fine orchestral performance as now.

Henry L. Higginson, who had studied and listened to excellent music in Europe, established the organization as the fulfilment of a lifetime dream. George Henschel was the first leader, but it was Wilhelm Gericke, his successor, who drilled the orchestra through many years into a sensitive and eloquent body which won the world's attention and respect. Arthur Nikisch, in a shorter term, gave it the more personal stamp of his vivid genius.

When Mr. Higginson was able to engage such a conductor as Dr. Karl Muck, he followed up his advantage by keeping him for many years. War troubles brought the Muck epoch to an end, and Mr. Higginson, after being the sole supporter of the orchestra for

Photo by Boris.
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Muck, Other Great Conductors Aided Rise to Fame

37 years, yielded its destinies to a board of trustees in 1918.

In 1924 came Serge Koussevitzky, a conductor destined to carry the Boston Symphony to new heights. Koussevitzky is now beginning his ninth season in Boston—the longest continuous term of any Boston conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 24 1932

MUSIC

By MARY B. SWAN.

Stellar Program

More than a hundred cities have begged for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, but out of the number, Buffalo and five other cities were chosen by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, for an appearance by the famous Boston group of musicians. This gala event of the musical season takes place tomorrow night in the Elmwood Music Hall. The program Dr. Koussevitzky announced for tomorrow night is one of rare beauty and variety. It reads:

Suite .... Corelli
Sarabande, Gigue, Badinerie
Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun .... Debussey
(Eclogue by S. Mallarme)
Tone Poem, Don Juan, Op. 20...Strauss
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op 68 .... Brahms

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony. The concert will begin at 8.15 o'clock. The Brahms first symphony was chosen by Dr. Koussevitzky to commemorate the centennary of the composer's birth, an event that occurs early in 1933 and is being widely recognized by the leading orchestras of the world.

The symphony is full of movements pastoral and gay, tripping and romantic, lyric and magnificently sweeping. It reaches its summit in the final movement, adagio, C minor. One of the episodes in the last movement is said to have come from the Alpine horns on the high passes of the Bernese Oberland. Oddly, the Cambridge University audience in England which heard the symphony first after its production, detected in the same passage the quarter bells of the University.

As in former years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes here under the local management of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, of which Alfred H. Schoellkopf is president and Marian de Forest, manager. This will be the Musical Foundation's only concert this season by a visiting orchestra, Miss de Forest has announced. Seats are now selling at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. Prices are $3, $2.50, $2 and $1.50, tax exempt.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 23 1932

MUSIC

By MARY HOWARD

A GALA event of the musical season is the concert tomorrow evening in Elmwood Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. As formerly, the concert is under the local management of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, Alfred H. Schcoellkopf, president; Miss Marian De Forest, secretary-manager. This will be the foundation's only concert by a visiting orchestra this season, Miss De Forest announces. The program scheduled for tomorrow night is one of rare beauty and much variety. It reads:

Suite; Sarabande-Gigue-Badinerie....Corelli
Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun... .... Debussy
Tone Poem, Don Juan, Op. 20......Strauss
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.Brahms
Un poco sostemuto; allegro; Andante sostemuto; Un poco allegretto e graziose; Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

The Brahms symphony is chosen by Dr. L. Koussevitzky to commemorate the centenary of the composer's birth, which occurs early in 1933. It is full of movements pastoral and gay, tripping and romantic, lyric and sweeping. One of the episodes in the last movement is said to have come from the Alpine horns on the high passes of Bernese Oberland. Oddly, the Cambridge university audience in England which heard the symphony first after its production, detected in the same passage the quarter bells of the university.

Seats for this concert are now selling at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 24 1932

BOSTON CONCERT TODAY

Symphony program at Elmwood Music Hall at 8.15 p. m.

The only concert this season by an out-of-town organization of its kind, under auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, will take place at 8.15 o'clock tonight, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, appears at Elmwood Music Hall.

A special train will bring to Buffalo this afternoon 110 musicians—the largest number of virtuosi ever assembled to make an orchestral body. This city is one of six points to be visited.

William H. Brennan, manager of the group, a former Buffalonian, will not be here tonight because of illness. Mr. Brennan was manager of the Old Music Hall here, which stood on the site of the present Teck theater. He succeeded the late Charles H. Ellis as manager of the Boston orchestra several years ago.

Tonight's program will include Brahm's First Symphony in C Minor, in commemoration of the centenary of the composer's birth, which will be observed widely next spring. Tickets may be obtained throughout the day, until 5 p. m., at the boxoffice at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. At 7 o'clock, the boxoffice at Elmwood Music Hall will be open.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT [illegible] 1932

Koussevitsky's Genius Manifest in Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky never had in Europe a great and permanent orchestra such as the one he now commands, for the fullest expression of his genius—his artist's vision. Nor had the Boston Symphony orchestra, even in its famous past, according to the critics, ever had a leader of such extensive and searching musical sympathies, of such tireless artistic ambition, of such engrossing interest and emotional response as an interpreter. Consequently, orchestra and conductor are each the richer—and so is the musical public of America which so highly prizes these concerts as they pass their mid-century mark.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

[illegible]

Boston Concert Master Is Russian Musician

The concert master's chair of the Boston Symphony is now fittingly held by Richard Burgin, the celebrated Russian musician. Mr. Burgin came to America to take this position in 1920. He had been concertmaster to more than one great conductor in Europe, and was equally admired for his recitals and activities in chamber music. Richard Burgin is known in America not only by his appearances as soloist with the orchestra, but by many recitals and by the string quartet and the trio which bear his name. Last season, he was appointed the regular assistant conductor of the orchestra.

As the Boston Symphony orchestra passes its fiftieth year, its famed precision, ensemble and tonal beauty, it is said, excel even the most glorious days of its illustrious past. And these qualities are liberating more than ever before Koussevitzky's ranging artist's vision.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

[illegible]

production.

Two first performances for this country will mark Mr. Koussevitzky's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Nov. 4. Four character portraits from Prokofieff's opera "The Gambler," after Dostoievsky, and Sibelius's "Tapiola" are the two works in question. Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" will round out the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 24 1932

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert in Hartford November 16

22

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS

OCT 22 1932

ANNOUNCEMENT MADE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ON TUESDAY

Ann Arbor, Mich., Oct. 22—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, recognized as one of the world's most distinguished ensemble groups, was organized in 1881, and is now in its 52nd year. At first it numbered but seventy players but has gradually and steadily been augmented until at the present time a hundred and ten players are listed on its roster and on its concert tours, the full complement of men is carried. On the occasion of its Ann Arbor concert, October 25, the full complement will be present. Dr. Koussevitzky will give an attractive and "exciting" program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 25 1932

Boston Orchestra of 110 Pieces to Be Here Tonight

Attractive Program Arranged for Choral Union Concert in Hill Auditorium

The Boston Symphony orchestra which will appear this evening in Hill auditorium is recognized as one of the world's most distinguished ensemble groups. It was organized in 1881, and is now in its fifty-second year. At first it numbered only 70 players but has gradually and steadily been augmented until at the present time 110 players are listed on its roster and on its concert tours, the full complement of men is carried. On the occasion of its Ann Arbor concert, tonight the full complement will be present. Dr. Koussevitzky will give the following attractive and "exciting" program:

"Classical" Symphony Op. 25.. .... Prokofieff
  I Allegro.
  II. Larghetto
  III. Gavotte
  IV. Finale
Two Nocturnes .... Deubssy
  Nuages
  Fetes
Tone Poem "Don Juan" Op. 20. (after Lenau) .... Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64.............. Tchaikovsky
  I. Andanto
  II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
  III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
  IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

The first conductor was Georg Hanschel, who was at the head of the organization until 1884, when he was succeeded by Wilhelm Gericke, who presided until 1889. Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur headed the organization from 1889 until 1898 when Wilhelm Gericke was again called to preside over the organization, serving this time from 1898 until 1906. From 1906 until 1914, Dr. Karl Muck, Max Fieldler, and the latter portion of the period, Dr. Muck again, presided. There was an interlude from 1914 to 1918 and after the war, two distinguished Frenchmen, were called to head the organization, Henry Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, whose regime continued from 1918 to 1924, at which time Serge Koussevitzky, was called from Russia. He has presided for the longest period. The good father of the orchestra for many years was Col. Henry L. Higginson, who not only had much to do with the direction of the orchestra's administrative policies but who provided funds over a period of many years to make up deficits and to add to the prestig of the organization.

The orchestra gives such a heav series of concerts in its home city that little time or opportunity i afforded for tours to other citie At intervals of several years how ever, the organization is generall prevailed upon to make a brie westward tour. Last season it gav several concerts coming as fa west as Ann Arbor and Ohio. Th season Dr. Koussevitzky is aga making a brief out-of-town tour, visiting Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, and Philadelphia, Ann Arbor being the only city in Michigan or this portion of the middle west where the organization will be heard. The orchestra has visited Ann Arbor many times and most of the distinguished conductors have been heard in the University city.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 26 1932

Boston Orchestra Is Heard In Initial Concert Event

Fifty-Fourth Choral Union Series Inaugurated at Auditorium

By Carl E. Gehring

Before discussing the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted Tuesday evening at Hill auditorium, a few pertinent remarks are in order. While all of the past Choral Union Concert series have, in varying degree, been a credit to their sponsors, perhaps no other local course has been faced with the situation which confronts the fifty-fourth annual Choral Union series. As we enter the fourth year of the economic depression, the portents of this catastrophe have become so menacing and far-flung that many who once regarded the Spenglerian theory of western decline with indifference now view with alarm the relentless march of events, incidentally noting the support which Ortega y Gasset, Egon Friedell and others have since accorded Spengler's ideas.

Thus the courage of the University Musical society, in planning one of its finest concert courses in a season when financial support for the project is not entirely assured, arouses our sincere commendation. When one considers the precarious state of our symphony orchestras, that only two grand opera companies remain in the country, as Deems Taylor has shown, and that our own Chamber Music Society of Ann Arbor has suspended activity for a year, one realizes what an obvious gamble confronts the officials of the University Musical society. Yet they have gone right ahead with a steadfastness which, if adhered to by Occidental society as a whole, should guide us out of an abyss which might ultimately prove to be bottomless if the descent goes on unchecked.

A Fine Opening Event

After congratulating local musical officials on their firm stand, we may say that the music of the Boston Symphony orchestra quite equalled the impression it made here last year. So uniformly excellent was this performance that one lost one's self in its contemplation and absorption, the crass concerns of every-day-life becoming matters of small account. This fact should be borne in mind by those who, with an eye to the family budget, may feel that under present conditions music had better be foregone. Art, it is well to recall, aptly has been called the recompense for the sufferings of mankind, and, in times like the present, it should be the more firmly embraced, not rejected. Concerning the concert, however, added to a sterling performance was an interesting program.

Offered on this occasion were Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony; two of Debussy's three orchestral Nocturnes, namely "Nuages" and "Fetes"; the Strauss Symphonic Poem "Don Juan," and the Fifth Symphony, in E Minor, of Tschaikowsky. This comprised a well balanced program, and attractive, yet it would have been a trifle more to our liking had Dr. Koussevitzky offered us Sibelius' Eighth Symphony or a work or two by Bruckner which he is featuring this year, inasmuch as we know the Tschaikowsky Op. 64 so intimately. However the Symphony we heard Tuesday evening was Tschaikowsky as he undoubtedly conceived his music; that is, Dr. Koussevitzky did not fall into the error of certain conductors who wring from the Russian's sentimental measures the last possible tear.

Tschaikowsky Symphony

As has been said of Rachmanin-f, Tschaikowsky enjoyed a good of.., yet it always has been the cr iter's conviction that this man wr his melancholy fits was not Peter in ych at his best. We had, for ex- Iljiple, the composer in one of his amit powerful and representative mosds in the finale of the Fifth moophony, which is the epitome of barbaric splendor. Not only was it intruiging to have a Russian conductor interpreting a Russian composer in a frenzied outburst, but it also was satisfying to hear a complete performance of this eloquent music. Not for a number of seasons has the movement entire been played here, the shorter Stock version unfortunately having gained in popularity with certain conductors. Incidentally, Willem Mengelberg has even a shorter version than the Stock, both of which are recorded.

In any case, this electrifying performance brought to conclusion a sparkling evening which had been charged with Dr. Koussevitzky's dynamic personality. Discussing the last bars of the concert first does not preclude remarking on some excellent French horn playing in the initial statement of the first theme from the second movement, or calling attention to the fine instrumental balances which were maintained in the haunting trio from the Waltz movement. A deviation from the orthodox approach to the first movement had to do with the tempo with which the third section of the second theme proper, exclusive of the motto theme, was taken. If any charge of sweetness were to be raised, it might apply here, the violins lingering too soulfully over an irresistibly lovely air, somewhat nullifying the effect of its delicate lyricism.

Other Works Heard

If Prokofieff's score did not seem so effective, it was due to the intrinsic character of the work and not to any lapses on the musicians' parts. This miniature Symphony is recorded by the Boston orchestra and, while the hearer may find it a charming enough work at first, it hardly holds up on too intimate acquaintance. Nevertheless it comprises an adroit use by Prokofieff of the classical symphonic mold, with a number of color tints belying its modern association. Yet the chameleon-like manner in which Prokofieff appears in this or that guise as composer, as is revealed by the varied quality of his output, little exceeded the chameleon-like way in which the orchestra adjusted itself to the demands of the various compositions played.

More exquisite performances of the Debussy Nocturnes scarcely could be imagined. Never, in the various renditions of "Nuages" which the writer has heard, have such luscious shadings beguiled the ear, the dreamy remoteness of the opening measures, for instance, fairly carrying away the imaginative listener on a bank of clouds of his own making. In this connection, the velvety texture of the chords in the wood choir was only equalled once again, in the finale of the Fifth Symphony wherein the woodwinds literally come up for air in a long diminuendo, after a Slavic dance tune has been quite torn asunder during some tempestuous attacks by the full orchestra. "Fetes," on the other hand, was likewise well interpreted, although some fuzzy work in the flutes injected a detracting element.

Trekking homeward and brought back to earth by the dampness of an inclement evening, the music lover might recall with inner warmth a colossal performance of Strauss' "Don Juan," the sinuous beauty of Debussy, the excellence of the orchestra, the genius of Dr. Koussevitzky, and, possibly, certain lines of Robert Frost, also recently a visitor to Ann Arbor, which read:

"Let the night be too dark for me to see into the future. Let what will be be."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NILES, MICH.
DAILY STAR

OCT 27 1932

3,500 at Concert by Boston Symphony at U. of M. Auditorium

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 27.—(AP)—An audience of 3,500 greeted the Boston symphony orchestra Tuesday evening at the opening concert of the annual choral union concert series of the University of Michigan musical society.

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and the "Classical" symphony of Prokofiev were received enthusiastically. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. Other numbers on the program included two Nocturnes by DeBussy and the tone poem "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 2 1932

U. of M. to Hear Boston Symphony

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 24—The University of Michigan Musical Society's Choral Union program will be opened here Tuesday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The attendance will reach close to 3,500, it is estimated by Dr. Charles A. Sink, head of the society. The program will feature the well-known Tschaikosky Symphony No. 5 in E. Minor and the Prokofieff classical symphony. Two nocturnes by Debussy and the Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS

OCT 26 1932

Boston Symphony Gives Choral Union Program

Ann Arbor, Mich., Oct. 26.—A storm of applause from the well-filled Hill Auditorium greeted the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the first of the fifty-fourth annual Choral Union Concert Series here, Tuesday evening. The rapt attention of the audience was apparent as the program unfolded and the selections were so ably interpreted.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The first rendition was that of the so-called "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, Serge Prokofieff, a modern composer. "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living, Mozart might put into his scores."

Three Nocturnes by Claude DeBussy, French composer, "Clouds", "Festivals", and "Sirens" were included in the program, these nocturnes are considered an important step in musical art. With the aid of the orchestra the audience could envision clouds traversing the somber sky and the various forms created by the imagination.

The tone-poem "Don Juan" (after Nicolaus Lenau), by Richard Strauss was filled with periods of "Disgust" and the theme "Longing" which is heard from the deep-stringed instruments. Till the end the mood grows wilder and wilder and a tremendous orchestral crash; a long and eloquent silence cut by a piercing trumpet.

Following the intermission the orchestra played Symphony No. 5, in E Minor, Op. 64 by Peter Tchaikovsky. The "eternal note of sadness", was present in all four of the movements of the andante. The second movement which was rich and sonorous has been characterized as a romance. The third movement which was light and gay was a waltz and the finale was a development of the sombre and dominating theme of storm and fury and the final climax contained a repetition of the first movement.

The stirring concluded measures of the program brought a continued wave of applause which lasted until the conductor returned three times.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES HERALD

OCT 27 1932

THERE ARE MODERN CLASSICS, TOO

There is, it appears, a certain school of thought in music, as well as in literature and art, which holds that anything really great and excellent comes out of the centuries of the past.

And although the idea has been pretty well exploded by those whose opinions on such things can be really valued, it persists more or less among those who are less informed.

So that it was interesting to read that the program of music played by the great Boston Symphony Orchestra—acknowledged one of the greatest organizations of its kind in the world—in its Ann Arbor concert this week, was made up of compositions all of which had been written within a period of years of little more than the present generation, while the greatest of them all was only fifteen years old.

And this, we discover, is being accepted as one more proof that it is not necessary to go back into the centuries to find really great music.

Which, of course, is true. It is not possible really to believe other than that we have progressed in musical technique and sense as well as in every other sort of art and mechanics.

The really strange thing about it all is that there should be some who think that is not so

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Plays in Ann Arbor

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 25.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky will offer a programme in Hill Auditorium this evening. The concert is the first of the University of Michigan Choral Union series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS CHORAL UNION

Ann Arbor, Oct. 26.—(By AP)—An audience of 3,500 greeted the Boston symphony orchestra Tuesday evening at the opening concert of the annual choral union concert series of the University of Michigan musical season.

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and the classical "Symphony of Prokofiev" were received enthusiastically. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. Other numbers on the program included two nocturnes by Debussy and the tone poem "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAGINAW, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 26 1932

3,500 PERSONS HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY

(By Associated Press.)

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 26.—An audience of 3,500 greeted the Boston symphony orchestra Tuesday evening at the opening concert of the annual choral union concert series of the University of Michigan musical society.

Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony and the "classical" symphony of Prokofiev were received enthusiastically. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. Other numbers on the program included two nocturnes by Debussy and the tone poem "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 24 1932

HOW the Boston Symphony orchestra came to be a great cultural force in America through half a century, and how it rose to its present pre-eminence makes an interesting and a significant story.

In 1881, when the orchestra began, there was no such abundance of fine orchestral performance as there is now. For the few concerts given each season in our larger cities, musicians were assembled for the moment from other pursuits. Even a leader such as the valorous Theodore Thomas could keep an orchestra together only by constant campaigning and touring, plus his own zealous personality.

Some 30 years previous to this time, a young Bostonian student, in Europe, listened to excellent music in Vienna and Berlin, and dreamed of the day when his own people might have an orchestra like one of these permanently maintained in the cause of the best music, ideally performed. The dream of Henry L. Higginson had to remain a dream for many years, because he was a man of very moderate means.

THE time eventually came when Henry L. Higginson could at least bring togetner the best musicians he could find in Europe and America for a permanent orchestra in Boston. The Boston Symphony orchestra first had 60 men and George Henschel, a promising young musicial, for leader.

When Mr. Higginson was able to engage such a conductor as Dr. Karl Muck, he followed up his advantage by keeping him for many years.

THEN KOUSSEVITZKY

CHANGES in membership at length resulted in a personnel more brilliant than ever before. And to these came, in 1932, Serge Kousseyitsky, a conductor destined to carry the Boston Symphony orchestra to new and surpassing heights. Koussevitsky had given a new impetus to music in Russia, he had electrified western Europe with his "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris, and by his guest appearances in other cities.

This orchestra is to play at Memorial hall Thursday night. Box office for the sale of single admission and season tickets remains open daily from 9 to 5 p. m. at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Tickets are available also at the Sarah E. Pye Shop and Mrs. Eugene Gray's.

The Boston orchestra is brought to Columbus under the auspices of the Symphony club of Central Ohio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 24 1932

Orchestra Leader Is To Be Guest

Mr. and Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington Have Dinner Party Thursday.

Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 S. Columbia avenue, has invited a small number of guests to a supper Thursday evening at her home to meet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The supper will follow the concert of the orchestra at Memorial Hall, presented by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE REPUBLICAN
Washington Court House O.

OCT 25 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY GREAT DIRECTOR

To Appear at Memorial Hall in Columbus Thursday Night With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is doubtless to say that, with a single exception, Serge Koussevitzky has known personally each of the composers he has placed upon the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Columbus at Memorial Hall next Thursday, October 27th. The exception is Arcangelo Corelli, who died in 1713.

Of the actual meeting of Koussevitzky and Tschaikowsky one can come conveniently upon no mention. But Koussevitzky was 19 when the elder musician died in 1893. He was a precocious young soloist upon the unlikeliest of instruments, a double-bass, an eager devotee of concert halls and opera. Whether or not they ever met, their orbits must have crossed, and, in any case there would be a great deal of second-hand acquaintance.

In his early European tours with his unwieldy instrument, Koussevitzky invaded Berlin, Dresden and Munich, where at that time Richard Strauss was musical god. There must have been meetings then, as well as many in later days, for the pinnacle of fame is a constricted space. Those who occupy it must of necessity brush against each other.

While Koussevitzky was conducting his own orchestra in St. Petersburg (so it was then) and Moscow, introducing European composers to Russia, introducing Russian composers to themselves, he invited Debussy to come out to conduct a series of concerts of his own compositions. The gentle Frenchman stayed three weeks at the Koussevitzkys. It is told that he spent all his leisure time at the piano, but that he would play not in public but only for a circle of intimate friends. Debussy's scores are still preserved at Koussevitzky's house with the composer's annotations on them, tokens of joint labors and friendly discussions.

So, of the works he will play in Columbus, he must time and again have heard Debussy conduct the "Nocturnes," must have discussed them minutely with him. He must time and again have heard Strauss conduct his "Don Juan." And whether or not he was present while Tschaikowsky led the "Fifth," he is of the same race and background, would feel the passionate, surging music as its composer felt it.

These works, with a suite drawn from chamber music by the 17th century Italian, Corelli, make up the program for October 27th, the first of the season for the Symphony Club.

The following is the program to be given:

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande-Gigue-Badinerie
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
a. Nuages. b. Fetes.
Strauss—"Don Juan," Tone Poem, Op. 20 (after Lenau)
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64

1. Andante
2. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
3. Valse (Allegro moderato)
4. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

Tickets are available at the Karl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, Columbus, Ohio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 25 1932

MR. AND MRS. EUGENE GOOSSENS are entertaining with a supper party, Wednesday night, in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symhony Orchestra, which will give a concert Wednesday, at Music Hall, under auspices of the Artists' Series. Mr. and Mrs. Goossens are assembling a few friends following the concert for supper in the Old English room of the Hotel Gibson. Although their guest list is not yet complete, it will include a small group interested in musical affairs. Mr. Goossens and Dr. Koussevitzky have a friendship of many years' standing, being both personal and professional friends.

Mr. J. Herman Thuman, manager of the Artists' Series, had hoped to entertain with a stag luncheon, Wednesday noon, in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky, but this distinguished conductor unfortunately could not accept since he has such a busy schedule this week. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving a concert Tuesday night in Ann Arbor, Mich., and are leaving early Thursday for Columbus. They will arrive in Cincinnati, Wednesday morning. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, and Mr. G. E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, will stop at the Hotel Gibson. This is the first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Cincinnati in twenty-four years.

COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 25 1932

110 Artists Arrive

Perhaps no larger assemblage of virtuosi ever visited Columbus than arrives Thursday in the persons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductors, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. They come from Cincinnati to inaugurate the ninth season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. This is the orchestra's third appearance here under its present conductor.

All of its 110 musicians are artists in their own right.

Season tickets, admitting also to the Chicago Orchestra concert Jan. 16, under Dr. Frederick A. Stock, are selling at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts. After 7 p. m. Thursday, tickets will be available in the Memorial Hall lobby from Mrs. Helen Pugh Alcorn.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

1932

It's Record Band As to Numbers

THE largest numbers of virtuosi ever assembled in one musical organization will arrive in Columbus at noon Thursday, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra stop here on their tour of the middle west to inaugurate the ninth season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio with a concert at Memorial hall. This is the third Columbus appearance of the country's oldest symphony orchestra under its present conductor.

The concert will begin at 8:15 p. m. and tickets may be obtained from 7 p. m. until opening at the box office in the Memorial hall lobby. Until then, both season and single admission tickets are on sale in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 25 1932

Conductor Honor Guest.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concert Thursday evening at Memorial Hall will be the opening one of the series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, will be honor guests at a small supper party at the home of Mr. and Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 S. Columbia Ave., following the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
POST

OCT 26 1932

EXCITEMENT PREVAILS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of Boston Bursts Into Town With His 112 Symphony Musicians

By Eugene Segal

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

AN EXCITEMENT, like at the approach of a tornado, prevailed in the Gibson Hotel lobby Wednesday when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky burst in with his 112 Boston musicians of many nations, laden with brass, woodwinds and strings.

Most excited was C. C. Schiffeler, the hotel's manager, who nevertheless, did not lose his generous smile while presiding at the registration in French and German, and trying to make his squad of bell boys do for 112 men all signing in at once.

Least excited was Dr. Koussevitzky, himself, which should not have been the case, what with his notably volcanic temperament equaled only by that of New York's Toscanini.

Dr. Koussevitsky (or Sergiei Aleksandrovich Kussevitskii, if you favor the Russian) was found in his room, placidly smiling, looking trim in perfectly tailored clothes and very refreshed for a man who all his life has been one of the world's hardest-working musicians.

He directed his Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night at Ann Arbor and the night before that in Buffalo. Wednesday night he will give a concert in Music Hall and Thursday night in Columbus.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY, in a voice that seeks to overcome a lack of English with flexible intonations, was pleased to tell about the state of music in America as he has found it during his tours.

"Only America," he says, "is such a country where there is the greatest interest in orchestras—you must excuse the language." (Dr. Koussevitky would rather be interviewed in French or German.)

"Now is bad times, is very dangerous time for art, but everywhere I play the houses are crowded. It shows the conditions of music in America is wonderful, and it shows when there is trouble, cultivated people make the greatest attention to art.'

To paraphrase him, Dr. Koussevitzky has found that the reproduction of music (as distinguished from composition) now is centered in America. The finest compositions, however, still are European, he says.

'I will not be surprised in two, three years, America will have the great composers also,' he says. 'Now are interesting composers in America, but not great."

Dr. Koussevitzky is sorry there are not enough American-born and American educated musicians from whom to recruit an orchestra, but he believes as the country ages it will produce its own.

From 12 until 58, his present age, Dr. Koussevitzky has had few inactive days, each one being devoted to music.

At 12, he was composer of the incidental music and directed the between-acts concerts for theatrical performances in his native town, Tver, Russia.

* * *

AT 14, he began study of the double-bass viol. For 10 years he toured Europe, was famed thruout the continent as a double-bass virtuoso. Meanwhile, he composed numerous works which now are in the repertoire of every double-bass soloist.

Then he returned to Russia to organize the famous Koussevitzky Symphony Orchestra, composed of youthful musicians, whom he would rehearse for three months in a single symphony before giving a concert.

From Moscow to Petrograd, back and forth, he took his musicians, giving an almost continuous series of concerts. To augment his orchestra, he organized a choir of 250 voices, and, still unfatigued, found time with his wife to start a music publishing house which gave unknown composers a chance.

He left Russia at the time of the revolution, founded his famous Paris concerts in 1921. This is his ninth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives 102 concerts in seven months under his direction.

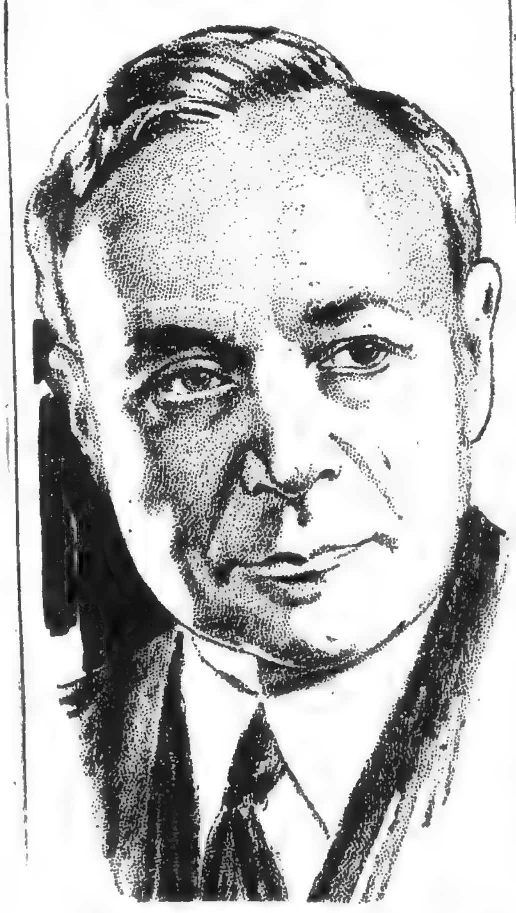
He is notable among conductors for his disregard of routine. His programs often include the works of not widely recognized composers.

When summer comes, he goes to Vienna to conduct more concerts. During a vacation of several weeks he straps a pack on his back and goes on a 10-day hike thru the Swiss Alps. That is his only recreation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 2 1932

DIRECTOR



VERSATILE — Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, composer and conductor, tomorrow night brings his 110-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra to Memorial Hall, inaugurating the Symphony Club of Central Ohio season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
POST

FROM THIS TEA many of the guests will hurry home to dress for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at 8.15 p. m. in Music Hall, which is the second offering of this year's Artist Series.

For the concert J. H. Thuman, manager of the series, will have Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens as guests in his box with Mr. Thuman's daughter, Miss Mary Rose, and his niece, Miss Janie Hills of Kansas City. Mr. and Mrs. Goossens are entertaining afterward at a supper party at the Gibson Hotel for Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, who has been one of Mr. Goossens' personal friends for many years.

Several groups of friends will assemble after the concert at the Club Latin for supper and dancing, this club deciding to keep its doors open late Wednesday as it does during the week-end. The play, "Dance of Death," by Strindberg, which the Club Latin players gave there with much success Tuesday, will be repeated Wednesday at 9 p. m. at the club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 26 193

MR. AND MRS. WILLIAM B. BOULTON of Morristown, N. J., and Aiken, S. C., are the guests of Mrs. Boulton's sister, Mrs. Lucien Wulsin and Mr. Wulsin at their residence "The Hermitage," on Madison road. Although no large affairs are being given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Boulton, they are the center of many little informal gatherings. Mrs. Harrison Smith is entertaining them at dinner, Wednesday night, at the Town Club, whence they will go on to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall under auspices of the Artists' Series.

Tuesday night Mrs. Nicholas Longworth assembled a few friends at Rookwood, the Longworth estate on Grandin road, following Ogden Mills' speech at Music Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Boulton and Mr. and Mrs. Wulsin were among the guests.

They will attend the Symphony Concert, Thursday night, and Friday they will hear Mr. William R. Castle, Undersecretary of State, address the Commonwealth Club at its regular monthly dinner and meeting at the Queen City Club.

Mr. and Mrs. Boulton will be here another week when they will return to Morristown before going to Aiken for the early winter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Art Students To "Paint Symphony"

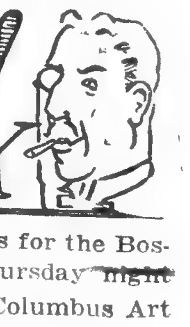
ABOUT 100 young students at the Columbus Art school will attempt an experiment Thursday evening, when they attend the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Memorial hall with a view to transcribing their muscal impressions graphically the following day. Dean Nicodemus of the Are school admits that the assignment is purely experimental.

The concert program, beginning with the classical Corelli, and including, besides the Tschaikowsky Fifth symphony, Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," is exceptionally well suited to the experiment, he believes.

Box office for the sale of season and single admission tickets to the two concerts of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio will continue open until 5 p. m. Thursday in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, after which it will reopen at 7 p. m. in the lobby of Memorial hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OH! I SAY



ONE HUNDRED seats for the Boston Symphony Thursday ~~night~~ are being reserved for Columbus Art School students. Unlike you and you and me, these students can't simply enjoy themselves and let it go at that. For they are going to "attempt an experiment in artistic transcription," to use the words of a newspaper woman who knows far more about art than your humble substitute show reporter.

Thursday night the art students hear the concert. Friday they reconstruct their musical impressions either in pictorial or sculptural form. It is believed that this will result in an increased appreciation of art and musical possibilities, whether the pictures or sculpturing are particularly successful or not.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

1932

JOBLESS HEAR MUSIC

100 Unemployed to Be Guests At Boston Symphony Concert.

About 100 unemployed in Columbus will be guests of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio Thursday night at the annual concert in Memorial Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Another block of 100 tickets has been given to students at Columbus Art School as a part of a program inaugurated this year at the school, on the theory that an attempt to relate the arts will result in increased appreciation of all of them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
POST

OCT 27 193

Boston Symphony Acclaimed Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the 112 men of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played Wednesday night in Music Hall for the second concert of this year's Artist Series, received a tremendous ovation from the huge crowd of music lovers who filled nearly every seat in the house on this occasion, and kept the orchestra and its leader on the stage for many minutes after the close of the program, because of the continued applause.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was one of the most appreciative of the attentive audience, composed of trained symphony listeners who are regular attendants of the Cincinnati orchestra's concerts, and many other music lovers on this occasion, a large number of them from surrounding towns. Mr. and Mrs. Goossens, the latter wearing a striking ensemble of bright red velvet, were guests of Mr. J. H. Thuman, manager of the Artist Series, in his box. Joining them in this loge were Mr. Thuman's daughter, Mary Rose, who wore dark red velvet; his cousin, Miss Janie Hills of Kansas City, who was in French blue, and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, who wore red crepe and a white fur jacket. Mrs. Wulsin's house guests, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Boulton of Morristown, N. J., sat with Mr. Wulsin in seats well down in front.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Wilbur Witt, the latter in a bright blue gown, had the box adjoining, where they were accompanied by a group of friends.

Mr. Stuart M. Thompson, business manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, also was there to hear the visiting orchestra.

He was accompanied by Mrs. Thompson, who wore black velvet. With them were Mr. and Mrs. Roger K. Rogan of Glendale, the latter also choosing black velvet for her attire.

Mrs. John J. Emery, in a long ermine wrap, had with her Dr. and Mme. Liszniewski, the latter in rose and gold brocade.

Mrs. Herbert Witherspoon, who recently arrived in Cincinnati to join Mr. Witherspoon, new director of music at the Conservatory, was among those of the artist set welcomed on this occasion.

Others seen thruout the auditorium and foyer were Mr. and Mrs. Philip Wyman, Mrs. John Wachmann, Mrs. Leo Westheimer, Mr. and Mrs. George Warrington, Miss Patricia O'Brien of Dayton, O.; Mr. and Mrs. Martin Dumler, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischback, the latter in bright green and brown; Mrs. Adolf Hahn, who accompanied Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; Mrs. C. C. Benedict, Miss Mildred Eakes, Miss Grace Woodruff, Misses Mabel and Kay Madden, Mrs. Maurice Henle, Miss Mary Katherine Neely, who was accompanied by Miss Mina Pemberton; Mr. and Mrs. Ladislas Segoe, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Geier, Mr. Edgar Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffmann, Mr. Alexander von Kreisler, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Van Fossen, Miss Mary Johnston, Mr. Louis Saverne, Miss Gertrude Englander who was with Mr. and Mrs. Ben Lowenthal; Mr. Chalmers Hadley, Mrs. Jerome Sturm, Mrs. Arthur Beyer, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, Mr. Josef Cherniavsky, Mr. Howard Cox, Mrs. George F. Otte, Miss Jean Dearness, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Graydon, Miss Alma Betscher, Miss Irene Gromme, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gellenbeck, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Huttenbauer, Mme. Karin Dayas, Mrs. Gretchen Barnes, Mrs. Blanche Greenland, Mrs. Leonard Minster, Mrs. Ralph Pappenheimer, Mrs. Frederick W. Hinkle, Mr. N. Gabor, Miss Jean Simon, Miss Bertha Baur, and Dr. and Mrs. David Philipson.

Among those motoring up from Louisville were Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams, Mr. Stuart J. Simons and Mrs. Charles T. Ballard.

CINCINNNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 27 193

Artist Series Concert

By George A. Leighton.

Hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Music Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program of marvelous worth, made such a vivid impression, so overwhelmed the emotions, that anything less than fervent praise would amount to injustice. And there are 3,500 people who were in Music Hall last night and gave demonstrative expression to their approval, who would rise in indignant wrath—and rightfully so—at any injustice done the visitors.

This gives us a thought. The program was far from light or "popular." It was no prima donna entertainment. There was no audience idol to stir the superficial emotions and tickle the fancy. Yet no prima donna, no popular idol, not even a coloratura but would have been flattered at a reception such as was given the Boston musicians. It was a fitting return for an evening of extraordinary beauty, a compliment as great to those who expressed the approval as to those who gave such outstanding cause for approval.

Three factors entered into the making of a perfect evening. First, a surpassing program; second, a great conductor; third, a splendid ensemble. And after listing these features we suddenly realize they are but one composite factor and hopelessly impaired if shorn of any element. Koussevitsky, the conductor, has made of his ensemble a body responsible to his slightest interpretive indication. He has within himself recreative faculties that place him among the Titans of orchestral leaders. He it was who selected the program and interpreted it. So by infallible reasoning the conclusion is reached that it is to Koussevitsky that first recognition for the perfect evening must be given.

Where to begin! There was the Prokofieff "Classical" symphony, an impulsive, shimmering treatment of old forms that glowed and sparkled under Koussevitsky's direction. The presentation of the finale was as exciting a bit of virtuosity as we ever have heard.

Nuages and Fetes of Debussy, and excerpts from Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite we group together for mention because they so vividly brought to attention the fineness of the various units of the orchestra and their leader's superlative gifts for emotional expression.

After the intermission there was the Brahms C-minor Symphony, to us not the "Tenth," but the FIRST, and played with overpowering authority. Under Koussevitzky it seemed to grow from a classical coldness gradually into the warmest romantic fervor, almost seeming to be program music in his conception of the third movement, and reaching a glorious height of joyous exaltation in the finale.

We haven't the space to say all we would of the countless number of excellences in the presentations. The Boston Orchestra is an instrument that seems never to have exhausted its tonal resources. No matter how hushed a pianissimo, there still is left a softer hush. No matter how grandiose the climax, if needed, there is a greater fortissimo in reserve. And the conductor plays on the instrument with a master's touch. With no semblance of personal display, but with what guidance two remarkable hands and a vibrant personality can give, he recreates wonderful music in a manner to prove all its wonder and beauty. The concert last evening was outstandingly significant and not soon to be forgotten.

Tonight at Emery Auditorium another great orchestra under a great leader will present an excellent program. Perhaps the sensation of hearing a visiting orchestra will stimulate even great pride in our own. Surely the capacity for appreciation shown last evening must be credited to the musical and cultural development created by the long years of service given Cincinnati by its own justly famed orchestra.

Symphony Broadcast

A rare treat awaits radio listeners Friday afternoon.

At 2:30 o'clock, the great Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Eugene Goossens, will play at Emery Auditorium and broadcast over Station WLW Bach's magnificent "Suite in G" from the week's symphony program.

Here is an opportunity to hear the world's finest music, sent over the air to waiting ears by one of the world's finest music ensembles. Don't fail to hear it. The "Suite in G" has never before been played professionally in this city.

Hear it from the air. Realize how heretofore you have cheated yourself. Resolve to come to Emery Auditorium to hear whole concerts of inspiring, soul-stirring music.

It's your orchestra, your musical tradition, your chance to hear, to grow, to serve.

CINCINNNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

AMERICA STANDS SUPREME

In Efforts Toward Education In Music, Koussevitzky Says.

Serge Koussevitzky, in an interview, describes music in America as it had impressed him during his nine years' experience as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard here tonight for the first time in 24 years.

Said Mr. Koussevitzky: "The American people have an inordinate genius for growth. Everyone is active, especially the women. Therefore they have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense business enterprises. No country in the world today is making so great an effort toward education in music."

As specific instances of America's musical development, Mr. Koussevitzky spoke of "her 20 superb orchestras, her promising young composers, such as Copeland, Carpenter and Roger Sessions."

Mr. Koussevitzky has found the response of his American audiences most interesting. Said he: "What is most stimulating about the musical situation in America is that the majority of the people have musical taste. Given an understanding and sympathetic audience, there results a close 'rapport' which I perceive, almost intuitively. To me this is the ultimate achievement—the one justification of the painstaking effort of orchestra and conductor in preparation and performance."

Dorothy Lyon Badham.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

An audience, brilliant, distinguished and impressively enthusiastic, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night as the second offering of the Artist Series. As this notable institution has not been heard here for 20 years, and as the subscription list of this series is a most representative and congenial one, socially and musically, the evening was not only a triumph from those standpoints, but also from the aspect of a vociferous welcome to an internatio ally known musical organizatio greeted as a stranger within th city's gates. Mr. J. H. Thuma was a center of felicitation, an his Artist Series once more a topi of congratulatory satisfaction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

27 193

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WINS OVATION

The Boston Orchestra, playing at Music Hall on Wednesday evening as one of the attractions of the "Artist Series," drew an audience slightly in excess of the throng which habitually attends these delightful concerts. During intermission those who revel in research work tossed about conversationally the last date when the Boston Orchestra visited us. Actually it was "long, long ago, long ago."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who directs the Boston Orchestra, has not, before the Wednesday night concert, directed his organization in this city. But many musicians here went up to Dayton some seasons ago to hear Koussevitzky direct the Boston Orchestra in a concert.

The added flexibility, suavity and congeniality which this famous Russian orchestra director has acquired, with the passing of years spent in this comfortable country, was noted.

So far as the audience is concerned with the appearance of Koussevitzky there is seen a perfectly tailored, quiet man, a figure neither too tall nor too short, a fine face, crowned with heavy gray hair. The orchestra seems its leader aflame.

Dr. Koussevitzky seems to talk every note of the music, his lips move constantly. He uses a very small baton imperceptible to the audience. The left hand entreats signals, warns, commands.

Judging from his Music Hall concert, Dr. Koussevitzky is an adroit program maker. The later styles of Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" seem to possess a proper program position as advancing the two Debussy Nocturnes, "Clouds and Festivals" and the Ravel No. 2 "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite.

This "later" music, far now as it is from being modern, contrasted without dissent, with the Brahms C Minor Symphony No. 1 played after intermission. Because of his puckish spirit, Prokofieff calls his symphony "classical." That classification fits Prokofieff's charming music, as neatly as the school boy's description of a horse as an animal which had four legs, one at each corner. The "Classical Symphony" has four symphonic movements. Within these flexible bounds the music cavorts, captivates, dances and becomes triumphantly irresistible.

We know the Debussy Nocturnes well, the drifting, dissolving clouds, the remote echoes of the people's festival. Dr. Koussevitzky made feature of the music of the passing regiment in Festival. From its background of crowd noises the director detached the little military march, as the music's important feature.

The Boston orchestra plays as an impeccable ensemble, it is given neither to exaggerations nor sudden extremes.

The strings are beautiful, but the director asks from them no more than legitimate expression.

At all times, and for the building of orchestral climaxes, the orchestral body supports the violins, relieving them of that necessity for strenuousness, shrillness too often heard from overworked strings in the Brahms music. The solidity of the ensemble and its entirely musical effect was greatly admired.

NINA PUGH SMITH.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS

OCT 25 1932

Explanatory Lecture By Professor Weaver On Musical Program

An explanatory lecture on the program to be played here Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow by Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Cornell Music Department.

The orchestra will open the University concert series with a concert in Bailey Hall starting at 8:15 Saturday night. Professor Weaver's lecture, open to the public, will be given in the lecture room of the Music Building, 320 Wait Avenue, at 4:30 tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Weaver will also give a brief broadcast on the same program over Station WEAI, starting at 11:15 Thursday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CINCINNATI, O.

TIMES-STAR

OCT 26 1932

MR. AND MRS. WILLIAM B. BOULTON of Morristown, N. J., and Aiken, S. C., are the guests of Mrs. Boulton's sister, Mrs. Lucien Wulsin and Mr. Wulsin at their residence "The Hermitage," on Madison road. Although no large affairs are being given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Boulton, they are the center of many little informal gatherings. Mrs. Harrison Smith is entertaining them at dinner, Wednesday night, at the Town Club, whence they will go on to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall under auspices of the Artists' Series.

Tuesday night Mrs. Nicholas Longworth assembled a few friends at Rookwood, the Longworth estate on Grandin road, following Ogden Mills' speech at Music Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Boulton and Mr. and Mrs. Wulsin were among the guests.

They will attend the Symphony Concert, Thursday night, and Friday they will hear Mr. William R. Castle, Undersecretary of State, address the Commonwealth Club at its regular monthly dinner and meeting at the Queen City Club.

Mr. and Mrs. Boulton will be here another week when they will return to Morristown before going to Aiken for the early winter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COLUMBUS, O.

DISPATCH

OCT 26 1932

Art Students To "Paint Symphony"

ABOUT 100 young students at the Columbus Art school will attempt an experiment Thursday evening, when they attend the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Memorial hall with a view to transcribing their muscal impressions graphically the following day. Dean Nicodemus of the Are school admits that the assignment is purely experimental.

The concert program, beginning with the classical Corelli, and including, besides the Tschaikowsky Fifth symphony, Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," is exceptionally well suited to the experiment, he believes.

Box office for the sale of season and single admission tickets to the two concerts of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio will continue open until 5 p. m. Thursday in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, after which it will reopen at 7 p. m. in the lobby of Memorial hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COLUMBUS, OHIO

CITIZEN

OCT 26 193

OH! I SAY

ONE HUNDRED seats for the Boston Symphony Thursday night are being reserved for Columbus Art School students. Unlike you and you and me, these students can't simply enjoy themselves and let it go at that. For they are going to "attempt an experiment in artistic transcription," to use the words of a newspaper woman who knows far more about art than your humble substitute show reporter.

Thursday night the art students hear the concert. Friday they reconstruct their musical impressions either in pictorial or sculptural form. It is believed that this will result in an increased appreciation of art and musical possibilities, whether the pictures or sculpturing are particularly successful or not.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COLUMBUS, OHIO

CITIZEN

OCT 26 1932

JOBLESS HEAR MUSIC

100 Unemployed to Be Guests At Boston Symphony Concert.

About 100 unemployed in Columbus will be guests of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio Thursday night at the annual concert in Memorial Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Another block of 100 tickets has been given to students at Columbus Art School as a part of a program inaugurated this year at the school, on the theory that an attempt to relate the arts will result in increased appreciation of all of them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CINCINNATI, O.

POST

OCT 27 1932

Boston Symphony Acclaimed Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the 112 men of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played Wednesday night in Music Hall for the second concert of this year's Artist Series, received a tremendous ovation from the huge crowd of music lovers who filled nearly every seat in the house on this occasion, and kept the orchestra and its leader on the stage for many minutes after the close of the program, because of the continued applause.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was one of the most appreciative of the attentive audience, composed of trained symphony listeners who are regular attendants of the Cincinnati orchestra's concerts, and many other music lovers on this occasion, a large number of them from surrounding towns. Mr. and Mrs. Goossens, the latter wearing a striking ensemble of bright red velvet, were guests of Mr. J. H. Thuman, manager of the Artist Series, in his box. Joining them in this loge were Mr. Thuman's daughter, Mary Rose, who wore dark red velvet; his cousin, Miss Janie Hills of Kansas City, who was in French blue, and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, who wore red crepe and a white fur jacket. Mrs. Wulsin's house guests, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Boulton of Morristown, N. J., sat with Mr. Wulsin in seats well down in front.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Wilbur Witt, the latter in a bright blue gown, had the box adjoining, where they were accompanied by a group of friends.

Mr. Stuart M. Thompson, business manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, also was there to hear the visiting orchestra.

He was accompanied by Mrs. Thompson, who wore black velvet. With them were Mr. and Mrs. Roger K. Rogan of Glendale, the latter also choosing black velvet for her attire.

Mrs. John J. Emery, in a long ermine wrap, had with her Dr. and Mme. Liszniewski, the latter in rose and gold brocade.

Mrs. Herbert Witherspoon, who recently arrived in Cincinnati to join Mr. Witherspoon, new director of music at the Conservatory, was among those of the artist set welcomed on this occasion.

Others seen thruout the auditorium and foyer were Mr. and Mrs. Philip Wyman, Mrs. John Wachmann, Mrs. Leo Westheimer, Mr. and Mrs. George Warrington, Miss Patricia O'Brien of Dayton, O.; Mr. and Mrs. Martin Dumler, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischback, the latter in bright green and brown; Mrs. Adolf Hahn, who accompanied Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; Mrs. C. C. Benedict, Miss Mildred Eakes, Miss Grace Woodruff, Misses Mabel and Kay Madden, Mrs. Maurice Henle, Miss Mary Katherine Neely, who was accompanied by Miss Mina Pemberton; Mr. and Mrs. Ladislas Segoe, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Geier, Mr. Edgar Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffmann, Mr. Alexander von Kreisler, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Van Fossen, Miss Mary Johnston, Mr. Louis Saverne, Miss Gertrude Englander who was with Mr. and Mrs. Ben Lowenthal; Mr. Chalmers Hadley, Mrs. Jerome Sturm, Mrs. Arthur Beyer, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, Mr. Josef Cherniavsky, Mr. Howard Cox, Mrs. George F. Otte, Miss Jean Dearness, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Graydon, Miss Alma Betscher, Miss Irene Gromme, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gellenbeck, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Huttenbauer, Mme. Karin Dayas, Mrs. Gretchen Barnes, Mrs. Blanche Greenland, Mrs. Leonard Minster, Mrs. Ralph Pappenheimer, Mrs. Frederick W. Hinkle, Mr. N. Gabor, Miss Jean Simon, Miss Bertha Baur, and Dr. and Mrs. David Philipson.

Among those motoring up from Louisville were Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams, Mr. Stuart J. Simons and Mrs. Charles T. Ballard.

CINCINNATI, O.

ENQUIRER

OCT 27 1932

Artist Series Concert

By George A. Leighton.

Hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Music Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program of marvelous worth, made such a vivid impression, so overwhelmed the emotions, that anything less than fervent praise would amount to injustice. And there are 3,500 people who were in Music Hall last night and gave demonstrative expression to their approval, who would rise in indignant wrath—and rightfully so—at any injustice done the visitors.

This gives us a thought. The program was far from light or "popular." It was no prima donna entertainment. There was no audience idol to stir the superficial emotions and tickle the fancy. Yet no prima donna, no popular idol, not even a coloratura but would have been flattered at a reception such as was given the Boston musicians. It was a fitting return for an evening of extraordinary beauty, a compliment as great to those who expressed the approval as to those who gave such outstanding cause for approval.

Three factors entered into the making of a perfect evening. First, a surpassing program; second, a great conductor; third, a splendid ensemble. And after listing these features we suddenly realize they are but one composite factor and hopelessly impaired if shorn of any element. Koussevitsky, the conductor, has made of his ensemble a body responsible to his slightest interpretive indication. He has within himself recreative faculties that place him among the Titans of orchestral leaders. He it was who selected the program and interpreted it. So by infallible reasoning the conclusion is reached that it is to Koussevitsky that first recognition for the perfect evening must be given.

Where to begin! There was the Prokofieff "Classical" symphony, an impulsive, shimmering treatment of old forms that glowed and sparkled under Koussevitsky's direction. The presentation of the finale was as exciting a bit of virtuosity as we ever have heard.

Nuages and Fetes of Debussy, and excerpts from Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite we group together for mention because they so vividly brought to attention the fineness of the various units of the orchestra and their leader's superlative gifts for emotional expression.

After the intermission there was the Brahms C-minor Symphony, to us not the "Tenth," but the FIRST, and played with overpowering authority. Under Koussevitzky it seemed to grow from a classical coldness gradually into the warmest romantic fervor, almost seeming to be program music in his conception of the third movement, and reaching a glorious height of joyous exaltation in the finale.

We haven't the space to say all we would of the countless number of excellences in the presentations. The Boston Orchestra is an instrument that seems never to have exhausted its tonal resources. No matter how hushed a pianissimo, there still is left a softer hush. No matter how grandiose the climax, if needed, there is a greater fortissimo in reserve. And the conductor plays on the instrument with a master's touch. With no semblance of personal display, but with what guidance two remarkable hands and a vibrant personality can give, he recreates wonderful music in a manner to prove all its wonder and beauty. The concert last evening was outstandingly significant and not soon to be forgotten.

Tonight at Emery Auditorium another great orchestra under a great leader will present an excellent program. Perhaps the sensation of hearing a visiting orchestra will stimulate even great pride in our own. Surely the capacity for appreciation shown last evening must be credited to the musical and cultural development created by the long years of service given Cincinnati by its own justly famed orchestra.

Symphony Broadcast

A rare treat awaits radio listeners Friday afternoon.

At 2:30 o'clock, the great Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Eugene Goossens, will play at Emery Auditorium and broadcast over Station WLW Bach's magnificent "Suite in G" from the week's symphony program.

Here is an opportunity to hear the world's finest music, sent over the air to waiting ears by one of the world's finest music ensembles. Don't fail to hear it. The "Suite in G" has never before been played professionally in this city.

Hear it from the air. Realize how heretofore you have cheated yourself. Resolve to come to Emery Auditorium to hear whole concerts of inspiring, soul-stirring music.

It's your orchestra, your musical tradition, your chance to hear, to grow, to serve.

CINCINNATI, O.

ENQUIRER

OCT 26 1932

AMERICA STANDS SUPREME

In Efforts Toward Education In Music, Koussevitzky Says.

Serge Koussevitzky, in an interview, describes music in America as it had impressed him during his nine years' experience as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard here tonight for the first time in 24 years.

Said Mr. Koussevitzky: "The American people have an inordinate genius for growth. Everyone is active, especially the women. Therefore they have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense business enterprises. No country in the world today is making so great an effort toward education in music."

As specific instances of America's musical development, Mr. Koussevitzky spoke of "her 20 superb orchestras, her promising young composers, such as Copeland, Carpenter and Roger Sessions."

Mr. Koussevitzky has found the response of his American audiences most interesting. Said he: "What is most stimulating about the musical situation in America is that the majority of the people have musical taste. Given an understanding and sympathetic audience, there results a close 'rapport' which I perceive, almost intuitively. To me this is the ultimate achievement—the one justification of the painstaking effort of orchestra and conductor in preparation and performance."

Dorothy Lyon Badham.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CINCINNATI, O.

ENQUIRER

OCT 27 1932

An audience, brilliant, distinguished and impressively enthusiastic, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night as the second offering of the Artist Series. As this notable institution has not been heard here for 20 years, and as the subscription list of this series is a most representative and congenial one, socially and musically, the evening was not only a triumph from those standpoints, but also from the aspect of a vociferous welcome to an internatio ally known musical organizatio greeted as a stranger within th city's gates. Mr. J. H. Thuma was a center of felicitation, an his Artist Series once more a topi of congratulatory satisfaction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CINCINNATI, O.

TIMES-STAR

OCT 27 1932

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WINS OVATION

The Boston Orchestra, playing at Music Hall on Wednesday evening as one of the attractions of the "Artist Series," drew an audience slightly in excess of the throng which habitually attends these delightful concerts. During intermission those who revel in research work tossed about conversationally the last date when the Boston Orchestra visited us. Actually it was "long, long ago, long ago."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who directs the Boston Orchestra, has not, before the Wednesday night concert, directed his organization in this city. But many musicians here went up to Dayton some seasons ago to hear Koussevitzky direct the Boston Orchestra in a concert.

The added flexibility, suavity and congeniality which this famous Russian orchestra director has acquired, with the passing of years spent in this comfortable country, was noted.

So far as the audience is concerned with the appearance of Koussevitzky there is seen a perfectly tailored, quiet man, a figure neither too tall nor too short, a fine face, crowned with heavy gray hair.

The orchestra seems its leader aflame.

Dr. Koussevitzky seems to talk every note of the music, his lips move constantly. He uses a very small baton imperceptible to the audience. The left hand entreats signals, warns, commands.

Judging from his Music Hall concert, Dr. Koussevitzky is an adroit program maker. The later styles of Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" seem to possess a proper program position as advancing the two Debussy Nocturnes, "Clouds and Festivals" and the Ravel No. 2 "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite.

This "later" music, far now as it is from being modern, contrasted without dissent, with the Brahms C Minor Symphony No. 1 played after intermission. Because of his puckish spirit, Prokofieff calls his symphony "classical." That classification fits Prokofieff's charming music, as neatly as the school boy's description of a horse as an animal which had four legs, one at each corner. The "Classical Symphony" has four symphonic movements. Within these flexible bounds the music cavorts, captivates, dances and becomes triumphantly irresistible.

We know the Debussy Nocturnes well, the drifting, dissolving clouds, the remote echoes of the people's festival. Dr. Koussevitzky made feature of the music of the passing regiment in Festival. From its background of crowd noises the director detached the little military march, as the music's important feature.

The Boston orchestra plays as an impeccable ensemble, it is given neither to exaggerations nor sudden extremes.

The strings are beautiful, but the director asks from them no more than legitimate expression.

At all times, and for the building of orchestral climaxes, the orchestral body supports the violins, relieving them of that necessity for strenuousness, shrillness too often heard from overworked strings in the Brahms music. The solidity of the ensemble and its entirely musical effect was greatly admired.

NINA PUGH SMITH.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ITHACA, N. Y.

JOURNAL-NEWS

OCT 25 1932

Explanatory Lecture By Professor Weaver On Musical Program

An explanatory lecture on the program to be played here Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow by Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Cornell Music Department.

The orchestra will open the University concert series with a concert in Bailey Hall starting at 8:15 Saturday night. Professor Weaver's lecture, open to the public, will be given in the lecture room of the Music Building, 320 Wait Avenue, at 4:30 tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Weaver will also give a brief broadcast on the same program over Station WEAI, starting at 11:15 Thursday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 26 1932

MR. AND MRS. WILLIAM B. BOULTON of Morristown, N. J., and Aiken, S. C., are the guests of Mrs. Boulton's sister, Mrs. Lucien Wulsin and Mr. Wulsin at their residence "The Hermitage," on Madison road. Although no large affairs are being given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Boulton, they are the center of many little informal gatherings. Mrs. Harrison Smith is entertaining them at dinner, Wednesday night, at the Town Club, whence they will go on to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall under auspices of the Artists' Series.

Tuesday night Mrs. Nicholas Longworth assembled a few friends at Rookwood, the Longworth estate on Grandin road, following Ogden Mills' speech at Music Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Boulton and Mr. and Mrs. Wulsin were among the guests.

They will attend the Symphony Concert, Thursday night, and Friday they will hear Mr. William R. Castle, Undersecretary of State, address the Commonwealth Club at its regular monthly dinner and meeting at the Queen City Club.

Mr. and Mrs. Boulton will be here another week when they will return to Morristown before going to Aiken for the early winter.

x

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 26 1932

Art Students To "Paint Symphony"

ABOUT 100 young students at the Columbus Art school will attempt an experiment Thursday evening, when they attend the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Memorial hall with a view to transcribing their muscal impressions graphically the following day. Dean Nicodemus of the Are school admits that the assignment is purely experimental.

The concert program, beginning with the classical Corelli, and including, besides the Tschaikowsky Fifth symphony, Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," is exceptionally well suited to the experiment, he believes.

Box office for the sale of season and single admission tickets to the two concerts of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio will continue open until 5 p. m. Thursday in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, after which it will reopen at 7 p. m. in the lobby of Memorial hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 26 1932

ONE HUNDRED seats for the Boston Symphony Thursday ~~night~~ are being reserved for Columbus Art School students. Unlike you and you and me, these students can't simply enjoy themselves and let it go at that. For they are going to "attempt an experiment in artistic transcription," to use the words of a newspaper woman who knows far more about art than your humble substitute show reporter.

Thursday night the art students hear the concert. Friday they reconstruct their musical impressions either in pictorial or sculptural form. It is believed that this will result in an increased appreciation of art and musical possibilities, whether the pictures or sculpturing are particularly successful or not.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 26 1932

JOBLESS HEAR MUSIC

100 Unemployed to Be Guests At Boston Symphony Concert.

About 100 unemployed in Columbus will be guests of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio Thursday night at the annual concert in Memorial Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Another block of 100 tickets has been given to students at Columbus Art School as a part of a program inaugurated this year at the school, on the theory that an attempt to relate the arts will result in increased appreciation of all of them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
POST

OCT 27 1932

Boston Symphony Acclaimed Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the 112 men of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played Wednesday night in Music Hall for the second concert of this year's Artist Series, received a tremendous ovation from the huge crowd of music lovers who filled nearly every seat in the house on this occasion, and kept the orchestra and its leader on the stage for many minutes after the close of the program, because of the continued applause.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was one of the most appreciative of the attentive audience, composed of trained symphony listeners who are regular attendants of the Cincinnati orchestra's concerts, and many other music lovers on this occasion, a large number of them from surrounding towns. Mr. and Mrs. Goossens, the latter wearing a striking ensemble of bright red velvet, were guests of Mr. J. H. Thuman, manager of the Artist Series, in his box. Joining them in this loge were Mr. Thuman's daughter, Mary Rose, who wore dark red velvet; his cousin, Miss Janie Hills of Kansas City, who was in French blue, and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, who wore red crepe and a white fur jacket. Mrs. Wulsin's house guests, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Boulton of Morristown, N. J., sat with Mr. Wulsin in seats well down in front.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Wilbur Witt, the latter in a bright blue gown, had the box adjoining, where they were accompanied by a group of friends.

Mr. Stuart M. Thompson, business manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, also was there to hear the visiting orchestra.

He was accompanied by Mrs. Thompson, who wore black velvet. With them were Mr. and Mrs. Roger K. Rogan of Glendale, the latter also choosing black velvet for her attire.

Mrs. John J. Emery, in a long ermine wrap, had with her Dr. and Mme. Liszniewski, the latter in rose and gold brocade.

Mrs. Herbert Witherspoon, who recently arrived in Cincinnati to join Mr. Witherspoon, new director of music at the Conservatory, was among those of the artist set welcomed on this occasion.

Others seen thruout the auditorium and foyer were Mr. and Mrs. Philip Wyman, Mrs. John Wachmann, Mrs. Leo Westheimer, Mr. and Mrs. George Warrington, Miss Patricia O'Brien of Dayton, O.; Mr. and Mrs. Martin Dumler, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischback, the latter in bright green and brown; Mrs. Adolf Hahn, who accompanied Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; Mrs. C. C. Benedict, Miss Mildred Eakes, Miss Grace Woodruff, Misses Mabel and Kay Madden, Mrs. Maurice Henle, Miss Mary Katherine Neely, who was accompanied by Miss Mina Pemberton; Mr. and Mrs. Ladislas Segoe, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Geier, Mr. Edgar Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffmann, Mr. Alexander von Kreisler, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Van Fossen, Miss Mary Johnston, Mr. Louis Saverne, Miss Gertrude Englander who was with Mr. and Mrs. Ben Lowenthal; Mr. Chalmers Hadley, Mrs. Jerome Sturm, Mrs. Arthur Beyer, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, Mr. Josef Cherniavsky, Mr. Howard Cox, Mrs. George F. Otte, Miss Jean Dearness, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Graydon, Miss Alma Betscher, Miss Irene Gromme, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gellenbeck, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Huttenbauer, Mme. Karin Dayas, Mrs. Gretchen Barnes, Mrs. Blanche Greenland, Mrs. Leonard Minster, Mrs. Ralph Pappenheimer, Mrs. Frederick W. Hinkle, Mr. N. Gabor, Miss Jean Simon, Miss Bertha Baur, and Dr. and Mrs. David Philipson.

Among those motoring up from Louisville were Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams, Mr. Stuart J. Simons and Mrs. Charles T. Ballard.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 27 1932

Artist Series Concert

By George A. Leighton.

Hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Music Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program of marvelous worth, made such a vivid impression, so overwhelmed the emotions, that anything less than fervent praise would amount to injustice. And there are 3,500 people who were in Music Hall last night and gave demonstrative expression to their approval, who would rise in indignant wrath—and rightfully so—at any injustice done the visitors.

This gives us a thought. The program was far from light or "popular." It was no prima donna entertainment. There was no audience idol to stir the superficial emotions and tickle the fancy. Yet no prima donna, no popular idol, not even a coloratura but would have been flattered at a reception such as was given the Boston musicians. It was a fitting return for an evening of extraordinary beauty, a compliment as great to those who expressed the approval as to those who gave such outstanding cause for approval.

Three factors entered into the making of a perfect evening. First, a surpassing program; second, a great conductor; third, a splendid ensemble. And after listing these features we suddenly realize they are but one composite factor and hopelessly impaired if shorn of any element. Koussevitsky, the conductor, has made of his ensemble a body responsible to his slightest interpretive indication. He has within himself recreative faculties that place him among the Titans of orchestral leaders. He it was who selected the program and interpreted it. So by infallible reasoning the conclusion is reached that it is to Koussevitsky that first recognition for the perfect evening must be given.

Where to begin! There was the Prokofieff "Classical" symphony, an impulsive, shimmering treatment of old forms that glowed and sparkled under Koussevitsky's direction. The presentation of the finale was as exciting a bit of virtuosity as we ever have heard.

Nuages and Fetes of Debussy, and excerpts from Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite we group together for mention because they so vividly brought to attention the fineness of the various units of the orchestra and their leader's superlative gifts for emotional expression.

After the intermission there was the Brahms C-minor Symphony, to us not the "Tenth," but the FIRST, and played with overpowering authority. Under Koussevitzky it seemed to grow from a classical coldness gradually into the warmest romantic fervor, almost seeming to be program music in his conception of the third movement, and reaching a glorious height of joyous exaltation in the finale.

We haven't the space to say all we would of the countless number of excellences in the presentations. The Boston Orchestra is an instrument that seems never to have exhausted its tonal resources. No matter how hushed a pianissimo, there still is left a softer hush. No matter how grandiose the climax, if needed, there is a greater fortissimo in reserve. And the conductor plays on the instrument with a master's touch. With no semblance of personal display, but with what guidance two remarkable hands and a vibrant personality can give, he recreates wonderful music in a manner to prove all its wonder and beauty. The concert last evening was outstandingly significant and not soon to be forgotten.

Tonight at Emery Auditorium another great orchestra under a great leader will present an excellent program. Perhaps the sensation of hearing a visiting orchestra will stimulate even great pride in our own. Surely the capacity for appreciation shown last evening must be credited to the musical and cultural development created by the long years of service given Cincinnati by its own justly famed orchestra.

Symphony Broadcast

A rare treat awaits radio listeners Friday afternoon.

At 2:30 o'clock, the great Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Eugene Goossens, will play at Emery Auditorium and broadcast over Station WLW Bach's magnificent "Suite in G" from the week's symphony program.

Here is an opportunity to hear the world's finest music, sent over the air to waiting ears by one of the world's finest music ensembles. Don't fail to hear it. The "Suite in G" has never before been played professionally in this city.

Hear it from the air. Realize how heretofore you have cheated yourself. Resolve to come to Emery Auditorium to hear whole concerts of inspiring, soul-stirring music.

It's your orchestra, your musical tradition, your chance to hear, to grow, to serve.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 26 1932

AMERICA STANDS SUPREME

In Efforts Toward Education In Music, Koussevitzky Says.

Serge Koussevitzky, in an interview, describes music in America as it had impressed him during his nine years' experience as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard here tonight for the first time in 24 years.

Said Mr. Koussevitzky: "The American people have an inordinate genius for growth. Everyone is active, especially the women. Therefore they have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense business enterprises. No country in the world today is making so great an effort toward education in music."

As specific instances of America's musical development, Mr. Koussevitzky spoke of "her 20 superb orchestras, her promising young composers, such as Copeland, Carpenter and Roger Sessions."

Mr. Koussevitzky has found the response of his American audiences most interesting. Said he: "What is most stimulating about the musical situation in America is that the majority of the people have musical taste. Given an understanding and sympathetic audience, there results a close 'rapport' which I perceive, almost intuitively. To me this is the ultimate achievement—the one justification of the painstaking effort of orchestra and conductor in preparation and performance."

Dorothy Lyon Badham.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 27 1932

An audience, brilliant, distinguished and impressively enthusiastic, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night as the second offering of the Artist Series. As this notable institution has not been heard here for 20 years, and as the subscription list of this series is a most representative and congenial one, socially and musically, the evening was not only a triumph from those standpoints, but also from the aspect of a vociferous welcome to an internationally known musical organization, greeted as a stranger within the city's gates. Mr. J. H. Thuman was a center of felicitation, and his Artist Series once more a topic of congratulatory satisfaction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 27 1932

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WINS OVATION

The Boston Orchestra, playing at Music Hall on Wednesday evening as one of the attractions of the "Artist Series," drew an audience slightly in excess of the throng which habitually attends these delightful concerts. During intermission those who revel in research work tossed about conversationally the last date when the Boston Orchestra visited us. Actually it was "long, long ago, long ago."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who directs the Boston Orchestra, has not, before the Wednesday night concert, directed his organization in this city. But many musicians here went up to Dayton some seasons ago to hear Koussevitzky direct the Boston Orchestra in a concert.

The added flexibility, suavity and congeniality which this famous Russian orchestra director has acquired, with the passing of years spent in this comfortable country, was noted.

So far as the audience is concerned with the appearance of Koussevitzky there is seen a perfectly tailored, quiet man, a figure neither too tall nor too short, a fine face, crowned with heavy gray hair.

The orchestra seems its leader aflame.

Dr. Koussevitzky seems to talk every note of the music, his lips move constantly. He uses a very small baton imperceptible to the audience. The left hand entreats signals, warns, commands.

Judging from his Music Hall concert, Dr. Koussevitzky is an adroit program maker. The later styles of Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" seem to possess a proper program position as advancing the two Debussy Nocturnes, "Clouds and Festivals" and the Ravel No. 2 "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite.

This "later" music, far now as it is from being modern, contrasted without dissent, with the Brahms C Minor Symphony No. 1 played after intermission. Because of his puckish spirit, Prokofieff calls his symphony "classical." That classification fits Prokofieff's charming music, as neatly as the school boy's description of a horse as an animal which had four legs, one at each corner. The "Classical Symphony" has four symphonic movements. Within these flexible bounds the music cavorts, captivates, dances and becomes triumphantly irresistible.

We know the Debussy Nocturnes well, the drifting, dissolving clouds, the remote echoes of the people's festival. Dr. Koussevitzky made feature of the music of the passing regiment in Festival. From its background of crowd noises the director detached the little military march, as the music's important feature.

The Boston orchestra plays as an impeccable ensemble, it is given neither to exaggerations nor sudden extremes.

The strings are beautiful, but the director asks from them no more than legitimate expression.

At all times, and for the building of orchestral climaxes, the orchestral body supports the violins, relieving them of that necessity for strenuousness, shrillness too often heard from overworked strings in the Brahms music. The solidity of the ensemble and its entirely musical effect was greatly admired.

NINA PUGH SMITH.

HIS CLIPPING FROM HACA, N. Y.
NAL-NEWS

OCT 25 1932

Explanatory Lecture By Professor Weaver On Musical Program

An explanatory lecture on the program to be played here Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow by Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Cornell Music Department.

The orchestra will open the University concert series with a concert in Bailey Hall starting at 8:15 Saturday night. Professor Weaver's lecture, open to the public, will be given in the lecture room of the Music Building, 320 Wait Avenue, at 4:30 tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Weaver will also give a brief broadcast on the same program over Station WEAI, starting at 11:15 Thursday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ATTRACTS LARGE AUDIENCE—The Music Hall for the second attraction of the Artist Series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was again filled to capacity with a large and fashionable audience, Wednesday evening.

The return of Lily Pons, which is the third of the Artists' Series, is a much looked forward to event, Friday evening, November 11. She spent the summer in South America where she received as great an ovation as she did at previous concerts in Cincinnati, and no doubt will be greeted again by an immense audience.

Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens, who entertained at supper at the Hotel Gibson following the concert Wednesday in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky, were the guests in the box of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Thuman. Mrs. Goossens's cherry red velvet gown was worn with a short jacket trimmed with Kolinsky fur, and Mrs. Thuman was gowned in a rose crepe.

Among those observed in groups during the intermission and promenading in the foyer were many from out of town. Louisville, Springfield and Dayton being represented by a number of the musically inclined.

Mrs. Harry Martin (Margaret Buchwalter) and her son, Oscar, motored from Springfield for the concert. Miss Bertha Baur was accompanied by Mrs. Birmingham of San Francisco. Mr. and Mrs. J. K. Pollock had with them Mrs. Robert Richards of California and her son, Mr. Murray Richards. The Prince and Princess Vasili, who are now established in their residence on Indian Hill, were greeted by many friends which they have made since coming to Cincinnati. Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Emery and Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Henry were surrounded by friends, as were also Mr. and Mrs. George Dana, Dr. and Mrs. Albert James Bell, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Harrison, Mrs. Thomas B. Paxton, who wore an emerald green crepe, the cape on the bodice trimmed with ruchings; Mr. and Mrs. Roger Rogan; Mrs. Rogan wore a corsage of orchids with her black crepe evening gown; Miss Beatrice Shillito in a black evening gown, the bodice with one of the smart cape effects over the shoulders was brightened by a trimming of rhinestones.

Mrs. George Warrinton wore a beige crepe. Mrs. Harold Nichols, in a maroon crepe gown, was accompanied by Miss Grace Rowe. Mrs. Wallace Gray's evening cloak was worn over a black evening gown. Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Ewing Clark, Mrs. Clark in a white gown. Mr. Morison Waite was accompanied by his daughter, Miss Ione, whose white fur cloak was worn over a royal blue chiffon. Dr. and Mrs. Henry M. Goodyear, Mrs. Goodyear in a brown velvet gown, the bodice trimmed with flesh-colored chiffon.

Mrs. Lucien Wulsin was accompanied by her sister, Mrs. William Boulton and Mr. Boulton of Aiken, S. Carolina. Mrs. H. Achilles Pugh and her daughter, Miss Elizabeth, enjoyed the concert together. Mrs. Peter Thomson, who is a great lover of music was surrounded by many friends. Mr. Harry Breneman was accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. Van Meter Ames. Others in the large audience were Mr. and Mrs. Green Fenley, Jr., Miss Julie Anderson, Dr. Beverly Bond, Mrs. Harley Morrison, Mrs. William Ernst Minor, Mrs. James Morrison, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Rapp, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Kreimer, Mrs. C. C. Benedict, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischback, Mrs. Philip Wyman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. James De Camp, Dr. and Mrs. Albert Freiberg, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Chandler, Mrs. H. Frederick Schaefer and her daughters, Misses Louise and Mary, Mrs. Walter Freiberg, Mme. Marguerita Liszniewska, Mme. Vladimer Bakaleinikoff, Mrs. Adolph Hahn, Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith, Mrs. Frank Bahlman, Mrs. Virginius Hall, Mr. Karl Burckhardt, Mrs. Robert Hilton, Mrs. John Crawford Pogue, Mrs. William H. Hoppe, Mrs. Louise Maddux Kinney, Mrs. Abbot Thayer, Dr. and Mrs. Richard Austin, Mrs. Fred F. Bernard and her son, Mr. Charles McLaughlin, Mr. Fred Yeiser, Mrs. Henry Yeiser, Jr., Mrs. Harrison Smith, the Rev. Robert Lambert and Mrs. Lambert, Mr. Griffith R. Resor, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Fenton Lawson, Miss Mardi Hunt, Mrs. Glendenning Groesbeck, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. R. Alexander, Mr. Raymond Kunkel, who was accompanied by his mother, Mrs. Frank Kunkel, and Mr. and Mrs. Robert A. Cline.

—x—

OHIO STATE JOURNAL
OCT 28 – '32

Large House Hears Boston Music Group

Memorial Hall Balcony Is Filled for Appearance Here of Koussevitzky.

By HAROLD G. DAVIDSON.

IF you ever doubt that symphony is the highest form of the greatest of the fine arts, then you should hear a perfect orchestra like the Boston conducted by such a genius as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

It is absolutely false economy to pass up such an opportunity for happiness. No real music lover in good health lost that chance last night at the old hall. The balcony was packed solid and the lower floor showed few blotches of emptiness. It was a grand, gala, successful affair. More crowds like this will insure more than two concerts, sponsored by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, in the far, if not near, future.

When Koussevitzky sauntered leisurely across the stage to the conductor's stand, the audience, while applauding, rose in deference. As far as we know, Columbus is the only place where that is done and it bespeaks far more respect than the beating of palms upon palms.

In many respects we are in thorough accord with Koussevitzky's method of planning a program. The auditory appetite should always be whetted with something rich and well-aged like ripe wine. The Chianti was a Suite by Corelli. The leader drew forth long strands of full string tone in the serene Sarabande. The Gigue, in gayer mood, was followed by the even brighter Badinerie which spun and swirled, rejoicing in the delightful effect of muted strings and a pizzicato of plucked accompaniment.

Again we agree with the celebrated doctor of music. The right place for modern music is second on the program and not last, especially when it is not, to use Stokowsky's phrase — "debatable music." We have all heard Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" played here by other orchestras. But which one has ever played it better or as well? The subtleties of Debussy's gossamer orchestration are only audible when such an interesting medium is present in the flesh.

After hearing these two numbers we feel more than ever like throwing all radios and gramaphones into the Scioto River.

Debussy's "Nueges" are not described by the composer as being the cotton-line cumulus clouds of midsummer. And we are glad to know it. We have always felt something brooding and autumnal in the close, low intervals of the wood-wind introduction. The second Nocturne, "Fetes" or "Festivals," was performed with becoming alternations of brilliance and light sprightliness. The always delightful duet, often played offstage as if coming from a great distance, was perfectly delivered by two mighty sure-lipped trumpeters with muted instruments. This effect, with soft harp accompaniment, is one of the cleverest effects in all of Debussy's orchestral compositions.

The compositions of Tchaikovsky, we feel, are usually given to please the people. But Koussevitzky conducts the music of this fellow countryman as if he really loved it passionately. The melodies of Tschaikovsky, unlike the bold angularity of Strauss' "Don Juan" theme, have a grace and curvature in the skillfully woven tone-lines which is singable, hummable, whistleable. They cling to the memory but not eternally. They have the virtue of being forgetable over a reasonable period of time. The Boston leader drew forth these smooth phrases with persuasive gestures, suave and inviting. There is variety in Koussevitzky. He's fun to watch.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PRESENTS BRILLIANT PROGRAM

OCT. 28

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts With Accustomed Mastery

Works by Corelli, Debussy, Strauss and Tchaikowsky Evoke Enthusiasm of Large Audience at Symphony Club's Opening Concert.

JUST as he transmutes black notes printed on white paper into living sound, smoothly clear or turbulently impassioned, Serge Koussevitzky, Thursday night at Memorial Hall, with the magic of his art transformed the welcoming cordiality of his hearers into reverberating, enthusiastic acclaim.

Three times he brought the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to their feet in response. For climax, after old orchestral custom, he had a congratulatory handclasp for Mr. Burgin, the concertmaster.

"Revelator"

Koussevitzky

Thus began the ninth season of the Symphony Club of central Ohio. In fatter years it may have filled the auditorium with more people, seldom with more enthusiasm. And that is not to imply that Thursday's "house" was a matter for regret; on the contrary, weeks of work on the part of the diligent women of the organization resulted in increased rather than diminished attendance. A crowd of 3000 or better sat spellbound, departed still under the enchantment.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY could have devised no program better to serve both his own ends and the diverse tastes of his hearers.

He doubtless comes on tour, proud of his achievements, to show far cities the perfection of his instrument. Thus he chooses pieces in which the string choir can display its singing buoyancy, in which brasses may glow with rich and varied color, in which the solo voices of his incomparable woodwinds stand out, now and again, in etched beauty.

At the same time he (wise showman) knows that a program for an audience that hears but two or three in a season cannot be built like those for his own Symphony Hall. There all manner of men may be satisfied in a score and more of programs. Here they must be made happy with one.

So the list stood with the ancient Corelli's chamber music rearranged for his strings, Debussy's two Nocturnes for cool, shadowy color, the "Don Juan" of Strauss for fire and brilliance, Tchaikowsky's Fifth for familiar symphony, reawakened by his searching and revealing interpretation.

Nothing is there that may be classed as novelty, but neither is there anything that age has staled or repetition, in Columbus concert halls, has worn thin.

* * *

THE nameless author of a familiar Negro spiritual coined a word which may aptly be applied to Dr. Koussevitzky. The pious singer, full of the confused mystical promises of the last book of the New Testament, chanted of "John the Revelator." No more orthodox word so completely describes a special quality of this conductor.

He takes Corelli's score (as tactfully revised for string orchestra by one Ettore Pinelli) and by the happiest of phrasing and of pacing, by a delicate accent of rhythm here or of an inner voice there, sets it before us with its proportions and patterns revealed as at a glance.

He takes the lazily floating clouds of Debussy's fancy or his impressions of a nocturnal festival with its unearthly dazzling procession, and conjures up the composer's very visions for us from the multiple voices of his orchestra.

He takes the restless passions of Strauss' hero, tosses them about here and there among his instruments as poor, disillusioned Don Juan was tossed in his endless quest, and there stands revealed to us the epitome of a human experience.

Upon Tchaikowsky's symphony the conductor seized as if he himself had wrought the rich tapestries of the music. I venture to say the composer might have welcomed the revelation that resulted. The contrapuntal blend was just, melodramatic or morbid overtones were muffled, the adroit pattern of theme against theme was clarified in Dr. Koussevitzky's reading. Even if he did not adhere strictly to the letter of his printed instructions, Tchaikowsky must have been glad of the small liberties.

* * *

TO all this must be added a word of the self-revelation of the conductor amidst these luminous glimpses of the music he offered us. He renewed the impressions we carry in our mind's ear from season to season of his tremendous orchestral technique. We laymen can only begin to appreciate the sheer virtuosity of Thursday's performance; at the command of his baton miracles, we may be sure, were accomplished in the serried black and white ranks of his players.

Then, too, the present program showed, as no other here has, the musical internationality of the man (if I, in turn, may coin a word). Each composer stood in his own century, his own country, his own mood. It seemed scarcely the same orchestra that left the illusive and sensuous measures of Debussy to attack the fiery ardor of Strauss.

As long as the Boston orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky bring such a performance to us once in a long year, we cannot indulge in too much self-pity for a curtailed symphony season.

R. L. F. MC COMBS.

---

* * *

THE THURSDAY NIGHT concert this week in Emery Auditorium, for the first of the third pair of concerts, with Mme. Goeta Ljungberg as soloist, brought out an enthusiastic audience to hear the program and show their appreciation of their own Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, after listening the preceding night to the splendid concert of the Boston Symphony in Cincinnati.

Mrs. Eugene Goossens, wife of the orchestra conductor, shared her loge for the Thursday program with Mrs. Bakaleinikoff and Mr. and Mrs. Milan Petrovic. Mrs. Goossens was in a low cut black lace, Mrs. Bakaleinikoff in cerise, and Mrs. Petrovic in white with a gold lame wrap.

In the adjoining box Prince and Princess Vassili, who have chosen Cincinnati as their home for the coming year at least, sat with Dr. and Mme. Karol Liszniewski and Mrs. C. A. Dykstra. The princess wore a dark red velvet jacket over a white gown; Mme. Liszniewski was in black with a brocade wrap, and Mrs. Dykstra in all white.

With Mrs. J. Walter Freiberg in her box on the right were Mrs. Leo Westheimer, in all black, and Dr. and Mrs. Joseph Freiberg, the latter a lovely picture in black velvet with puffed sleeves of gold and green brocade.

Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Benedict were in their places in the box which they share this year with Mrs. Peter G. Thomson, the latter wearing an all-white gown. Mrs. Benedict also chose a white gown, wearing over it a bright red velvet wrap.

Mrs. Clifford B. Wright, in black lace, was accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Howard Luther, in bright blue chiffon, and Mr. Luther, who sat with her in her box on the left.

Adjoining them in the Livingood loge, Mrs. Livingood had with her her daughter, Mrs. Virginius Hall and Mr. Hall.

With Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Schiffeler for this symphony in their box were Mr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffman, the latter wearing Franch blue velvet under a rose velvet wrap. Mrs. Schiffeler was in bright red.

Mrs. Herbert French heard the concert from his box in the balcony, Miss Bertha Baur also having box seats on the second flood.

Among those seen thruout the lower floor and in the foyer during the intermission, which always proves a delightful period for social reunions, were: Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, Mr. C. A. Dykstra, who occupied his box in the balcony; Mrs. Otto Geier, who wore a lovely pastel green satin gown and was accompanied by Dr. Geier; Dr. and Mrs. Fischback, the latter in a striking gown of cerise; Mrs. John Wachman, in black velvet; Miss Betty Besuner, Mrs. Rudolph Wurlitzer, who had with her her sister, Miss Elise Richards; Miss Helen Kay, with Miss Amy Sherlock; Mrs. Mabel Freiberg Straus, who wore a dark green ensemble; Miss Mabel Madden, with Mrs. Samuel Huttenbauer, both of them choosing black velvet; Mme. Karin Dayas, who wore rust velvet; Mr. and Mrs. Harold Bergen, Dr. Samuel Rabkin, accompanied by his daughter; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Twitchell, the latter wearing black velvet; Miss Mildred Eakes, Miss Miriam Marting, Mrs. Joseph Cherniavsky, who was with Mrs. Mikhail Stolarevsky; Mrs. Julian Pulikowsky, Mrs. Adolf Hahn, who was with Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; Mrs. Lillian Tyler Plogstedt, Mr. David Rosenberg, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Miss Florence Barbour, Mrs. C. C. Aler and her son, Mr. Samuel Wilson; Dr. and Mrs. James G. Heller, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Ericourt, the latter in all black; Mr. and Mrs. Fenton Lawson, Mrs. Lawson wearing bright French blue; Mrs. Walter Draper, who was in all white; Miss Mollie Halstead, and Mr. and Mrs. John Ditmars, the latter in black satin.

The soloist's gown was a matter of comment among the women, Mme. Ljungberg making a lovely appearance in white and silver brocade with a huge green ostrich band across one shoulder and fastened at the waistline front and back. She was presented at the close of her first group of songs, with a basket of huge yellow chrysanthemums.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 25 1932

To Entertain Conductor

Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens are entertaining Wednesday night at a supper party at the Gibson Hotel in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives a concert Wednesday night at Music Hall, for the second program of the Artist Series.

Mr. and Mrs. Goossens are keeping their party after the concert very small and informal, asking just a few of Dr. Koussevitsky's personal friends here.

The Boston conductor and his 110 men of the orchestra, will arrive in Cincinnati Wednesday at 8:35 a. m. and will stay at the Gibson Hotel. With them also is their manager, G. E. Judd. They come here from Ann Arbor, Mich., and will remain overnight here Wednesday, going Thursday morning to Columbus for a concert there that night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

(2)

OCT 25 1932

Explanatory Lecture By Professor Weaver On Musical Program

An explanatory lecture on the program to be played here Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow by Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Cornell Music Department.

The orchestra will open the University concert series with a concert in Bailey Hall starting at 8:15 Saturday night. Professor Weaver's lecture, open to the public, will be

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

BOSTON S
ORCHESTE
ATTRACTS

The Music traction of Boston Sym
Dr. Serge K
was again filled to capacity with a large and fashionable audience, Wednesday evening.

The return of Lily Pons, which is the third of the Artists' Series, is a much looked forward to event, Friday evening, November 11. She spent the summer in South America where she received as great an ovation as she did at previous concerts in Cincinnati, and no doubt will be greeted again by an immense audience.

Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens, who entertained at supper at the Hotel Gibson following the concert Wednesday in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky, were the guests in the box of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Thuman. Mrs. Goossens's cherry red velvet gown was worn with a short jacket trimmed with Kolinsky fur, and Mrs. Thuman was gowned in a rose crepe.

Among those observed in groups during the intermission and promenading in the foyer were many from out of town. Louisville, Springfield and Dayton being represented by a number of the musically inclined.

Mrs. Harry Martin (Margaret Buchwalter) and her son, Oscar, motored from Springfield for the concert. Miss Bertha Baur was accompanied by Mrs. Birmingham of San Francisco. Mr. and Mrs. J. K. Pollock had with them Mrs. Robert Richards of California and her son, Mr. Murray Richards. The Prince and Princess Vasili, who are now established in their residence on Indian Hill, were greeted by many friends which they have made since coming to Cincinnati. Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Emery and Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Henry were surrounded by friends, as were also Mr. and Mrs. George Dana, Dr. and Mrs. Albert James Bell, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Harrison, Mrs. Thomas B. Paxton, who wore an emerald green crepe, the cape on the bodice trimmed with ruchings; Mr. and Mrs. Roger Rogan; Mrs. Rogan wore a corsage of orchids with her black crepe evening gown; Miss Beatrice Shillito in a black evening gown, the bodice with one of the smart cape effects over the shoulders was brightened by a trimming of rhinestones.

Mrs. George Warrinton wore a beige crepe. Mrs. Harold Nichols, in a maroon crepe gown, was accompanied by Miss Grace Rowe. Mrs. Wallace Gray's evening cloak was worn over a black evening gown. Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Ewing Clark, Mrs. Clark in a white gown. Mr. Morison Waite was accompanied by his daughter, Miss Ione, whose white fur cloak was worn over a royal blue chiffon. Dr. and Mrs. Henry M. Goodyear, Mrs. Goodyear in a brown velvet gown, the bodice trimmed with flesh-colored chiffon.

Mrs. Lucien Wulsin was accompanied by her sister, Mrs. William Boulton and Mr. Boulton of Aiken, S. Carolina. Mrs. H. Achilles Pugh and her daughter, Miss Elizabeth, enjoyed the concert together. Mrs. Peter Thomson, who is a great lover of music was surrounded by many friends. Mr. Harry Breneman was accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. Van Meter Ames. Others in the large audience were Mr. and Mrs. Green Fenley, Jr., Miss Julie Anderson, Dr. Beverly Bond, Mrs. Harley Morrison, Mrs. William Ernst Minor, Mrs. James Morrison, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Rapp, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Kreimer, Mrs. C. C. Benedict, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischback, Mrs. Philip Wyman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. James De Camp, Dr. and Mrs. Albert Freiberg, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Chandler, Mrs. H. Frederick Schaefer and her daughters, Misses Louise and Mary, Mrs. Walter Freiberg, Mme. Marguerita Liszniewska, Mme. Vladimer Bakaleinikoff, Mrs. Adolph Hahn, Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith, Mrs. Frank Bahlman, Mrs. Virginius Hall, Mr. Karl Burckhardt, Mrs. Robert Hilton, Mrs. John Crawford Pogue, Mrs. William H. Hoppe, Mrs. Louise Maddux Kinney, Mrs. Abbot Thayer, Dr. and Mrs. Richard Austin, Mrs. Fred F. Bernard and her son, Mr. Charles McLaughlin, Mr. Fred Yeiser, Mrs. Henry Yeiser, Jr., Mrs. Harrison Smith, the Rev. Robert Lambert and Mrs. Lambert, Mr. Griffith R. Resor, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Fenton Lawson, Miss Mardi Hunt, Mrs. Glendenning Groesbeck, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. R. Alexander, Mr. Raymond Kunkel, who was accompanied by his mother, Mrs. Frank Kunkel, and Mr. and Mrs. Robert A. Cline.

—x—

OHIO STATE JOURNAL

Large House

h Was Called

Curtis Relates

DECEIT IS LAID

ined for Appearance Here of Koussevitzky.

By HAROLD G. DAVIDSON.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

IF you ever doubt that symphony is the highest form of the greatest of the fine arts, then you should hear a perfect orchestra like the Boston conducted by such a genius as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It is absolutely false economy to pass up such an opportunity for happiness. No real music lover in good health lost that chance last night at the old hall. The balcony was packed solid and the lower floor showed few blotches of emptiness. It was a grand, gala, successful affair. More crowds like this will insure more than two concerts, sponsored by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, in the far, if not near, future.

When Koussevitzky sauntered leisurely across the stage to the conductor's stand, the audience, while applauding, rose in deference. As far as we know, Columbus is the only place where that is done and it bespeaks far more respect than the beating of palms upon palms.

In many respects we are in thorough accord with Koussevitzky's method of planning a program. The auditory appetite should always be whetted with something rich and well-aged like ripe wine. The Chianti was a Suite by Corelli. The leader drew forth long strands of full string tone in the serene Sarabande. The Gigue, in gayer mood, was followed by the even brighter Badinerie which spun and swirled, rejoicing in the delightful effect of muted strings and a pizzicato of plucked accompaniment.

Again we agree with the celebrated doctor of music. The right place for modern music is second on the program and not last, especially when it is not, to use Stokowsky's phrase — "debatable music." We have all heard Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" played here by other orchestras. But which one has ever played it better or as well? The subtleties of Debussy's gossamer orchestration are only audible when such an interesting medium is present in the flesh.

After hearing these two numbers we feel more than ever like throwing all radios and gramaphones into the Scioto River.

Debussy's "Nueges" are not described by the composer as being the cotton-line cumulus clouds of midsummer. And we are glad to know it. We have always felt something brooding and autumnal in the close, low intervals of the wood-wind introduction. The second Nocturne, "Fetes" or "Festivals," was performed with becoming alternations of brilliance and light sprightliness. The always delightful duet, often played offstage as if coming from a great distance, was perfectly delivered by two mighty sure-lipped trumpeters with muted instruments. This effect, with soft harp accompaniment, is one of the cleverest effects in all of Debussy's orchestral compositions.

The compositions of Tchaikovsky, we feel, are usually given to please the people. But Koussevitzky conducts the music of this fellow countryman as if he really loved it passionately. The melodies of Tschaikovsky, unlike the bold angularity of Strauss' "Don Juan" theme, have a grace and curvature in the skillfully woven tone-lines which is singable, hummable, whistleable. They cling to the memory but not eternally. They have the virtue of being forgetable over a reasonable period of time. The Boston leader drew forth these smooth phrases with persuasive gestures, suave and inviting. There is variety in Koussevitzky. He's fun to watch.

PAGE 16

THE COLUMBUS CITIZEN

national administration with laxity during the stock speculation flurry in Wall Street in 1929.

Cites New York Laws.

"The national government has con-

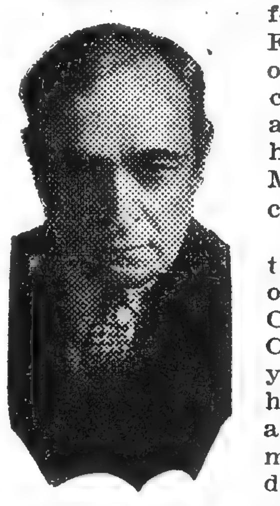
DEM WET STAND

vitzky Conducts With Accustomed Mastery

Works by Corelli, Debussy, Strauss and Tchaikowsky Evoke Enthusiasm of Large Audience at Symphony Club's Opening Concert.

JUST as he transmutes black notes printed on white paper into living sound, smoothly clear or turbulently impassioned, Serge Koussevitzky, Thursday night at Memorial Hall, with the magic of his art transformed the welcoming cordiality of his hearers into reverberating, enthusiastic acclaim.

"Revelator"



Koussevitzky

Three times he brought the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to their feet in response. For climax, after old orchestral custom, he had a congratulatory handclasp for Mr. Burgin, the concertmaster.

Thus began the ninth season of the Symphony Club of central Ohio. In fatter years it may have filled the auditorium with more people, seldom with more enthusiasm. And that is not to imply that Thursday's "house" was a matter for regret; on the contrary, weeks of work on the part of the diligent women of the organization resulted in increased rather than diminished attendance. A crowd of 3000 or better sat spellbound, departed still under the enchantment.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY could have devised no program better to serve both his own ends and the diverse tastes of his hearers.

He doubtless comes on tour, proud of his achievements, to show far cities the perfection of his instrument. Thus he chooses pieces in which the string choir can display its singing buoyancy, in which brasses may glow with rich and varied color, in which the solo voices of his incomparable woodwinds stand out, now and again, in etched beauty.

At the same time he (wise showman) knows that a program for an audience that hears but two or three in a season cannot be built like those for his own Symphony Hall. There all manner of men may be satisfied in a score and more of programs. Here they must be made happy with one.

So the list stood with the ancient Corelli's chamber music rearranged for his strings, Debussy's two Nocturnes for cool, shadowy color, the "Don Juan" of Strauss for fire and brilliance, Tchaikowsky's Fifth for familiar symphony, reawakened by his searching and revealing interpretation.

Nothing is there that may be classed as novelty, but neither is there anything that age has staled or repetition, in Columbus concert halls, has worn thin.

* * *

THE nameless author of a familiar Negro spiritual coined a word which may aptly be applied to Dr. Koussevitzky. The pious singer, full of the confused mystical promises of the last book of the New Testament, chanted of "John the Revelator." No more orthodox word so completely describes a special quality of this conductor.

He takes Corelli's score (as tactfully revised for string orchestra by one Ettore Pinelli) and by the happiest of phrasing and of pacing, by a delicate accent of rhythm here or of an inner voice there, sets it before us with its proportions and patterns revealed as at a glance.

He takes the lazily floating clouds of Debussy's fancy or his impressions of a nocturnal festival with its unearthly dazzling procession, and conjures up the composer's very visions for us from the multiple voices of his orchestra.

He takes the restless passions of Strauss' hero, tosses them about here and there among his instruments as poor, disillusioned Don Juan was tossed in his endless quest, and there stands revealed to us the epitome of a human experience.

Upon Tchaikowsky's symphony the conductor seized as if he himself had wrought the rich tapestries of the music. I venture to say the composer might have welcomed the revelation that resulted. The contrapuntal blend was just, melodramatic or morbid overtones were muffled, the adroit pattern of theme against theme was clarified in Dr. Koussevitzky's reading. Even if he did not adhere strictly to the letter of his printed instructions, Tchaikowsky must have been glad of the small liberties.

* * *

TO all this must be added a word of the self-revelation of the conductor amidst these luminous glimpses of the music he offered us. He renewed the impressions we carry in our mind's ear from season to season of his tremendous orchestral technique. We laymen can only begin to appreciate the sheer virtuosity of Thursday's performance; at the command of his baton miracles, we may be sure, were accomplished in the serried black and white ranks of his players.

Then, too, the present program showed, as no other here has, the musical internationality of the man (if I, in turn, may coin a word). Each composer stood in his own century, his own country, his own mood. It seemed scarcely the same orchestra that left the illusive and sensuous measures of Debussy to attack the fiery ardor of Strauss.

As long as the Boston orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky bring such a performance to us once in a long year, we cannot indulge in too much self-pity for a curtailed symphony season.

R. L. F. MC COMBS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 28 1932

THE THURSDAY NIGHT concert this week in Emery Auditorium, for the first of the third pair of concerts, with Mme. Goeta Ljungberg as soloist, brought out an enthusiastic audience to hear the program and show their appreciation of their own Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, after listening the preceding night to the splendid concert of the Boston Symphony in Cincinnati.

Mrs. Eugene Goossens, wife of the orchestra conductor, shared her loge for the Thursday program with Mrs. Bakaleinikoff and Mr. and Mrs. Milan Petrovic. Mrs. Goossens was in a low cut black lace, Mrs. Bakaleinikoff in cerise, and Mrs. Petrovic in white with a gold lame wrap.

In the adjoining box Prince and Princess Vassili, who have chosen Cincinnati as their home for the coming year at least, sat with Dr. and Mme. Karol Liszniewski and Mrs. C. A. Dykstra. The princess wore a dark red velvet jacket over a white gown; Mme. Liszniewski was in black with a brocade wrap, and Mrs. Dykstra in all white.

With Mrs. J. Walter Freiberg in her box on the right were Mrs. Leo Westheimer, in all black, and Dr. and Mrs. Joseph Freiberg, the latter a lovely picture in black velvet with puffed sleeves of gold and green brocade.

Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Benedict were in their places in the box which they share this year with Mrs. Peter G. Thomson, the latter wearing an all-white gown. Mrs. Benedict also chose a white gown, wearing over it a bright red velvet wrap.

Mrs. Clifford B. Wright, in black lace, was accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Howard Luther, in bright blue chiffon, and Mr. Luther, who sat with her in her box on the left.

Adjoining them in the Livingood loge, Mrs. Livingood had with her her daughter, Mrs. Virginius Hall and Mr. Hall.

With Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Schiffeler for this symphony in their box were Mr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffman, the latter wearing Franch blue velvet under a rose velvet wrap. Mrs. Schiffeler was in bright red.

Mrs. Herbert French heard the concert from his box in the balcony, Miss Bertha Baur also having box seats on the second flood.

Among those seen thruout the lower floor and in the foyer during the intermission, which always proves a delightful period for social reunions, were: Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, Mr. C. A. Dykstra, who occupied his box in the balcony; Mrs. Otto Geier, who wore a lovely pastel green satin gown and was accompanied by Dr. Geier; Dr. and Mrs. Fischback, the latter in a striking gown of cerise; Mrs. John Wachman, in black velvet; Miss Betty Besuner, Mrs. Rudolph Wurlitzer, who had with her her sister, Miss Elise Richards; Miss Helen Kay, with Miss Amy Sherlock; Mrs. Mabel Freiberg Straus, who wore a dark green ensemble; Miss Mabel Madden, with Mrs. Samuel Huttenbauer, both of them choosing black velvet; Mme. Karin Dayas, who wore rust velvet; Mr. and Mrs. Harold Bergen, Dr. Samuel Rabkin, accompanied by his daughter; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Twitchell, the latter wearing black velvet; Miss Mildred Eakes, Miss Miriam Marting, Mrs. Joseph Cherniavsky, who was with Mrs. Mikhail Stolarevsky; Mrs. Julian Pulikowsky, Mrs. Adolf Hahn, who was with Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; Mrs. Lillian Tyler Plogstedt, Mr. David Rosenberg, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Miss Florence Barbour, Mrs. C. C. Aler and her son, Mr. Samuel Wilson; Dr. and Mrs. James G. Heller, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Ericourt, the latter in all black; Mr. and Mrs. Fenton Lawson, Mrs. Lawson wearing bright French blue; Mrs. Walter Draper, who was in all white; Miss Mollie Halstead, and Mr. and Mrs. John Ditmars, the latter in black satin.

The soloist's gown was a matter of comment among the women, Mme. Ljungberg making a lovely appearance in white and silver brocade with a huge green ostrich band across one shoulder and fastened at the waistline front and back. She was presented at the close of her first group of songs, with a basket of huge yellow chrysanthemums.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 25 1932

To Entertain Conductor

Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens are entertaining Wednesday night at a supper party at the Gibson Hotel in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives a concert Wednesday night at Music Hall, for the second program of the Artist Series.

Mr. and Mrs. Goossens are keeping their party after the concert very small and informal, asking just a few of Dr. Koussevitsky's personal friends here.

The Boston conductor and his 110 men of the orchestra, will arrive in Cincinnati Wednesday at 8:35 a. m. and will stay at the Gibson Hotel. With them also is their manager, G. E. Judd. They come here from Ann Arbor, Mich., and will remain overnight here Wednesday, going Thursday morning to Columbus for a concert there that night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

(2)

OCT 25 1932

Explanatory Lecture By Professor Weaver On Musical Program

An explanatory lecture on the program to be played here Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow by Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Cornell Music Department.

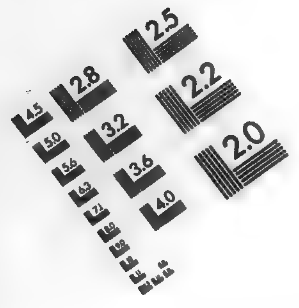
The orchestra will open the University concert series with a concert in Bailey Hall starting at 8:15 Saturday night. Professor Weaver's lecture, open to the public, will be

REDUCTION
RATIO
16x

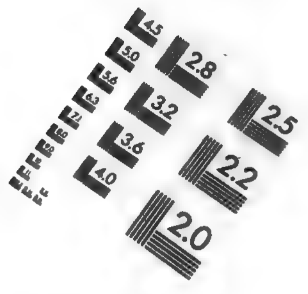
2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

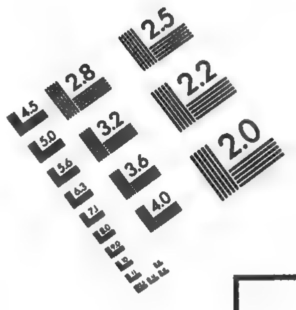


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

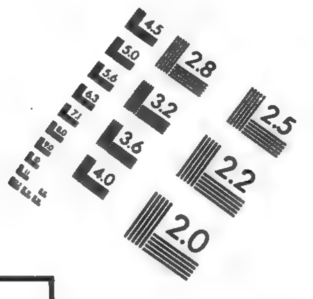


2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
4.5
5.0

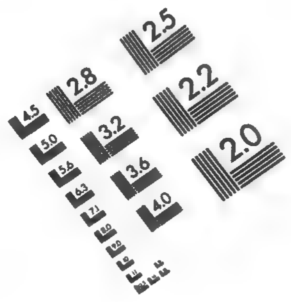
PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



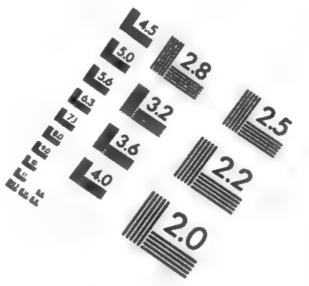
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0



2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
4.5
5.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

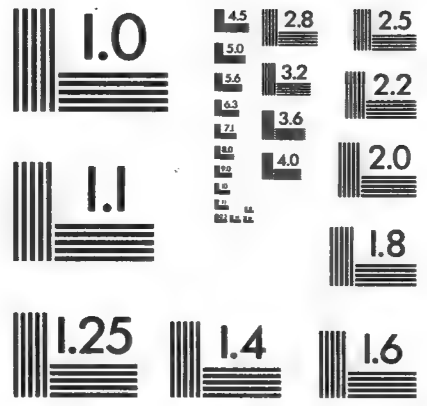


2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
4.5
5.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
5.0
2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

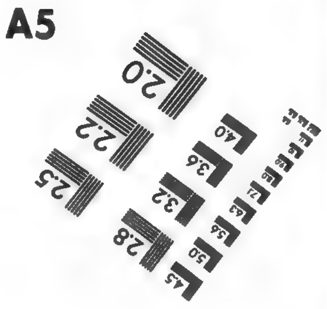
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

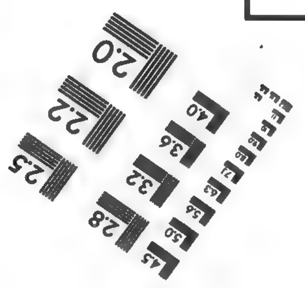


2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

A4

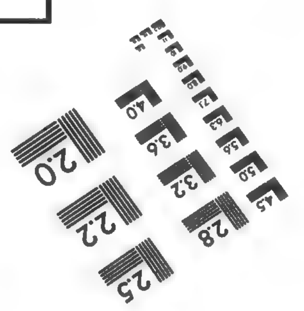
A3



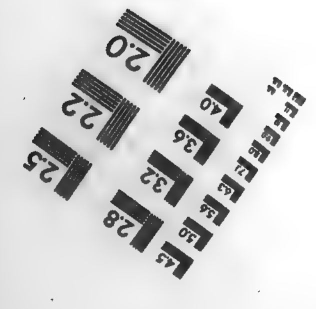
2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5



2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

26

COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 26 1932

By Eugene Segal

AN EXCITEMENT, like at the approach of a tornado, prevailed in the Gibson Hotel lobby Wednesday when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky burst in with his 112 Boston musicianh of many nations, laden with brass, woodwinds and strings.

Most excited was C. C. Schiffeler, the hotel's manager, who nevertheless, did not lose his generous smile while presiding at the registration in French and German, and trying to make his squad of bell boys do for 112 men all signing in at once.

Least excited was Dr. Koussevitzky, himself, which should not have been the case, what with his notably volcanic temperament equaled only by that of New York's Toscanini.

Dr. Koushevitzky (or Sergiei Aleksandrovich Kussevitskii, if you favor the Russian) was found in his hoom, placidly smiling, looking trim in perfectly tailored clothes and very refreshed for a man who all his life has been one of the world's hardest-working musicians.

He directed his Boston Symphany orchestra Tuesday night at Ann Arbor and the night before that in Buffalo. Wednesday night he will give a concert in Music Hall and Thursday night in Columbus.

* * *

DR. KOUSSETITZKY, in a voice that seeks to overcome a lack of English with flexible intonations, was pleased to tell about the state of music in America as he has found it during his tours.

"Only America," he says, "is such a country where there is the greatest interest in orchestras—you must excuse the language." (Dr. Koussevitky would rather be interviewed in French or German.)

"Now is bad times, is very dangerous time for art, but everywhere I play the houses are crowded. It shows the conditions of music in America is wonderful, and it shows when there is trouble, cultivated people make the greatest attention to art.'

To paraphrase him, Dr. Koussevitzky has found that the reproduction of music (as distinguished from composition) now is centered in America. The finest compositions, however, still are European, he says.

"I will not be surprised in two, three years, America will have the great composers also," he says. "Now are interesting composers in America, but not great."

Dr. Koussevitzky is sorry there are not enough American-born and American educated musicians from whom to recruit an orchestra, but he believes as the country ages it will produce its own.

From 12 until 58, his present age, Dr. Koussevitzky has had few inactive days, each one being devoted to music.

At 12, he was composer of the incidental music and directed the between-acts concerts for theatrical performances in his native town, Tver, Russia.

* * *

AT 14, he began study of the double-bass viol. For 10 years he toured Europe, was famed thruout the continent as a double-bass virtuoso. Meanwhile, he composed numerous works which now are in the repertoire of every double-bass soloist.

Then he returned to Russia to organize the famous Koussevitzky Symphony Orchestra, composed of youthful musicians, whom he would rehearse for three months in a single symphony before giving a concert.

From Moscow to Petrograd, back and forth, he took his musicians, giving an almost continuous series of concerts. To augment his orchestra, he organized a choir of 250 voices, and, still unfatigued, found time with his wife to start a music publishing house which gave unknown composers a chance.

He left Russia at the time of the revolution, founded his famous Paris concerts in 1921. This is his ninth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives 102 concerts in seven months under his direction.

He is notable among conductors for his disregard of routine. His programs often include the works of not widely recognized composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 26 1932

SYMPHONY CONCERT TRAFFIC RULES MADE

All Autos Must Unload on Parkway Side of Music Hall

Traffic regulations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Wednesday night at Music Hall, as announced by police, follow:

All auto traffic must approach Music Hall on the Parkway from the south.

All autos must unload at the rear entrance on Parkway.

All autos must proceed north on Parkway to 15th-st, to west side of Parkway to parking lot on old hospital grounds.

After the concert autos mus approach Music Hall on the Parkway from the north on Parkway to 15th-st before turning. The "no-parking" ban pertains to Central Parkway between 12th and 14th ctreets; Elm-st, between 12th and 14th streets, 14th-st between Race-st and Parkway; Grant-st, between Elm-st and Parkway, and 12th-st, between Elm-st and Parkway.

Taxicabs must park on west side of Parkway, south of 12th, and south side of 12th-st, west of Parkway.

Taxis will be permitted to park on south side of 14th-st, between Elm and Plum streets, after the opening of each performance and, after most uedestrians have crossed Elm-st, will proceed south on Elm-st to load in the offset in front of Music Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 27 1932

Boston Symphony Acclaimed Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the 112 men of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played Wednesday night in Music Hall for the second concert of this year's Artist Series, received a tremendous ovation from the huge crowd of music lovers who filled nearly every seat in the house on this occasion, and kept the orchestra and its leader on the stage for many minutes after the close of the program, because of the continued applause.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was one of the most appreciative of the attentive audience, composed of trained symphony listeners who are regular attendants of the Cincinnati orchestra's concerts, and many other music lovers on this occasion, a large number of them from surrounding towns. Mr. and Mrs. Goossens, the latter wearing a striking ensemble of bright red velvet, were guests of Mr. J. H. Thuman, manager of the Artist Series, in his box. Joining them in this loge were Mr. Thuman's daughter, Mary Rose, who wore dark red velvet; his cousin, Miss Janie Hills of Kansas City, who was in French blue, and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, who wore red crepe and a white fur jacket. Mrs. Wulsin's house guests, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Boulton of Morristown, N. J., sat with Mr. Wulsin in seats well down in front.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Wilbur Witt, the latter in a bright blue gown, had the box adjoining, where they were accompanied by a group of friends.

Mr. Stuart M. Thompson, business manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, also was there to hear the visiting orchestra.

He was accompanied by Mrs. Thompson, who wore black velvet. With them were Mr. and Mrs. Roger K. Rogan of Glendale, the latter also choosing black velvet for her attire.

Mrs. John J. Emery, in a long ermine wrap, had with her Dr. and Mme. Liszniewski, the latter in rose and gold brocade.

Mrs. Herbert Witherspoon, who recently arrived in Cincinnati to join Mr. Witherspoon, new director of music at the Conservatory, was among those of the artist set welcomed on this occasion.

Others seen thruout the auditorium and foyer were Mr. and Mrs. Philip Wyman, Mrs. John Wachmann, Mrs. Leo Westheimer, Mr. and Mrs. George Warrington, Miss Patricia O'Brien of Dayton, O.; Mr. and Mrs. Martin Dumler, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischback, the latter in bright green and brown; Mrs. Adolf Hahn, who accompanied Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; Mrs. C. C. Benedict, Miss Mildred Eakes, Miss Grace Woodruff, Misses Mabel and Kay Madden, Mrs. Maurice Henle, Miss Mary Katherine Neely, who was accompanied by Miss Mina Pemberton; Mr. and Mrs. Ladislas Segoe, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Geier, Mr. Edgar Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffmann, Mr. Alexander von Kreisler, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Van Fossen, Miss Mary Johnston, Mr. Louis Saverne, Miss Gertrude Englander who was with Mr. and Mrs. Ben Lowenthal; Mr. Chalmers Hadley, Mrs. Jerome Sturm, Mrs. Arthur Beyer, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, Mr. Josef Cherniavsky, Mr. Howard Cox, Mrs. George F. Otte, Miss Jean Dearness, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Graydon, Miss Alma Betscher, Miss Irene Gromme, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gellenbeck, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Huttenbauer, Mme. Karin Dayas, Mrs. Gretchen Barnes, Mrs. Blanche Greenland, Mrs. Leonard Minster, Mrs. Ralph Pappenheimer, Mrs. Frederick W. Hinkle, Mr. N. Gabor, Miss Jean Simon, Miss Bertha Baur, and Dr. and Mrs. David Philipson.

Among those motoring up from Louisville were Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams, Mr. Stuart J. Simons and Mrs. Charles T. Ballard.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

27 1932

BOSTON TO PLAY "BEST SELLER"

Famous Conductor to Lead Favorite Work of Fellow Russian Tonight.

Tchaikowsky's colorful and impassioned Fifth Symphony, which is the chief item on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Memorial Hall Thursday night, is one of the few "best sellers" in symphonic literature, and Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, is internationally famous for his interpretation of it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 27 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Moves Hearers to Enthusiasm

By Lillian Tyler Plogstedt

Seated in Music Hall Wednesday evening, listening to the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, one was reminded of a saying accredited to Jean de Reszke, the famous tenor, speaking of the Wagnerian conductor, Anton Seidl. Said he: "If I forget a line, I look at Seidl and read it on his lips." Last night literally every phrase was framed on the lips of this dynamic conductor and mirrored in the playing of his men. Giving of himself as he does, it is small wonder that the huge audience was aroused to a point of enthusiasm seldom found in the temper of staid Cincinnati concertgoers.

One thinks of the Boston Symphon Orchestra in terms not of individual excellence, but as a unit of sound so superbly knit together that at no time does any one instrument predominate save at the desire of the director. And Koussevitsky has his men literally in the hollow of his expressive hands, molding them to the most suave phraseology, the most stirring climaxes, the most complete revelation of the inner meaning of a composition.

The program was ideally built. The "Classical" symphony, by the Russian composer, Prokofieff, embodies in charming fashion the grace of a classic garbed in modern dress. And it was read in a manner that revealed with meticulous clarity its loveliness.

Two Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages," that impressionistic picture of delicate cloud formation, and the gay "Fetes," followed. The middle section of the "Festivals," with its procession heralded by the muted trumpets, was built up to a thrilling climax, subsiding into almost nothing as the throng passed into the distance.

Excerpts from the colorful second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite of Ravel, superbly done, formed the closing number of the first half of the program. All of this beauty, however, was forgotten later in the glorious performance of the C minor of Brahms. In this monumental work Koussevitsky revealed himself as one of the elect, for he not only knows his Brahms, but can, thru the medium of his splendid body of players, succeed in so impressing his hearers that they are spellbound. How superbly, for example, he makes the strings sing the beauty of the heavenly Andante. And with what rare understanding the brasses intoned the solemn phrases preceding the choral episode of the last movement. It was a rare concert and a musical feast which will linger long in the memory of those who heard it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Boston Symphony Arrives in City

Conductor Koussevitzky Praises Progress of Music In America.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, first Russian conductor ever to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra and the "lionized" of all the eastern conductors, arrived Thursday in Columbus with his staff of 100 musicians, on a special train. The orchestra will play in Memorial hall at 8:15 p. m.

"No country in the world is making so great an effort toward education in music as America," he said. "She is assuming the world leadership in music, and already owns the greatest orchestras in the world.

Unemployed Admitted

The orchestra will play to several hundred unemployed men and women, scattered among the audience, who will be admitted as a part of a plan of the Symphony club of central Ohio to serve the largest possible number of music lovers in the community. Realizing that some of their most loyal supporters in the past will this year be financialy unable to purchase tickets, the Symphonw club has made it possible for a limited number of unemployed musicians and others to be admitted.

The conductor will be the guest of Mrs. B. G. Huntington, 292 South Colubia avenue, president of the Symphony cluub, following the concert, and at midnight will leave Columbus with his orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 27 1932

* * *

MRS. B. GWYNNE HUNTINGTON and Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, those two women who so devotedly have sponsored various musical enterprises, are largely responsible for the two large blocks of seats which will be filled with enthusiastic supporters at the Boston Symphony Concert which will be at Memorial Hall this evening.

One hundred seats have been given to unemployed musicians who otherwise would not have heard the concert, and 100 pupils at the Columbus Art School will go to the concert and then back to the gallery, where they will transcribe graphically their impression of the program.

Mrs. Huntington is the founder and president of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is starting on its ninth season with the concert.

Mrs. Miller, the associate president, a generous patroness of art, is the aunt of Florence Stage, who is an accomplished pianist. Miss Stage, who has returned from a summer's visit in Europe, is a guest at the Miller home.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 27 1932

Art Students Watch Orchestra in Action

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky wields his baton in Memorial Hall this evening, directing the Boston Smyphony Orchestra in its third appearance here, 100 students from the Columbus Art School will be among his most interested listeners. They have agreed to note their impressions of the concert with a view to transcribing them graphically later at the art school.

The classical harmonies of Carelli, the strictly programmatic music of Debussy, the poetic Strauss' "Don Juan" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Smyphony will furnish the material from which to work. As an assignment, the problem is an experiment, Dean Nicomedum says.

The box office continues open until 5 p. m. today in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., and will reopen at 7 p. m. in Memorial Hall lobby. The concert is the first on the Smyphony Club of Central Ohio series. The group brings the Chicago Orchestra, with Dr. Frederick A. Stock, for a Jan. 16 concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

OCT 30 1932

MUSIC EVENTS OF INTEREST HERE AND AFIELD

The Boston Symphony orchestra played at Music hall, Cincinnati, Wednesday evening, to an audience which filled 4500 seats and purchased standing room.

This was the first time that the orchestra had appeared in Cincinnati for 25 years and the public which had been trained to a high musical appreciation through the many concerts presented by the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra paid a tribute of much applause to Serge Koussevitsky, director, and his orchestral interpretations.

The instruments of this great orchestra are played so evenly, their presentations are so smooth that the selections seem almost perfectly interpreted.

Cincinnati thinks much of her music. She is one of the oldest cities in the country and her German population gave to her an early start in things cultural. East of the Alleghenies she probably has no rival in the number of citizens who care for the fine in paintings and prints, and in music.

Since she as a city is so ready to pay tribute to the arts she sees to it that her police force is friendly in direction of traffic about the hall. She sees that there is parking space for concert goers, and this, free of charge.

The concerts in Music hall are of a social nature. A lengthy intermission is provided in order that there may be a period for friends to meet in the lobby and long corridors. Almost everyone is attired in evening dress and the affairs take on much of glamour. There are many boxes and here sit the wealthy patrons of things musical.

26

COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 26 1932

By Eugene Segal

AN EXCITEMENT, like at the approach of a tornado, prevailed in the Gibson Hotel lobby Wednesday when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky burst in with his 112 Boston musicianh of many nations, laden with brass, woodwinds and strings.

Most excited was C. C. Schiffeler, the hotel's manager, who nevertheless, did not lose his generous smile while presiding at the registration in French and German, and trying to make his squad of bell boys do for 112 men all signing in at once.

Least excited was Dr. Koussevitzky, himself, which should not have been the case, what with his notably volcanic temperament equaled only by that of New York's Toscanini.

Dr. Koushevitzky (or Sergiei Aleksandrovich Kussevitskii, if you favor the Russian) was found in his hoom, placidly smiling, looking trim in perfectly tailored clothes and very refreshed for a man who all his life has been one of the world's hardest-working musicians.

He directed his Boston Symphany orchestra Tuesday night at Ann Arbor and the night before that in Buffalo. Wednesday night he will give a concert in Music Hall and Thursday night in Columbus.

* * *

DR. KOUSSETITZKY, in a voice that seeks to overcome a lack of English with flexible intonations, was pleased to tell about the state of music in America as he has found it during his tours.

"Only America," he says, "is such a country where there is the greatest interest in orchestras—you must excuse the language." (Dr. Koussevitky would rather be interviewed in French or German.)

"Now is bad times, is very dangerous time for art, but everywhere I play the houses are crowded. It shows the conditions of music in America is wonderful, and it shows when there is trouble, cultivated people make the greatest attention to art.'

To paraphrase him, Dr. Koussevitzky has found that the reproduction of music (as distinguished from composition) now is centered in America. The finest compositions, however, still are European, he says.

"I will not be surprised in two, three years, America will have the great composers also," he says. "Now are interesting composers in America, but not great."

Dr. Koussevitzky is sorry there are not enough American-born and American educated musicians from whom to recruit an orchestra, but he believes as the country ages it will produce its own.

From 12 until 58, his present age, Dr. Koussevitzky has had few inactive days, each one being devoted to music.

At 12, he was composer of the incidental music and directed the between-acts concerts for theatrical performances in his native town, Tver, Russia.

* * *

AT 14, he began study of the double-bass viol. For 10 years he toured Europe, was famed thruout the continent as a double-bass virtuoso. Meanwhile, he composed numerous works which now are in the repertoire of every double-bass soloist.

Then he returned to Russia to organize the famous Koussevitzky Symphony Orchestra, composed of youthful musicians, whom he would rehearse for three months in a single symphony before giving a concert.

From Moscow to Petrograd, back and forth, he took his musicians, giving an almost continuous series of concerts. To augment his orchestra, he organized a choir of 250 voices, and, still unfatigued, found time with his wife to start a music publishing house which gave unknown composers a chance.

He left Russia at the time of the revolution, founded his famous Paris concerts in 1921. This is his ninth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives 102 concerts in seven months under his direction.

He is notable among conductors for his disregard of routine. His programs often include the works of not widely recognized composers.

When summer comes, he goes to Vienna to conduct more concerts. During a vacation of several weeks he straps a pack on his back and goes on a 10-day hike thru the Swiss Alps. That is his only recreation.

Traffic regulations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Wednesday night at Music Hall, as announced by police, follow:

All auto traffic must approach Music Hall on the Parkway from the south.

All autos must unload at the rear entrance on Parkway.

All autos must proceed north on Parkway to 15th-st, to west side of Parkway to parking lot on old hospital grounds.

After the concert autos mus approach Music Hall on the Parkway from the north on Parkway to 15th-st before turning. The "no-parking" ban pertains to Central Parkway between 12th and 14th streets; Elm-st, between 12th and 14th streets, 14th-st between Race-st and Parkway; Grant-st, between Elm-st and Parkway, and 12th-st, between Elm-st and Parkway.

Taxicabs must park on west side of Parkway, south of 12th, and south side of 12th-st, west of Parkway.

Taxis will be permitted to park on south side of 14th-st, between Elm and Plum streets, after the opening of each performance and, after most uedestrians have crossed Elm-st, will proceed south on Elm-st to load in the offset in front of Music Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 2? 1932

Boston Symphony Acclaimed Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the 112 men of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played Wednesday night in Music Hall for the second concert of this year's Artist Series, received a tremendous ovation from the huge crowd of music lovers who filled nearly every seat in the house on this occasion, and kept the orchestra and its leader on the stage for many minutes after the close of the program, because of the continued applause.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was one of the most appreciative of the attentive audience, composed of trained symphony listeners who are regular attendants of the Cincinnati orchestra's concerts, and many other music lovers on this occasion, a large number of them from surrounding towns. Mr. and Mrs. Goossens, the latter wearing a striking ensemble of bright red velvet, were guests of Mr. J. H. Thuman, manager of the Artist Series, in his box. Joining them in this loge were Mr. Thuman's daughter, Mary Rose, who wore dark red velvet; his cousin, Miss Janie Hills of Kansas City, who was in French blue, and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, who wore red crepe and a white fur jacket. Mrs. Wulsin's house guests, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Boulton of Morristown, N. J., sat with Mr. Wulsin in seats well down in front.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Wilbur Witt, the latter in a bright blue gown, had the box adjoining, where they were accompanied by a group of friends.

Mr. Stuart M. Thompson, business manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, also was there to hear the visiting orchestra.

He was accompanied by Mrs. Thompson, who wore black velvet. With them were Mr. and Mrs. Roger K. Rogan of Glendale, the latter also choosing black velvet for her attire.

Mrs. John J. Emery, in a long ermine wrap, had with her Dr. and Mme. Liszniewski, the latter in rose and gold brocade.

Mrs. Herbert Witherspoon, who recently arrived in Cincinnati to join Mr. Witherspoon, new director of music at the Conservatory, was among those of the artist set welcomed on this occasion.

Others seen thruout the auditorium and foyer were Mr. and Mrs. Philip Wyman, Mrs. John Wachmann, Mrs. Leo Westheimer, Mr. and Mrs. George Warrington, Miss Patricia O'Brien of Dayton, O.; Mr. and Mrs. Martin Dumler, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischback, the latter in bright green and brown; Mrs. Adolf Hahn, who accompanied Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; Mrs. C. C. Benedict, Miss Mildred Eakes, Miss Grace Woodruff, Misses Mabel and Kay Madden, Mrs. Maurice Henle, Miss Mary Katherine Neely, who was accompanied by Miss Mina Pemberton; Mr. and Mrs. Ladislas Segoe, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Geier, Mr. Edgar Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffmann, Mr. Alexander von Kreisler, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Van Fossen, Miss Mary Johnston, Mr. Louis Saverne, Miss Gertrude Englander who was with Mr. and Mrs. Ben Lowenthal; Mr. Chalmers Hadley, Mrs. Jerome Sturm, Mrs. Arthur Beyer, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, Mr. Josef Cherniavsky, Mr. Howard Cox, Mrs. George F. Otte, Miss Jean Dearness, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Graydon, Miss Alma Betscher, Miss Irene Gromme, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gellenbeck, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Huttenbauer, Mme. Karin Dayas, Mrs. Gretchen Barnes, Mrs. Blanche Greenland, Mrs. Leonard Minster, Mrs. Ralph Pappenheimer, Mrs. Frederick W. Hinkle, Mr. N. Gabor, Miss Jean Simon, Miss Bertha Baur, and Dr. and Mrs. David Philipson.

Among those motoring up from Louisville were Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams, Mr. Stuart J. Simons and Mrs. Charles T. Ballard.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

2? 1932

BOSTON TO PLAY "BEST SELLER"

Famous Conductor to Lead Favorite Work of Fellow Russian Tonight.

Tchaikowsky's colorful and impassioned Fifth Symphony, which is the chief item on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Memorial Hall Thursday night, is one of the few "best sellers" in symphonic literature, and Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, is internationally famous for his interpretation of it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 27 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Moves Hearers to Enthusiasm

By Lillian Tyler Plogstedt

Seated in Music Hall Wednesday evening, listening to the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, one was reminded of a saying accredited to Jean de Reszke, the famous tenor, speaking of the Wagnerian conductor, Anton Seidl. Said he: "If I forget a line, I look at Seidl and read it on his lips." Last night literally every phrase was framed on the lips of this dynamic conductor and mirrored in the playing of his men. Giving of himself as he does, it is small wonder that the huge audience was aroused to a point of enthusiasm seldom found in the temper of staid Cincinnati concertgoers.

One thinks of the Boston Symphon Orchestra in terms not of individual excellence, but as a unit of sound so superbly knit together that at no time does any one instrument predominate save at the desire of the director. And Koussevitsky has his men literally in the hollow of his expressive hands, molding them to the most suave phraseology, the most stirring climaxes, the most complete revelation of the inner meaning of a composition.

The program was ideally built. The "Classical" symphony, by the Russian composer, Prokofieff, embodies in charming fashion the grace of a classic garbed in modern dress. And it was read in a manner that revealed with meticulous clarity its loveliness.

Two Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages," that impressionistic picture of delicate cloud formation, and the gay "Fetes," followed. The middle section of the "Festivals," with its procession heralded by the muted trumpets, was built up to a thrilling climax, subsiding into almost nothing as the throng passed into the distance.

Excerpts from the colorful second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite of Ravel, superbly done, formed the closing number of the first half of the program. All of this beauty, however, was forgotten later in the glorious performance of the C minor of Brahms. In this monumental work Koussevitsky revealed himself as one of the elect, for he not only knows his Brahms, but can, thru the medium of his splendid body of players, succeed in so impressing his hearers that they are spellbound. How superbly, for example, he makes the strings sing the beauty of the heavenly Andante. And with what rare understanding the brasses intoned the solemn phrases preceding the choral episode of the last movement. It was a rare concert and a musical feast which will linger long in the memory of those who heard it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Boston Symphony Arrives in City

Conductor Koussevitzky Praises Progress of Music In America.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, first Russian conductor ever to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra and the "lionized" of all the eastern conductors, arrived Thursday in Columbus with his staff of 100 musicians, on a special train. The orchestra will play in Memorial hall at 8:15 p. m.

"No country in the world is making so great an effort toward education in music as America," he said. "She is assuming the world leadership in music, and already owns the greatest orchestras in the world.

Unemployed Admitted

The orchestra will play to several hundred unemployed men and women, scattered among the audience, who will be admitted as a part of a plan of the Symphony club of central Ohio to serve the largest possible number of music lovers in the community. Realizing that some of their most loyal supporters in the past will this year be financialy unable to purchase tickets, the Symphonw club has made it possible for a limited number of unemployed musicians and others to be admitted.

The conductor will be the guest of Mrs. B. G. Huntington, 292 South Colubia avenue, president of the Symphony cluub, following the concert, and at midnight will leave Columbus with his orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 27 1932

* * *

MRS. B. GWYNNE HUNTINGTON and Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, those two women who so devotedly have sponsored various musical enterprises, are largely responsible for the two large blocks of seats which will be filled with enthusiastic supporters at the Boston Symphony Concert which will be at Memorial Hall this evening.

One hundred seats have been given to unemployed musicians who otherwise would not have heard the concert, and 100 pupils at the Columbus Art School will go to the concert and then back to the gallery, where they will transcribe graphically their impression of the program.

Mrs. Huntington is the founder and president of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is starting on its ninth season with the concert.

Mrs. Miller, the associate president, a generous patroness of art, is the aunt of Florence Stage, who is an accomplished pianist. Miss Stage, who has returned from a summer's visit in Europe, is a guest at the Miller home.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 27 1932

Art Students Watch Orchestra in Action

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky wields his baton in Memorial Hall this evening, directing the Boston Smyphony Orchestra in its third appearance here, 100 students from the Columbus Art School will be among his most interested listeners. They have agreed to note their impressions of the concert with a view to transcribing them graphically later at the art school.

The classical harmonies of Carelli, the strictly programmatic music of Debussy, the poetic Strauss' "Don Juan" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Smyphony will furnish the material from which to work. As an assignment, the problem is an experiment, Dean Nicomedum says.

The box office continues open until 5 p. m. today in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., and will reopen at 7 p. m. in Memorial Hall lobby. The concert is the first on the Smyphony Club of Central Ohio series. The group brings the Chicago Orchestra, with Dr. Frederick A. Stock, for a Jan. 16 concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

OCT 30 1932

MUSIC EVENTS OF INTEREST HERE AND AFIEL

The Boston Symphony orchestra played at Music hall, Cincinnati, Wednesday evening, to an audience which filled 4500 seats and purchased standing room.

This was the first time that the orchestra had appeared in Cincinnati for 25 years and the public which had been trained to a high musical appreciation through the many concerts presented by the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra paid a tribute of much applause to Serge Koussevitsky, director, and his orchestral interpretations.

The instruments of this great orchestra are played so evenly, their presentations are so smooth that the selections seem almost perfectly interpreted.

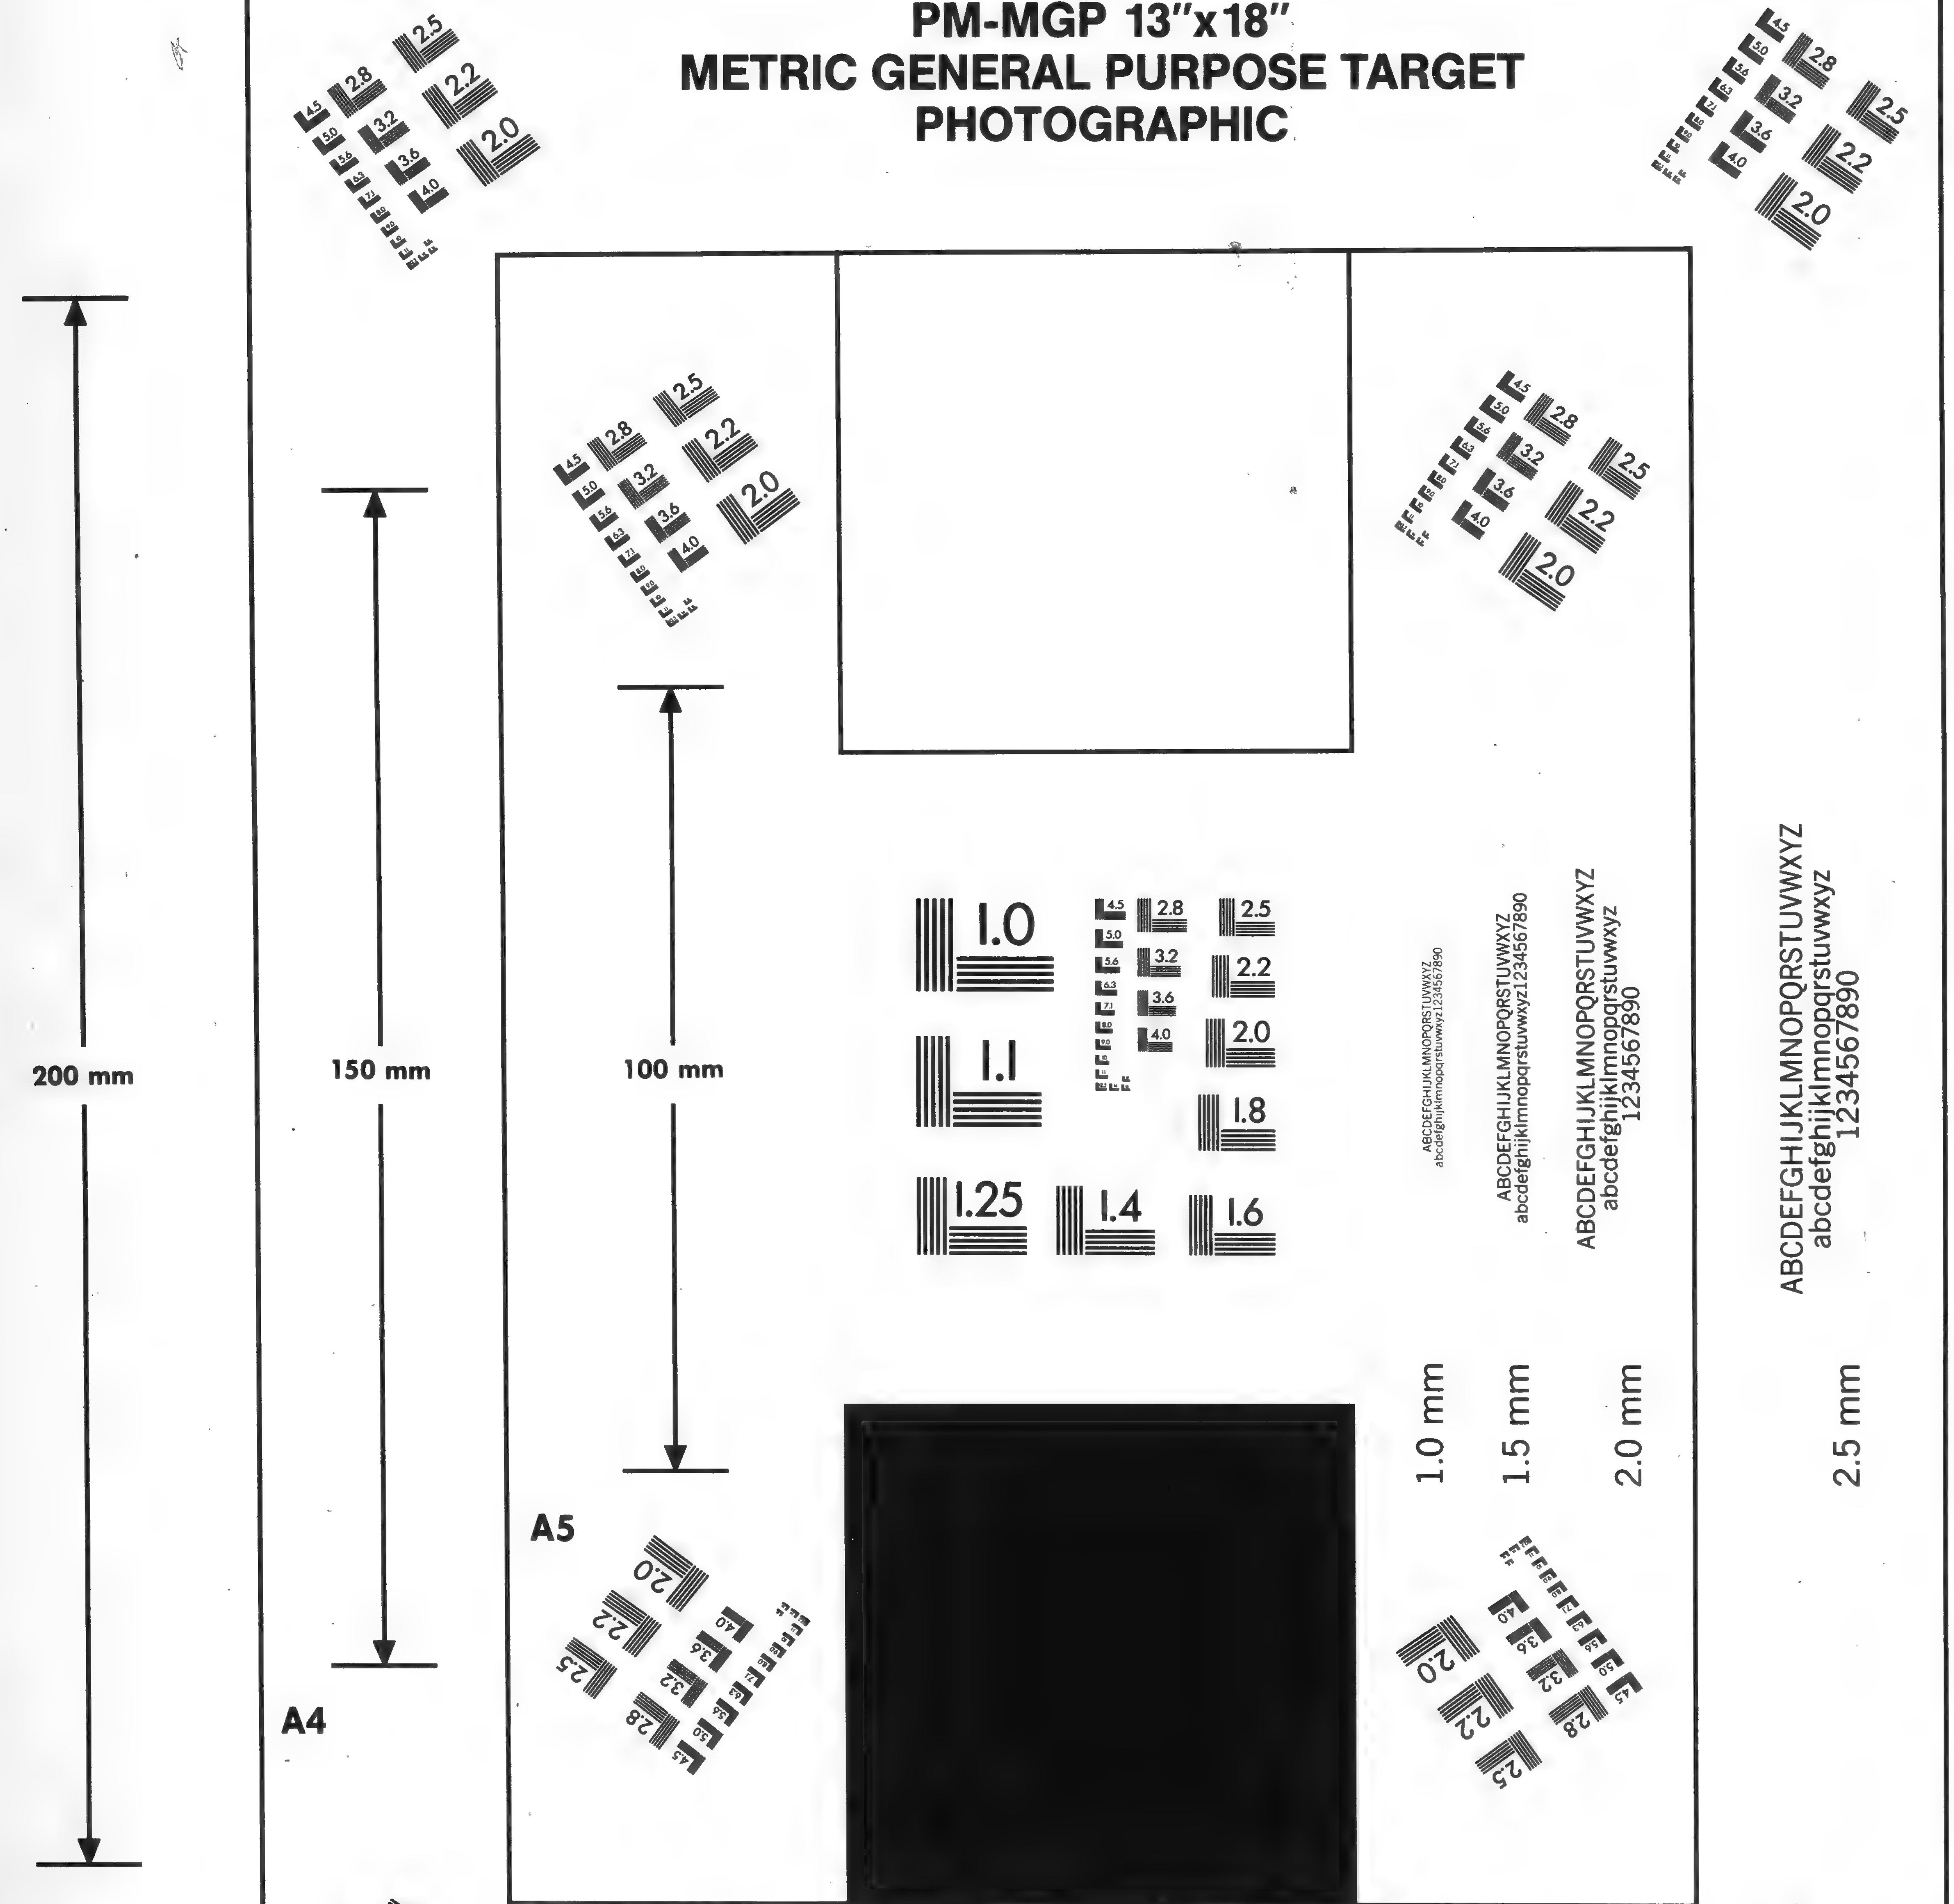
Cincinnati thinks much of her music. She is one of the oldest cities in the country and her German population gave to her an early start in things cultural. East of the Alleghenies she probably has no rival in the number of citizens who care for the fine in paintings and prints, and in music.

Since she as a city is so ready to pay tribute to the arts she sees to it that her police force is friendly in direction of traffic about the hall. She sees that there is parking space for concert goers, and this, free of charge.

The concerts in Music hall are of a social nature. A lengthy intermission is provided in order that there may be a period for friends to meet in the lobby and long corridors. Almost everyone is attired in evening dress and the affairs take on much of glamour. There are many boxes and here sit the wealthy patrons of things musical.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

2 26

COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 26 1932

By Eugene Segal

AN EXCITEMENT, like at the approach of a tornado, prevailed in the Gibson Hotel lobby Wednesday when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky burst in with his 112 Boston musicianh of many nations, laden with brass, woodwinds and strings.

Most excited was C. C. Schiffeler, the hotel's manager, who nevertheless, did not lose his generous smile while presiding at the registration in French and German, and trying to make his squad of bell boys do for 112 men all signing in at once.

Least excited was Dr. Koussevitzky, himself, which should not have been the case, what with his notably volcanic temperament equaled only by that of New York's Toscanini.

Dr. Koushevitzky (or Sergiei Aleksandrovich Kussevitskii, if you favor the Russian) was found in his hoom, placidly smiling, looking trim in perfectly tailored clothes and very refreshed for a man who all his life has been one of the world's hardest-working musicians.

He directed his Boston Symphany orchestra Tuesday night at Ann Arbor and the night before that in Buffalo. Wednesday night he will give a concert in Music Hall and Thursday night in Columbus.

* * *

DR. KOUSSETITZKY, in a voice that seeks to overcome a lack of English with flexible intonations, was pleased to tell about the state of music in America as he has found it during his tours.

"Only America," he says, "is such a country where there is the greatest interest in orchestras—you must excuse the language." (Dr. Koussevitky would rather be interviewed in French or German.)

"Now is bad times, is very dangerous time for art, but everywhere I play the houses are crowded. It shows the conditions of music in America is wonderful, and it shows when there is trouble, cultivated people make the greatest attention to art.'

To paraphrase him, Dr. Koussevitzky has found that the reproduction of music (as distinguished from composition) now is centered in America. The finest compositions, however, still are European, he says.

"I will not be surprised in two, three years, America will have the great composers also," he says. "Now are interesting composers in America, but not great."

Dr. Koussevitzky is sorry there are not enough American-born and American educated musicians from whom to recruit an orchestra, but he believes as the country ages it will produce its own.

From 12 until 58, his present age, Dr. Koussevitzky has had few inactive days, each one being devoted to music.

At 12, he was composer of the incidental music and directed the between-acts concerts for theatrical performances in his native town, Tver, Russia.

* * *

AT 1[illegible], he began study of the double-bass viol. For 10 years he toured Europe, was famed thruout the continent as a double-bass virtuoso. Meanwhile, he composed numerous works which now are in the repertoire of every double-bass soloist.

Then he returned to Russia to organize the famous Koussevitzky Symphony Orchestra, composed of youthful musicians, whom he would rehearse for three months in a single symphony before giving a concert.

From Moscow to Petrograd, back and forth, he took his musicians, giving an almost continuous series of concerts. To augment his orchestra, he organized a choir of 250 voices, and, still unfatigued, found time with his wife to start a music publishing house which gave unknown composers a chance.

He left Russia at the time of the revolution, founded his famous Paris concerts in 1921. This is his ninth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives 102 concerts in seven months under his direction.

He is notable among conductors for his disregard of routine. His programs often include the works of not widely recognized composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 26 1932

SYMPHONY CONCERT TRAFFIC RULES MADE

All Autos Must Unload on Parkway Side of Music Hall

Traffic regulations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Wednesday night at Music Hall, as announced by police, follow:

All auto traffic must approach Music Hall on the Parkway from the south.

All autos must unload at the rear entrance on Parkway.

All autos must proceed north on Parkway to 15th-st, to west side of Parkway to parking lot on old hospital grounds.

After the concert autos mus approach Music Hall on the Parkway from the north on Parkway to 15th-st before turning. The "no-parking" ban pertains to Central Parkway between 12th and 14th streets; Elm-st, between 12th and 14th streets, 14th-st between Race-st and Parkway; Grant-st, between Elm-st and Parkway, and 12th-st, between Elm-st and Parkway.

Taxicabs must park on west side of Parkway, south of 12th, and south side of 12th-st, west of Parkway.

Taxis will be permitted to park on south side of 14th-st, between Elm and Plum streets, after the opening of each performance and, after most uedestrians have crossed Elm-st, will proceed south on Elm-st to load in the offset in front of Music Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 27 1932

Boston Symphony Acclaimed Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the 112 men of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played Wednesday night in Music Hall for the second concert of this year's Artist Series, received a tremendous ovation from the huge crowd of music lovers who filled nearly every seat in the house on this occasion, and kept the orchestra and its leader on the stage for many minutes after the close of the program, because of the continued applause.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was one of the most appreciative of the attentive audience, composed of trained symphony listeners who are regular attendants of the Cincinnati orchestra's concerts, and many other music lovers on this occasion, a large number of them from surrounding towns. Mr. and Mrs. Goossens, the latter wearing a striking ensemble of bright red velvet, were guests of Mr. J. H. Thuman, manager of the Artist Series, in his box. Joining them in this loge were Mr. Thuman's daughter, Mary Rose, who wore dark red velvet; his cousin, Miss Janie Hills of Kansas City, who was in French blue, and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, who wore red crepe and a white fur jacket. Mrs. Wulsin's house guests, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Boulton of Morristown, N. J., sat with Mr. Wulsin in seats well down in front.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Wilbur Witt, the latter in a bright blue gown, had the box adjoining, where they were accompanied by a group of friends.

Mr. Stuart M. Thompson, business manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, also was there to hear the visiting orchestra.

He was accompanied by Mrs. Thompson, who wore black velvet. With them were Mr. and Mrs. Roger K. Rogan of Glendale, the latter also choosing black velvet for her attire.

Mrs. John J. Emery, in a long ermine wrap, had with her Dr. and Mme. Liszniewski, the latter in rose and gold brocade.

Mrs. Herbert Witherspoon, who recently arrived in Cincinnati to join Mr. Witherspoon, new director of music at the Conservatory, was among those of the artist set welcomed on this occasion.

Others seen thruout the auditorium and foyer were Mr. and Mrs. Philip Wyman, Mrs. John Wachmann, Mrs. Leo Westheimer, Mr. and Mrs. George Warrington, Miss Patricia O'Brien of Dayton, O.; Mr. and Mrs. Martin Dumler, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischback, the latter in bright green and brown; Mrs. Adolf Hahn, who accompanied Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; Mrs. C. C. Benedict, Miss Mildred Eakes, Miss Grace Woodruff, Misses Mabel and Kay Madden, Mrs. Maurice Henle, Miss Mary Katherine Neely, who was accompanied by Miss Mina Pemberton; Mr. and Mrs. Ladislas Segoe, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Geier, Mr. Edgar Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffmann, Mr. Alexander von Kreisler, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Van Fossen, Miss Mary Johnston, Mr. Louis Saverne, Miss Gertrude Englander who was with Mr. and Mrs. Ben Lowenthal; Mr. Chalmers Hadley, Mrs. Jerome Sturm, Mrs. Arthur Beyer, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, Mr. Josef Cherniavsky, Mr. Howard Cox, Mrs. George F. Otte, Miss Jean Dearness, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Graydon, Miss Alma Betscher, Miss Irene Gromme, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gellenbeck, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Huttenbauer, Mme. Karin Dayas, Mrs. Gretchen Barnes, Mrs. Blanche Greenland, Mrs. Leonard Minster, Mrs. Ralph Pappenheimer, Mrs. Frederick W. Hinkle, Mr. N. Gabor, Miss Jean Simon, Miss Bertha Baur, and Dr. and Mrs. David Philipson.

Among those motoring up from Louisville were Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams, Mr. Stuart J. Simons and Mrs. Charles T. Ballard.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

27 1932

BOSTON TO PLAY "BEST SELLER"

Famous Conductor to Lead Favorite Work of Fellow Russian Tonight.

Tchaikowsky's colorful and impassioned Fifth Symphony, which is the chief item on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Memorial Hall Thursday night, is one of the few "best sellers" in symphonic literature, and Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, is internationally famous for his interpretation of it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 27 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Moves Hearers to Enthusiasm

By Lillian Tyler Plogstedt

Seated in Music Hall Wednesday evening, listening to the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, one was reminded of a saying accredited to Jean de Reszke, the famous tenor, speaking of the Wagnerian conductor, Anton Seidl. Said he: "If I forget a line, I look at Seidl and read it on his lips." Last night literally every phrase was framed on the lips of this dynamic conductor and mirrored in the playing of his men. Giving of himself as he does, it is small wonder that the huge audience was aroused to a point of enthusiasm seldom found in the temper of staid Cincinnati concertgoers.

One thinks of the Boston Symphon Orchestra in terms not of individual excellence, but as a unit of sound so superbly knit together that at no time does any one instrument predominate save at the desire of the director. And Koussevitsky has his men literally in the hollow of his expressive hands, molding them to the most suave phraseology, the most stirring climaxes, the most complete revelation of the inner meaning of a composition.

The program was ideally built. The "Classical" symphony, by the Russian composer, Prokofieff, embodies in charming fashion the grace of a classic garbed in modern dress. And it was read in a manner that revealed with meticulous clarity its loveliness.

Two Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages," that impressionistic picture of delicate cloud formation, and the gay "Fetes," followed. The middle section of the "Festivals," with its procession heralded by the muted trumpets, was built up to a thrilling climax, subsiding into almost nothing as the throng passed into the distance.

Excerpts from the colorful second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite of Ravel, superbly done, formed the closing number of the first half of the program. All of this beauty, however, was forgotten later in the glorious performance of the C minor of Brahms. In this monumental work Koussevitsky revealed himself as one of the elect, for he not only knows his Brahms, but can, thru the medium of his splendid body of players, succeed in so impressing his hearers that they are spellbound. How superbly, for example, he makes the strings sing the beauty of the heavenly Andante. And with what rare understanding the brasses intoned the solemn phrases preceding the choral episode of the last movement. It was a rare concert and a musical feast which will linger long in the memory of those who heard it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Boston Symphony Arrives in City

Conductor Koussevitzky Praises Progress of Music In America.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, first Russian conductor ever to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra and the "lionized" of all the eastern conductors, arrived Thursday in Columbus with his staff of 100 musicians, on a special train. The orchestra will play in Memorial hall at 8:15 p. m.

"No country in the world is making so great an effort toward education in music as America," he said. "She is assuming the world leadership in music, and already owns the greatest orchestras in the world.

Unemployed Admitted

The orchestra will play to several hundred unemployed men and women, scattered among the audience, who will be admitted as a part of a plan of the Symphony club of central Ohio to serve the largest possible number of music lovers in the community. Realizing that some of their most loyal supporters in the past will this year be financialy unable to purchase tickets, the Symphonw club has made it possible for a limited number of unemployed musicians and others to be admitted.

The conductor will be the guest of Mrs. B. G. Huntington, 292 South Colubia avenue, president of the Symphony cluub, following the concert, and at midnight will leave Columbus with his orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 27 1932

* * *

MRS. B. GWYNNE HUNTINGTON and Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, those two women who so devotedly have sponsored various musical enterprises, are largely responsible for the two large blocks of seats which will be filled with enthusiastic supporters at the Boston Symphony Concert which will be at Memorial Hall this evening.

One hundred seats have been given to unemployed musicians who otherwise would not have heard the concert, and 100 pupils at the Columbus Art School will go to the concert and then back to the gallery, where they will transcribe graphically their impression of the program.

Mrs. Huntington is the founder and president of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is starting on its ninth season with the concert.

Mrs. Miller, the associate president, a generous patroness of art, is the aunt of Florence Stage, who is an accomplished pianist. Miss Stage, who has returned from a summer's visit in Europe, is a guest at the Miller home.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 27 1932

Art Students Watch Orchestra in Action

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky wields his baton in Memorial Hall this evening, directing the Boston Smyphony Orchestra in its third appearance here, 100 students from the Columbus Art School will be among his most interested listeners. They have agreed to note their impressions of the concert with a view to transcribing them graphically later at the art school.

The classical harmonies of Carelli, the strictly programmatic music of Debussy, the poetic Strauss' "Don Juan" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Smyphony will furnish the material from which to work. As an assignment, the problem is an experiment, Dean Nicomedum says.

The box office continues open until 5 p. m. today in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., and will reopen at 7 p. m. in Memorial Hall lobby. The concert is the first on the Smyphony Club of Central Ohio series. The group brings the Chicago Orchestra, with Dr. Frederick A. Stock, for a Jan. 16 concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

OCT 29 1932

MUSIC EVENTS OF INTEREST H

The Boston Symphony orchestra played at Music hall, Cincinnati, Wednesday evening, to an audience which filled 4500 seats and purchased standing room.

This was the first time that the orchestra had appeared in Cincinnati for 25 years and the public which had been trained to a high musical appreciation through the many concerts presented by the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra paid a tribute of much applause to Serge Koussevitsky, director, and his orchestral interpretations.

The instruments of this great orchestra are played so evenly, their presentations are so smooth that the selections seem almost perfectly interpreted.

Cincinnati thinks much of her music. She is one of the oldest cities in the country and her German population gave to her an early start in things cultural. East of the Alleghenies she probably has no rival in the number of citizens who care for the fine in paintings and prints, and in music.

Since she as a city is so ready to pay tribute to the arts she sees to it that her police force is friendly in direction of traffic about the hall. She sees that there is parking space for concert goers, and this, free of charge.

The concerts in Music hall are of a social nature. A lengthy intermission is provided in order that there may be a period for friends to meet in the lobby and long corrridors. Almost everyone is attired in evening dress and the affairs take on much of glamour. There are many boxes and here sit the wealthy patrons of things musical.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 1932

Boston Symphony Acclaimed Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the 112 men of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played Wednesday night in Music Hall for the second concert of this year's Artist Series, received a tremendous ovation from the huge crowd of music lovers who filled nearly every seat in the house on this occasion, and kept the orchestra and its leader on the stage for many minutes after the close of the program, because of the continued applause.

Mr. Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was one of the most appreciative of the attentive audience, composed of trained symphony listeners who are regular attendants of the Cincinnati orchestra's concerts, and many other music lovers on this occasion, a large number of them from surrounding towns. Mr. and Mrs. Goossens, the latter wearing a striking ensemble of bright red velvet, were guests of Mr. J. H. Thuman, manager of the Artist Series, in his box. Joining them in this loge were Mr. Thuman's daughter, Mary Rose, who wore dark red velvet; his cousin, Miss Janie Hills of Kansas City, who was in French blue, and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, who wore red crepe and a white fur jacket. Mrs. Wulsin's house guests, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Boulton of Morristown, N. J., sat with Mr. Wulsin in seats well down in front.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Wilbur Witt, the latter in a bright blue gown, had the box adjoining, where they were accompanied by a group of friends.

Mr. Stuart M. Thompson, business manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, also was there to hear the visiting orchestra.

He was accompanied by Mrs. Thompson, who wore black velvet. With them were Mr. and Mrs. Roger K. Rogan of Glendale, the latter also choosing black velvet for her attire.

Mrs. John J. Emery, in a long ermine wrap, had with her Dr. and Mme. Liszniewski, the latter in rose and gold brocade.

Mrs. Herbert Witherspoon, who recently arrived in Cincinnati to join Mr. Witherspoon, new director of music at the Conservatory, was among those of the artist set welcomed on this occasion.

Others seen thruout the auditorium and foyer were Mr. and Mrs. Philip Wyman, Mrs. John Wachmann, Mrs. Leo Westheimer, Mr. and Mrs. George Warrington, Miss Patricia O'Brien of Dayton, O.; Mr. and Mrs. Martin Dumler, Dr. and Mrs. Victor Fischback, the latter in bright green and brown; Mrs. Adolf Hahn, who accompanied Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; Mrs. C. C. Benedict, Miss Mildred Eakes, Miss Grace Woodruff, Misses Mabel and Kay Madden, Mrs. Maurice Henle, Miss Mary Katherine Neely, who was accompanied by Miss Mina Pemberton; Mr. and Mrs. Ladislas Segoe, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Geier, Mr. Edgar Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Hoffmann, Mr. Alexander von Kreisler, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Van Fossen, Miss Mary Johnston, Mr. Louis Saverne, Miss Gertrude Englander who was with Mr. and Mrs. Ben Lowenthal; Mr. Chalmers Hadley, Mrs. Jerome Sturm, Mrs. Arthur Beyer, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, Mr. Josef Cherniavsky, Mr. Howard Cox, Mrs. George F. Otte, Miss Jean Dearness, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Graydon, Miss Alma Betscher, Miss Irene Gromme, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gellenbeck, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Huttenbauer, Mme. Karin Dayas, Mrs. Gretchen Barnes, Mrs. Blanche Greenland, Mrs. Leonard Minster, Mrs. Ralph Pappenheimer, Mrs. Frederick W. Hinkle, Mr. N. Gabor, Miss Jean Simon, Miss Bertha Baur, and Dr. and Mrs. David Philipson.

Among those motoring up from Louisville were Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams, Mr. Stuart J. Simons and Mrs. Charles T. Ballard.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

27 1932

BOSTON TO PLAY "BEST SELLER"

Famous Conductor to Lead Favorite Work of Fellow Russian Tonight.

Tchaikowsky's colorful and impassioned Fifth Symphony, which is the chief item on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Memorial Hall Thursday night, is one of the few "best sellers" in symphonic literature, and Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, is internationally famous for his interpretation of it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 27 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Moves Hearers to Enthusiasm

By Lillian Tyler Plogstedt

Seated in Music Hall Wednesday evening, listening to the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, one was reminded of a saying accredited to Jean de Reszke, the famous tenor, speaking of the Wagnerian conductor, Anton Seidl. Said he: "If I forget a line, I look at Seidl and read it on his lips." Last night literally every phrase was framed on the lips of this dynamic conductor and mirrored in the playing of his men. Giving of himself as he does, it is small wonder that the huge audience was aroused to a point of enthusiasm seldom found in the temper of staid Cincinnati concertgoers.

One thinks of the Boston Symphon Orchestra in terms not of individual excellence, but as a unit of sound so superbly knit together that at no time does any one instrument predominate save at the desire of the director. And Koussevitsky has his men literally in the hollow of his expressive hands, molding them to the most suave phraseology, the most stirring climaxes, the most complete revelation of the inner meaning of a composition.

The program was ideally built. The "Classical" symphony, by the Russian composer, Prokofieff, embodies in charming fashion the grace of a classic garbed in modern dress. And it was read in a manner that revealed with meticulous clarity its loveliness.

Two Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages," that impressionistic picture of delicate cloud formation, and the gay "Fetes," followed. The middle section of the "Festivals," with its procession heralded by the muted trumpets, was built up to a thrilling climax, subsiding into almost nothing as the throng passed into the distance.

Excerpts from the colorful second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite of Ravel, superbly done, formed the closing number of the first half of the program. All of this beauty, however, was forgotten later in the glorious performance of the C minor of Brahms. In this monumental work Koussevitsky revealed himself as one of the elect, for he not only knows his Brahms, but can, thru the medium of his splendid body of players, succeed in so impressing his hearers that they are spellbound. How superbly, for example, he makes the strings sing the beauty of the heavenly Andante. And with what rare understanding the brasses intoned the solemn phrases preceding the choral episode of the last movement. It was a rare concert and a musical feast which will linger long in the memory of those who heard it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Boston Symphony Arrives in City

Conductor Koussevitzky Praises Progress of Music In America.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, first Russian conductor ever to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra and the "lionized" of all the eastern conductors, arrived Thursday in Columbus with his staff of 100 musicians, on a special train. The orchestra will play in Memorial hall at 8:15 p. m.

"No country in the world is making so great an effort toward education in music as America," he said. "She is assuming the world leadership in music, and already owns the greatest orchestras in the world.

Unemployed Admitted

The orchestra will play to several hundred unemployed men and women, scattered among the audience, who will be admitted as a part of a plan of the Symphony club of central Ohio to serve the largest possible number of music lovers in the community. Realizing that some of their most loyal supporters in the past will this year be financialy unable to purchase tickets, the Symphonw club has made it possible for a limited number of unemployed musicians and others to be admitted.

The conductor will be the guest of Mrs. B. G. Huntington, 292 South Colubia avenue, president of the Symphony cluub, following the concert, and at midnight will leave Columbus with his orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 27 1932

• • •

MRS. B. GWYNNE HUNTINGTON and Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, those two women who so devotedly have sponsored various musical enterprises, are largely responsible for the two large blocks of seats which will be filled with enthusiastic supporters at the Boston Symphony Concert which will be at Memorial Hall this evening.

One hundred seats have been given to unemployed musicians who otherwise would not have heard the concert, and 100 pupils at the Columbus Art School will go to the concert and then back to the gallery, where they will transcribe graphically their impression of the program.

Mrs. Huntington is the founder and president of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is starting on its ninth season with the concert.

Mrs. Miller, the associate president, a generous patroness of art, is the aunt of Florence Stage, who is an accomplished pianist. Miss Stage, who has returned from a summer's visit in Europe, is a guest at the Miller home.

• • •

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

27 1932

Art Students Watch Orchestra in Action

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky wields his baton in Memorial Hall this evening, directing the Boston Smyphony Orchestra in its third appearance here, 100 students from the Columbus Art School will be among his most interested listeners. They have agreed to note their impressions of the concert with a view to transcribing them graphically later at the art school.

The classical harmonies of Carelli, the strictly programmatic music of Debussy, the poetic Strauss' "Don Juan" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Smyphony will furnish the material from which to work. As an assignment, the problem is an experiment, Dean Nicomedum says.

The box office continues open until 5 p. m. today in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., and will reopen at 7 p. m. in Memorial Hall lobby. The concert is the first on the Smyphony Club of Central Ohio series. The group brings the Chicago Orchestra, with Dr. Frederick A. Stock, for a Jan. 16 concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

30 1932

MUSIC EVENTS OF INTEREST HERE AND AFIELD

The Boston Symphony orchestra played ~~at Music~~ hall, Cincinnati, Wednesday evening, to an audience which filled 4500 seats and purchased standing room.

This was the first time that the orchestra had appeared in Cincinnati for 25 years and the public which had been trained to a high musical appreciation through the many concerts presented by the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra paid a tribute of much applause to Serge Koussevitsky, director, and his orchestral interpretations.

The instruments of this great orchestra are played so evenly, their presentations are so smooth that the selections seem almost perfectly interpreted.

Cincinnati thinks much of her music. She is one of the oldest cities in the country and her German population gave to her an early start in things cultural. East of the Alleghenies she probably has no rival in the number of citizens who care for the fine in paintings and prints, and in music.

Since she as a city is so ready to pay tribute to the arts she sees to it that her police force is friendly in direction of traffic about the hall. She sees that there is parking space for concert goers. and this, free of charge.

The concerts in Music hall are of a social nature. A lengthy intermission is provided in order that there may be a period for friends to meet in the lobby and long corridors. Almost everyone is attired in evening dress and the affairs take on much of glamour. There are many boxes and here sit the wealthy patrons of things musical.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 28 1932

Boston Symphony Plays as Inspired

Kosseuvitzky Gives New Attestation of His Ripened Powers

By H. E. Cherrington

A LARGE audience, which completely filled the balcony and a good portion of the first floor last night listened to and applauded, with mighty ardor, the Boston Symphony club brought to Memorial hall by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The audience was deserved and also the applause, for in many years of attending symphonies we have rarerly heard a concert which so richly deserved an ovation as did the Boston, especially for the way, under direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, that the heroic ensemble played the Fifth symphonic opus of Tschaikowsky.

The symphony season had to be cut down this year, but the club certainly salvaged two remarkable groups to provide this phase of our music—namely the Boston and the Chicago, the latter to come hither in mid-January.

A GREATER BAND

WE THOUGHT that Boston had a great orchestra under Muck; we believed it had a great orchestra when Koussevitzky came here before, but last night so happily met were the talents of the band, the skill of the conductor and his enthusiasm for a great work, in the playing of the Fifth symphony, that we could call it nothing less than a super-orchestra. In this work of Tschaikowsky, so rigidly criticized in his lifetime and now accepted as one of the symphonic treasures of all times, Koussevitzky met something that he loves to interpret, and he directed it decidedly con amore. Occasionally his enthusiasm broke through the bounds of usual directive restraint and became positively impassioned. At times we were glad he didn't have a whip in hand for the excellent first violins would certainly have suffered something, innocently enough, at his hands.

There was a uniformity of excellence all through the symphony, which came after the intermission, but the second movement, the andante cantabile, with its hauntingly beautiful themes, was played with the most genuine inspiration and also the brilliant finale, which Brahms didn't like, a fact that we no longer hold against that great contemporary. The finale was played at galloping pace and with the most meticulous precision, too. It convinced us at last that this is no mere orchestra: it is a group of 110 virtuosi who have decided, fraternally, to play together under competent and respected leadership.

DEBUSSY NOCTURNES

THE suite of dances by Corelli began the program in a lightsome manner and another high point in the program was attained by the "Clouds"—Oriental clouds we found them—and "Festivals" of Debussy's glorified impressionism, best known to most of us through his pianistic masterpieces, here reaches a genuine splendor in creating atmospheric effects. There is nothing definite, objective, of course, but no more is there in a sunset or the trail of a skyrocket. "Luminous dust," they are, as Debussy says in his comment on the "Fetes," "participating in the universal rhythm of all things." These nocturnes were played by the orchestra with rare feeling, directed by a man who is nothing if not sensitivity personified. The familiar tone poem by Strauss, the "Don Juan," which has been played here so often, was also conducted with enthusiasm. We were interested to see in Philip Hale's remarkable notes that the first performance of this work in Boston was in 1891 under Nikisch.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 28 1932

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts With Accustomed Mastery

Works by Corelli, Debussy, Strauss and Tchaikowsky Evoke Enthusiasm of Large Audience at Symphony Club's Opening Concert.

JUST as he transmutes black notes printed on white paper into living sound, smoothly clear or turbulently impassioned, Serge Koussevitzky, Thursday night at Memorial Hall, with the magic of his art transformed the welcoming cordiality of his hearers into reverberating, enthusiastic acclaim.

"Revelator"

Koussevitzky

Three times he brought the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to their feet in response. For climax, after old orchestral custom, he had a congratulatory handclasp for Mr. Burgin, the concertmaster.

Thus began the ninth season of the Symphony Club of central Ohio. In fatter years it may have filled the auditorium with more people, seldom with more enthusiasm. And that is not to imply that Thursday's "house" was a matter for regret; on the contrary, weeks of work on the part of the diligent women of the organization resulted in increased rather than diminished attendance. A crowd of 3000 or better sat spellbound, departed still under the enchantment.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY could have devised no program better to serve both his own ends and the diverse tastes of his hearers.

He doubtless comes on tour, proud of his achievements, to show far cities the perfection of his instrument. Thus he chooses pieces in which the string choir can display its singing buoyancy, in which brasses may glow with rich and varied color, in which the solo voices of his incomparable woodwinds stand out, now and again, in etched beauty.

At the same time he (wise showman) knows that a program for an audience that hears but two or three in a season cannot be built like those for his own Symphony Hall. There all manner of men may be satisfied in a score and more of programs. Here they must be made happy with one.

So the list stood with the ancient Corelli's chamber music rearranged for his strings, Debussy's two Nocturnes for cool, shadowy color, the "Don Juan" of Strauss for fire and brilliance, Tchaikowsky's Fifth for familiar symphony, reawakened by his searching and revealing interpretation.

Nothing is there that may be classed as novelty, but neither is there anything that age has staled or repetition, in Columbus concert halls, has worn thin.

* * *

THE nameless author of a familiar Negro spiritual coined a word which may aptly be applied to Dr. Koussevitzky. The pious singer, full of the confused mystical promises of the last book of the New Testament, chanted of "John the Revelator." No more orthodox word so completely describes a special quality of this conductor.

He takes Corelli's score (as tactfully revised for string orchestra by one Ettore Pinelli) and by the happiest of phrasing and of pacing, by a delicate accent of rhythm here or of an inner voice there, sets it before us with its proportions and patterns revealed as at a glance.

He takes the lazily floating clouds of Debussy's fancy or his impressions of a nocturnal festival with its unearthly dazzling procession, and conjures up the composer's very visions for us from the multiple voices of his orchestra.

He takes the restless passions of Strauss' hero, tosses them about here and there among his instruments as poor, disillusioned Don Juan was tossed in his endless quest, and there stands revealed to us the epitome of a human experience.

Upon Tchaikowsky's symphony the conductor seized as if he himself had wrought the rich tapestries of the music. I venture to say the composer might have welcomed the revelation that resulted. The contrapuntal blend was just, melodramatic or morbid overtones were muffled, the adroit pattern of theme against theme was clarified in Dr. Koussevitzky's reading. Even if he did not adhere strictly to the letter of his printed instructions, Tchaikowsky must have been glad of the small liberties.

* * *

TO all this must be added a word of the self-revelation of the conductor amidst these luminous glimpses of the music he offered us. He renewed the impressions we carry in our mind's ear from season to season of his tremendous orchestral technique. We laymen can only begin to appreciate the sheer virtuosity of Thursday's performance; at the command of his baton miracles, we may be sure, were accomplished in the serried black and white ranks of his players.

Then, too, the present program showed, as no other here has, the musical internationality of the man (if I, in turn, may coin a word). Each composer stood in his own century, his own country, his own mood. It seemed scarcely the same orchestra that left the illusive and sensuous measures of Debussy to attack the fiery ardor of Strauss.

As long as the Boston orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky bring such a performance to us once in a long year, we cannot indulge in too much self-pity for a curtailed symphony season.

R. L. F. MC COMBS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG PRESS

OCT 27 1932

Society Folk Take Boxes For Symphony

Appearance of Boston Orchestra Will Open Musical Season

THE VISIT of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Pittsburgh tomorrow will bring Pittsburghers out for the official opening of the musical season. Among those who have reserved boxes for the concert tomorrow evening at Syria Mosque are Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., president of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, and Mrs. William Reed Thompson, who returned from New York to be here for the opening.

Boxes have also been taken by Mrs. William Watson Smith, Mrs. H. H. McClintic, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker, Mrs. Howell C. Cooper, Mrs. Leon Falk, Jr., Mrs. Ralph E. Flinn, Miss Margaret Adair, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Miss Rosamound Fitch, Mrs. James E. Graham, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey, Mrs. W. Terrell Johnson, Mrs. A. S. F. Keister, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. James E. Lewis, Dr. C. W. Norton, Dr. Ellen J. Patterson, Miss Mary Provost, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. John G. Stephenson, Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, Miss Emily Stuart, Mrs. J. F. Tate, Jr., Mrs. George E. Tener, George H. Taber, Mrs. Chester Marsh Van Kleeck and Mrs. H. S. Wherrett.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony, will open the local symphony season tomorrow night at Syria Mosque, when he will lead his orchestra of 100 players in a program that has the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor for its principal work.

Pittsburgh is indeed in the favored class in having the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for, outside of Boston, New York and Washington, but four other cities are favored during the entire season for one concert each. In addition to the Brahms Symphony, the other numbers include the Corelli Suite in three movements; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 27 1932

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always looked upon as the official opening of the local musical season. Sergei Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian leader, will bring his complete orchestra of 100 players to Syria Mosque tomorrow evening, and as this event has been anticipated for many months, indications are that society will be well represented, as it always is on the occasion of a Boston symphony concert. Dr. Koussevitzky has no superior in the making of programs and his selections for tomorrow night, including the Brahms Symphony No. 1 as the major work has met with such great favor that it was chosen as the subject for the first of the musical luncheons at the Woman's City Club yesterday, when T. Carl Whitmer analyzed the Brahms, Ravel, Debussy, and Corelli works that are to be presented tomorrow evening. Among the box holders for tomorrow night's concert are Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., who is president of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, under whose auspices the concert is given; Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, the vice president, and Mrs. William Reed Thompson, who returned to the city yesterday to be present at this opening; Mrs. William Watson Smith, Mrs. H. H. McClintic, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker, Mrs. Howell C. Cooper, Mrs. Leon Falk, Jr., Mrs. Ralph Flinn, also a member of the board; Miss Margaret Adair, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Miss Rosamound Fitch, Mrs. James E. Graham, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey, Mrs. W. Terrell Johnson, Mrs. A. S. F. Keister, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. James E. Lewis, Dr. C. W. Norton, Dr. Ellen J. Patterson, Miss Mary Provost, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. John G. Stephenson, Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, Miss Emily Stuart, Mrs. J. F. Tate, Jr., Mrs. George E. Tener, George H. Taber, Mrs. Chester Marsh Van Kleeck, and Mrs. H. S. Wherrett.

28

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG PRESS

OCT 29 1932

— Music —

Boston Symphony Opens Orchestra Group Course

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Whenever the Boston Symphony comes to town—far too infrequently for those who crave the best in orchestral musical expression—it is a signal for an outpouring of faithful admirers.

Thus again at Syria Mosque last night the famous orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, played to a throng in the first orchestra concert of the season—the initial event of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association course.

The program embraced the three movement suite in D minor of Corelli, as arranged by Ettore Pinelli; Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the second orchestral suite consisting of excerpts from Ravel's ballet "Daphne and Chloe," comprising "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance;" and Brahms' first symphony in C minor.

The playing of these works was marked by fine tonal delineation of superb interpretive conception, the solitary exception being the performance of the Debussy opus. The composer in this work has dipped deeply into the ravishing coloring of a hypnotic exoticism which he has spread lavishly and intelligently upon the orchestral canvas with an intentional vagueness that at once is alluring and compelling, instilling sensations of languor and indolence that are wafted into the consciousness through amazing harmonies and enchanting weaving melodic tracery. The entire work is replete with mystery and spell. Yet last night certain of the qualities that make for complete appeal were absent in its performance. True, there was plasticity and much loveliness of tonal contour, but the tempos were seemingly too retarded and one felt the need of more buoyancy and spontaneity. So much for dissent.

The opening Corelli work for strings was something to be remembered. It was astonishing what great-throated tone emanated from the instruments of this group of players—gorgeous sonority, exquisite nuance, and matchless phrasing vieing for the attention. Koussevitsky imparted to his reading of the score on ease and dignity that charmed the audience and elicited rousing applause. Gems of the past such as this Corelli work are sure-fire program leaders that never wear out their welcome.

Ravel's ballet, "Daphne" and Chloe," proved a tonal revel, intoxicating and pungent in characteristic Koussevitsky style. It was significant, scintillating and redolent with mood, from moments of serenity and tenderness mounting to climaxes of passionate power. Its breathless appeal captured the audience by storm waves of ovational applause recalling the conductor several times, the orchestra rising to share the approbation.

The final and most important work of the evening was that keystone of musical art, Brahms' first symphony, a full-blooded tonal body of pulsating life. It is the product of maturity, for Brahms was past 40 when he gave this stupendous brain child to the world. He had waited 10 years longer than Beethoven to produce his first symphony. Yet every movement—every bar glows with the spark of inimitable genius and profound thought. It is a work further distinguished by the complete absence of superfluities, and when one hears it performed as it was last night, one cannot but feel on a par with the gods, so potent is its inspirational claim. It was a fitting climax and one departed from the hall with the feeling of satisfaction of having spent an evening hearing great music played by a great orchestra directed by a great conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 29 1932

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Syria Mosque

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky leading, played the opening concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series in Syria Mosque last night. The audience reluctantly showed its appreciation of the high qualities of this orchestra until the finale of the symphony brought an outburst of applause, and no wonder.

Mr. Lissfelt

The program was for all tastes, not even the most exacting classicist might cavil. Resurrected Corelli for the Boston players is like wearing one's best bib and tucker, for their string choir is phenomenal and, singing alone in this Eighteenth century music, its best is undisguised. Embellishments that are difficult enough for soloist fall from their bows and fingers in the most precise unison.

The Ravel ballet music was momentary respite, a carnival before the more sombre joy of Brahms. And of this music and its players we speak with reverence. For we have heard music better than which we shall likely never hear again in this life.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing tonight in Syria Mosque.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG PRESS

OCT 29 1932

Society In Welcome To Symphony As Concert Season Opens Here

Women Don Velvet and Ermine for Musical Event Sponsored by Pittsburgh Orchestra Association

SOCIETY came out in black velvet and ermine last night for the official opening of the musical season when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a concert at Syria Mosque. The concert was under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association of which Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., is president.

Mrs. Thaw, who had reserved one of the boxes was gowned in black velvet with a black velvet wrap. Mrs. William Reed Thompson, another officer of the association, who had arrived home from New York a few days before, entertained guests in her box. She wore a dark blue velvet gown, with a wrap the same shade. Her daughter, Mrs. Thomas H. Eddy, was also gowned in dark blue velvet.

Mrs. John W. Lawrence in black satin was a box holder, as was Mrs. Mortimer Miller, who was also gowned in black. Her daughter, Mrs. Roy A. Hunt, wore an attractive dark red velvet gown, with a red and gold metallic cloth wrap trimmed in fox. Mrs. Frank C. Irish wore black satin and Mrs. E. V. Babcock was gowned in black satin and lace.

* * *

AMONG the young people at the concert were Miss Katharine Frazer in a black velvet gown with a short ermine jacket with wide loose sleeves, and Mrs. James C. McKay (Frances Reed) in chartreuse green rough crinkly crepe. Over her gown Mrs. McKay wore a brown velvet wrap that had a deep collar of gold metallic cloth banded in brown fur. The Misses Virginia and Ruth Willock, both wearing black; Miss Madeleine Alexander in a blue velvet gown with a wrap to match, Miss Emily Stuart in a gown of Bagheera cloth in the new shade of dark blue were others of the younger group at the concert.

Mrs. T. Clifton Jenkins in a gown of red crepe and lace was there with her two daughters. Miss Dorothea Jenkins wore an American Beauty red velvet gown, with a wrap to match, and Miss Elizabeth Jenkins wore a gown in the new shade of hyacinth blue crepe.

Mrs. Karl Kaufmann wore a black gown with a black caracul wrap. Miss Helen Rauh was gowned in red velvet, with which she wore a black velvet wrap trimmed with white fur.

Mrs. William Terrell Johnson wore a red and gold metallic ensemble. Mrs. Hugh Campbell Shaw was in bright green crepe.

* * *

MISS ELIZABETH GEORGE wore a gown of purple velvet with a white velvet wrap. Miss Rosamound Fitch was gowned in black and flesh pink lace. Miss Gretchen Bickford wore a pink chiffon gown.

Miss Betty Higgins had chosen a gown of bright blue velvet, Miss Dorothy Jarvis wore brown velvet and Miss Harriet Fickes was gowned in green satin. Miss Fredericka Holdship was gowned in blue lace. Miss Eleanor George wore robin's egg blue silk.

Among those who had reserved boxes were Mrs. William Watson Smith, Mrs. H. H. McClintic, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker, Mrs. Howell C. Cooper, Mrs. Leon Falk, Jr., Mrs. Ralph E. Flinn, Miss Margaret Adair, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Miss Rosamound Fitch, Mrs. James E. Graham, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey, Mrs. Y. Terrell Johnson, Mrs. A. S. F. Keister, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. James E. Lewis, Dr. C. W. Norton, Mr. Ellen J. Patterson, Miss Mary Provost, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. John G. Stephenson, Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, Miss Emily Stuart, Mrs. J. F. Tate, Jr., Mrs. George E. Tener, George H. Taber, Mrs. Chester March Van Kleek and Mrs. H. S. Wherrett.

* * *

Weather permitting, the Aviation Country Club will hold an air meet Sunday which was postponed last week. The event will begin at 2 p. m.

Among the eight events planned is a tag race open to women pilots only. The other races will be for both men and women.

A tea will be served during the afternoon to guests who attend the meet. Among pilots will be Miss Katherine May Edwards, Miss Helen MacCloskey and Miss Helen Ritchey.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

Mayfair Turns Out to Hear Symphony

Music lovers who attended the Boston Symphony's concert last night in Syria Mosque, the first symphony to appear this season, had an evening's reprieve from the realities of 1932 living. And nobody who was at the concert could go away saying Pittsburgh does not appreciate music.

The boxes were filled with such staunch supporters of music as slight, dignified Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., of Sewickley Heights, who is president of the Symphony Association

Mrs. W. Edgar Reed and Mrs. E. V. Babcock, familiar figures at concerts, arrived together,—and Mrs. F. C. Irish, looking regal in black velvet, was there, as were Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, Mrs. George Pearson, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, in black satin; Mrs. John E. Nelson and her young daughter, Peggy.

Petite Gretchen Bickford, in snapdragon pink lace, arrived with David McCargo, and Elizabeth and Clara Dorothea Jenkins with their mother, Mrs. T. Clifton Jenkins. Elizabeth wore an interesting gown of flax blue crepe having scarf drapery of the same material over the shoulders and criss-cross straps of the crepe, outlined in sequins, to distinguish the deep black decolletage.

Betty Higgins' dress was striking. It was of sapphire blue bagheera with the V decolletage boasting a narrow bertha of the same material.

Emily Stuart wore blue bagheera fastened at the shoulders with rhinestone clips. Dorothy Jarvis was in wine-red velvet having a brief jacket of the same material with the sleeves outlined in bands of white fur.

Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., chose wine-red satin, Katharine Frazer, black velvet with a white ermine jacket, Mrs. James McKay was there, Mrs. James M. Graham, Jr., Mrs. W. Terrell Johnston and Mrs. Mortimer Miller in black velvet and chinchilla and Mrs. Roy A. Hunt.

Mrs. J. Hartwell Hillman arrived with her daughter, Juliet Hillman, Mrs. Edward B. Lee was in the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG PRESS

OCT 28 1932

Boston Symphony Appears Tonight

In a program that has the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor as its principal work, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear tonight at Syria Mosque under the leadership of the noted Serge Koussevitzky.

Outside of Boston Pittsburgh is one of only six other cities in which the orchestra gives a concert each season.

Dr. Koussevitzky, the conductor of the orchestra, does more than merely read a score when leading his 100 musicians, for he succeeds, music critics agree, in identifying himself with the composer.

In addition to the Brahms Symphony, the program for tonight includes the Corelli Suite in three movements, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 29 1932

Boston Symphony Superb In Season's First Concert

Simply superb.

There may be other and lengthier ways of describing it, but that is the Boston Symphony in one paragraph, and he who has to read the political speeches may skip the rest of this.

Perhaps it was the lapse of two years, possibly it was the initial orchestra concert of the season, maybe it was because we were all hungry for noble music nobly read, but whatever it was the Boston Symphony gave a memorable concert last night at the Mosque.

It is silly to say this, but Serge Koussevitzky seems to have improved; maybe he has and maybe he hasn't, but Pittsburgh has, and so last night to a man the enthusiastic audience gave conductor and men an ovation at intermission and an ovation at the close.

Koussevitzky has always been a program maker; there is no man in the trade who knows more of archetectonics than he, and last night there was a glorious sequence of works.

To be sure, little of the program was new, but as played by the Boston men it seemed new, and it certainly was accomplished. For finesse, ravishing refinements, commend yourself to that Debussy and Ravel.

What boots it if we've seen that dawdling faun dream away more afternoons than an unemployed bonus soldier, still it was refreshing to hear that cooling flute, and as for strings, Boston is the orchestra par excellence.

Ravel and Brahms.

Exquisite as was the Debussy hardy perennial, "The Afternoon of a Faun" still the high lights were the Ravel and the Brahms, and the first work of the program was the Brahms C Minor symphony, a work of inestimatable beauty.

If Mozart wrote the "Jupiter," Beethoven the heroic ninth then Brahms, the old hedonist, wrote the "Ein Fests Burg" in that first symphony, and when that "Hymn to Joy," chorale-coda came bursting forth that was a notable episode.

The Brahms No. 1 is almost as familiar here as the Cesar Franck, and yet last night there were inspired qualities, and while we hesitate to say this lest some greybeard with a memory as long as a Bach toccata, come along and say, "way back in '76 Victor Herbert played it better," still it was the best Brahms we can remember in some time.

Off the four movements nothing finer has been heard at the Mosque than that "Andante Sostenuto," and that paenesque finale.

Maurice Ravel's ballet "Daphis et Chloe" was a logical successor to the Debussy, and it carried on the idiom one step further and rose to a smashing climax in that "Danse Generale." It was magnificent and if it was episodic, that too was agreeable.

The opening work was the Corelli suite, a three-some of "Sarabande-Gigue-Badinerie" and the three movements served to show the opulence and plasticity of the Boston strings.

When drawing up your list of the season's concerts, remember this opening program by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston men—and be grateful that we can still have such incomparable music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 24 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY BRAHMS

Dr. Koussevitzky Will Conduct Concert Monday Evening in Music Hall.

Buffalonians will hear one of the foremost musical organizations in the country Monday evening, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, presents a concert in Elmwood Music hall. The concert, scheduled to commence at 8:15 P. M., is the only one to be given by an out-of-town orchestra this season under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

The musicians are scheduled to arrive in Buffalo in a special train Monday afternoon. Besides the 110 members of the orchestra, the aggregation includes a librarian, and a man whose sole duty it is to take care of the various instruments.

Because of illness, William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra and a former Buffalonian is unable to come with the players, Miss Marian de Forest, secretary-manager of the Buffalo Musical foundation, announced Sunday. Mr. Brennan was largely responsbile for inclusion of Buffalo among the six cities in which the orchestra will play this season.

Mr. Brennan formerly was manager of the Old Music hall here, the site of which is now occupied by the Teck theater. He has been manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra for several years, succeeding the late Charles H. Ellis.

A brilliant program has been arranged for the local concret. Commemorating the centenary of Brahms, to be observed early next spring, the musicians will play his First Symphony in C minor.

Dr. Koussevitzky has been conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for nine of the 53 years of its existence, holding this position a longer time than any of his predecessors.

Tickets for the concert may be obtained at Denton, Cottier & Daniels until 5 P. M. Monday. The box office at Elmwood Music hall will open at 7 P. M., Miss de Forest said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 25 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY TRIUMPHAL IN CONCERT HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra stirs brilliant audience in Music Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, made a triumphal appearance in Elmwood Music Hall last evening before a brilliant audience under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation of which Alfred H. Schoellkopf is president and Marian De Forest, manager.

Dr. Koussevitzky now is at the very pinnacle of his ripened artistry and he has the enviable gift of inspiring his orchestra to convincing expression. This was evidenced in the monumental performance of the final number, the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, opus 68. The prolonged ovation accorded him and the members of his orchestra, 110 in number, was a flattering testimonial to his aristocratic and scholarly reading of this work by Brahms which is like a gorgeous piece of tapestry. It presents picture after picture in glowing tonalism with contrasts of more subdued harmonies, and exuberant passages and the rarified atmosphere of mountain heights, pierced by the clear insistent call of the Alpine horn, echoed from mountain to mountain. The second and third movements were arrestingly beautiful, and the heroic climax which Dr. Koussevitzky evoked with his sovereign mastery, brought his audience to a high pitch of excitement.

Another superb offering was Don Juan, a tone-poem by Richard Strauss, a modern work of tremendous orchestral demands and one which through the medium of music portrays the hero in search of his ideal woman. It is a composition of fiery appeal and fairly drips with color, while its poetic themes temper its ardent passages. The orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky's guidance played with flexibility of nuance, incisiveness of rhythm and glorious tonal quality.

This was the second triumph of the evening. In the Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy, whose compositions a world-famous writer once called "the vaporous dreams woven of star dust," the orchestra again scored a success with its sensitive regard for delicate nuances and a poetic portrayal.

The Corelli Suite, Sarabande-Gigue-Badinerie, graceful in character and sparkling in melodies was the opening number on the program. It was, however, the Brahms Symphony upon which Dr. Koussevitzky left the imprint of his master musicianship.

M. B. S.

Among Those Attending

Among those in the audience were Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey, Mrs. Bryant B. Glenny, Judge and Mrs. Charles B. Sears, Bishop and Mrs. Cameron J. Davis, Miss Frances Davis, Mrs. George Bleistein, Miss Betty Wells, Miss Barbara Stowe, Mr. and Mrs. Chauncey J. Hamlin, Dr. and Mrs. Franciscus Vissert'ooft, Mr. and Mrs. George Meadway, Mrs. Frank W. Abbott, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred H. Schoellkopf, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin T. Douglass, Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel S. Norton, Miss Marian de Forest, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Taylor, Mrs. Charles L. Gurney, Lars S. Potter, Mrs. Eva Sellstedt Potter, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mrs. Evelyn Choate, Miss Lillias Macdonald, Dr. and Mrs. George J. Eckel, Mrs. Clement Long, R. Leon Trick, Dr. Lesser Kauffman, Dr. and Mrs. Henry Ten Eyck Perry, Miss Florence Lee, Mrs. Charles H. Seymour, Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mrs. Walter M. Zink, Mrs. Thomas B. Carpenter, Miss Elizabeth Cottier

Miss Mabel Wilcox, Mrs. S. M. Clement, Mrs. Charles H. Frost, Mrs. Albert J. Phinney, Mr. and Mrs. Harold J. Cook, Dr. Maud J. Frye, Mrs. William B. Frye, Miss Margaret Frye, John Ingram, Mrs. Risley Tucker, Mrs. William E. Lyle, Mrs. Edward B. Guthrie, Miss Nellie R. Thurstone, Miss Helen L. Pierce, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Becker Goetz, Dr. and Mrs. Julian Park, Roswell Park, the Misses Ada and Florence Fitts, Mrs. Frank G. Webster, Miss Margaret Webster, the Rev. and Mrs. Walter R. Lord, Mrs. Carlton M. Smith, Miss Emily Smith, Miss Ethelyn Pratt Cobb, Miss Fredericka Cobb, Mrs. Ellwood C. Grissinger, Mrs. Henry Altman, Mrs. Madeline Nichols, Miss Clara Fassett, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Ullman, Miss Mary E. Larned, Mr. and Mrs. Francis di Bartolo, Mrs. Ralph R. Hillman, Mrs. William J. Gray, Miss Harriet Keating, Miss Lavinia S. Hawley, Miss Mary E. Jauch, the Misses Kurtz, Miss Margaret R. Pyke, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Taylor, Miss Ruth Johnston, Mrs. William H. Hufstader, Robert E. Hufstader.

Mrs. Mark S. Hubbell, Mrs. Mark H. Hubbell, Mrs. U. K. Loose, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Halliday, Mr. and Mrs. Carlos C. Alden, Mrs. James W. Greene, Mrs. Edward A. Sharp, Mrs. Harry P Pierce, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Rumeill, Jr., George T. Ballachey, Mrs. James E. Hanrahan, Mrs. Albert F. Laub, Mr. and Mrs. J. Rollin Ansteth, John F. Huber, Mrs. Jane Showerman McLeod, Miss Julia T. Sherman, Miss May Forrestel, Dr. and Mrs. A. L. Benedict, Mrs. James B. Fenton, Miss Fenton, Miss Cora Townsend, Mrs. George I. Seney, Miss Betty Welch, George H. Field, Mrs. Norma Metz, Mr. and Mrs. Stuart C. Welch, Mrs. Robert J. Gallagher, Mrs. George S. Buck, Mrs. Charles A. Bailey.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 25 1932

but estra nks-

KY
s, the audi-

f the pro-
visits to this city, has he offered a more effectively contrasted array of musical numbers. It included a Corelli suite arranged by Ettore Pinelli; The Afternoon of a Faun, Debussy; the tone poem, Don Juan, Richard Strauss, and the Brahms symphony No. 1, in C minor. The novel Corelli suite consisted of three short pieces, Sarabande, a Gigue, and Badinerie. It was music of aristocratic elegance, with the grace and perfume of a royal court, and the orchestra played it with unsurpassable daintiness and charm.

Where could one find a sharper and more telling contrast than be-visionary, the heroic axes of the whose con-end and bal-and glowing temperament, painted the Debussy tone picture in lovely pastel shades, and gave thrilling utterance to the Strauss measures. In both of these, the hearer was constantly impressed by the super-excellent caliber of the orchestra. The solo voices were always beautiful to the ear, and the union of the instruments was a flood of pellucid tone, exquisite in color. In brief, the orchestral work of last night left no room for criticism; it was virtually perfection in this field of musical performance.

Great interest centered in the Brahms symphony, a composition rarely played here. Brahms wrought ten years on this first symphony, a Titanic creation. Like many of his writings, it utilizes the simple elements of folksong, and like much of his music, it takes one into the shadows rather than the sunlit spaces of the world. But it is such wholesome music, expressing musical thought with both eloquence and control. The work was played with glittering technical skill, beauty of tone and unfailing unity of the different sections. The Andante was outstanding in the reverential treatment of its noble, hymn-like melodies. Unrestrained enthusiasm followed the performance of the symphony, and both conductor and his men were included in the prolonged outbursts of applause, a fitting tribute to a memorable artistic achievement.

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1932

Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky and Orchestra Give Memorable Performance in Elmwood Music Hall.

By EDWARD DURNEY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra have scored another local triumph; have come to us thus early in the season with an inspired musical message that will not soon be forgotten, and again have won the appreciation and gratitude of an enormous audience of Buffalo music lovers. The Boston organization gave its annual local program Monday evening, in Elmwood Music hall, the concert under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Dr. Koussevitzky's admirable program offered, as its major item, Brahms' First Symphony; happily included the Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and, as well, an arranged Corelli suite and the Richard Strauss "Don Juan."

The inclusion of the Debussy composition was sufficient to arouse joyous anticipation, for a former reading of the work by Dr. Koussevitzky is fondly remembered. If ever music was creative of atmosphere here it is in this exquisitely fragrant, limpid score of Debussy. And the deft, unerring touch of Koussevitzky never fails to lend enchantment to its pages, to reveal its delicate play of color, its moods, its allurement, its orchestral charm. This Debussy performance provided one of the great delights of a memorable evening.

The Brahms C Minor Symphony made up the second half of the program and its performance stands as an achievement of first magnitude. In this first symphony Brahms has not always avoided complexities, but, characteristically, he has presented beauty and vitality in happy union. Koussevitzky's reading was, needless to say, fraught with significance, was free from exaggeration, was of incisive rhythmic pulse and of electrifying spirit and clarity. The soaring spirit of the first movement, the temporary calm of the second, the pastoral delicacy of the third, the mounting joy of the finale, all were communicated faithfully to the listeners in the conductor's brilliant unfoldment. The close of the performance was the signal for unwonted enthusiasm on the part of the audience, and conductor and players responded to the ovation.

The Corelli suite, opening the program, proved a choice appetizer, and profited in performance by the radiant purity of the string quality of the Boston orchestra. The three numbers of the suite, Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, in their pervading grace and charm exerted instant appeal.

The Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," came as the third and final offering of the first half of the program. This episodic work, of Wagnerian echo, betrays its composer's accustomed brilliance in matters of orchestration. Full justice was its fate at the hands of the Boston players.

77

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 29 1932

Boston Symphony Superb In Season's First Concert

Simply superb.

There may be other and lengthier ways of describing it, but that is the Boston Symphony in one paragraph, and he who has to read the political speeches may skip the rest of this.

Perhaps it was the lapse of two years, possibly it was the initial orchestra concert of the season, maybe it was because we were all hungry for noble music nobly read, but whatever it was the Boston Symphony gave a memorable concert last night at the Mosque.

It is silly to say this, but Serge Koussevitzky seems to have improved; maybe he has and maybe he hasn't, but Pittsburgh has, and so last night to a man the enthusiastic audience gave conductor and men an ovation at intermission and an ovation at the close.

Koussevitzky has always been a program maker; there is no man in the trade who knows more of archetectonics than he. and last night there was a glorious sequence of works.

To be sure, little of the program was new, but as played by the Boston men it seemed new, and it certainly was accomplished. For finesse,, ravishing refinements, commend yourself to that Debussy and Ravel.

What boots it if we've seen that dawdling faun dream away more afternoons than an unemployed bonus soldier, still it was refreshing to hear that cooling flute, and as for strings, Boston is the orchestra par excellence.

Ravel and Brahms.

Exquisite as was the Debussy hardy perennial, "The Afternoon of a Faun" still the high lights were the Ravel and the Brahms, and the first work of the program was the Brahms C Minor symphony, a work of inestimatable beauty.

If Mozart wrote the "Jupiter," Beethoven the heroic ninth then Brahms, the old hedonist, wrote the "Ein Fests Burg" in that first symphony, and when that "Hymn to Joy," chorale-coda came bursting forth that was a notable episode.

The Brahms No. 1 is almost as familiar here as the Cesar Franck, and yet last night there were inspired qualities, and while we hesitate to say this lest some greybeard with a memory as long as a Bach toccata, come along and say, "way back in '76 Victor Herbert played it better," still it was the best Brahms we can remember in some time.

Off the four movements nothing finer has been heard at the Mosque than that "Andante Sostenuto," and that paenesque finale.

Maurice Ravel's ballet "Daphis et Chloe" was a logical successor to the Debussy, and it carried on the idiom one step further and rose to a smashing climax in that "Danse Generale." It was magnificent and if it was episodic, that too was agreeable.

The opening work was the Corelli suite, a three-some of "Sarabande-Gigue-Badinerie" and the three movements served to show the opulence and plasticity of the Boston strings.

When drawing up your list of the season's concerts, remember this opening program by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston men—and be grateful that we can still have such incomparable music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 24 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY BRAHMS

Dr. Koussevitzky Will Conduct Concert Monday Evening in Music Hall.

Buffalonians will hear one of the foremost musical organizations in the country Monday evening, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, presents a concert in Elmwood Music hall. The concert, scheduled to commence at 8:15 P. M., is the only one to be given by an out-of-town orchestra this season under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

The musicians are scheduled to arrive in Buffalo in a special train Monday afternoon. Besides the 110 members of the orchestra, the aggregation includes a librarian, and a man whose sole duty it is to take care of the various instruments.

Because of illness, William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra and a former Buffalonian is unable to come with the players, Miss Marian de Forest, secretary-manager of the Buffalo Musical foundation, announced Sunday. Mr. Brennan was largely responsbile for inclusion of Buffalo among the six cities in which the orchestra will play this season.

Mr. Brennan formerly was manager of the Old Music hall here, the site of which is now occupied by the Teck theater. He has been manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra for several years, succeeding the late Charles H. Ellis.

A brilliant program has been arranged for the local concret. Commemorating the centenary of Brahms, to be observed early next spring, the musicians will play his First Symphony in C minor.

Dr. Koussevitzky has been conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for nine of the 53 years of its existence, holding this position a longer time than any of his predecessors.

Tickets for the concert may be obtained at Denton, Cottier & Daniels until 5 P. M. Monday. The box office at Elmwood Music hall will open at 7 P. M., Miss de Forest said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 25 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY TRIUMPHAL IN CONCERT HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra stirs brilliant audience in Music Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, made a triumphal appearance in Elmwood Music Hall last evening before a brilliant audience under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation of which Alfred H. Schoellkopf is president and Marian De Forest, manager.

Dr. Koussevitzky now is at the very pinnacle of his ripened artistry and he has the enviable gift of inspiring his orchestra to convincing expression. This was evidenced in the monumental performance of the final number, the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, opus 68. The prolonged ovation accorded him and the members of his orchestra, 110 in number, was a flattering testimonial to his aristocratic and scholarly reading of this work by Brahms which is like a gorgeous piece of tapestry. It presents picture after picture in glowing tonalism with contrasts of more subdued harmonies, and exuberant passages and the rarified atmosphere of mountain heights, pierced by the clear insistent call of the Alpine horn, echoed from mountain to mountain. The second and third movements were arrestingly beautiful, and the heroic climax which Dr. Koussevitzky evoked with his sovereign mastery, brought his audience to a high pitch of excitement.

Another superb offering was Don Juan, a tone-poem by Richard Strauss, a modern work of tremendous orchestral demands and one which through the medium of music

ORDER TO GUARD RIGHTS OF CHILD ASKED BY BANK

Executor named in Reynold's will would protect interests of unborn baby

New York, Oct. 24 (AP)—A court order empowering it to protect the interests of the unborn child of Libby Holman Reynolds, widow of Z. Smith Reynolds, heir to the tobacco fortune, was sought today by the Guaranty Trust Company, which was named executor in Reynolds' will.

The trust company, in a petition filed in surrogate's court, asked that letters of temporary administration be granted pending the birth of a child to Reynolds' widow, or the "definite determination that the possibility of birth no longer exists."

The petition specifically asked for permission to sublet an apartment, which Reynolds had leased in New York, effective August 1st, for fourteen months at $6,000 a year.

Belief was expressed in the petition that a probate of Reynolds' will which leaves $50,000 each to his first wife, their daughter and

Charles E. Gurney, Lars S. Potter, Mrs. Eva Sellstedt Potter, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mrs. Evelyn Choate, Miss Lillias Macdonald, Dr. and Mrs. George J. Eckel, Mrs. Clement Long, R. Leon Trick, Dr. Lesser Kauffman, Dr. and Mrs. Henry Ten Eyck Perry, Miss Florence Lee, Mrs. Charles H. Seymour, Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mrs. Walter M. Zink, Mrs. Thomas B. Carpenter, Miss Elizabeth Cottier

Miss Mabel Wilcox, Mrs. S. M. Clement, Mrs. Charles H. Frost, Mrs. Albert J. Phinney, Mr. and Mrs. Harold J. Cook, Dr. Maud J. Frye, Mrs. William B. Frye, Miss Margaret Frye, John Ingram, Mrs. Risley Tucker, Mrs. William E. Lyle, Mrs. Edward B. Guthrie, Miss Nellie

---

BUFFALO EVENING NE BUFFALO EVENIN

Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky and Orchestra Give Memorable Performance in Elmwood Music Hall.

By EDWARD DURNEY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra have scored another local triumph; have come to us thus early in the season with an inspired musical message that will not soon be forgotten, and again have won the appreciation and gratitude of an enormous audience of Buffalo music lovers. The Boston organization gave its annual local program Monday evening, in Elmwood Music hall, the concert under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Dr. Koussevitzky's admirable program offered, as its major item, Brahms' First Symphony; happily included the Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and, as well, an arranged Corelli suite and the Richard Strauss "Don Juan."

The inclusion of the Debussy composition was sufficient to arouse joyous anticipation, for a former reading of the work by Dr. Koussevitzky is fondly remembered. If ever music was creative of atmosphere here it is in this exquisitely fragrant, limpid score of Debussy. And the deft, unerring touch of Koussevitzky never fails to lend enchantment to its pages, to reveal its delicate play of color, its moods, its allurement, its orchestral charm. This Debussy performance provided one of the great delights of a memorable evening.

The Brahms C Minor Symphony made up the second half of the program and its performance stands as an achievement of first magnitude. In this first symphony Brahms has not always avoided complexities, but, characteristically, he has presented beauty and vitality in happy union. Koussevitzky's reading was, needless to say, fraught with significance, was free from exaggeration, was of incisive rhythmic pulse and of electrifying spirit and clarity. The soaring spirit of the first movement, the temporary calm of the second, the pastoral delicacy of the third, the mounting joy of the finale, all were communicated faithfully to the listeners in the conductor's brilliant unfoldment. The close of the performance was the signal for unwonted enthusiasm on the part of the audience, and conductor and players responded to the ovation.

The Corelli suite, opening the program, proved a choice appetizer, and profited in performance by the radiant purity of the string quality of the Boston orchestra. The three numbers of the suite, Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, in their pervading grace and charm exerted instant appeal.

The Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," came as the third and final offering of the first half of the program. This episodic work, of Wagnerian echo, betrays its composer's accustomed brilliance in matters of orchestration. Full justice was its fate at the hands of the Boston players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 25 1932

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Program Defying Criticism

By MARY M. HOWARD

KOUSSEVITZKY

As Buffalo is scheduled to have but one concert by a visiting orchestra this season, it is cause for thanksgiving that the orchestra selected for this single occasion was the Boston Symphony, which, under its masterful conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave a program last evening in Elmwood Music hall. The Buffalo Musical Foundation could not have made wiser choice, and to the delight of all music lovers, the hall held an almost-capacity audience.

The distinguished leader of the Boston orchestra is famed as a program maker, but rarely, in his visits to this city, has he offered a more effectively contrasted array of musical numbers. It included a Corelli suite arranged by Ettore Pinelli; The Afternoon of a Faun, Debussy; the tone poem, Don Juan, Richard Strauss, and the Brahms symphony No. 1, in C minor. The novel Corelli suite consisted of three short pieces, Sarabande, a Gigue, and Badinerie. It was music of aristocratic elegance, with the grace and perfume of a royal court, and the orchestra played it with unsurpassable daintiness and charm.

Where could one find a sharper and more telling contrast than between the Debussy, with its visionary, elusive atmosphere, and the heroic themes and brilliant climaxes of the Strauss? Koussevitzky, whose conducting shows such a blend and balance of high mentality and glowing temperament, painted the Debussy tone picture in lovely pastel shades, and gave thrilling utterance to the Strauss measures. In both of these, the hearer was constantly impressed by the super-excellent caliber of the orchestra. The solo voices were always beautiful to the ear, and the union of the instruments was a flood of pellucid tone, exquisite in color. In brief, the orchestral work of last night left no room for criticism; it was virtually perfection in this field of musical performance.

Great interest centered in the Brahms symphony, a composition rarely played here. Brahms wrought ten years on this first symphony, a Titanic creation. Like many of his writings, it utilizes the simple elements of folksong, and like much of his music, it takes one into the shadows rather than the sunlit spaces of the world. But it is such wholesome music, expressing musical thought with both eloquence and control. The work was played with glittering technical skill, beauty of tone and unfailing unity of the different sections. The Andante was outstanding in the reverential treatment of its noble, hymn-like melodies. Unrestrained enthusiasm followed the performance of the symphony, and both conductor and his men were included in the prolonged outbursts of applause, a fitting tribute to a memorable artistic achievement.

30

Oct. 26. 1932

E ANN ARBOR DAILY NEWS, ANN ARBOR, MICH.

Reforestation

Boston Orchestra Is Heard In Initial Concert Event

Fifty-Fourth Choral Union Series Inaugurated at Auditorium

By Carl E. Gehring

Before discussing the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted Tuesday evening at Hill auditorium, a few pertinent remarks are in order. While all of the past Choral Union Concert series have, in varying degree, been a credit to their sponsors, perhaps no other local course has been faced with the situation which confronts the fifty-fourth annual Choral Union series. As we enter the fourth year of the economic depression, the portents of this catastrophe have become so menacing and far-flung that many who once regarded the Spenglerian theory of western decline with indifference now view with alarm the relentless march of events, incidentally noting the support which Ortega y Gasset, Egon Friedell and others have since accorded Spengler's ideas.

Thus the courage of the University Musical society, in planning one of its finest concert courses in a season when financial support for the project is not entirely assured, arouses our sincere commendation. When one considers the precarious state of our symphony orchestras, that only two grand opera companies remain in the country, as Deems Taylor has shown, and that our own Chamber Music Society of Ann Arbor has suspended activity for a year, one realizes what an obvious gamble confronts the officials of the University Musical society. Yet they have gone right ahead with a steadfastness which, if adhered to by Occidental society as a whole, should guide us out of an abyss which might ultimately prove to be bottomless if the descent goes on unchecked.

A Fine Opening Event

After congratulating local musical officials on their firm stand, we may say that the music of the Boston Symphony orchestra quite equalled the impression it made here last year. So uniformly excellent was this performance that one lost one's self in its contemplation and absorption, the crass concerns of every-day-life becoming matters of small account. This fact should be borne in mind by those who, with an eye to the family budget, may feel that under present conditions music had better be foregone. Art, it is well to recall, aptly has been called the recompense for the sufferings of mankind, and, in times like the present, it should be the more firmly embraced, not rejected. Concerning the concert, however, added to a sterling performance was an interesting program.

Offered on this occasion were Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony; two of Debussy's three orchestral Nocturnes, namely "Nuages" and "Fetes"; the Strauss Symphonic Poem "Don Juan," and the Fifth Symphony, in E Minor, of Tschaikowsky. This comprised a well balanced program, and attractive, yet it would have been a trifle more to our liking had Dr. Koussevitzky offered us Sibelius' Eighth Symphony or a work or two by Bruckner which he is featuring this year, inasmuch as we know the Tschaikowsky Op. 64 so intimately. However the Symphony we heard Tuesday evening was Tschaikowsky as he undoubtedly conceived his music; that is, Dr. Koussevitzky did not fall into the error of certain conductors who wring from the Russian's sentimental measures the last possible tear.

Tschaikowsky Symphony

As has been said of Rachmaninoff, Tschaikowsky enjoyed a good cry, yet it always has been the writer's conviction that this man in his melancholy fits was not Peter Iljitch at his best. We had, for example, the composer in one of his most powerful and representative moods in the finale of the Fifth Symphony, which is the epitome of barbaric splendor. Not only was it intruiging to have a Russian conductor interpreting a Russian composer in a frenzied outburst, but it also was satisfying to hear a complete performance of this eloquent music. Not for a number of seasons has the movement entire been played here, the shorter Stock version unfortunately having gained in popularity with certain conductors. Incidentally, Willem Mengelberg has even a shorter version than the Stock, both of which are recorded.

In any case, this electrifying performance brought to conclusion a sparkling evening which had been charged with Dr. Koussevitzky's dynamic personality. Discussing the last bars of the concert first does not preclude remarking on some excellent French horn playing in the initial statement of the first theme from the second movement, or calling attention to the fine instrumental balances which were maintained in the haunting trio from the Waltz movement. A deviation from the orthodox approach to the first movement had to do with the tempo with which the third section of the second theme proper, exclusive of the motto theme, was taken. If any charge of sweetness were to be raised, it might apply here, the violins lingering too soulfully over an irresistibly lovely air, somewhat nullifying the effect of its delicate lyricism.

Other Works Heard

If Prokofieff's score did not seem so effective, it was due to the intrinsic character of the work and not to any lapses on the musicians' parts. This miniature Symphony is recorded by the Boston orchestra and, while the hearer may find it a charming enough work at first, it hardly holds up on too intimate acquaintance. Nevertheless it comprises an adroit use by Prokofieff of the classical symphonic mold, with a number of color tints belying its modern association. Yet the chameleon-like manner in which Prokofieff appears in this or that guise as composer, as is revealed by the varied quality of his output, little exceeded the chameleon-like way in which the orchestra adjusted itself to the demands of the various compositions played.

More exquisite performances of the Debussy Nocturnes scarcely could be imagined. Never, in the various renditions of "Nuages" which the writer has heard, have such luscious shadings beguiled the ear, the dreamy remoteness of the opening measures, for instance, fairly carrying away the imaginative listener on a bank of clouds of his own making. In this connection, the velvety texture of the chords in the wood choir was only equalled once again, in the finale of the Fifth Symphony wherein the woodwinds literally come up for air in a long diminuendo, after a Slavic dance tune has been quite torn asunder during some tempestuous attacks by the full orchestra. "Fetes," on the other hand, was likewise well interpreted, although some fuzzy work in the flutes injected a detracting element.

Trekking homeward and brought back to earth by the dampness of an inclement evening, the music lover might recall with inner warmth a colossal performance of Strauss' "Don Juan," the sinuous beauty of Debussy, the excellence of the orchestra, the genius of Dr. Koussevitzky, and, possibly, certain lines of Robert Frost, also recently a visitor to Ann Arbor, which read:

"Let the night be too dark for me to see into the future. Let what

---

THE MICHIGAN DAILY
Established 1890

OCT 27

Our Appreciations To The Choral Union . . .

FOUR thousand Ann Arbor music lovers Tuesday night heard the opening presentation of the Choral Union series, which will bring nine more outstanding musical organizations and individual artists here before the famous May Festival week next spring. The Boston Symphony, led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave a great performance that amply justified the enthusiasm of the audience. The program was arranged with remarkable care; the orchestra was —just what one of the greatest symphony organizations in the world should be.

So again we offer our congratulations to the Choral Union; not only for the work of the orchestra, but also on the success of the ambitious program of bringing the best in the musical world to Ann Arbor, while other small cities, in the belief that good music is too great a luxury for this era of depression, are permitting interest in such events to lapse.

And we congratulate those who heard the concert as well. It is through these discriminating listeners, who appreciate the finest talent and throng the auditorium to hear such artists as Dr. Koussevitzky and the members of the orchestra, that the Choral Union is able to make Ann Arbor a real musical center.

IE DETROIT FREE PRESS—WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 26

Throng Hails Koussevitzky

First Choral Union Concert Triumph

By HERMAN WISE

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 25—The fifty-fourth annual choral union series of concerts opened in a dignified and ceremonious manner here tonight when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 members performed before an audience that almost filled spacious Hill Auditorium.

As was to be expected, the evening was in every way a distinct success. Musically, it met the demands of the most discriminating. For the visiting organization and its poetically brilliant leader, there was shown an appreciation both genuine and of vast proportion.

Musical Society Commended

The University Musical Society which has planned one of the most extensive series in its history, is to be commended for bringing the esteemed Koussevitzky to this city. The society could not have begun its season in a more fitting manner.

Four major works made up the program—four compositions that have been written within the last 45 years.

It is interesting to note that while each work is as different from the other as is possible in music, not one can be pointed to as an inferior piece of writing. Each must be considered among the musical masterpieces of all time and yet not one is as old as the average person of yesterday's generation.

Here is definite proof that it is unnecessary to go back into the centuries to find great music. It is at once clear that those who shed tears over the claim that valuable compositions ceased to be written after Beethoven are hardly to be taken seriously. Those at the concert tonight demonstrated beyond any doubt their favorable reaction to the program and the manner of performance.

'Classical' Symphony Opens

To open, Dr. Koussevitzky chose the "Classical" symphony, Op. 25, of Prokofieff, a work which had its first reading in the state. Completed in 1917, it is said to be fashioned after the style Mozart might have employed today.

A superb bit of orchestration, the work proved the outstanding contribution of the evening. For vitality and sheer delight, here is a number that Detroit ought to hear before the season gets too far along. The spirit of the time has been incorporated in this gem with the utmost understanding.

The two Debussy nocturnes — "Clouds" and "Festivals" — were read by the magnetic Koussevitzky with the keenneess he showed at his Detroit concert last year. His shading, his orchestral contracts and unexpected climaxes are miraculous and long to be remembered.

The other two numbers were the Strauss Tone Poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20 (after Lenau), and the Tschaikovsky Fifth Symphony in E Minor, Op. 64.

Finale Evokes Cheers

Neither of these measured up to the first two performances, although the orchestra gave of its best. The tone in the brass, however, could have been improved upon in more than one instance.

But these slips were unimportant. Both the Strauss and the Tschaikovsky were given vigorous readings and the finale of the symphony was sufficiently stirring to evoke cheers from the audience.

Music, played by an organization that can stand with the very best both in this country and abroad, was king here tonight, and the town paid proper tribute to it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 26 1932

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra is on tour, the first of the present season. For the concerts of Nov. 4 and 5 the novelty will be the first performance in Boston of the tone poem "Tapiola" by Sibelius. According to the Boston Transcript, Mr. Cecil Gray has this to say of it:

"'Tapiola' is in many respects the culminating point of Sibelius's entire creative activity, and a consummate masterpiece which could only be the outcome of a long process of spiritual growth and development. It is music of extraordinary simplicity and directness, yet there is not one bar in it, from first to last, that could possibly have been written by any other composer.

"The work takes its name from Tapio, the forest god of Finnish Mythology—the Old Man of the Woods, the Elder of the Hills, the Master of the Wasteland.

"No words can hope to convey one tithe of the grandeur and sublimity, the sheer originality and imaginative power, which inform the whole work both in broadest outline and in the minutest details of the scoring."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 25 1932

Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky and Orchestra Give Memorable Performance in Elmwood Music Hall.

By EDWARD DURNEY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra have scored another local triumph; have come to us thus early in the season with an inspired musical message that will not soon be forgotten, and again have won the appreciation and gratitude of an enormous audience of Buffalo music lovers. The Boston organization gave its annual local program Monday evening, in Elmwood Music hall, the concert under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Dr. Koussevitzky's admirable program offered, as its major item, Brahms' First Symphony; happily included the Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and, as well, an arranged Corelli suite and the Richard Strauss "Don Juan."

The inclusion of the Debussy composition was sufficient to arouse joyous anticipation, for a former reading of the work by Dr. Koussevitzky is fondly remembered. If ever music was creative of atmosphere here it is in this exquisitely fragrant, limpid score of Debussy. And the deft, unerring touch of Koussevitzky never fails to lend enchantment to its pages, to reveal its delicate play of color, its moods, its allurement, its orchestral charm. This Debussy performance provided one of the great delights of a memorable evening.

The Brahms C Minor Symphony made up the second half of the program and its performance stands as an achievement of first magnitude. In this first symphony Brahms has not always avoided complexities, but, characteristically, he has presented beauty and vitality in happy union. Koussevitzky's reading was, needless to say, fraught with significance, was free from exaggeration, was of incisive rhythmic pulse and of electrifying spirit and clarity. The soaring spirit of the first movement, the temporary calm of the second, the pastoral delicacy of the third, the mounting joy of the finale, all were communicated faithfully to the listeners in the conductor's brilliant unfoldment. The close of the performance was the signal for unwonted enthusiasm on the part of the audience, and conductor and players responded to the ovation.

The Corelli suite, opening the program, proved a choice appetizer, and profited in performance by the radiant purity of the string quality of the Boston orchestra. The three numbers of the suite, Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, in their pervading grace and charm exerted instant appeal.

The Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," came as the third and final offering of the first half of the program. This episodic work, of Wagnerian echo, betrays its composer's accustomed brilliance in matters of orchestration. Full justice was its fate at the hands of the Boston players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

OCT 30 1932

Boston Symphony to Play Prokofieff and Sibelius Works

The orchestral suite made by Serge Prokofieff from his opera, "Le Joueur" (Der Spieler), will be played for the first time in America under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home concerts on next Friday and Saturday. The opera was first heard at Brussels in the spring of 1929 and the suit was first performed in Paris at a Colonne concert last March.

The opera was derived from Dostoievsky's novel of this title. Sibelius's tone poem "Tapiola" will have its first Boston hearing on this program. It was composed in 1925 on a commission from the New York Symphony Orchestra and introduced here on December 26, 1926, with Walter Damrosch conducting. The music did not win much favor here, but is said to be much admired in Europe.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

30

Oct. 26, 1932

E ANN ARBOR DAILY NEWS, ANN ARBOR, MICH.

Reforestation

Boston Orchestra Is Heard In Initial Concert Event

Fifty-Fourth Choral Union Series Inaugurated at Auditorium

By Carl E. Gehring

Before discussing the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted Tuesday evening at Hill auditorium, a few pertinent remarks are in order. While all of the past Choral Union Concert series have, in varying degree, been a credit to their sponsors, perhaps no other local course has been faced with the situation which confronts the fifty-fourth annual Choral Union series. As we enter the fourth year of the economic depression, the portents of this catastrophe have become so menacing and far-flung that many who once regarded the Spenglerian theory of western decline with indifference now view with alarm the relentless march of events, incidentally noting the support which Ortega y Gasset, Egon Friedell and others have since accorded Spengler's ideas.

Thus the courage of the University Musical society, in planning one of its finest concert courses in a season when financial support for the project is not entirely assured, arouses our sincere commendation. When one considers the precarious state of our symphony orchestras, that only two grand opera companies remain in the country, as Deems Taylor has shown, and that our own Chamber Music Society of Ann Arbor has suspended activity for a year, one realizes what an obvious gamble confronts the officials of the University Musical society. Yet they have gone right ahead with a steadfastness which, if adhered to by Occidental society as a whole, should guide us out of an abyss which might ultimately prove to be bottomless if the descent goes on unchecked.

A Fine Opening Event

After congratulating local musical officials on their firm stand, we may say that the music of the Boston Symphony orchestra quite equalled the impression it made here last year. So uniformly excellent was this performance that one lost one's self in its contemplation and absorption, the crass concerns of every-day-life becoming matters of small account. This fact should be borne in mind by those who, with an eye to the family budget, may feel that under present conditions music had better be foregone. Art, it is well to recall, aptly has been called the recompense for the sufferings of mankind, and, in times like the present, it should be the more firmly embraced, not rejected. Concerning the concert, however, added to a sterling performance was an interesting program.

Offered on this occasion were Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony; two of Debussy's three orchestral Nocturnes, namely "Nuages" and "Fetes"; the Strauss Symphonic Poem "Don Juan," and the Fifth Symphony, in E Minor, of Tschaikowsky. This comprised a well balanced program, and attractive, yet it would have been a trifle more to our liking had Dr. Koussevitzky offered us Sibelius' Eighth Symphony or a work or two by Bruckner which he is featuring this year, inasmuch as we know the Tschaikowsky Op. 64 so intimately. However the Symphony we heard Tuesday evening was Tschaikowsky as he undoubtedly conceived his music; that is, Dr. Koussevitzky did not fall into the error of certain conductors who wring from the Russian's sentimental measures the last possible tear.

Tschaikowsky Symphony

As has been said of Rachmaninoff, Tschaikowsky enjoyed a good cry, yet it always has been the writer's conviction that this man in his melancholy fits was not Peter Iljitch at his best. We had, for example, the composer in one of his most powerful and representative moods in the finale of the Fifth Symphony, which is the epitome of barbaric splendor. Not only was it intruiging to have a Russian conductor interpreting a Russian composer in a frenzied outburst, but it also was satisfying to hear a complete performance of this eloquent music. Not for a number of seasons has the movement entire been played here, the shorter Stock version unfortunately having gained in popularity with certain conductors. Incidentally, Willem Mengelberg has even a shorter version than the Stock, both of which are recorded.

In any case, this electrifying performance brought to conclusion a sparkling evening which had been charged with Dr. Koussevitzky's dynamic personality. Discussing the last bars of the concert first does not preclude remarking on some excellent French horn playing in the initial statement of the first theme from the second movement, or calling attention to the fine instrumental balances which were maintained in the haunting trio from the Waltz movement. A deviation from the orthodox approach to the first movement had to do with the tempo with which the third section of the second theme proper, exclusive of the motto theme, was taken. If any charge of sweetness were to be raised, it might apply here, the violins lingering too soulfully over an irresistibly lovely air, somewhat nullifying the effect of its delicate lyricism.

Other Works Heard

If Prokofieff's score did not seem so effective, it was due to the intrinsic character of the work and not to any lapses on the musicians' parts. This miniature Symphony is recorded by the Boston orchestra and, while the hearer may find it a charming enough work at first, it hardly holds up on too intimate acquaintance. Nevertheless it comprises an adroit use by Prokofieff of the classical symphonic mold, with a number of color tints belying its modern association. Yet the chameleon-like manner in which Prokofieff appears in this or that guise as composer, as is revealed by the varied quality of his output, little exceeded the chameleon-like way in which the orchestra adjusted itself to the demands of the various compositions played.

More exquisite performances of the Debussy Nocturnes scarcely could be imagined. Never, in the various renditions of "Nuages" which the writer has heard, have such luscious shadings beguiled the ear, the dreamy remoteness of the opening measures, for instance, fairly carrying away the imaginative listener on a bank of clouds of his own making. In this connection, the velvety texture of the chords in the wood choir was only equalled once again, in the finale of the Fifth Symphony wherein the woodwinds literally come up for air in a long diminuendo, after a Slavic dance tune has been quite torn asunder during some tempestuous attacks by the full orchestra. "Fetes," on the other hand, was likewise well interpreted, although some fuzzy work in the flutes injected a detracting element.

Trekking homeward and brought back to earth by the dampness of an inclement evening, the music lover might recall with inner warmth a colossal performance of Strauss' "Don Juan," the sinuous beauty of Debussy, the excellence of the orchestra, the genius of Dr. Koussevitzky, and, possibly, certain lines of Robert Frost, also recently a visitor to Ann Arbor, which read:

"Let the night be too dark for me to see into the future. Let what [illegible] be."

NEWS

OCT 25 1932

Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky and Orchestra Give Memorable Performance in Elmwood Music Hall.

By EDWARD DURNEY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra have scored another local triumph; have come to us thus early in the season with an inspired musical message that will not soon be forgotten, and again have won the appreciation and gratitude of an enormous audience of Buffalo music lovers. The Boston organization gave its annual local program Monday evening, in Elmwood Music hall, the concert under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Dr. Koussevitzky's admirable program offered, as its major item, Brahms' First Symphony; happily included the Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and, as well, an arranged Corelli suite and the Richard Strauss "Don Juan."

The inclusion of the Debussy composition was sufficient to arouse joyous anticipation, for a former reading of the work by Dr. Koussevitzky is fondly remembered. If ever music was creative of atmosphere here it is in this exquisitely fragrant, limpid score of Debussy. And the deft, unerring touch of Koussevitzky never fails to lend enchantment to its pages, to reveal its delicate play of color, its moods, its allurement, its orchestral charm. This Debussy performance provided one of the great delights of a memorable evening.

The Brahms C Minor Symphony made up the second half of the program and its performance stands as an achievement of first magnitude. In this first symphony Brahms has not always avoided complexities, but, characteristically, he has presented beauty and vitality in happy union. Koussevitzky's reading was, needless to say, fraught with significance, was free from exaggeration, was of incisive rhythmic pulse and of electrifying spirit and clarity. The soaring spirit of the first movement, the temporary calm of the second, the pastoral delicacy of the third, the mounting joy of the finale, all were communicated faithfully to the listeners in the conductor's brilliant unfoldment. The close of the performance was the signal for unwonted enthusiasm on the part of the audience, and conductor and players responded to the ovation.

The Corelli suite, opening the program, proved a choice appetizer, and profited in performance by the radiant purity of the string quality of the Boston orchestra. The three numbers of the suite, Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, in their pervading grace and charm exerted instant appeal.

The Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," came as the third and final offering of the first half of the program. This episodic work, of Wagnerian echo, betrays its composer's accustomed brilliance in matters of orchestration. Full justice was its fate at the hands of the Boston players.

THE MICHIGAN DAILY
Established 1890

OCT 27

Our Appreciations To The Choral Union . . .

FOUR thousand Ann Arbor music lovers Tuesday night heard the opening presentation of the Choral Union series, which will bring nine more outstanding musical organizations and individual artists here before the famous May Festival week next spring. The Boston Symphony, led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave a great performance that amply justified the enthusiasm of the audience. The program was arranged with remarkable care; the orchestra was —just what one of the greatest symphony organizations in the world should be.

So again we offer our congratulations to the Choral Union; not only for the work of the orchestra, but also on the success of the ambitious program of bringing the best in the musical world to Ann Arbor, while other small cities, in the belief that good music is too great a luxury for this era of depression, are permitting interest in such events to lapse.

And we congratulate those who heard the concert as well. It is through these discriminating listeners, who appreciate the finest talent and throng the auditorium to hear such artists as Dr. Koussevitzky and the members of the orchestra, that the Choral Union is able to make Ann Arbor a real musical center.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 26 1932

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra is on tour, the first of the present season. For the concerts of Nov. 4 and 5 the novelty will be the first performance in Boston of the tone poem "Tapiola" by Sibelius. According to the Boston Transcript, Mr. Cecil Gray has this to say of it:

"'Tapiola' is in many respects the culminating point of Sibelius's entire creative activity, and a consummate masterpiece which could only be the outcome of a long process of spiritual growth and development. It is music of extraordinary simplicity and directness, yet there is not one bar in it, from first to last, that could possibly have been written by any other composer.

"The work takes its name from Tapio, the forest god of Finnish Mythology—the Old Man of the Woods, the Elder of the Hills, the Master of the Wasteland.

"No words can hope to convey one tithe of the grandeur and sublimity, the sheer originality and imaginative power, which inform the whole work both in broadest outline and in the minutest details of the scoring."

IE DETROIT FREE PRESS—WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 26

Throng Hails Koussevitzky

First Choral Union Concert Triumph

By HERMAN WISE

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 25—The fifty-fourth annual choral union series of concerts opened in a dignified and ceremonious manner here tonight when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 members performed before an audience that almost filled spacious Hill Auditorium.

As was to be expected, the evening was in every way a distinct success. Musically, it met the demands of the most discriminating. For the visiting organization and its poetically brilliant leader, there was shown an appreciation both genuine and of vast proportion.

Musical Society Commended

The University Musical Society which has planned one of the most extensive series in its history, is to be commended for bringing the esteemed Koussevitzky to this city. The society could not have begun its season in a more fitting manner.

Four major works made up the program—four compositions that have been written within the last 45 years.

It is interesting to note that while each work is as different from the other as is possible in music, not one can be pointed to as an inferior piece of writing. Each must be considered among the musical masterpieces of all time and yet not one is as old as the average person of yesterday's generation.

Here is definite proof that it is unnecessary to go back into the centuries to find great music. It is at once clear that those who shed tears over the claim that valuable compositions ceased to be written after Beethoven are hardly to be taken seriously. Those at the concert tonight demonstrated beyond any doubt their favorable reaction to the program and the manner of performance.

'Classical' Symphony Opens

To open, Dr. Koussevitzky chose the "Classical" symphony, Op. 25, of Prokofieff, a work which had its first reading in the state. Completed in 1917, it is said to be fashioned after the style Mozart might have employed today.

A superb bit of orchestration, the work proved the outstanding contribution of the evening. For vitality and sheer delight, here is a number that Detroit ought to hear before the season gets too far along. The spirit of the time has been incorporated in this gem with the utmost understanding.

The two Debussy nocturnes — "Clouds" and "Festivals" — were read by the magnetic Koussevitzky with the keenneess he showed at his Detroit concert last year. His shading, his orchestral contracts and unexpected climaxes are miraculous and long to be remembered.

The other two numbers were the Strauss Tone Poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20 (after Lenau), and the Tschaikovsky Fifth Symphony in E Minor, Op. 64.

Finale Evokes Cheers

Neither of these measured up to the first two performances, although the orchestra gave of its best. The tone in the brass, however, could have been improved upon in more than one instance.

But these slips were unimportant. Both the Strauss and the Tschaikovsky were given vigorous readings and the finale of the symphony was sufficiently stirring to evoke cheers from the audience.

Music, played by an organization that can stand with the very best both in this country and abroad, was king here tonight, and the town paid proper tribute to it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

OCT 30 1932

Boston Symphony to Play Prokofieff and Sibelius Work

The orchestral suite made by Serge Prokofieff from his opera, "Le Joueur" (Der Spieler), will be played for the first time in America under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home concerts on next Friday and Saturday. The opera was first heard at Brussels in the spring of 1929 and the suit was first performed in Paris at a Colonne concert last March.

The opera was derived from Dostoievsky's novel of this title. Sibelius's tone poem "Tapiola" will have its first Boston hearing on this program. It was composed in 1925 on a commission from the New York Symphony Orchestra and introduced here on December 26, 1926, with Walter Damrosch conducting. The music did not win much favor here, but is said to be much admired in Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

OCT 30 1932

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Again the Symphonic Broadcaster

CULTIVATED music-lovers are entitled to congratulate themselves upon the progressive though leisurely reclamation of symphonic broadcasting from the malign influence of ignoramuses and vulgarians. I refer to that type of radio announcer and lecturer whose activities have been a sore affliction to those who wished to hear the broadcasting of music performed by our great orchestras.

When the rulers of the air began to act upon the theory that there was a radio audience of considerable size whose musical appetite was not entirely satisfied by listening to such gems of the lighter repertoire as the "Ground Hog Blues" and "He's a Curbstone Cutie," they proceeded to choose the announcers and lecturers for their symphonic broadcasts upon a quaint and original principle. Apparently it seemed to the discerning minds of the radio directors that the best commentaries upon Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner, and other composers of what is vulgarly known as "classical" music would be supplied by persons who knew least about their subject.

Upon no other theory can one account for the fact that in the earlier years of symphonic broadcasting in this country, most of the radioed comment upon the programs to which educated music lovers were invited to listen proceeded apparently from the darkened minds of glib barbarians, obviously ignorant concerning the matters they were attempting to discuss.

* * *

Disheartened Listeners

IN THOSE incredible days, it was possible to hear the C minor Symphony of Brahms discussed, in connection with a performance by Mr. Toscanini, by a commentator whose musical illiteracy was as appalling as the elegant vulgarity of his speech. I sometimes wondered, in those days, how many potential enthusiasts were lost to the radio by the kind of pretentious and flatulent gush which was offered to them as appropriate comment upon the great music of the world: comment so cheap and erroneous, so insufferable in its hifalutin' affectations, that a million cultivated music lovers, from New York to San Francisco, must have turned off their radios in shuddering dismay—or transferred their attention, in desperation, to the concurrent discourse of the Rev. Ozias Crump.

* * *

These conditions are being slowly bettered. I had occasion not long ago in this column to applaud the selection by the Columbia Broadcasting System of Mr. Olin Downes, music critic of "The New York Times," as lecturer for the broadcasting of the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts. And now the WABC authorities have carried further this excellent work of regeneration by securing as radio commentator upon the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra Mr. Pitts Sanborn, the music critic of the New York "World-Telegram."

Mr. Sanborn has already spoken at two of the concerts that are being broadcast this season from the stage of the Philadelphia Academy of Music on Friday afternoons; and one hopes that he will continue to do so throughout the series.

Mr. Sanborn's qualifications as a commentator upon music are scarcely in need of indication. He is a scholar, an accomplished man of letters, a critic of long experience and of unimpeachable taste (incidentally, he is a poet and a novelist of parts). He speaks concerning music with the authority of the expert. He has an excellent radio voice—cultivated, of agreeable timbre; and his diction is admirable. His comments upon the C minor Symphony of Brahms, during the intermission of the first Philadelphia broadcast, could not have been improved upon. His characterization of the music was pithy, eloquent, illuminating—the observations of an enlightened listener offering the fruits of that enlightenment to other listeners.

* * *

Orchestras and the Depression

IT APPEARS to some of us that insufficient recognition has been accorded those amazingly unselfish philanthropists who are today, in the midst of unprecedented financial calamities and anxieties, continuing their support of our great but exceedingly expensive orchestras. A symphony orchestra is always a costly thing to maintain. An orchestra such as the Philharmonic-Symphony or the Philadelphia or the Boston or the Chicago, with its high-priced first players and its none too humble conductors, not only is unable to pay for itself, but must necessarily, even in boom times, confront its guarantors with enormous deficits.

Under the present fantastic and terrifying conditions, the problem of maintaining an organization like the Philharmonic or the Philadelphia Orchestra, in the face of diminished subscriptions and all-around distress and stringency, is appalling to contemplate. Yet these orchestras are proceeding on their usual course, as if the year were 1928 instead of 1932. The programs continue to offer the great works of the symphonic repertoire; the performances are as superb as they ever were; the conductors are the finest to be had.

* * *

The public-spirited men and women who are financially responsible for these staggeringly expensive undertakings are, as is known of all, far less affluent than they once were; yet they continue uncomplainingly to stand the gaff. One cannot but wonder if their unselfishness in thus enhancing the civilization of the communities they serve, their invaluable contributions to the education of the public in perceptive listening, are appreciated. One has one's doubts.

There is nothing spectacularly alluring about a performance of Brahms's F major Symphony by the Philharmonic under Toscanini, or of the Sibelius Fourth under Stokowski, or of a Handel Concerto Grosso by the Boston Orchestra under Koussevitzky. The easily tickled crowds run in another direction—to hear Signor Belcantofirmo agitating the operatic chandelier with his high C's; to observe the lyric dementia of Lucia.

The persuasions of a symphony orchestra are of a different sort. At their characteristic best, they serve to promote that kind of education which initiates the mind and the spirit into new and richer orders of experience: that kind of enlightenment which the inimitable appraiser of intellectual values had in mind when he wrote: "Let our artists be those who are qualified to discern the true nature of the beautiful; . . . then will our youth dwell in a land of health, amid fair sights and sounds, and receive the good in everything: and beauty, the effulgence of fair works, shall flow into the eye and the ear . . . and insensibly draw the soul from earliest years into likeness and sympathy with the beauty of reason. There can be no nobler training."

That, also, is "to build for endlessness."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 31 1932

The Distaff

BY CAROLINE HAZARD.

Musical Recollections and Comments Occasioned by the Opening of Symphony Orchestra Season on Two Coasts

The symphony societies have begun their splendid work for the season, the three great orchestras of Boston, Philadelphia and Cleveland leading in the East, and Los Angeles and San Francisco on the West Coast. With the radio their beautiful music is carried far and wide, the unseen auditors vastly outnumbering those in the concert halls. Providence is to have its own orchestra as well as sharing in the music of its neighbor and we must never forget that Koussevitsky is a son of Brown, that Dr. Faunce conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Music. Those who were at that convocation can never forget its unusual feature for any academic occasion. The explorer Roy Chapman Andrews was the other recipient of a degree, at the special meeting of the trustees in February. He was to be in China on one of his fruitful journeys of exploration at Commencement time in June, and Koussevitsky would be abroad, so the ceremony took place on the hill, instead of in the first Baptist church. Andrews responded for his degree in detailing some of the picturesque features of his work. When it came Koussevitsky's turn Dr. Faunce announced that the distinguished foreigner would not trust his English, but would respond in the universal language. I have been told, for alas, I was not there, that the doctor's gown and hood were quietly laid aside, the great bass viol was brought in and Koussevitsky played a magnificent composition of his own. That I have heard, when he gave it later in Symphony hall, Boston, for the benefit of the Russian students. Such pure rich tone, such brilliant treble parts, such notes quivering with life, I have never heard, as that great viol produced in the hands of such a master. It is more than a 'cello for richness, with the added wonder as Koussevitsky plays it of harmonics of angelic sweetness, capable of the utmost a single instrument can do, covering the whole realm of expression.

* * *

After all the great orchestras are made up of individual musicians, and to each his own instrument. There is a joy in the creation of sound, projecting one's own individuality through the strings of instruments, or the very breath of one's own life through the stops of flutes and the great family of pipes. The organ binds them together in massive chords, the piano brings its mechanism for the string vibrations. We each can do something to make a musical instrument our own.

In the far mountains of Kentucky there are still dulciniers, such as used to be played in England two hundred years ago. It is only a three-stringed instrument tuned to a common chord, and plucked with the fingers. For the old ballads like "Barbara Allen," or "The Bailiff's Daughter" it makes a thrumming accompaniment to the voice. These are still made and used in the mountains.

* * *

Not so long ago violins were made in Rhode Island. One artist of the South County made over seventy, seasoning his wood with care, polishing it to beauty, shaping his violins after the old good models, each one, as is the glory of violins, an individual creation with its own differing beauty of tone. This violin maker led the village choir with the same instrument that often set his neighbors to dancing. Some of them remonstrated with him, but he protested it was a "Godly Fiddle"; and it was. Under his bow it could comfort, and exhalt, as well as excite to merriment. It could run the whole gamut of life, from simple childlike joy to noble worship.

The material side of music, its notes and scores, rest with the players. The result is an appeal to the hearer, intangible, evanescent beauty itself, aloof in its loveliness, and universal, for sound

"Is everywhere in the world—loud, soft, and all is said:
Give it to me to use! I mix it with two in my thought;
And, there! ye have heard and seen:
consider and bow the head."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 2 - 1932

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky will play the following works Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall in Boston: Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute"; Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Tapiola"; Prokofieff's character portraits from "The Gambler" and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

OCT 27 1932

Brahms Opus To Be Feature For Symphony

Two Modern, Two Classic Composers on Saturday Program of Boston Orchestra in Bailey Hall—Serge Koussevitzky to Conduct

Two modern and two classic composers will be represented in the program with which the Boston Symphony will open the Bailey Hall concert series on Saturday night.

The major offering, which will continue the second half of the program, will be a Brahms symphony, his No. 1 in C Minor. This is especially apropos in view of the fact that the Brahms centenary will be celebrated this winter. The composer was born on May 7, 1833.

The other composers to be used are Debussy and Ravel of the modern school, and Corelli of the classical Italian, violinist-composer who originated the concerto grosso. The Corelli selection is a modern arrangement from his 12th Sonata for violin.

The Cornell Music Department announced today that only about 160 of the better seats in Bailey Hall remain for this concert.

The Boston Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will make this appearance the last of a week's tour with which it has opened its road season. The musicians will arrive in Ithaca Saturday morning by special train, and will return to Boston after the concert.

The program will be as follows:
Suite .... Corelli
Sarabande, Gigue, Badinerie
Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun .... Debussy
"Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet,
Orchestral .... Ravel
(Excerpts, second suite)
Lever du jour—pantomime—danse generale
Intermission.
Symphony No. 1 in C minor..
.... Brahms

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

OCT 31 1932

Koussevitsky And Symphony Well Received

Performance in Bailey Hall Excells Past Appearances Of Boston Musicians — Brahms Opus Highlight— Play to Capacity House

A performance excelling its own past record of Bailey Hall triumphs was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night.

Working with practically the same body of musicians year after year, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brings them constantly nearer perfection. Saturday's concert seemed even more dazzling in realization of the fact that the musicians had been on a six night trip during which time they gave eight performances.

The symmetry and dextrous yet translucent gaiety of the opening number, a Corelli suite, showed the beauty of the strings. Interpretation of the sarabande, gigue and badinerie conveyed a feeling not only of the musicianship of the players but of the richness of the instruments themselves used by the Boston organization.

Turn to Debussy

After this delectable 17th century beginning, the orchestra turned to Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," one of the battlegrounds earlier in the century in the conquest of modern music. Throughout this selection it became evident that each soloist in the group is an artist in his own right. The flutist aurens produced tones of unsurpassed warmth and purity, and the theme came and went through the horns, the harp, the oboe, the clarinet, and the violincello.

Koussevitzky apparently believes in coupling a Debussy with a Ravel, and for Saturday's concert he chose a number capable of clanging "Bolero" out of anybody's head. Toward the end of the "Daphnis and Chloe," some members of the audience felt reminded of Shakespeare's title, "Much Ado About Nothing," and others were given a Halloween mood. The tremendous effects seem to be built up on a few ideas somewhat banal, and it is the superb orchestration behind them that gives them eclat. Overestimated though Ravel may be, there is no doubt that he can build an imposing structure..

Brahms Symphony

The second half of the program was the height of the evening, being devoted to Brahms first Symphony, in C minor. Koussevitzky has a slight tendency to overemphasize the slow movements. This resulted in making the second movement, the andante, seem "troppo sostenutto" to part of the hearers who sensed a consequent over-dramatizing of the Brahms. To others such criticism would seem unduly carping.

The orchestra played to a capacity house, and to an enthusiastic one. Rarely has more spontaneous and more tumultuous applause been heard there, not begging for an encore but in tribute to the music.

At the supper given afterward by the music committee to the orchestra leaders, Dr. Koussevitzky complimented the Ithaca audiences. He has noticed an improvement in taste and appreciation from year to year, he confided. He would never venture to give in this city a program of cheap popular music, or of music not of the highest character. E. B.

From Novel, From Legend, Comes Music

TRANS. — NOV. 4

New Tone-Poem by Sibelius, New Suite by Prokofiev, At Symphony Hall

ON the program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky places two new pieces by eminent hands. First, the tone-poem "Tapiola," which is Opus 112 of Jan Sibelius; second, a suite drawn from the opera "Le Joueur" (The ("Gambler") by Serge Prokofiev. "Tapiola" was written for, and dedicated to, Walter Damrosch in 1926; was played by the New York Symphony Orchestra under the venerable conductor on Dec. 26 of that year. . . . Prokofiev's opera had a performance at the progressive Théâtre de la Monnaie at Brussels in 1929; has since been produced in German cities. The Suite drawn from it was played by the Colonne Orchestra at Paris, March 12, 1932. It is new to the United States.

The New Sibelius

The score of "Tapiola" is prefaced by these verses:

Ancient, mysterious, brooding savage dreams,
Within them dwells the Forest's mighty God
And woodsprites in the gloom weave magic secrets.
Widespread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests,

"Tapiola," then is program-music, though program-music in mild form. With Sibelius program-music almost invariably means music that has to do with things of the North. The four lines just quoted indicate that "Tapiola" is no exception. Tapio is the Finnish god of the forest. This fact and the verses furnish the sole clue to the poetic content of the score.

The entire work is based on a single, short pregnant phrase. It is no more than two measures long. It is simplicity itself. It occure at the very beginning of the piece (Largamente, B minor, 2-2), in strings, supported by close string harmonies. Mr. Cecil Gray, in his recent book about Sibelius, says that this theme "at the very outset is repeated with variations by different instrumental combinations no fewer than twenty-two times." One hastens to add that the variations are variations in orchestral color only; that the theme undergoes no transformations of contour during these twenty-two repetitions. Mr. Gray continues: "The transformations it subsequently undergoes are infinite in number and extent." Liszt, following in minute detail an elaborate program, has never found more variants for any of his themes. Open the score at almost any page and you will find something that in some way relates to these simple notes of the beginning. . . . The pace soon quickens to Allegro, after the first two statements of the motif, in fact, the mood grows darker and more intense.

An interesting episode occurs where strings weave an eerie, shimmering background out of major seconds in various octaves; while woodwinds play a variant, or derivative, of the theme in broken rhythm, punctuated by short rests. The mood again grows more meditative. Another episode follows, which Mr. H. F. Peyser, writing the program-note for the performance by the New York Symphony Orchestra described as "a kind of scherzando frolic of wood-sprites—chattering dialogues and interchanges between strings and woodwinds on diminutions and other variants of preceding material"; evidently a reference to the woodsprites of the already quoted verses. There are returns to some of the material used earlier in the piece.

For a description of the climax we turn again to Mr. Gray: "The dénouement of the work is reached with a rising crescendo passage of chromatics for the strings alone, extending over thirty-seven bars, whcih attains to an unimaginable pitch of intensity, and culminates in a truly terrific and overwhelming outburst from the whole orchestra—one of the greatest climaxes in all music, like a convulsion of nature, or the unchaining of some elemental force." Nor must one omit Mr. Gray's estimate of the work as a whole: "No mere words can hope to convey one tithe of the grandeur and sublimity, the sheer originality and imaginative power, which inform the whole work both in broadest outline and in the minutest details of the scoring. Even if Sibelius had written nothing else this one work would be sufficient to entitle him to a place among the greatest masters of all time."

Background for Prokofiev

Prokofiev's suite, "The Gambler," is drawn from his opera of the same name. The opera, in turn, is based upon Dostoievsky's novel, also of like title. The novel, in its turn, is in part autobiographical, with a foundation in certain incidents of the author's life. "The Gambler" was written (1867) while he was at work upon his masterpiece, "Crime and Punishment." In her "Fyodor Dostoievsky; a Study," the daughter of the novelist, Aimée, recounts the circumstances. Dostoievsky had assumed his brother's debts, though not legally obliged to do so. At once creditors began to press him hard. An unscrupulous publisher, Stellovsky, persuaded Bostoievsky to sell him the right to publish a complete edition of his works, stipulating, however, that a new novel of a certain number of pages be included. The new novel was to be completed by November; otherwise Dostoievsky was to lose all his earlier copyrights. The new novel was "The Gambler." Dostoievsky put by work on "Crime and Punishment" to write it. But the publisher well knew that the time allowed was too short, was gleefully awaiting his own coming into ownership of all Dostoievsky's copyrights. All this happened in the early days of stenography. In his predicament it was suggested to Dostoievsky that he employ a stenographer. He chanced upon a young girl who was a member of the first class in stenography that had ever been taught in Russia. Dostoievsky was at the time a widower. He was fascinated by his young assistant; and upon completion of "The Gambler" (within the stipulated time) married her. Through fourteen years more she transcribed his novels.

The chief personage in "The Gamblers" is Alexis Ivanovitch, tutor in the house of General Zagoriansky. In Alexis, Dostoievsky pictures himself. (Details of the plot of the novel are, in this account, based upon Serge Persky's "La Vie et l'Œuvre de Dostoievsky"; details of his life, upon his daughter's book, already cited). Alexis has fallen hopelessly in love with Pauline, step-daughter of the general. Pauline encourages him only in such degree and in such wise as shall enable her to make use of him to her own advantage. Here also Dostoievsky is autobiographical. His first wife seems to have been an adventuress who was faithless and prone to "affairs." Dostoievsky, however, did not divorce her, but continued to support her until her death some time before he wrote "The Gambler." Dostoievsky, in those days, was lecturing to students at one of the Russian universities, where he was exceedinly popular. He was stung to the quick by his wife's coldness and infidelity. Soon a young adventuress, a Pauline N . . . who had made herself common with the students, wrote him an ardent love-letter, offering herself to him. Inexperienced in such matters, not knowing her character, he fell into a liaison with her, followed her to Paris (where she had already found another lover), later to Italy and through Germany. His offers of marriage she rejected, preferring her "freedom." While travelling with her Dostoievsky gambled frequently, lost heavily. Hence "The Gambler."

Pauline thus blows both hot and cold with Alexis. But his own emotions toward her are by no means unmixed. He writes: "There were moments when I would have given half my life to be able to strangle her. I swear that could I have plunged a knife into her breast I would have done so exultantly. Yet I swear also, by all that is sacred to me, if, at the summit of the Schlangenberg she had said to me, 'Throw yourself over that precipice', I would have obeyed her, and even obeyed her joyfully."

In the entourage of the general are two adventurers, the faking "marquis" de Grieux and the bogus "Countess" Blanche de Cominges. Both are awaiting the death of an aged grand-aunt of the general. They have managed to get some hold upon him; through it hope to inherit some of the old woman's fortune. Instead of dying, she recovers; comes to visit the general, succumbs to the temptations of roulette, loses everything, returns to her home. De Grieux and Blanche now detach themselves from the general. It becomes known that de Grieux had had an "affair" with Pauline; also that the general had entrusted to Grieux 50,000 francs out of Pauline's personal fortune. This the adventurer returns to her. But more money is needed, and Pauline conceives the idea of instructing Alexis to gamble for her with the 50,000 francs. (Earlier he had played with smaller amounts at her orders, but had always lost. This time he wins 200,000 francs; has the good sense to stop playing, returns to Pauline with the money. Pauline, however, now declares:

"I will not take your money."

"How? What? Why, Pauline?"

"I do not want to take this money without giving something in exchange."

"I offer you myself, my entire life."

"You are generous. The mistress of de Grieux is not worth 50,000 francs."

"Pauline, how can you speak in this way! Am I de Grieux?"

"I hate you. Yes. . . . I do not love you more than de Grieux." Then, continues:

"No, no. You are good. You are my faithful friend." Soon it seems again that she ought to pay for favors, and cries:

"Buy me? Would you? For 50,000 francs, like de Grieux"; but ends by embracing him. The next day:

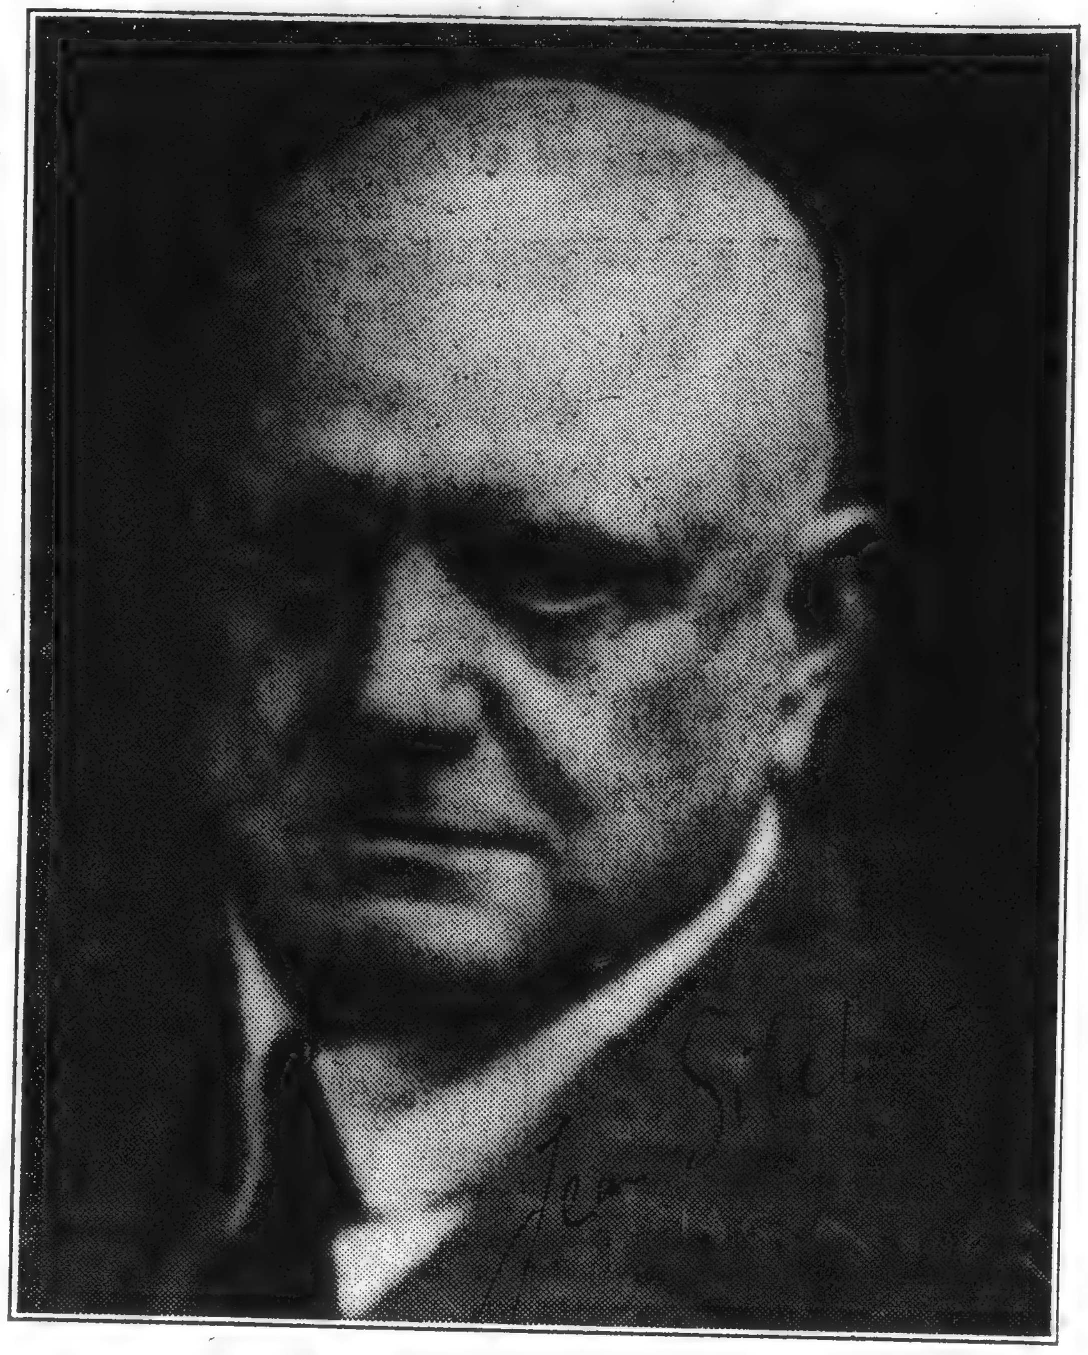
"Now give me my 50,000 francs." Receiving them, she leaves him. To which one need only add that the old grand-aunt was actually a favorite aunt of Dostoievsky's father, who was believed to have gambled and lost heavily.

Opera and Suite

Out of this story Prokofiev began an opera in 1916. In 1927 he took it up again and completed it. After the first performance, already mentioned, Lucien Solvay, in Le Menestrel, summarized the whole: "The book, written by the composer, is an adaptation of a novel of Dostoievsky, very picturesque, full of movement, 'rough stuff,' although affecting strongly pessimistic moralizing. It has to do with an old lady for whose death an number of grotesque types are waiting. She is rich and each of them hopes for her fortune. But the woman takes a new hold on life, begins gambling, losses everything. Then the gaming table obsesses one of her heirs, who rewins the lost fortune, hoping thereby to conquer the heart of a damsel whom he adores. He finds himself cruelly snubbed. All this is madly animated, incoherent, much in conformity with the disordered spirit of Russian society before the war—and after, without doubt. It serves as text for a score of fleet motion, having not a shadow of sensibility or emotion, but carried forward in violent rhythm, blustering, irresistible. The impression is curious, bewildering, but in spite of everything, engaging by its singularity." One remembers the composer's "Love for Three Oranges," for similar qualities.

For his suite, which is numbered Opus 49, Prokofiev has drawn from his opera for four character sketches: I, Alexis (Allegro Passionato); II, Grand-mere (Moderato); III, The General (Moderato); IV, Pauline (Moderato). A fifth, Dénouement, is again at Allegro. The score, still in manuscript, is a highly colored, fantastic piece of work of considerable body. One need add nothing to the description given in Le Menestrel. The characters, as sketched in the above outline, are vividly pictural in the several numbers of the suite. A. H. M.

"The Strength of Ten"



Jean Sibelius (Helander-Helsingfors)

To Be the Composer Distinguished above All Others at the Symphony Concerts of the Current Musical Year. From a Photograph (1930) Lent by Boaz Piller, Esq.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Nov 2

Western Harvest

THE westward journey, last week, of the Symphony Orchestra was fortunate in every way. It visited six cities—Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Cincinnati, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Ithaca. In each the audience filled the concert-hall; was notable for quality as well as numbers; received program and performance warmly. As heretofore, in the two university towns—Ann Arbor and Ithaca—the trip came to climax. The particular pleasure in Buffalo was Brahms's First Symphony; in Ann Arbor, Chaikovsky's Fifth, played without cuts, seemingly a rare experience in that corner of the world. In other cities, as the reviewers record the concerts, the audience fastened upon Debussy's "Clouds" or the familiar Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë." The newspaper articles teemed with praise of Dr. Koussevitzky as program-maker and conductor, whatever the piece in hand. The orchestra as an ensemble, and each choir within it, shared this acclaim. In Ann Arbor, indeed, the collegiate audience was so musically wise that it noted the remarkable playing in the slow movement of Mr. Boettcher and his three associates in the horn quartet. Only Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony" seemed less liked in this Western world than it is in the seaboard cities.

Incidents and Prospects

It is now definitely settled that Florent Schmitt, the eminent and many-sided French composer, will be guest of the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts on Nov. 25 and 26. He will play the piano-part in a Concerto he has lately written.

The long-promised Piano-Concerto of Arnold Bax, the English composer, will be played at the Symphony Concerts of next week. It has not hitherto been produced in America. Miss Harriet Cohen, the London pianist, will take the solo-part, for which she was Mr. Bax's original choice. Hereabouts she has been heard only at a chamber-concert at Harvard. Nov 2 Trans

---

Trans -

Nov 3

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Dr. Koussevitzky will begin his announced cycle of the symphonies of Sibelius. The first will be played on Nov. 11 and 12. At intervals the six others in print and in repertory will follow. The new Eighth, heard for the first times anywhere, will be end and climax to the series.

Herald MUSIC NOTES Nov 3

Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed gloriously in Cincinnati. Mr. Leighton of the Inquirer found the evening a "perfect" one; "a surpassing program; a great conductor; a splendid ensemble." . . . Koussevitsky, the conductor, has made of his ensemble a body responsible to his slightest interpretive indication. He has within himself recreative faculties that place him among the Titans of orchestral leaders. He it was who selected the program and interpreted it. So by infallible reasoning the conclusion is reached that it is to Koussevitsky that first recognition for the perfect evening must be given. . . . We haven't the space to say all we would of the countless number of excellences in the presentations. The Boston orchestra is an instrument that seems never to have exhausted its tonal resources. No matter how hushed a pianissimo, there still is left a softer hush. No matter how grandiose the climax, if needed, there is a greater fortissimo in reserve. And the conductor plays on the instrument with a master's touch. With no semblance of personal display, but with what guidance two remarkable hands and a vibrant personality can give, he recreates wonderful music in a manner to prove all its wonder and beauty."

The program of the Symphony concerts on tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute." Prokofieff, suite, "Four Character Portraits from 'The Gambler'" (first time in the United States); sibelius, "Tapiola," symphonic poem (first time in Boston). Beethoven, Symphony, No. 7. The "Portraits" are those of characters in Dostoievsky's autobiographical novel, "The Gambler"—Alexis, the Grandmother, the General, Pauline. The opera from which the suite is derived was produced at the Monnaie, Brussels. "Tapiola" was written for Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Society of New York and first performed in New York late in December, 1926. The composer undertakes to interpret in music "the wild northern forest where dwell its god and his wood sprites."

Tonight at Bates hall, Y. M. C. A. building "Dawn," a pageant by Gena May Brown will be performed under the auspices of the Knights of Pythias. The pageant portrays "the cultured aspect of the Negro race." John Warner, tenor of "Green Pastures"; Lavinia Brown, soprano; Ethel Hardy Smith, soprano; Rufus Brent, baritone; Jay Perry & Co. (in Negro ballet), William Rhodes and Marsha Johnson will take part. Choruses, quartets, spirituals. Mme. Brown, born in Virginia, was educated in Columbus, O. She studied music at the Mt. Union College Conservatory. Later studies in elecution were in Boston; religious education at Columbia University.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, tonight at 8 o'clock. Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Strauss, "Don Juan"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7.

The People's Symphony orchestra will give its first concert of the season in Jordan Hall next Sunday afternoon. Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Brahms, Symphony No. 1. Grieg, piano concerto (Felix Fox, pianist). Liszt, "The Preludes."

Maxim Karolik, tenor, will sing in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. Songs by Tchaikovsky, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms, Moussorgsky.

OVEMBER 4, 1932

S === Films

Dr. Koussevitzky Again in Cambridge

Trans

DESPITE the fact that the program contained no music of recent date, a perceptible air of freshness pervaded the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening. The inclusion of the Overture to Weber's "Oberon" as the opening number no doubt contributed in some degree to this impression; until recently it has long been absent from local symphonic programs. The choice of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, though not the least familiar of the composer's master works, was likewise a happy one; while the "Don Juan" tone-poem of Strauss was a welcome alternative to more favored pieces of preceding seasons. As for the remaining item of the total four, one was led to observe that Dr. Koussevitzky is seldom more fortunate as regards the music of Wagner than in the Prelude to "Lohengrin."

The entire evening was a constant exhibition of instrumental versatility. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted spiritedly and with apparent pleasure in the deed. The response of the audience increased in warmth with every number. For Weber's Overture, the clapping was brisk, though not prolonged; it reflected, in a measure, the bright loveliness of the piece. For the Prelude to "Lohengrin," it intimated a more profound pleasure. Following the tone-poem of Strauss and the symphony of Beethoven, it continued with sufficient vigor to recall the conductor to the stage and to bring the musicians to their feet in the familiar gesture of acknowledgment.

A re-hearing of Weber's Overture by an organization such as the Boston Symphony confirms a widely-held belief that this piece deserves more frequent performance if for no other reason than the fact that it makes a delightful appetizer for more solid fare. Then, too, Dr. Koussevitzky's notable talent in music of delicate or fanciful character heightens its peculiar charm and provides it with a sophisticated polish and fresh elegance.

The Prelude from "Lohengrin" served as additional proof of the orchestra's refined technique. The strings, in their airy upper registers, played with edgeless tone. Caught in the stream of flowing sound, they blended their several and ensemble voices with the deeper brass and woodwinds. The pliant strands of Wagnerian melody, the expanding harmonies, the expressive instrumental timbres steadily invoked the exalted mood. Under Dr. Koussevitzky's hand, the familiar music renews its seldom-failing spell.

"Don Juan" was the dramatic contrast of the evening; the striking portrait; the picturesque narrative. Confirming a frequent experience with the music of Strauss, the pleasure of the listener was derived from the composer's mastery of orchestral resource and the orchestra's corresponding mastery of instrument.

Beyond the rather square-fashioned first movement, which reflects Beethoven's earlier style and which even after repeated hearings fails to hold the attention of present-day listeners, the Seventh Symphony provided sustained pleasure. The extended and steadily moving Allegretto made its persuasive way with subtle insistence. The engaging folk-like measures of the third movement foreshadowed and led up to the concluding Allegro.

N. M. J.

At Symphony

Nov 5 Amer

By MOSES SMITH

Between the Mozart overture to "The Magic Flute," which opens, and the Beethoven seventh symphony, which closes this week's Boston Symphony Orchestra program, are two novelties—"Tapiola," a symphonic poem of Sibelius, and a suite drawn from Prokofieff's opera, "The Gambler".

The Sibelius work, played at yesterday's concert for the first time in Boston, is music often enigmatic in character, yet one readily understands the encomiums which sensitive and learned critics have heaped on it.

There is here no excess verbiage. Hearing "Tapiola" for the first time, one was almost inclined to think that the score was too concise, too angular. But no doubt, this angularity will pass with familiarity. Even so, one already senses the greatness of the work.

The Prokofieff suite, which received its first performance in this country, was quite another matter. The composer has assembled music from the opera into four character portraits, and he adds a fifth movement which he calls "denouement." One is at a loss to trace the connection between music and the characters or story. Heard strictly as music, away from the opera house, this recent work of Prokofieff makes little sense, to put the case mildly. Not only does it lack the distinction which one might reasonably expect from a new opus of the Russian master; the music has no essential vitality.

Amusements

PHEUM
Hamilton Pl.
Theatres

Amusements

Post

DAY, NOVEMBER 5,

SIBELIUS MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Tone-Poem 'Tapiola' Given First Boston Hearing

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three composers are marked for special honors at the Symphony Concerts of this season: Brahms, who was born in 1833; Wagner, who died 50 years later, and Sibelius, whose Eighth Symphony will receive its world premiere here next spring.

SIBELIUS' "TAPIOLA"

There will be other music of Sibelius at these concerts, leading up to the event, as it were, before that premiere takes place. Yesterday brought the first Boston performance of his tone-poem, "Tapiola," and all of the other symphonies are promised us, beginning with the First next week.

Perhaps at the end of the year it may be more clearly discernible whether the Finnish composer's powers have waxed or waned with the years. "Tapiola," composed for Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra in 1926, is accordingly of the composer's later period in which, on the authority of his perfervid biographer, Cecil Gray, the Northern and largely national phase of his creative activity is in the ascendant. With that comment on the music there may be no dissenting. This tone-picture of the Finnish forest god is music abundantly typical of nature in its boreal aspects. In it reside bleakness and chill, the whistling of the wind, the gloom of deep woods and, for fleeting contrast, the hint of woodland sprites.

Inclined to Moodiness

Sibelius can suggest elemental nature as no composer since Wagner has suggested it. But this "Tapiola," for all its sombre impressiveness, does not escape monotony; there is in it more of mood than of self-sustaining musical design and progress. And this tendency to moodiness has grown upon the composer. Felicien David, obsessed by the Orient, was enjoined to "get off his camel"; Sibelius might be invited to forsake for a time his Finnish fens and forests for a clime where nature's habitual expression is a smile, not a frown.

The performance of the tone-poem, so far as might be judged, was an eloquent one, and the audience received it appreciatively.

Prokofieff's Suite

The other new piece yesterday was a suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Gambler," after the autobiographical novel of Dostoievsky, first produced in Brussels in 1929. Four of the five divisions of the suite portray figures in the novel; Alexis, the Grandmother, the General and Pauline. Apparently the gift of salient musical characterization has been denied Prokofieff. It is only a slight exaggeration to say that had the movements been transposed the listener would have been none the wiser. If the General had a degree of pompousness and bluster, neither the amorous Alexis nor the capricious, passionate Pauline were recognizable as such. This music, of little value at least outside the theatre, was brilliantly played.

For the rest, the concert began and ended classically with Mozart's Overture to the "Magic Flute" and Beethoven's Symphony, respectively.

HE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1932

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute." Sibelius, "Tapiola," symphonic poem (first performance in Boston). Prokofieff, Four character portraits—Alexis. The Grandmother, The General, Pauline—Denouement—derived from Prokofieff's opera, "The Gambler" (after Dostoievsky's novel, "Le Joueur"). Beethoven, Symphony No. 7.

Walter Damrosch in January, 1926, asked Sibelius to compose a work to be played by the Symphony Orchestra of New York. "Tapiola" was composed in March and May of that year. The first performance was in New York under Mr. Damrosch's direction on Dec. 26, 1926. There was a second performance a few days later. Since then the work has been neglected in this country, but there have been several performances in England, where it is counted among the most important compositions of Sibelius. The title comes from Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology, god of the forests and wood-sprites. The motto in the score is the only "program" vouchsafed by the composer:

"Wide-spread they stand, the northland's dusky forests,
Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
Within them dwells the forest's mighty god,
And wood-sprites in the gloom weave magic secrets."

A short phrase may be taken as typical of the forest god, or of the forest itself. This theme assumes more and more significance, by the successive variations for different groupings of instruments, and varying of the theme itself. However remote the theme may appear to be in some variations—or shall one say episodes?—its presence is ever there. Perhaps some may find there are too many repetitions without a marked change in form or expression—especially in what may be described as the middle section—but these repetitions are not from want of invention—they are there purposely to intensify the prevailing sombre, mysterious mood. There are tricksy measures here and there that may justly be associated with the wood-sprites, but Sibelius does not attempt an interlinear translation into tones of his prefixed motto: he is a master of impressive moods, a poet who suggests, who does not seek imitations of natural phenomena. It would never occur to him to employ a wind-machine to paint in tones a wind-swept plain, nor to use a gramaphone record of a screaming sea-gull.

"Tapiola" is a remarkable work as the expression of an emotion provoked by a gloomy, haunted forest. Nor are there so many trees in this music that the forest is not seen and felt. There is nothing impertinently distracting; no sacrifice to the elegancies; no appeal to conventional beauty; the mood takes hold of one until it reaches an extraordinary intensity in the marvellous climax. Seldom has any unfamiliar work been received with so great, spontaneous, genuine applause for the music itself, the conductor and the orchestra.

This cannot be said of the Suite by Prokofieff. A composer runs a risk in attempting the musical portraiture of persons in life or in fiction. Schumann gave us Chopin in the "Carnival"; a lesser composer, Rheinberger, gave the character and music of Fesca in a little organ piece. To those who know Dostoievsky's novel, the autobiographical novel, "The Gambler" Prokofieff has not succeeded, however interesting the music itself may or may not be. In the opera there are the characters, who are seen, act, and sing: Alexis (Dostoievsky), who is by no means the Alexis of Virgil's eclogue; the General, the Grandmother, Pauline. Who could distinguish from this suite the General from the Grandmother? The character, the spirit of the music is practically the same. And Pauline (Apollonaria Soushov), with whom Dostoievsky had a strange and at times grotesque liaison for two or three years; that capricious, whimsical, enigmatical, sensual woman—is there a semblance of her in this music? Strauss did better in his portrayal of his wife when he wrote "Heldenleben" and the Domestic Symphony. True, he had lived longer with her when he composed these works. And if Dostoievsky entertained a passion for Pauline, he at the same time was drawn to the gaming table as much as to her chamber.

A sparkling performance of Mozart's overture and a fine interpretation of Beethoven's symphony added materially to the brilliance of the concert, which will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Haydn's "Oxford" symphony; "Winter Legends" for orchestra and piano by Arnold Bax (first time in the United States—Harriet Cohen of London, pianist), and the First Symphony of Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MARTINS FERRY, O.
TIMES

America Assuming World Leadership In Music, Claim

COLUMBUS Nov. 4—Although the finest compositions still come from Europe, America is rapidly assuming the world leadership in music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"I will not be surprised," Dr. Koussevitzky said in an interview here, "if in two or three years America will have the great composers also.

"Now you have interesting composers in America, but not great."

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is now in his ninth season with the Boston orchestra said that no country in the world is making so great an effort toward education in music as America.

But these are bad days for music, or as he described them in his halting English, enriched by eloquent inflections, "now is dangerous times for art."

"But yet, wherever I go the houses are crowded. Perhaps it shows that when people are troubled that is when they most need music."

With the (

Monitor Nov 5

Boston Symphony

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Upon the program of the fourth pair of concerts in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home season (Nov. 4-5) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky set two novelties: the symphonic poem, "Tapiola," by Sibelius, heard for the first time in Boston; and the suite of character portraits which Prokofieff has drawn from his opera "Le Joueur," after Dostoevsky's story, played for the first time in America.

"Tapiola" was written in 1926 for the New York Symphony Society, at the request of Mr. Walter Damrosch, its conductor. The name is derived, Mr. Cecil Gray has pointed out in his biography of the composer, from Tapio, "the forest god of Finnish mythology—the Old Man of the Woods, the Elder of the Hills, the Master of the Waste Land." The score, dedicated to Mr. Damrosch, contains these lines, written by the composer:

Widespread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests,
Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
Within them dwells the forest's mighty god,
And wood sprites in the gloom weave magic secrets.

The score is one of the most finished expressions of the composer's genius. With characteristic economy of means, Sibelius projects with compelling power the mood of the motto. The tone poem is constructed on a simple theme which is announced at once by strings. This theme is not developed in the conventional sense, but is passed about the several choirs with evocaive key changes and variations of imbre. There is no surplus material, o padding. Everything is bare and tark. The music holds the listener nrelentingly. Toward the close here is an overwhelming effect of a ong crescendo in the strings leading to a tremendous outcry from the [illegible] close. [illegible] have made no difference if the description of the first three of the characters had been transposed. In the sketch of the Grandmother, in particular, it seemed to us that the composer had missed a great opportunity—there's a character. There seemed to be an attempt to portray Pauline as a rather nice girl who could be peevish, but Dostoevsky's young woman was not present.

The concert opened with a virtuosic performance of the Overture to "The Magic Flute" and closed with a glorious proclamation of Beethoven's joyful Seventh Symphony. Although the majority of the Friday congregation received this benefaction with surprising imperturbation, a little band of the faithful remained to applaud until the men were called to their feet.

L. A. S.

MUSIC

Globe Nov 5

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The notable music new to Boston heard at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon was Jan Sibelius' Symphonic Poem "Tapiola." Dr Koussevitzky also conducted the first performance in the United States of Prokofieff's Suite drawn from his opera "The Gambler." The concert began with the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and was ended with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major.

"Tapiola," although played for the first time in this city yesterday, is not new music. It was written upon a request made in 1926 by Walter Damrosch, then conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, and was first played by that organization late in the same year. The score was prefaced by the Finnish master with the following quatrain:

"Wide-spread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests,
Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
Within them dwells the forest's mighty God,
And wood sprites in the gloom weave magic secrets."

Sibelius has, therefore, written a species of program music about the immense, awesome forests of his native Finland, and about Tapio, the God of the forests in ancient Finnish folklore. Whether he had in mind a definite sequence of incidents is not known. There is, however, a considerable amount of tone painting, such as in the first part when small groups of instruments, notably the higher strings, sing nostalgic melodies against a murmuring background that might be rushing wind in the treetops; and just before the climax when the strings play a long crescendo that suggests imaginary wood sprites. But most remarkable of all is the impression of solitude and the feeling of physical cold aroused by Sibelius' harmony. The present reviewer has never heard any music which so realistically suggests temperature in terms of musical tone.

The composer has in this work been as original and artistically discriminating as in his Symphonies, those lofty, incomparable masterpieces which are among the noblest music of the time. The mature Sibelius has eschewed the literal and the commonplace in material and in style, and cheapness was ever utterly foreign to him. Program music though it may be, "Tapiola" is not of the order of Richard Strauss' "A Hero's Life" or "Domestic Symphony."

Whether "Tapiola" is Sibelius' greatest work, most revealing of his mind and spirit, is open to question. It is, however, a powerful and strangely moving music.

It was plain, from an eloquent performance, that Dr Koussevitzky had labored hard in preparing the work and his pleasure at its enthusiastic reception by a normally undemonstrative audience was obvious.

Prokofieff's opera "The Gamblers," from which the Suite played yesterday was drawn, is based upon Dostoievsky's novel of like name. The opera was first sung in Brussels in 1929. When the Suite had its first performance, in March of this year at Paris, the program contained the following note: "The composer . . . . . has wished to present the chief characters that figure in his opera. . . . . The procedure of his work has been to reunite all the musical material which defines each character, and to shape it into an orchestral piece."

The characters thus portrayed are Alexis, the Grandmother, the General and Pauline. A fifth section is called "Denouement." To judge from persistent thumps of the kettle drum in the first three parts, those characters were much overweight, and walked with thunderous tread. The orchestral sternutations imply that all concerned were inveterate takers of snuff. Prokofieff's music, at first hearing, is not sufficiently varied to suggest even the external characteristics of dissimilar beings. And it does not seem possible that subtle traits which the composer must have wished to suggest can be made plain in terms of music. But the worst fault of this Suite lies not in its merciless rhythmic insistence nor in its cacophony, but in its irredeemable dullness.

The program for the concerts next Friday and Saturday will comprise Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony, No. 92, long unplayed here; Arnold Bax' new "Winter Legends" with Harriet Cohen as piano soloist; and Sibelius' First Symphony, in E minor.

C. W. D.

33

S === Films

Dr. Koussevitzky Again in Cambridge

Tran

DESPITE the fact that the program contained no music of recent date, a perceptible air of freshness pervaded the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening. The inclusion of the Overture to Weber's "Oberon" as the opening number no doubt contributed in some degree to this impression; until recently it has long been absent from local symphonic programs. The choice of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, though not the least familiar of the composer's master works, was likewise a happy one: while the "Don Juan" tone-poem of Strauss was a welcome alternative to more favored pieces of preceding seasons. As for the remaining item of the total four, one was led to observe that Dr. Koussevitzky is seldom more fortunate as regards the music of Wagner than in the Prelude to "Lohengrin."

The entire evening was a constant exhibition of instrumental versatility. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted spiritedly and with apparent pleasure in the deed. The response of the audience increased in warmth with every number. For Weber's Overture, the clapping was brisk, though not prolonged; it reflected, in a measure, the bright loveliness of the piece. For the Prelude to "Lohengrin," it intimated a more profound pleasure. Following the tone-poem of Strauss and the symphony of Beethoven, it continued with sufficient vigor to recall the conductor to the stage and to bring the musicians to their feet in the familiar gesture of acknowledgment.

A re-hearing of Weber's Overture by an organization such as the Boston Symphony confirms a widely-held belief that this piece deserves more frequent performance if for no other reason than the fact that it makes a delightful appetizer for more solid fare. Then, too, Dr. Koussevitzky's notable talent in music of delicate or fanciful character heightens its peculiar charm and provides it with a sophisticated polish and fresh elegance.

The Prelude from "Lohengrin" served as additional proof of the orchestra's refined technique. The strings, in their airy upper registers, played with edgeless tone. Caught in the stream of flowing sound, they blended their several and ensemble voices with the deeper brass and woodwinds. The pliant strands of Wagnerian melody, the expanding harmonies, the expressive instrumental timbres steadily invoked the exalted mood. Under Dr. Koussevitzky's hand, the familiar music renews its seldom-failing spell.

"Don Juan" was the dramatic contrast of the evening; the striking portrait; the picturesque narrative. Confirming a frequent experience with the music of Strauss, the pleasure of the listener was derived from the composer's mastery of orchestral resource and the orchestra's corresponding mastery of instrument.

Beyond the rather square-fashioned first movement, which reflects Beethoven's earlier style and which even after repeated hearings fails to hold the attention of present-day listeners, the Seventh Symphony provided sustained pleasure. The extended and steadily moving Allegretto made its persuasive way with subtle insistence. The engaging folk-like measures of the third movement foreshadowed and led up to the concluding Allegro.

N. M. J.

At Symphony

nov 5 Amer

By MOSES SMITH

Between the Mozart overture to "The Magic Flute," which opens, and the Beethoven seventh symphony, which closes this week's Boston Symphony Orchestra program, are two novelties—"Tapiola," a symphonic poem of Sibelius, and a suite drawn from Prokofieff's opera, "The Gambler".

The Sibelius work, played at yesterday's concert for the first time in Boston, is music often enigmatic in character, yet one readily understands the encomiums which sensitive and learned critics have heaped on it.

There is here no excess verbiage. Hearing "Tapiola" for the first time, one was almost inclined to think that the score was too concise, too angular. But no doubt, this angularity will pass with familiarity. Even so, one already senses the greatness of the work.

The Prokofieff suite, which received its first performance in this country, was quite another matter. The composer has assembled music from the opera into four character portraits, and he adds a fifth movement which he calls "denouement." One is at a loss to trace the connection between music and the characters or story. Heard strictly as music, away from the opera house, this recent work of Prokofieff makes little sense, to put the case mildly. Not only does it lack the distinction which one might reasonably expect from a new opus of the Russian master; the music has no essential vitality.

Amusements

Amusements

ᴾPHEUM
Hamilton-Pl.
ʰ Theatres

Post

SIBELIUS MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Tone-Poem 'Tapiola' Given First Boston Hearing

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three composers are marked for special honors at the Symphony Concerts of this season: Brahms, who was born in 1833; Wagner, who died 50 years later, and Sibelius, whose Eighth Symphony will receive its world premiere here next spring.

SIBELIUS' "TAPIOLA"

There will be other music of Sibelius at these concerts, leading up to the event, as it were, before that premiere takes place. Yesterday brought the first Boston performance of his tone-poem, "Tapiola," and all of the other symphonies are promised us, beginning with the First next week.

Perhaps at the end of the year it may be more clearly discernible whether the Finnish composer's powers have waxed or waned with the years. "Tapiola," composed for Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra in 1926, is accordingly of the composer's later period in which, on the authority of his perfervid biographer, Cecil Gray, the Northern and largely national phase of his creative activity is in the ascendant. With that comment on the music there may be no dissenting. This tone-picture of the Finnish forest god is music abundantly typical of nature in its boreal aspects. In it reside bleakness and chill, the whistling of the wind, the gloom of deep woods and, for fleeting contrast, the hint of woodland sprites.

Inclined to Moodiness

Sibelius can suggest elemental nature as no composer since Wagner has suggested it. But this "Tapiola," for all its sombre impressiveness, does not escape monotony; there is in it more of mood than of self-sustaining musical design and progress. And this tendency to moodiness has grown upon the composer. Felicien David, obsessed by the Orient, was enjoined to "get off his camel"; Sibelius might be invited to forsake for a time his Finnish fens and forests for a clime where nature's habitual expression is a smile, not a frown.

The performance of the tone-poem, so far as might be judged, was an eloquent one, and the audience received it appreciatively.

Prokofieff's Suite

The other new piece yesterday was a suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Gambler," after the autobiographical novel of Dostoievsky, first produced in Brussels in 1929. Four of the five divisions of the suite portray figures in the novel; Alexis, the Grandmother, the General and Pauline. Apparently the gift of salient musical characterization has been denied Prokofieff. It is only a slight exaggeration to say that had the movements been transposed the listener would have been none the wiser. If the General had a degree of pompousness and bluster, neither the amorous Alexis nor the capricious, passionate Pauline were recognizable as such. This music, of little value at least outside the theatre, was brilliantly played.

For the rest, the concert began and ended classically with Mozart's Overture to the "Magic Flute" and Beethoven's Symphony, respectively.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute." Sibelius, "Tapiola," symphonic poem (first performance in Boston). Prokofieff, Four character portraits—Alexis, The Grandmother, The General, Pauline—Denouement—derived from Prokofieff's opera, "The Gambler" (after Dostoievsky's novel, "Le Joueur"). Beethoven, Symphony No. 7.

Walter Damrosch in January, 1926, asked Sibelius to compose a work to be played by the Symphony Orchestra of New York. "Tapiola" was composed in March and May of that year. The first performance was in New York under Mr. Damrosch's direction on Dec. 26, 1926. There was a second performance a few days later. Since then the work has been neglected in this country, but there have been several performances in England, where it is counted among the most important compositions of Sibelius. The title comes from Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology, god of the forests and wood-sprites. The motto in the score is the only "program" vouchsafed by the composer:

> "Wide-spread they stand, the northland's dusky forests,
> Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
> Within them dwells the forest's mighty god,
> And wood-sprites in the gloom weave magic secrets."

A short phrase may be taken as typical of the forest god, or of the forest itself. This theme assumes more and more significance, by the successive variations for different groupings of instruments, and varying of the theme itself. However remote the theme may appear to be in some variations—or shall one say episodes?—its presence is ever there. Perhaps some may find there are too many repetitions without a marked change in form or expression—especially in what may be described as the middle section—but these repetitions are not from want of invention—they are there purposely to intensify the prevailing sombre, mysterious mood. There are tricksy measures here and there that may justly be associated with the wood-sprites, but Sibelius does not attempt an interlinear translation into tones of his prefixed motto: he is a master of impressive moods, a poet who suggests, who does not seek imitations of natural phenomena. It would never occur to him to employ a wind-machine to paint in tones a wind-swept plain, nor to use a gramaphone record of a screaming sea-gull.

"Tapiola" is a remarkable work as the expression of an emotion provoked by a gloomy, haunted forest. Nor are there so many trees in this music that the forest is not seen and felt. There is nothing impertinently distracting; no sacrifice to the elegancies; no appeal to conventional beauty; the mood takes hold of one until it reaches an extraordinary intensity in the marvellous climax. Seldom has any unfamiliar work been received with so great, spontaneous, genuine applause for the music itself, the conductor and the orchestra.

This cannot be said of the Suite by Prokofieff. A composer runs a risk in attempting the musical portraiture of persons in life or in fiction. Schumann gave us Chopin in the "Carnival"; a lesser composer, Rheinberger, gave the character and music of Fesca in a little organ piece. To those who know Dostoievsky's novel, the autobiographical novel, "The Gambler" Prokofieff has not succeeded, however interesting the music itself may or may not be. In the opera there are the characters, who are seen, act, and sing: Alexis (Dostoievsky), who is by no means the Alexis of Virgil's eclogue; the General, the Grandmother, Pauline. Who could distinguish from this suite the General from the Grandmother? The character, the spirit of the music is practically the same. And Pauline (Apollonaria Soushov), with whom Dostoievsky had a strange and at times grotesque liaison for two or three years; that capricious, whimsical, enigmatical, sensual woman—is there a semblance of her in this music? Strauss did better in his portrayal of his wife when he wrote "Heldenleben" and the Domestic Symphony. True, he had lived longer with her when he composed these works. And if Dostoievsky entertained a passion for Pauline, he at the same time was drawn to the gaming table as much as to her chamber.

A sparkling performance of Mozart's overture and a fine interpretation of Beethoven's symphony added materially to the brilliance of the concert, which will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Haydn's "Oxford" symphony; "Winter Legends" for orchestra and piano by Arnold Bax (first time in the United States—Harriet Cohen of London, pianist), and the First Symphony of Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MARTINS FERRY, O

TIMES

WANT JACKSON COIN

WESTON, W. Va.—The me of General "Stonewall" Jack whose daring feats upon the ba field stimulate the pride of yo should be perpetuated, in the opin of the Weston Lions club. With organization of the a Stonew
Jackson Memorial association, t club will seek the co-operation of other Lions clubs of the Unit
States for the coinage of a spec half-dollar to commemorate Jacks

RARE PLANT BLOOMS

PARIS—The Victoria Regia, o

MUSIC

Globe nov 5

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The notable music new to Boston heard at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon was Jan Sibelius' Symphonic Poem "Tapiola." Dr Koussevitzky also conducted the first performance in the United States of Prokofieff's Suite drawn from his opera "The Gambler." The concert began with the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and was ended with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major.

"Tapiola," although played for the first time in this city yesterday, is not new music. It was written upon a request made in 1926 by Walter Damrosch, then conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, and was first played by that organization late in the same year. The score was prefaced by the Finnish master with the following quatrain:

> "Wide-spread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests,
> Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
> Within them dwells the forest's mighty God,
> And wood sprites in the gloom weave magic secrets."

Sibelius has, therefore, written a species of program music about the immense, awesome forests of his native Finland, and about Tapio, the God of the forests in ancient Finnish folklore. Whether he had in mind a definite sequence of incidents is not known. There is, however, a considerable amount of tone painting, such as in the first part when small groups of instruments, notably the higher strings, sing nostalgic melodies against a murmuring background that might be rushing wind in the tree-tops; and just before the climax when the strings play a long crescendo that suggests imaginary wood sprites. But most remarkable of all is the impression of solitude and the feeling of physical cold aroused by Sibelius' harmony. The present reviewer has never heard any music which so realistically suggests temperature in terms of musical tone.

The composer has in this work been as original and artistically discriminating as in his Symphonies, those lofty, incomparable masterpieces which are among the noblest music of the time. The mature Sibelius has eschewed the literal and the commonplace in material and in style, and cheapness was ever utterly foreign to him. Program music though it may be, "Tapiola" is not of the order of Richard Strauss' "A Hero's Life" or "Domestic Symphony."

Whether "Tapiola" is Sibelius' greatest work, most revealing of his mind and spirit, is open to question. It is, however, a powerful and strangely moving music.

It was plain, from an eloquent performance, that Dr Koussevitzky had labored hard in preparing the work and his pleasure at its enthusiastic reception by a normally undemonstrative audience was obvious.

Prokofieff's opera "The Gamblers," from which the Suite played yesterday was drawn, is based upon Dostoievsky's novel of like name. The opera was first sung in Brussels in 1929. When the Suite had its first performance, in March of this year at Paris, the program contained the following note: "The composer . . . . . has wished to present the chief characters that figure in his opera. . . . .The procedure of his work has been to reunite all the musical material which defines each character, and to shape it into an orchestral piece."

The characters thus portrayed are Alexis, the Grandmother, the General, and Pauline. A fifth section is called "Denouement." To judge from persistent thumps of the kettle drum in the first three parts, those characters were much overweight, and walked with thunderous tread. The orchestral sternutations imply that all concerned were inveterate takers of snuff. Prokofieff's music, at first hearing, is not sufficiently varied to suggest even the external characteristics of dissimilar beings. And it does not seem possible that subtle traits which the composer must have wished to suggest can be made plain in terms of music. But the worst fault of this Suite lies not in its merciless rhythmic insistence nor in its cacophony, but in its irredeemable dullness.

The program for the concerts next Friday and Saturday will comprise Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony, No. 92, long unplayed here; Arnold Bax' new "Winter Legends" with Harriet Cohen as piano soloist; and Sibelius' First Symphony, in E minor.

C. W. D.

With the (

Monitor nov 5

Boston Symphony

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Upon the program of the fourth pair of concerts in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home season (Nov. 4-5) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky set two novelties: the symphonic poem, "Tapiola," by Sibelius, heard for the first time in Boston; and the suite of character portraits which Prokofieff has drawn from his opera "Le Joueur," after Dostoevsky's story, played for the first time in America.

"Tapiola" was written in 1926 for the New York Symphony Society, at the request of Mr. Walter Damrosch, its conductor. The name is derived, Mr. Cecil Gray has pointed out in his biography of the composer, from Tapio, "the forest god of Finnish mythology—the Old Man of the Woods, the Elder of the Hills, the Master of the Waste Land." The score, dedicated to Mr. Damrosch, contains these lines, written by the composer:

> Widespread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests,
> Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
> Within them dwells the forest's mighty god,
> And wood sprites in the gloom weave magic secrets.

The score is one of the most finished expressions of the composer's genius. With characteristic economy of means, Sibelius projects with compelling power the mood of the motto. The tone poem is constructed on a simple theme which is announced at once by strings. This theme is not developed in the conventional sense, but is passed about the several choirs with evocative key changes and variations of timbre. There is no surplus material, no padding. Everything is bare and stark. The music holds the listener unrelentingly. Toward the close there is an overwhelming effect of a long crescendo in the strings leading to a tremendous outcry from the whole orchestra; then a quiet close. The work, surely one of the major utterances of a great musician, makes an admirable prelude to the series of his eight symphonies which Dr. Koussevitzky projects for the season. It was cordially received.

Prokofieff has supplied four portraits and a dénouement from his opera for the concert hall. The characters represented are Alexis, the Grandmother, the General and Pauline. Although we had done our home work faithfully, we could make little of the excerpts. It is possible that with the aid of the stage representation this music might take on a meaning that it lacks in the concert hall. But so far as we were concerned it would have made no difference if the description of the first three of the characters had been transposed. In the sketch of the Grandmother, in particular, it seemed to us that the composer had missed a great opportunity—there's a character. There seemed to be an attempt to portray Pauline as a rather nice girl who could be peevish, but Dostoevsky's young woman was not present.

The concert opened with a virtuosic performance of the Overture to "The Magic Flute" and closed with a glorious proclamation of Beethoven's joyful Seventh Symphony. Although the majority of the Friday congregation received this benefaction with surprising imperturbation, a little band of the faithful remained to applaud until the men were called to their feet.

L. A. S.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Nov. 5 Trans Pl

Two Composers, One Misplaced, One Masterful

Sibelius with 'Tapiola' Over Against Prokofiev with Character-Pieces

THE EVENT of the afternoon at the Symphony Concert yesterday, was first performance in Boston of Sibelius's tone-poem, "Tapiola"; one of the rare departures also of Dr. Koussevitzky from the composer's symphonies to his music in other genres. Though Sibelius has flourished these many years at Symphony Hall, no conductor, except Dr. Muck, has often introduced or returned to his tone-poems. . . . The American past of "Tapiola" is singular. Six years ago it was written on commission for Mr. Damrosch and his New York Symphony Orchestra, now absorbed into the Philharmonic Society. They played it toward the end of the year in an auditorium of indifferent acoustics, with no more insight or projection than the elderly conductor could muster. Two audiences heard coldly. Most reviewers wote perfunctorily. Commissioned work, they said, if memory serves; therefore alien to the freer exercises of Sibelius's genius. There was no future, thereafter, for "Tapiola" in these United States; but in Europe the tone-poem gradually made the round of the capitals of music. In nearly every one it was received with nearly unanimous acclaim. Sibelius—the word went—had returned to a genre that oftenest employed his younger years; now lavished upon it the powers of full maturity. At last on this side of the sea has come Dr. Koussevitzky's resurrection of "Tapiola" before a first audience that applauded it loud and long. Six years after, the Damroschian débacle stands retrieved.

As played and heard on Friday "Tapiola" bears many a mark of the composer's ripest years. Though he assembles a more numerous orchestra than is his usual habit in these later days—woodwinds in threes and a full complement of brass—he utilizes it with characteristic directness, economy and precision. Nowhere is there waste; nowhere, decoration. Each choir, each instrument, if at will or need the composer isolates it, preserves the Sibelian quality. The strings are prevailingly incisive. They are used more than once with that stark or diversified reiteration in which Sibelius is akin to Beethoven and often surpasses him. The woodwinds keep the Sibelian pungency. (There is no more graphic word for an individuality that the ear immediately recognizes). Now and again in "Tapiola" they sing, Sibelian fashion, in lonesome voices against a whirr of strings. The brass is never overbearing. As choice prompts, it is now incisive; again measuredly sonorous.

Sibelian, likewise, is the evolution of "Tapiola." It proceeds from a germ, rather than a theme, immediately launched upon the ear; then repeated in varying harmonic and instrumental dress until it is etched into the listening imagination. From it, so stated, Sibelius develops the whole tone-poem (which is neither short nor long) with exhaustless invention, resource, diversity. There is no formal process, as one speaks of formal process with the sections of "Ein Heldenleben," the variations of "Don Quixote," even the divisions of Debussy's sea-pieces. Yet measure springs from measure, period expands from period, until the whole rises before the hearer unified and self-contained, plastic and manifold. It is as though Sibelius were ever drawing threads from his germinal phrase, ever twisting and re-twisting them into another tonal texture. Such a paradox of fecundity and economy marks him in these days as no other.

Illusively we are concerned with Tapio, the forest-god of Finnish mythology; with the woodlands that are his vast and solitary seat, with his might and with his magic. Perhaps the reiterated phrase of the beginning is token of his omnipresence. Perhaps the multifold variations that follow re-affirm it ever manifest. Perhaps passing episodes, shimmering or somber, for the instant arresting, may be related to the verses that the composer sets beneath his title. Perhaps the intensity of the ascending, proclaiming, fiercely chromatic strings, the mass and momentum of the final climax, the hush into unplumbed depths of silence, are as the progress of the god through his forest.

After the manner of tone-poems (unless Strauss writes them) larger and more generalized sensations efface these imagined particulars: cumulative intensity that knows no flagging; piercing and mounting suspense, becoming as spell—the magic of the forest upon us. At last the godhead so evoked sweeps by in puissant presence, and all again—the magic gone—is somber, vast and still. Music of a potent hand and imagination, darkling music of power and splendor is this "Tapiola." From the outset, conductor, orchestra and audience were at one with it. All three felt the mettle of a masterpiece. Most those who, by the chance of summer wanderings, have crossed northern woodlands and swayed, alone, between forest-magic and forest-fears.

Such a "Tapiola" might reasonably have stood uncompanioned. As it was, Dr. Koussevitzky set beside it another and less rewarding novel piece—the Suite that Prokofiev recently drew from his opera, "The Gambler." The opera harks back to the like-named novel of Dostoievsky. The novel harks back to known episodes in his life and known figures in his circle. From Berlin as far as Boston, with a halt along the way in Paris, the learned "programists" have had no happier—or lengthier—wallow through rivalries and unchastities, intrigues and vagabondage, the chances of the tables at a score of spas. The venerable master who compiles the program-books at Symphony Hall prepared us listeners in nearly five pages of print, though how we were to read, assimilate and semi-memorize them in the brief intervals of the concert-hall were hard to say. Perhaps there are inquiries today at the bookshops and the libraries for "The Gambler" and for Dostoievskian biographies and memoirs. Then have the omniscient and abundant race of "programists" done their perfect work. Otherwise their virtue in curiosity and compilation must be its own reward.

For circumstances alter perspectives. To listen understandingly and responsively to Prokofiev's Suite, the hearer should have at the back of his head both Dostoievsky's novel and Dostoievsky's life. He should have seen and heard Prokofiev's opera in Brussels or some German city. He should also possess the rare faculty that imaginatively bridges the gulf between theater and concert-hall, when music written for the one sounds in symphonic performance across the other. Under necessity most of us listened to Prokofiev's Suite as so much self-contained music, pointed up by the sub-titles, eked out by gasping references to the program-book. The sub-titles were not exactly illuminating: Alexis, Pauline, the Grandmother, the General, Dénouement. The program-pages might hardly be swallowed at a gulp. Most of us also—by inference from demeanor and applause—were both puzzled and bored.

Now Prokofiev is no composer who writes wholly or mainly for the theater; who must pass to the concert-room in excerpts and adaptations. His symphonic music is plentiful and characteristic. Some of it, whatever its deserts, is still unheard at Symphony Hall. Instead, a Suite from his ballet of clowns, "Chout," is played (1926) and barely prevails by sheer comic exuberance. A Suite from his ballet of Soviets and machines, "Le Pas d'Acier," follows (1927) and falls flat because the music is primarily dependent upon the stage. And now to similar mischance this Suite from his Dostoievskian opera—for the sufficient reason that there is no understanding it without a preparation that not two in two hundred listeners will undergo.

How much, in short, could a practised, attentive, open-minded hearer gather from a single performance of this Suite from "The Gambler?" Not a little that was pleasurable and profitable from the stinging finale, "Dénouement." There Prokofiev teems with rhythmic and propulsive life; flings out phrases, periods, progressions biting upon the ear; runs sharp-edged and pungent; gives force to contending and confused motivs already heard and, for quick memories, labelled. But upon receptive faculties that had no Dostoievskian background (which was too much to ask) Alexis and Pauline, Grandmother and General, were bound to be faintly adumbrated from their respective pages; while those pages often lacked an intrinsic musical interest sufficient to prevail in themselves. Until "Dénouement" began, the one engrossing sensation was Prokofiev's novel procedure. He has not lifted and strung together more or less self-contained passages from his opera. Rather, he has re-assembled and re-worked into new form for new purpose whatever measures characterize the four personages in hand. Each division of the Suite is no excerpt, but a tone-picture, a character-piece in little, that may have failed only because it was played before an unprepared audience. But as such the Suite was matter for studious connoisseurs. Nor could Dr. Koussevitzky's perceptive and projective performance alter the situation.

A familiar classic—Mozart's overture to his opera of "The Magic Flute"—began the concert. A familiar classic—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—ended it. Neither years nor repetition may dull the sonorous, solemn, portentous splendor of the chords that begin the overture and recur along its course. Perhaps they could be sounded yet more deeply and richly than they were yesterday; or, maybe, imagination, kindled by them, outruns orchestral possibility. For here, consciously or unconsciously, Mozart, "turning off" a magic opera while the waiting theater-manager stood by, has sealed and sounded the visioning exaltation of the human spirit when it draws near to ineffable things, high as the heavens, wide as the universe. To some of us also, and to this day, the transition into the body of the overture is beauty, unalloyed and changeless.

From conductor and orchestra the playing of Beethoven's Symphony stirred not only admiration but emotion. Whenever he undertakes Beethoven Dr. Koussevitzky freshens and energizes the music in hand. The listener hears it, not as a perdurable classic dutifully played for the nth time; not as a "reading" for directorial display; but as something warm, vivid, intensive, called again to new life; "first time" upon conductor, orchestra and audience, as it was "first time" to the composer's Vienna. Through half the Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky plies a light hand, save for the moment when the Allegrettte upswells to climax. The music justifies him. Up to the skies through the sunlight, winds across the orchestra the singing, dancing theme of the first movement. The Allegretto sings without languor or sentimentality. With bolder strokes the conductor molds and drives the Scherzo; while in the corybantic finale he whips on the whirling figures until they touch this earth only to rise again. Apotheosis of the dance the Seventh, in spite of Wagner, may or may not be. Call it, rather, Beethoven's homage to rhythm as though he were blessing that passion of music in our day. H. T. P.

Symphony Plays Two New Works

Her- Nov 5

Witness the works of Dr. Koussevitzky, champion of the new. In a perfect setting of recognized repertory pieces, namely Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's seventh symphony, he presented yesterday, in the Boston Symphony orchestra concert, two novelties: "Tapiola," tone poem by Sibelius, for the first time in Boston, and "The Gambler," suite by Prokofieff, for the first time in America.

Towering above the now-mysterious, now-bright Mozart overture, surpassing the Prokofieff character portraits, transcending even the famous Beethoven symphony of the dance, the Sibelius symphonic poem was the most impressive music of the afternoon.

For it is the mood of the north: winds whining in the mournful pines; ageless broodings of the gloomy forests; foreboding majesty of Tapio, legendary god of the northland. And with such a program, the Finnish composer, who is to be honored above all others at succeeding concerts this year, has woven a magnificent work.

The treatment is simple, austere. There is but a single, powerful theme, announced by the strings in the opening phrase, and appearing again and again, undergoing many variations. Approaching the climax, there is a weird passage for strings alone, producing an eery, shimmering effect. And then rises the mighty climax, a thing of overpowering strength.

At the conclusion of "Tapiola" yesterday, there was a hush over Symphony Hall, as though the spell of the north lingered. But as a spattering of handclaps echoed in the hollow silence, the audience awoke to pay tribute. And so insistent was the applause that Dr. Koussevitzky called his men to their feet in acknowledgment.

Prokofieff's "The Gambler," consisting of four character sketches and a denouement from his opera by the same name, also fared well. The amorous Alexis, the imperious grandmother, the pompous general and the cold, aloof Pauline, portrayed individually and then encountering one another in a dramatic finale, form a lucid, genuinely worthwhile orchestral work.

H. C. C.

Boston Symphony Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its series of six Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow at 8:15 p m. Dr Koussevitzky will perform Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony, Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan," and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends," a piece for orchestra with piano solo, will be given its first American performance at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Harriet Cohen, English pianist, will be soloist.

Dr Koussevitzky will also conduct the first Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, thus beginning the series of the Finnish composer's symphonies to be performed through the season, culminating with the new Eighth Symphony, which is to have its first public performance.

Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony in G major, No. 92, will be the opening number. This symphony has not been heard at these concerts for a number of years.

Miss Cohen first visited America two seasons ago at the invitation of Mrs E. S. Coolidge to participate in her festivals of chamber music at Washington and Chicago. Miss Cohen has long enjoyed a high reputation in England

Globe Nov 6

Tel. Chelsea 3-8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

ORCHES

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Bax's "Winter Legends" for piano and orchestra for the first time in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston next Friday and Saturday. The piano part will be performed by Harriet Cohen.

hestra's inday a e first plang
it wi

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TIMES

NOV 6 - 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its New York season on Nov. 17 and 19 at Carnegie Hall, is playing in Boston next Friday and Saturday the first American performances of Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends" for piano and orchestra, with the English pianist, Harriet Cohen, as soloist.

Nov 5 '32

INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

As there is nothing in the world of performance quite comparable in emotional depth and tonal splendor to a fine symphony orchestra, such an experience becomes infinitely more rare when the orchestra to be heard is one of the greatest in existence.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra has held this distinction for many years is a matter of history. In the last eight years, the continuous association of such a conductor as SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, and a personnel more illustrious than any of the past, has had its effect. An insatiable artist, Dr. KOUSSEVITZKY has shaped the Boston Symphony Orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument to express his fresh and vital conception of the "classics," his ranging interest in music, his unique artistic personality. These concerts have reached new heights of beauty and importance. Brooklyn will have the opportunity of greeting this superb band when it gives the first concert in its annual Institute series on Friday evening, November 18.

Dr Koussevitzky, arriving in New York, seemed refreshed after his European summer which included a vacation in the mountains as well as a quest of new music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 6 1932

Boston Symphony Here Nov. 17, 19

Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends" for piano and orchestra will have its first performances in this country next Friday and Saturday in Boston at the hands of Serge Krousssevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The piano part will be taken by Harriet Cohen, the English pianist.

The orchestra will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 17, and Saturday afternoon, November 19.

Tel. Chelsea 3-8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not yet announced its Carnegie Hall programs for November 17 and 19, but for its first program of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on Friday evening, November 18, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Weber's overture to "Oberon," Cesar Franck's symphony, Sibelius's "Tapiola" and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Nov, 5 Tran Pl

Two Composers, One Misplaced, One Masterful

Sibelius with 'Tapiola' Over Against Prokofiev with Character-Pieces

THE EVENT of the afternoon at the Symphony Concert yesterday, was first performance in Boston of Sibelius's tone-poem, "Tapiola"; one of the rare departures also of Dr. Koussevitzky from the composer's symphonies to his music in other genres. Though Sibelius has flourished these many years at Symphony Hall, no conductor, except Dr. Muck, has often introduced or returned to his tone-poems. . . . The American past of "Tapiola" is singular. Six years ago it was written on commission for Mr. Damrosch and his New York Symphony Orchestra, now absorbed into the Philharmonic Society. They played it toward the end of the year in an auditorium of indifferent acoustics, with no more insight or projection than the elderly conductor could muster. Two audiences heard coldly. Most reviewers wote perfunctorily. Commissioned work, they said, if memory serves; therefore alien to the freer exercises of Sibelius's genius. There was no future, thereafter, for "Tapiola" in these United States; but in Europe the tone-poem gradually made the round of the capitals of music. In nearly every one it was received with nearly unanimous acclaim. Sibelius—the word went—had returned to a genre that oftenest employed his younger years; now lavished upon it the powers of full maturity. At last on this side of the sea has come Dr. Koussevitzky's resurrection of "Tapiola" before a first audience that applauded it loud and long. Six years after, the Damroschian débacle stands retrieved.

As played and heard on Friday "Tapiola" bears many a mark of the composer's ripest years. Though he assembles a more numerous orchestra than is his usual habit in these later days—woodwinds in threes and a full complement of brass—he utilizes it with characteristic directness, economy and precision. Nowhere is there waste; nowhere, decoration. Each choir, each instrument, if at will or need the composer isolates it, preserves the Sibelian quality. The strings are prevailingly incisive. They are used more than once with that stark or diversified reiteration in which Sibelius is akin to Beethoven and often surpasses him. The woodwinds keep the Sibelian pungency. (There is no more graphic word for an individuality that the ear immediately recognizes). Now and again in "Tapiola" they sing, Sibelian fashion, in lonesome voices against a whirr of strings. The brass is never overbearing. As choice prompts, it is now incisive; again measuredly sonorous.

Sibelian, likewise, is the evolution of "Tapiola." It proceeds from a germ, rather than a theme, immediately launched upon the ear; then repeated in varying harmonic and instrumental dress until it is etched into the listening imagination. From it, so stated, Sibelius develops the whole tone-poem (which is neither short nor long) with exhaustless invention, resource, diversity. There is no formal process, as one speaks of formal process with the sections of "Ein Heldenleben," the variations of "Don Quixote," even the divisions of Debussy's sea-pieces. Yet measure springs from measure, period expands from period, until the whole rises before the hearer unified and self-contained, plastic and manifold. It is as though Sibelius were ever drawing threads from his germinal phrase, ever twisting and re-twisting them into another tonal texture. Such a paradox of fecundity and economy marks him in these days as no other.

Illusively we are concerned with Tapio, the forest-god of Finnish mythology; with the woodlands that are his vast and solitary seat, with his might and with his magic. Perhaps the reiterated phrase of the beginning is token of his omnipresence. Perhaps the multifold variations that follow re-affirm it ever manifest. Perhaps passing episodes, shimmering or somber, for the instant arresting, may be related to the verses that the composer sets beneath his title. Perhaps the intensity of the ascending, proclaiming, fiercely chromatic strings, the mass and momentum of the final climax, the hush into unplumbed depths of silence, are as the progress of the god through his forest.

After the manner of tone-poems (unless Strauss writes them) larger and more generalized sensations efface these imagined particulars: cumulative intensity that knows no flagging; piercing and mounting suspense, becoming a spell—the magic of the forest upon us. At last the godhead so evoked sweeps by in puissant presence, and all again—the magic gone—is somber, vast and still. Music of a potent hand and imagination, darkling music of power and splendor is this "Tapiola." From the outset, conductor, orchestra and audience were at one with it. All three felt the mettle of a masterpiece. Most those who, by the chance of summer wanderings, have crossed northern woodlands and swayed, alone, between forest-magic and forest-fears.

Such a "Tapiola" might reasonably have stood unaccompanied. As it was, Dr. Koussevitsky set beside it another and less rewarding novel piece—the Suite that Prokofiev recently drew from his opera, "The Gambler." The opera harks back to the like-named novel of Dostoievsky. The novel harks back to known episodes in his life and known figures in his circle. From Berlin as far as Boston, with a halt along the way in Paris, the learned "programists" have had no happier—or lengthier—wallow through rivalries and unchastities, intrigues and vagabondage, the chances of the tables at a score of spas. The venerable master who compiles the program-books at Symphony Hall prepared us listeners in nearly five pages of print, though how we were to read, assimilate and semi-memorise them in the brief intervals of the concert-hall were hard to say. Perhaps there are inquiries today at the bookshops and the libraries for "The Gambler" and for Dostoievskian biographies and memoirs. Then have the omniscient and abundant race of "programists" done their perfect work. Otherwise their virtue in curiosity and compilation must be its own reward.

For circumstances alter perspectives. To listen understandingly and responsively to Prokofiev's Suite, the hearer should have at the back of his head both Dostoievsky's novel and Dostoievsky's life. He should have seen and heard Prokofiev's opera in Brussels or some German city. He should also possess the rare faculty that imaginatively bridges the gulf between theater and concert-hall, when music written for the one sounds in symphonic performance across the other. Under necessity most of us listened to Prokofiev's Suite as so much self-contained music, pointed up by the sub-titles, eked out by gasping references to the program-book. The sub-titles were not exactly illuminating: Alexis, Pauline, the Grandmother, the General, Dénouement. The program-pages might hardly be swallowed at a gulp. Most of us also—by inference from demeanor and applause—were both puzzled and bored.

Now Prokofiev is no composer who writes wholly or mainly for the theater; who must pass to the concert-room in excerpts and adaptations. His symphonic music is plentiful and characteristic. Some of it, whatever its deserts, is still unheard at Symphony Hall. Instead, a Suite from his ballet of clowns, "Chout," is played (1926) and barely prevails by sheer comic exuberance. A Suite from his ballet of Soviets and machines, "Le Pas d'Acier," follows (1927) and falls flat because the music is primarily dependent upon the stage. And now to similar mischance this Suite from his Dostoievskian opera—for the sufficient reason that there is no understanding it without a preparation that not two in two hundred listeners will undergo.

How much, in short, could a practised, attentive, open-minded hearer gather from a single performance of this Suite from "The Gambler?" Not a little that was pleasurable and profitable from the stinging finale, "Dénouement." There Prokofiev teems with rhythmic and propulsive life; flings out phrases, periods, progressions biting upon the ear; runs sharp-edged and pungent; gives force to contending and confused motivs already heard and, for quick memories, labelled. But upon receptive faculties that had no Dostoievskian background (which was too much to ask) Alexis and Pauline, Grandmother and General, were bound to be faintly adumbrated from their respective pages; while those pages often lacked an intrinsic musical interest sufficient to prevail in themselves. Until "Dénouement" began, the one engrossing sensation was Prokofiev's novel procedure. He has not lifted and strung together more or less self-contained passages from his opera. Rather, he has re-assembled and re-worked into new form for new purpose whatever measures characterize the four personages in hand. Each division of the Suite is no excerpt, but a tone-picture, a character-piece in little, that may have failed only because it was played before an unprepared audience. But as such the Suite was matter for studious connoisseurs. Nor could Dr. Koussevitzky's perceptive and projective performance alter the situation.

A familiar classic—Mozart's overture to his opera of "The Magic Flute"—began the concert. A familiar classic—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—ended it. Neither years nor repetition may dull the sonorous, solemn, portentous splendor of the chords that begin the overture and recur along its course. Perhaps they could be sounded yet more deeply and richly than they were yesterday; or, maybe, imagination, kindled by them, outruns orchestral possibility. For here, consciously or unconsciously, Mozart, "turning off" a magic opera while the waiting theater-manager stood by, has scaled and sounded the visioning exaltation of the human spirit when it draws near to ineffable things, high as the heavens, wide as the universe. To some of us also, and to this day, the transition into the body of the overture is beauty, unalloyed and changeless.

From conductor and orchestra the playing of Beethoven's Symphony stirred not only admiration but emotion. Whenever he undertakes Beethoven Dr. Koussevitzky freshens and energizes the music in hand. The listener hears it, not as a perdurable classic dutifully played for the nth time; not as a "reading" for directorial display; but as something warm, vivid, intensive, called again to new life; "first time" upon conductor, orchestra and audience, as it was "first time" to the composer's Vienna. Through half the Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky plies a light hand, save for the moment when the Allegrettto upswells to climax. The music justifies him. Up to the skies through the sunlight, winds across the orchestra the singing, dancing theme of the first movement. The Allegretto sings without languor or sentimentality. With bolder strokes the conductor molds and drives the Scherzo; while in the corybantic finale he whips on the whirling figures until they touch this earth only to rise again. Apotheosis of the dance the Seventh, in spite of Wagner, may or may not be. Call it, rather, Beethoven's homage to rhythm as though he were blessing that passion of music in our day.

H. T. P.

Symphony Plays Two New Works

Her Nov 5

Witness the works of Dr. Koussevitzky, champion of the new. In a perfect setting of recognized repertory pieces, namely Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's seventh symphony, he presented yesterday, in the Boston Symphony orchestra concert, two novelties: "Tapiola," tone poem by Sibelius, for the first time in Boston, and "The Gambler," suite by Prokofieff, for the first time in America.

Towering above the now-mysterious, now-bright Mozart overture, surpassing the Prokofieff character portraits, transcending even the famous Beethoven symphony of the dance, the Sibelius symphonic poem was the most impressive music of the afternoon.

For it is the mood of the north: winds whining in the mournful pines; ageless broodings of the gloomy forests; foreboding majesty of Tapio, legendary god of the northland. And with such a program, the Finnish composer, who is to be honored above all others at succeeding concerts this year, has woven a magnificent work.

The treatment is simple, austere. There is but a single, powerful theme, announced by the strings in the opening phrase, and appearing again and again, undergoing many variations. Approaching the climax, there is a weird passage for strings alone, producing an eery, shimmering effect. And then rises the mighty climax, a thing of overpowering strength.

At the conclusion of "Tapiola" yesterday, there was a hush over Symphony Hall, as though the spell of the north lingered. But as a spattering of handclaps echoed in the hollow silence, the audience awoke to pay tribute. And so insistent was the applause that Dr. Koussevitzky called his men to their feet in acknowledgment.

Prokofieff's "The Gambler," consisting of four character sketches and a denouement from his opera by the same name, also fared well. The amorous Alexis, the imperious grandmother, the pompous general and the cold, aloof Pauline, portrayed individually and then encountering one another in a dramatic finale, form a lucid, genuinely worthwhile orchestral work.

H. C. C.

Boston Symphony Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its series of six Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow at 8:15 p m. Dr Koussevitzky will perform Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony, Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan," and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends," a piece for orchestra with piano solo, will be given its first American performance at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Harriet Cohen, English pianist, will be soloist.

Dr Koussevitzky will also conduct the first Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, thus beginning the series of the Finnish composer's symphonies to be performed through the season, culminating with the new Eighth Symphony, which is to have its first public performance.

Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony in G major, No. 92, will be the opening number. This symphony has not been heard at these concerts for a number of years.

Miss Cohen first visited America two seasons ago at the invitation of Mrs E. S. Coolidge to participate in her festivals of chamber music at Washington and Chicago. Miss Cohen has long enjoyed a high reputation in England

Globe Nov 6

Tel. Chelsea 3-8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 6 - 1932

ORCHES

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Bax's "Winter Legends" for piano and orchestra for the first time in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston next Friday and Saturday. The piano part will be performed by Harriet Cohen.

hestra's
nday s e first plang
t wi

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TIMES

NOV 6 - 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its New York season on Nov. 17 and 19 at Carnegie Hall, is playing in Boston next Friday and Saturday the first American performances of Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends" for piano and orchestra, with the English pianist, Harriet Cohen, as soloist.

Nov 5 '32

INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

As there is nothing in the world of performance quite comparable in emotional depth and tonal splendor to a fine symphony orchestra, such an experience becomes infinitely more rare when the orchestra to be heard is one of the greatest in existence.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra has held this distinction for many years is a matter of history. In the last eight years, the continuous association of such a conductor as SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, and a personnel more illustrious than any of the past, has had its effect. An insatiable artist, Dr. KOUSSEVITZKY has shaped the Boston Symphony Orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument to express his fresh and vital conception of the "classics," his ranging interest in music, his unique artistic personality. These concerts have reached new heights of beauty and importance. Brooklyn will have the opportunity of greeting this superb band when it gives the first concert in its annual Institute series on Friday evening, November 18.

Dr Koussevitzky, arriving in New York, seemed refreshed after his European summer which included a vacation in the mountains as well as a quest of new music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 6 - 1932

Boston Symphony Here Nov. 17, 19

Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends" for piano and orchestra will have its first performances in this country next Friday and Saturday in Boston at the hands of Serge Krousevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The piano part will be taken by Harriet Cohen, the English pianist.

The orchestra will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 17, and Saturday afternoon, November 19.

Tel. Chelsea 3-8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 6 - 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not yet announced its Carnegie Hall programs for November 17 and 19, but for its first program of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on Friday evening, November 18, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Weber's overture to "Oberon," Cesar Frank's symphony, Sibelius's "Tapiola" and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

35

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

NOV 6 - 1932

Recapitulations

Traveling Orchestra Plays On "Best Behavior"—Magnetized Atmosphere And Sense Of Newness React Favorably—Stokowski Settles Difficulties.

By George A. Leighton.

The Boston Orchestra played here a week or so ago. General and critical audience reaction was rapturous. The performance merited superlative praise. As an event, the concert approached being sensational. Without detracting one iota from the high quality of the presentation or qualifying praise already given, there is a reflex to the first immediate enthusiasm that comes to those contemplatively inclined.

The Boston Orchestra was on tour and on trial before new audiences. The program, of a certainty, was made up of the most familiar (to the players) and most-likely-to-attract numbers in its repertoire. These numbers had been subjected to unusual rehearsing. Conductor and orchestra were "on their toes." They had to make good—they just had to. Admittedly on their part they were keyed to the highest pitch. Leader and men were nervous with excitement. The audience was vast and magnificently friendly. Enthusiasm early was displayed. Performers reacted to the spontaneity of the listeners. The conductor, never less than splendid, grew with the inspiration of the occasion. The result was—what 3,500 people heard.

Another phase of the matter. The concert took place in Music Hall. Performers and audience were sufficiently detached from each other in actual distance for the latter to retain illusions and to hear nothing of the mechanics of the presentations. Furthermore, it was the Boston Orchestra, not heard here in many years and altogether a novelty. There were no familiar faces on the stage to inject personalities into receptivity. We heard a cello, not Karl Kirksmith; a violin, not Emil Herrmann.

As fine as it is, the Boston Orchestra is not omnipotent. Boston audiences hearing it every week surely are not every week as fortunate as we were in our one concert. Not every program is as general in it appeal was the one we heard. Koussevitasky offers as much debatable music as any conductor; Boston is made to listen to many modern experiments. Not every program can contain the equivalent of the Brahms First Symphony. And not every audience is sent home pleased.

The Cincinnati Orchestra goes on tour every season, and more often than otherwise is given a reception as vociferous as that we gave the Boston ensemble.

A variation of "a prophet hath no glory" is Kiplings, "They who dig foundations deep, little profit do they reap, in their own country." (We quote from memory—a mental function not always reliable.) This is the moral of our peroration. Another is that a loyal Cincinnatian will not make comparisons or, if he does, he will select the most interesting compositions he has heard in Emery Auditorium and the highest points of performance, and form in his own mind a two-hour program and let that be the basis for comparison.

* * *

And speak of orchestras, there is Stokowski's Philadelphia group. He arrived home after a foreign trip not long ago to find that his directors had decided there should be no "debatable" music on his program this season, only the time tried and assimilable!

Stokowski refused to be so circumscribed, but made no concession; he has placed the "debatable" compositions last on the programs so that those who object may leave after they have heard the time-tried and easily assimilable. We hear that only a few score left at the first concert and virtually none at the second.

The director's plan for Stokowski's programs was based on their assumption that falling off of subscriptions was due to the modern music being offered. Four hundred season subscriptions in the parquet have lapsed for the evening concerts and many seats in the balcony and boxes are available to single ticket purchasers.

A more reasonable objection, according to a writer in the Boston Transcript, which might have been advanced against modern music, lies in the expense of extra rehearsals and unusual instruments required by such music. Reasons of economy might be argued; objections on the basis of aesthetics are untenable.

* * *

Which opens up a large and mooted problem for which we have no space at the present time. But in passing we might mention that objectors usually are more outspoken than assentors. Those who dislike one piece on a program often are inclined to condemn the entire program and to do so with hearty voice. The pleased element take their enjoyment for granted and, though in the majority are not heard from.

Obviously, a program only by chance can satisfy everybody who hears it. As a matter of fact, with the great existing variety in tastes and prejudices, a patron in charity to his fellow patrons should be content to find but one or two numbers particularly suited to his particular fancy. And, in charity to the program maker and the performers, a patron should make as much a todo about the numbers he likes as he does adversely about those which displease him.

Concert-Chronicle

Tran — Nov 7

Conductor, Orchestra, Classic

IT IS good to see the regard of the audiences at Symphony Hall for the orchestra as such. Most reviewers are prone to overlook its prowess in the haste or the brevities of composition; then to soothe remembering conscience with the thought that in their praise of the conductor they have implied praise of his orchestra. The public of the Symphony Concerts knows no such subtleties. When, at a second recall, Dr. Koussevitzky bids the players rise, the applause invariably swells. It was so, last Friday, after the hearing of Sibelius's new tone-poem and of Beethoven's familiar Seventh Symphony; so again on Saturday after both pieces. By the evidence of two concerts the Sibelian "Tapiola" is to stand as one of the conductor's welcomed and impressive "novelties"; while his version of the Seventh Symphony is fairly comparable with his readings of "The Eroica," the Ninth and the lesser Fourth. Though it work in his image, the orchestra is no small part of these notable performances. Happily, audiences are at pains that it shall be so distinguished.

It is also custom to speak and write warmly of Dr. Koussevitzky's services to the music of our own time and to the composers that are making it. In many such pieces his works have praised him. His re-animation—for it is nothing less—of the symphonies of Beethoven and of Brahms does him equal credit. Since Dr. Muck's time they have not sounded across Symphony Hall in as true and stirring voice. Of course they were played between—intelligently, dutifully, after the manner of symphonic Sundays in Paris, that is as "repertory," or "standard," numbers. But nothing is "repertory" to Dr. Koussevitzky. He had Sibelius's splendid "Tapiola" (to borrow Ernest Newman's adjective) to rescue from the Damroschian débacle six years ago. Yet he lavished not a whit less pains on Beethoven's Symphony for the fiftieth time, and more, at these concerts. He surcharged "Tapiola" with its darkling life. Yet he was as graphic and invigorating with the luminous Seventh Symphony.

With Beethoven, moreover, he is the poised and masterful conductor, controlling himself as well as directing the performance. No conscious or unconscious excess of zeal possesses him. Consequently, there are no measures languishing for the beauty's sake; no measures over-driven and obscured for the power's sake. Nowhere on Saturday did the ear miss the underbody of the Symphony. Not once in the Allegretto was the pace over-slow or the phrases over-molded. There are conductors who read Beethoven by the letter of the score. To it in this Seventh Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky is also faithful; then sets it aglow with renewing life. In the ears of conductor, orchestra and audience, it sounds alive and charactered, which is the only perpetuation of a classic.

Overdoing Reproach

To well-found reproaches over an unleashed brass in recent performances at the Symphony Concerts of Franck's Symphony and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," correspondents of this department now add complaints against that choir in Weber's overture to "Oberon." They even charge the conductor with "too loud and heavy" a sounding of the noted staccato chord for full orchestra. If they would glance at the score, they would discover that over it Weber has set the three f's of a triple forte. They are also to be found elsewhere in his text; while by the scale of performance in 1826 such marking signified more than it does today. Conductor and orchestra at Symphony Hall may hardly go back to the time in which New York reviewers hailed them as "Herr Gericke's Damen-kapelle aus Boston."

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Globe

Dr Koussevitzky played last evening the first of the series of six Monday Symphony concerts. All the compositions comprising the program had been performed by the orchestra earlier this year.

Very subtly the conductor emphasized the glassy delicacy and brilliance of Weber's overture to "Oberon." From the first notes Dr Koussevitzky caught the precise mean between over-nicety and, on the other hand, hard polish.

Franck's D minor Symphony was the core of the evening. Perfect balance of orchestral tone threw into prominence Franck's organlike treatment of his score. True, many intermittent passages are typically orchestral, but before long, as the work unfolds, the listener is constantly made aware of the instrument that was nearest the composer's heart. In Franck's sparse use of percussive effects lies the possible pitfall of dullness; but Dr Koussevitzky kept sharp watch of changes in time and kept the embers constantly glowing.

In pictures like Strauss' "Don Juan" Dr Koussevitzky is at his best. To his heart's content he can evoke glitter, drama, passionate depth. Climaxes reached prodigious heights, yet when quiet was wanted it was there.

The "Die Meistersinger" prelude, superbly played, brought the concert to a close.

Dec 12 is the date of the next concert of this series.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY

Play Choicest Items From Previous Concerts

Post Nov 7

To make the programme of the first of the Monday evening series of Symphony concerts, which took place last evening, Dr. Koussevitzky garnered four of the choicest items from the programmes thus far presented at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. These pieces, in the order in which last evening's enthusiastically appreciative audience heard them, were Weber's overture to "Oberon," the symphony of Cesar Franck, Strauss' tone-poem "Don Juan," and the "Meistersinger" prelude of Wagner.

Regarding Dr. Koussevitzky's highly individual, here and there debatable but always effective readings of these pieces, nothing new need be said at this time. It may be remarked, however, that the performance of Strauss' tone-poem was more spirited, truer both to the composer's intentions and to the usual standards of conductor and orchestra in this music, than that of three weeks ago when the exactness of Bruckner's long Fourth Symphony seemed to have sapped the energies of conductor and band.

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY

Herald Nov 8

The Boston Symphony orchestra in the first concert of its Monday night series presented the following program: Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Franck, Symphony in D minor; Strauss, "Don Juan," tone poem, opus 20 (after Lenau); Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

There has been considerable talk recently about the Franck symphony, in which its position as an acknowledged masterpiece has been denied. Such an attack is justified by the weakness of the first movement which meanders around certain themes as though the composer were dreamily improvising on them at the organ. A beautiful subject is thus repeated as many times and in as many ways as there are stops on the instrument. This caricature of one flaw to be observed in the symphony should in no way detract from its obvious dignity as a work of art nor from the skill of its execution last night, but merely point out that its real faults are due to the composer's having been so long an organist. Vincent d' Judy wrote how Franck once exclaimed: "As for my organ, it is an orchestra!" Unfortunately it is not.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY

Play Choicest Items From Previous Concerts

Post Nov 8

To make the programme of the first of the Monday evening series of Symphony concerts, which took place last evening, Dr. Koussevitzky garnered four of the choicest items from the programmes thus far presented at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. These pieces, in the order in which last evening's enthusiastically appreciative audience heard them, were Weber's overture to "Oberon," the symphony of Cesar Franck, Strauss' tone-poem "Don Juan," and the "Meistersinger" prelude of Wagner.

Regarding Dr. Koussevitzky's highly individual, here and there debatable but always effective readings of these pieces, nothing new need be said at this time. It may be remarked, however, that the performance of Strauss' tone-poem was more spirited, truer both to the composer's intentions and to the usual standards of conductor and orchestra in this music, than that of three weeks ago when the exactness of Bruckner's long Fourth Symphony seemed to have sapped the energies of conductor and band.

Beginning Another Symphonic Series

Trans. Nov. 8

THE Monday series of Symphony concerts began last evening. In these days one looks first at the audience, only then at the program. Last night, the searching eye, peering into corners and along edges, where unsold seats might be expected, found none. In the farthest recesses of the auditorium seats were occupied. The only vacant ones that met the eye were a light sprinkling throughout the house, such as might easily be due to the absence of subscribers on a rainy night. The Monday series, from the box office point of view, then, may be described as very nearly sold out.

There was the usual formality of greeting the conductor, spontaneous and enthusiastic, if not long drawn out. The program assembled the best of the "standard" works from the Friday and Saturday series—Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon"; Franck's Symphony in D minor; Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan"; Wagner's prelude to his opera, "The Mastersingers of Nürnberg."

Conductor and men were at top bent. It has happened before this that Monday and Tuesday concerts are blest with a kindling performance which exceeds that of Friday and Saturday. Last evening's concert was a case in point. The whole evening seemed to be charged with a galvanic something which the hearer strongly felt. For one thing, Dr. Koussevitsky's powers of divination of the inner essence of his music stood at their zenith. As it happened, also, his enthusiasm for his music rolled out in flood tide. One recalls Franck's symphony. (To the argument, "to play or not to play," this writer will add neither jot nor tittle, not by the slightest implication. All possible points have already been brought out. Let nature now take her course.) Last evening the conductor, in subtle adjustment of tempi, in modulation from one tempo to another, appeared to be discerning beyond any previous performance which the writer has happened to hear. The version is the dramatic one, superbly thought out, ending in an apotheosis. Just possibly that final apotheosis, which set people wildly applauding, would have been even more effective had the full force of the brass been saved for the real climax in the last third of the last movement.

Yet in comparison with the passionate, excited "Don Juan," this symphony sounded restrained and held in check. A veritable seething whirlpool of sound it was, punctuated only by the several lyric episodes which sang their way in gentlest manner.—One adds a word about the wondrous tone painting in "Oberon." If Weber's fairies exceed those of Mendelssohn, his great chord also exceeds the "surprise" chord of Haydn. But the bright, fresh music exceeds both.—Finally, the magnificences of Wagner's prelude formed sufficient climax even after the wildly arduous "Don Juan."

A. H. M.

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Globe Nov 8

Dr Koussevitzky played last evening the first of the series of six Monday Symphony concerts. All the compositions comprising the program had been performed by the orchestra earlier this year.

Very subtly the conductor emphasized the glassy delicacy and brilliance of Weber's overture to "Oberon." From the first notes Dr Koussevitzky caught the precise mean between over-nicety and, on the other hand, hard polish.

Franck's D minor Symphony was the core of the evening. Perfect balance of orchestral tone threw into prominence Franck's organlike treatment of his score. True, many intermittent passages are typically orchestral, but before long, as the work unfolds, the listener is constantly made aware of the instrument that was nearest the composer's heart. In Franck's sparse use of percussive effects lies the possible pitfall of dullness; but Dr Koussevitzky kept sharp watch of changes in time and kept the embers constantly glowing.

In pictures like Strauss' "Don Juan" Dr Koussevitzky is at his best. To his heart's content he can evoke glitter, drama, passionate depth. Climaxes reached prodigious heights, yet when quiet was wanted it was there.

The "Die Meistersinger" prelude, superbly played, brought the concert to a close.

Dec 12 is the date of the next concert of this series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

NOV 9 1932

For Lowell people who are unable to attend the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is a good opportunity to hear the famous organization in the series of six concerts to be given on Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 22. This arrangement is especially convenient for patrons outside of Boston. And Dr. Koussevitzky will choose for performance at them outstanding masterpieces, new and old.

The Boston Symphony orchestra opens the annual series in Carnegie hall, New York, on Nov. 17 and 19.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

1 1932

Light Comedy at Parsons's.

This evening the first light comedy of the season will be presented at Parsons's—Benn Levy's play called "Springtime for Henry," which had a very good run in New York last season (198 performances) and is now on the road in the hands of players other than those of the first cast. But inasmuch as there are only four people principally concerned in the tale it would seem unlikely that, in the present state of availability of talent in the theater, the producers would have found themselves in any difficulties whatever in casting their little play satisfactorily. The men of the cast, Henry Hull and Eric Blore, are both well known for good work in a variety of stage characters in the past; the two ladies have their way to make with Hartford audiences in "Springtime for Henry."

The Boston Symphony Program.

The announced program for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next Wednesday evening at the Bushnell Memorial, includes but one number not most familiar to lovers of orchestral music here. And in fact the three familiar numbers carry a large number of years in the repertory of the Boston Orchestra in the aggregate—for the "Oberon" Overture was first played in Boston by the orchestra in 1882; the Cesar Franck D minor Symphony dates from April 14, 1899; and the "Meistersinger" overture has been Boston Symphony Orchestra music ever since the orchestra was founded, in 1881. As to the tone poem "Tapiola" by Sibelius, however,—this takes the place of the Strauss "Don Juan" which was first anounced, and represents Dr. Koussevitzky's offering of a comparatively modern work (1926) with three others definitely and delightfully familiar.

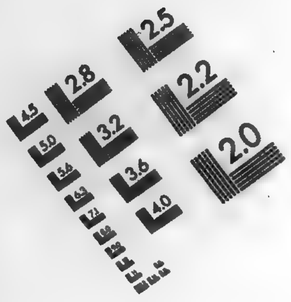
The use of the Sibelius number (which has never been played here) will probably serve to lessen the number of remonstrances that might have been filed, against the first program announced, by music-lovers who crave something new at each concert attended regardless of the quality of the interpretation of the old that is offered; but there may still be some complaints. In my opinion, however, the very familiarity of so large a part of the program will appeal strongly to a large number of those present in the undoubtedly-capacity audience in Bushnell Memorial Hall next Wednesday evening. And the many admirers of the music of Jan Sibelius will be delighted to hear one of his works, new to them, interpreted as Dr. Koussevitzky, and his hundred artists assisting, can interpret it!

REDUCTION
RATIO
16x

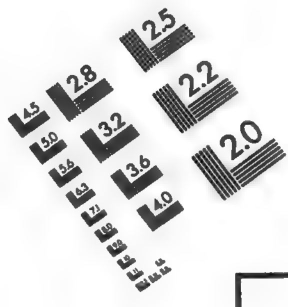
2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

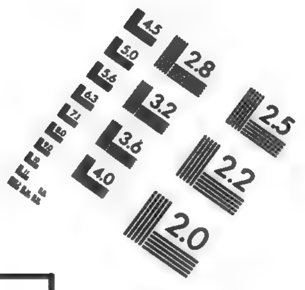
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

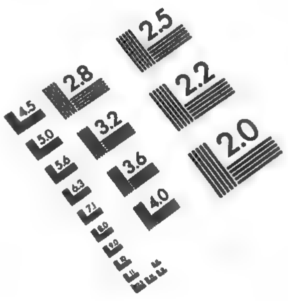
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

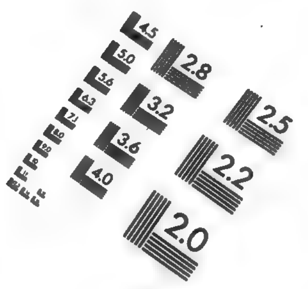


PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





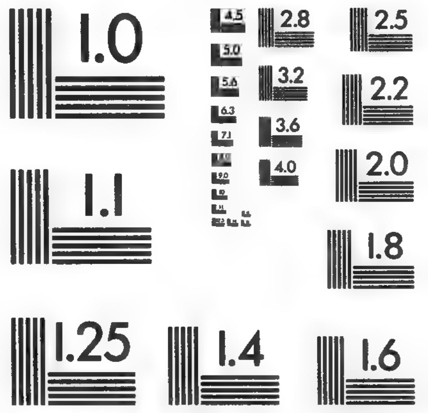




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



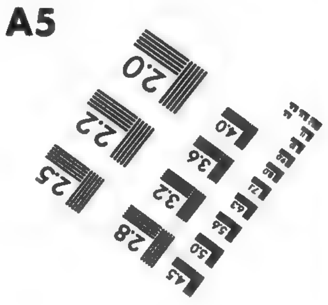
1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

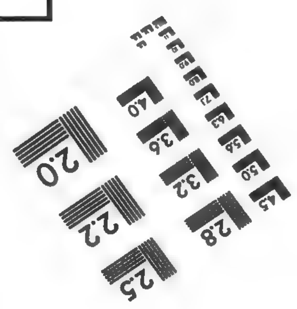
2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

A5



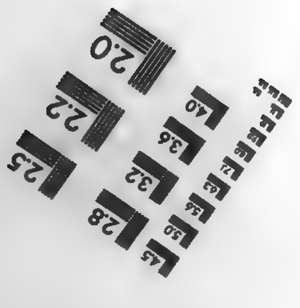
A4

A3



PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Hfd. Times Nov. 10, 1932.

Boston Symphony To Open Season With Unusual Concert Program

"Tapiola," Sibelius Tone Poem, and Other Notable Works; Koussevitzky Conducts.

"Tapiola," the most recent, and in the opinion of many critics, the most impressive of the tone poems of Jan Sibelius, is included in the program which the Boston Symphony orchestra will play at the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall Wednesday evening, November 16. This program, which will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is the first event of the Bushnell concert series of the current season.

The symphony which Dr. Koussevitzky will play on this program is the famous work in D minor by Cesar Franck. The overture to Weber's "Oberon" will open the program, while the fourth item is the prelude to Richard Wagner's grand opera, "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

"Tapiola," which has just been revived with great success by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston, is a nature piece. It has been described as follows in the program note:

"The title comes from Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology. The dark grandeur of the Finnish forests which are noted for their beauty gave the famous composer his inspiration. The following verse is at the head of this score:

"Wide-spread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests,
Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
With them dwells the forest's mighty god
And wood sprites in the gloom weave magic secrets."

"Sibelius develops his tone poem on a characteristic short phrase which is repeated many times with shifting instrumental colors. It develops to a tremendous climax which is finally reached by a swift chromatic passage for the strings, which lasts for thirty-seven bars and reaches an unbelievable degree of intensity.

"The Finnish composer dedicated 'Tapiola' to Walter Damrosch, and it was first played by this composer in New York in 1926. The piece has not since been heard in America, but has frequently been performed and greatly admired in Europe, particularly in England."

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

BOSTON SYMPHON WINS ADDED GLORY

Hfd. Times 11-17-32

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Capably Interprets Popular Compositions.

SIBELIUS WORK FEATURED

Franck "Symphony" Earns Greatest Approbation—Genius of Leader Disclosed.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky inaugurated the Bushnell symphonic series at the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall last evening before a large and enthusiastic gathering of music lovers. All present joined in a spontaneous ovation to both Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians. The following program was offered.

Overture to Oberon ...... Von Weber
Symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck
Tapiola, tone poem .... Sibelius
Prelude to "Meistersingers"... Wagner

Except for the Sibelius work, the entire program was familiar to local concert goers. Tapiola will be given at New York concerts by the Bostonians this evening and Saturday afternoon, when Dr. Kousevitzky will present an all-Sibelius program.

Greatest approbation was given presentation of the Franck symphony. This, work last given here nearly two years ago by Leopold Stokowski and his Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, seemed to lend what was perhaps the greatest air of distinction to the program, and those present were quck to note the different phases of interpretation disclosed by Dr. Koussivitzky from those showed by his distinguished Philidelphia contemporary. Dr. Koussevitzky, the super-showman, and Stokowski, the zeolous dramatist, have both given Hartford noble conceptions of this symphony, utterly different in their content, yet both virile and musical episodes of surpassing interest.

From the opening measure of "Oberon" the dynamic leader gave a vividness of contrasts which betokened a unique, yet satisfactory performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky made a popular gesture when he chose the Franck "Symphony" for a place on his program. Dr. Koussevitzky, always a onalist, pictured contracts which at imes bordered even on the sensation- l, yet always with the musical vision which has lifted the Boston orchestra into the realm of the unusual.

The opening "Lento-Allegro non Troppo" was a proper preliminary for he good things which were to follow. The opening theme, splendidly rased, was given with almost hyp- otic genius for interpretation always ticeable in Dr. Koussevitzky's work. e balance of the orchestra was a ng of great interest, and the vari- choirs were brought together into armonious body of musicians un- a leadership of great brilliancy. n the "Allegretto," the spell of Dr. ussevitzky's baton was manifest, d the pastel shades of the various ods were brought forth with de- ion and sympathetic understand-he concluding "Allegro" was pic- d with brilliancy and the climax impressive.

he tone poem "Tapiola" was the novelty and the genius of the uctor left the proper impression. cately interwoven themes, with al phrases of hidden import, ed in giving a descriptive read- the composition. There was and delicacy, yet authority and iveness. As an interpreter of us, Dr. Koussevitzky has no su- s.

familiar "Meistersinger" pre- was given with refreshing zest ramatic climaxes. The orches- semble was most satisfying.

next concert in this series will n December 7, when Ossip Ga- ach will bring the Detroit ony orchestra here for its se- earance.

Koussevitzky Orchestra In Finest Form

Hfd. Courant 11-17-32

Familiar Three-Quarters of Program Given New Values—Sibelius Tone-Poem Pleases

BY WALTER BROWN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—in first of the season's concerts of Bushnell Hall Course, Wednesday, November 16, 1932. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Program

Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Symphony in D minor	Franck
Symphonic Poem, "Tapiola"	Sibelius
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner

Dr. Koussevitzky offered a program at Bushnell Memorial Hall Wednesday evening that was three-quarters familiar music with a new Sibelius tone-poem added for good measure—and played the whole list as if it were new, beautifully, zestfully, appreciatively in every measure; and the huge audience that welcomed him and the orchestra gave every evidence of the most entire satisfaction with the whole concert, as well it might.

The Franck symphony is, of course, one of the most well known of them all—as it is one of the most popular in the best sense of the word. Last season it was selected by vote of the home audiences of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra as "the" most popular of the whole symphonic list as represented in the orchestra's comprehensive programs for the year; and it is always heard with delight when it is given adequate reading—and what a virile, intense and tremendously interesting reading Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work at his Wednesday concert!

The symphony shows Cesar Franck not only as a master of melody, alive to every possibility of tonal beauties in the themes he chooses to use, but it shows, too, the spiritual qualities of the man in what seems to many listeners, a degree unusual, in a light illumining as in technical skill undoubted. And the playing of the work was unusually effective, certainly to many listeners, in the power, the virility of its beauties were sometimes only the suavity, the sweetness of them obtains. Those first measures are blessing-spreading in their loveliness, and in the playing Wednesday evening there was the wonder of light playing through some of the dark tones of sadness in the succeeding passages. There was no loss of value in this interpretation of the work, certainly, but there was a freedom, a sense of getting away from the academic that charmed and delighted—and though the audience doubtless recognized the orchestra's custom of playing the whole work without interruption, save a momentary pause there was absolutely spontaneous applause following the first movement's brilliant climax.

The loveliness of the Allegretto were played in exquisite delicacy and the continuing sense of newness in the work; and the piling up of the brilliances of the final movement was accomplished as only a master-interpreter, with a band of artists in perfect accord, could be expected to show them. The heartiest possible applause brought Dr. Koussevitzky several times back to the stage and the orchestra, of course, was called on to rise knowledging the audience's approval.

The opening and the closing overtures were played as brilliantly as was the symphony, and in each there was the feeling of the most wonderful care and attention to every detail of melody, of single phrase, of massive climax. The Weber work is less essentially dramatic than Wagner's and so did not leave one with the feeling that necessarily the curtain must rise on the opera at the overture's close, but it shone in beauty throughout; and Wagner's stirring measures seemed possessed of the quality of eternal youth and freshness as they sounded.

The Sibelius work came brand new to the audience and was heard with the closest attention and interest. That it made an admirable first impression is undoubted, but that many felt that some further familiarity with its content might add to its values is also undoubtedly true. The pictures in tone of the Norse forests—granting program effects to the music, though these may not have been primarily in the composer's thought—are weird and strange; strange rhythms beat their way into the hearers' consciousness, strange harmonies float, strange forces strike. There are breakings-off in musical sequences unusual even in other works of Sibelius; there is an absolutely hair-raising crescendo of stormy strings to a climax almost overwhelming in volume of tone; there are some of the very loveliest of all Sibelius harmonies that follow this whirlwind's effect, and the three chords that sing the poem's close are exquisite.

In the reading here, again, was the feeling of the splendid freedom that the interpreter of the music could give himself in seeking the effects he wanted from his artists. The playing even in the few passages where it seemed as if the composer's thoughts were being given what might be termed routine expression—the playing in all the work was on a par with that in all the familiar program numbers accompanying the new work here. And higher praise is unnecessary.

12, 1932 Nov. Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The 14th anniversary of the signing of the Armistice which ended fighting in the World War on Nov 11, 1918, was observed at the fifth Symphony concert of the season yesterday afternoon. Dr Koussevitzky bade players and audience rise while "The Star Spangled Banner" was played.

The new music on the program was Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends," a "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra. Harriet Cohen, distinguished English pianist renowned for her interpretations of Bax and playing of Bach, was soloist. This work is dedicated to her, and was yesterday played for the first time in the United States.

"Winter Legends" was first performed in London in February of this year, with Miss Cohen as soloist. Bax has not offered any motto or any program for his work. By virtue of its title, style, and content, however, the music may likely enough represent some sequence of events, some fanciful tale, or a general impression in the mind of the composer. One might safely hazard a guess that Bax' mind was upon the verdure and the hills of Ireland when he wrote it.

Written in three movements, an allegro, a lento molto expressivo, and a molto moderato, "Winter Legends" is musing, wandering in style, and a curious blend of sounding fury and gentle introspection. Its occasional lack of continuity gives it the aspect of an orchestral improvisation.

If Bax had a definite program in mind, why did he not nail it to the masthead of his piece? It is not so much the fact of being programmatic that has won opprobrium for some music as the fact that the music itself is dull. After all, no one cares particularly whether Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," for example, tells us all about the unpleasant habits and demise of a rogue; what counts most is the distinction and vitality of the music per se. If Bax had some Celtic scene or tale in mind, why did he not make it known? The ultimate evaluation of "Winter Legends" will depend wholly upon the value of the musical matter.

At first hearing, the work is not pregnant with salient ideas, nor is it concise and to the point. Its greatest merit lies in the frail harmonic and melodic beauty of the slow movement, and in the stimulating rhythmic complexity of the finale. The instrumentation is uneven in quality, often being thick and blatant. The piano part is seemingly as intricate as the orchestral portions, and obviously requires no little physical strength to play. Many chords are massive, and numerous indeed must be the double and triple f's in the score.

Miss Cohen, playing for the first time in Boston, produced uncommon sonority. But her most enjoyable work occurred in the slow movement, where a felicitous touch enhanced Bax' gentle dreaming. The audience recalled her to the stage again and again. One would welcome opportunity of hearing her in recital, when the variety of her talents could better be revealed.

Dr Koussevitzky played Sibelius' First Symphony, in E minor, beginning the cycle of the Finnish master's works which will enrich Boston Symphony programs of the present season. The end and climax of the series will be the first performance anywhere of the new Eighth Symphony.

One could wish to be alive 100 years from now to observe in what esteem Sibelius will then be regarded. One has a secret conviction that he will by that time have emerged from the background into which the blatancies and tricksy stunts of the Hindemiths, Schoenbergs, Ravels and latter-day Stravinskys have thrust him.

What other contemporary composer whose work figures upon present day programs has so completely disregarded the cacophony, the rhythmical trickery and other devices that constitute the small change of contemporary composition? Who can better Sibelius in emotional force? And who can equal him in breadth of thought and depth of feeling?

His first symphony is derivative and not representative of him in maturity. But for all its Tchaikovskian echoes and for all its occasional groping, this work is an edifice of strength that towers over the puny structures of most of his contemporaries.

Dr Koussevitzky played the work brilliantly, with his customary intensity and splendor. The other item upon the program was Haydn's 17th Symphony, in F major, an ingratiating if somewhat monotonous work. It was agreeably played.

The orchestra will play in New York next week. The next regular concerts here will take place on Nov 25 and 26. Florent Schmitt will appear as piano soloist in his new "Symphonie Concertante."

C. W. D.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Nov 11

Pro Bono Publico

A DEFINITE and continuing scheme is announced from Symphony Hall for the programs at the Tuesday matinées of the Symphony Orchestra. There will be six concerts in all, beginning on Nov. 22, proceeding through Jan. 3, Feb. 7, March 7 and 28, to April 18. As nearly as possible the programs will be arranged "in historical sequence." Concert by concert and item by item, they will unfold "the evolution of symphonic music" as exemplified by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Brahms, Chaikovsky, Strauss, Debussy and Stravinsky. Here opens opportunity for those who prefer the musical past to the musical present; for those who would be informed as well as pleasured at symphony concerts; for those who would have concerts now and again "educational"—"for the young people of course." If all three groups live up to their habitual professions, in "letters to the editor" as well as in talk, there will be lines at the box-office.

urselves and Others

Symphony Plays Songs of North

Traveler Nov 12

Two songs of the north: the one, "Winter Legends," concerto by Arnold Bax, played for the first time in this country, with Miss Harriet Cohen at the piano; the other, the magnificent first symphony of Sibelius, constituted the main parts of the Boston Symphony concert under Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon.

Fittingly enough, the concert opened in holiday spirit, with the orchestra and audience rising for the national anthem. And to this mood was added an atmosphere of intimacy as the platform was stripped of all save the strings and two French horns, for a bright, spirited reading of Haydn's symphony No. 17.

Of far greater proportions than a piano-concerto in the ordinary sense of the word, the Bax work, in three movements, assumed the proportions of a symphony. Boldly, frankly heroic in conception, though perhaps superficial, it communicated in forceful detail a saga of primitive strife, and the brutal elements of a northern scene.

To many it must have seemed ludicrous that the solo part for such a music should be played by a slim, beautiful girl, dressed in a flowing green gown, her black hair pulled straight back over her face. But Miss Cohen, English pianist to whom the work is dedicated, played broadly, firmly, dramatically, with a perfect insight into the true conception of the piece.

Quite in contrast, the Sibelius symphony struck a different—and more sincere—note. The plaintive song of the clarinet, the harsh cries of the brass, the agitated shrieks of the strings, the ominous roll of the drums suggested not a legendary past, but a living present, amid desolate, melancholy moorlands and forests. At the conclusion to the symphony, orchestra and conductor were accorded a stirring ovation.

H. C. C.

Post

DAY, NOVEMBER 12,

DIVERTING PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Haydn and Sibelius for Ripeness and Bax for Recent

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In honor of Armistice Day the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon began with the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," the orchestra—save for the gentlemen of the violincellos—and the audience standing. Symphonies by Haydn, Arnold Bax and Sibelius followed.

BAX'S "LEGENDS"

This far this season, Dr. Koussevitzky has not been especially fortunate in his novelties, if exception may be made in the case of Sibelius' gloomily impressive "Tapiola" of a week ago. Bax's Symphonie Concertante for pianoforte and orchestra, titled, "Winter Legends," is, like Carpenter's "Patterns," and the suite from Prokofieff's "The Gambler," the work of a well-equipped composer who had nothing memorable to say at the time of writing.

"Winter Legends" is also the work of an incurable romanticist in music, and romanticism for the moment is not in fashion. This Symphonie Concertante makes a brave sound. There are pleasing pages, especially towards the close of both the middle and the final movements; there is richness of harmonic and orchestral treatment. But there is also a dearth of salient thematic invention and the music as a whole gives the impression that the composer had a programme in mind which, had it been divulged, might have given certain passages a significance that intrinsically they lack.

Miss Cohen at Piano

The piano-part, in this case little more than another, although highly important orchestral voice, was entrusted to the capable hands of Miss Harriet Cohen, personable English pianist, much admired in her own country and making her first appearance in this city. The audience preferred to look upon her as a soloist in the ordinary sense and recalled her to the platform many times. Graciously and appropriately, she brought Dr. Koussevitzky to share in the plaudits.

It was not an altogether happy stroke of programme-making which placed the bardic First Symphony of Sibelius after the "Winter Legends" of Bax with its presumably Northern flavor. But, intending to play all of Sibelius' symphonies, this season, Dr. Koussevitzky is evidently anxious to get on with them; the Second follows at the next pair of concerts.

Sibelius' Early Work

In this First Symphony, Sibelius alternately goes his own way and remembers the ways of others. No more is it the work of the matured and ripened, highly individual composer of the Fourth Symphony, than the Strauss of "Don Juan" is the Strauss of the "Symphonia Domestica." But this Symphony, like that tone-poem, is the work of a composer who, finding that he has a voice of his own, flings his challenge to the world. For all its contradictions of style it will delight audiences for long years to come. That of yesterday received it warmly.

The Symphony of Haydn, buried under the tonal avalanche which followed, is an early one, No. 17, scored only for strings. The Allegro and Andante are not important. The gay Finale hints of the true Haydn. Nevertheless, Dr. Koussevitzky bestowed the same pains upon the piece that he did upon those of Bax and Sibelius.

Times Nov 11

How to Play Sibelius

A Word from Ernest Newman to Mark the Beginning of Dr. Koussevitzky's Symphonic Cycle

SIBELIUS, I repeat, must be played in terms of himself. He is hard, strong, unaccommodating; at times harsh, at others savage, at others elemental; a voice, it would almost seem, from a wilder and severer world that belongs almost to the pre-historic past. There are things in the slow movement of this Second Symphony to which there is nothing corresponding in the actual experience of the ordinary European of today. Above all, Sibelius is never sentimental, never self-conscious or self-approving. It appears to me, therefore, to be fundamentally wrong to lard his melodies with effects that are the direct product of the self-consciousness, the self-approbation, and the sentimentality that crept into music about the beginning of the nineteenth century.

Some music is improved by being handled in this way; but to apply these and similar airs and graces to music like that of Sibelius is, in my opinion, to deface it. You do not improve the granite front of a great stark building by tieing pretty ribbons to the columns of it. You do not bring out the real quality of a magnificent nor'-easter by sending whiffs of attar of roses down it.

[The Sunday Times, London

Boston Symphony

Mon Nov 12

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

"Winter Legends," Symphonie Concertante for pianoforte and orchestra, by Arnold Bax, was the central piece on the fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season (Nov. 11-12). The Friday afternoon performance was the first in the United States. The soloist was Miss Harriet Cohen, who performed a similar service to the composer at the original production of the work in London last winter. Miss Cohen, who was heard for the first time in Boston on the present occasion, had an immediate success.

Mr. Bax has let it be known, somewhat reluctantly, that this work is associated with the Far North. Certainly it employs liberally those shimmering timbres and acrid chords by which the modern master of the orchestra may evoke vast ice fields and the glare of sun on snow. But listening to it, we wondered if the music had not been composed for an opera, or, better, for a ballet. The facture is episodic, rather than organic in the symphonic sense. The material is undistinguished and its treatment not arresting. There are moments of beauty, especially in the slow movement, but the chief interest is rhythmic. The score indeed seems to suggest that jazz rhythms have been introduced into the Arctic Circle. So in the scenario that we composed during the performance, little Eskimos, in the first act, were doing the latest steps on the ice floes. In the second act there was a chilly idyl, interrupted apparently by bombs from a Zeppelin. The last act brought a barbaric feast of the Volsungs. We're sorry if this is wrong, but without something of the sort the work would hardly hold the attention for three-quarters of an hour. On the whole, we feel that Mr. Bax's muse thrives better in the Irish climate.

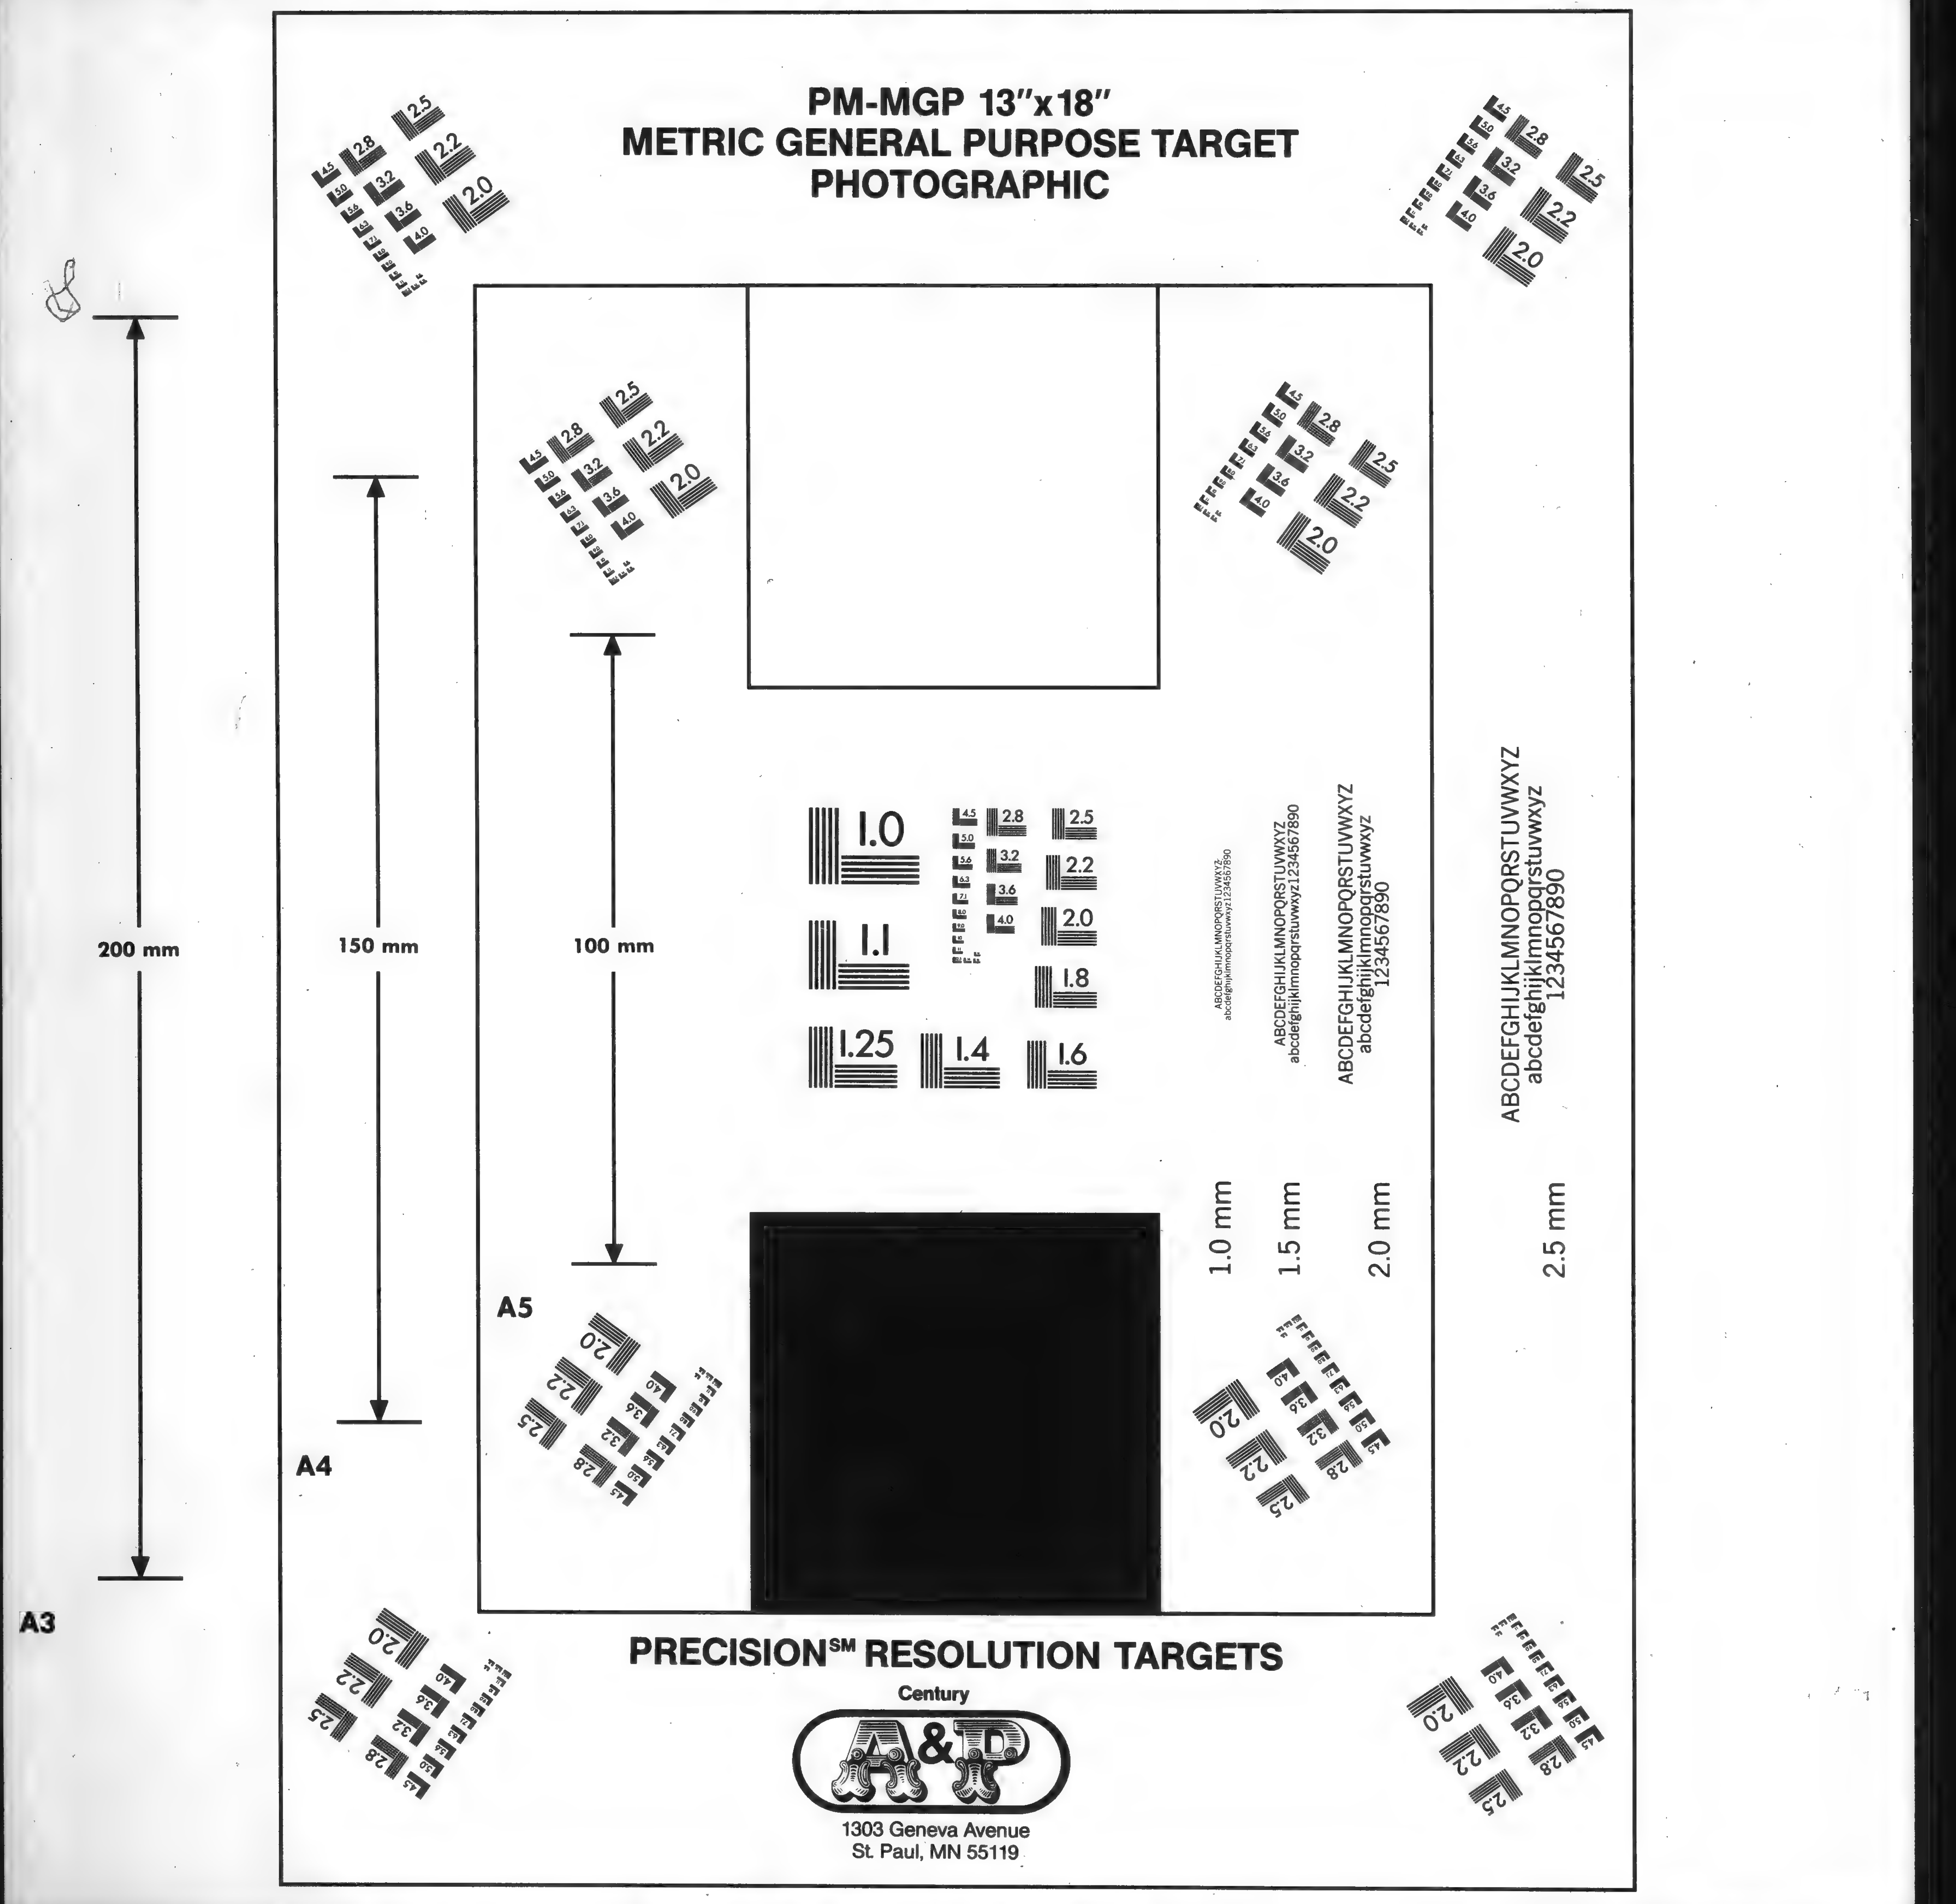
Dr. Koussevitzky completed a shivery program with a thrilling account of the First—and least characteristic—Symphony of Sibelius; but his kettledrums were a little too loud in the last movement. The concert began, on Armistice Day, with a performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner," with orchestra and audience standing. The other item was a very Haydnesque symphony by Haydn for string orchestra—No. 17, in F major—beautifully played.

L. A. S.

2

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
A5
A4
A3

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Hfd. Times, Nov. 10, 1932.

Boston Symphony To Open Season With Unusual Concert Program

"Tapiola," Sibelius Tone Poem, and Other Notable Works; Koussevitzky Conducts.

"Tapiola," the most recent, and in the opinion of many critics, the most impressive of the tone poems of Jan Sibelius, is included in the program which the Boston Symphony orchestra will play at the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall Wednesday evening, November 16. This program, which will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is the first event of the Bushnell concert series of the current season.

The symphony which Dr. Koussevitzky will play on this program is the famous work in D minor by Cesar Franck. The overture to Weber's "Oberon" will open the program, while the fourth item is the prelude to Richard Wagner's grand opera, "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

"Tapiola," which has just been revived with great success by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston, is a nature piece. It has been described as follows in the program note:

"The title comes from Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology. The dark grandeur of the Finnish forests which are noted for their beauty gave the famous composer his inspiration. The following verse is at the head of this score:

"Wide-spread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests,
Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
With them dwells the forest's mighty god
And wood sprites in the gloom weave magic secrets."

"Sibelius develops his tone poem on a characteristic short phrase which is repeated many times with shifting instrumental colors. It develops to a tremendous climax which is finally reached by a swift chromatic passage for the strings, which lasts for thirty-seven bars and reaches an unbelievable degree of intensity.

"The Finnish composer dedicated 'Tapiola' to Walter Damrosch, and it was first played by this composer in New York in 1926. The piece has not since been heard in America, but has frequently been performed and greatly admired in Europe, particularly in England."

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Nov 11

Pro Bono Publico

A DEFINITE and continuing scheme is announced from Symphony Hall for the programs at the Tuesday matinées of the Symphony Orchestra. There will be six concerts in all, beginning on Nov. 22, proceeding through Jan. 3, Feb. 7, March 7 and 28, to April 18. As nearly as possible the programs will be arranged "in historical sequence." Concert by concert and item by item, they will unfold "the evolution of symphonic music" as exemplified by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Brahms, Chaikovsky, Strauss, Debussy and Stravinsky. Here opens opportunity for those who prefer the musical past to the musical present; for those who would be informed as well as pleasured at symphony concerts; for those who would have concerts now and again "educational"—"for the young people of course." If all three groups live up to their habitual professions, in "letters to the editor" as well as in talk, there will be lines at the box-office.

Ourselves and Others

Trans Nov 11

How to Play Sibelius

A Word from Ernest Newman to Mark the Beginning of Dr. Koussevitzky's Symphonic Cycle

SIBELIUS, I repeat, must be played in terms of himself. He is hard, strong, unaccommodating; at times harsh, at others savage, at others elemental; a voice, it would almost seem, from a wilder and severer world that belongs almost to the pre-historic past. There are things in the slow movement of this Second Symphony to which there is nothing corresponding in the actual experience of the ordinary European of today. Above all, Sibelius is never sentimental, never self-conscious or self-approving. It appears to me, therefore, to be fundamentally wrong to lard his melodies with effects that are the direct product of the self-consciousness, the self-approbation, and the sentimentality that crept into music about the beginning of the nineteenth century.

Some music is improved by being handled in this way; but to apply these and similar airs and graces to music like that of Sibelius is, in my opinion, to deface it. You do not improve the granite front of a great stark building by tieing pretty ribbons to the columns of it. You do not bring out the real quality of a magnificent nor'-easter by sending whiffs of attar of roses down it.

[The Sunday Times, London

Symphony Plays Songs of North

Trans Nov 12

Two songs of the north: the one, "Winter Legends," concerto by Arnold Bax, played for the first time in this country, with Miss Harriet Cohen at the piano; the other, the magnificent first symphony of Sibelius, constituted the main parts of the Boston Symphony concert under Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon.

Fittingly enough, the concert opened in holiday spirit, with the orchestra and audience rising for the national anthem. And to this mood was added an atmosphere of intimacy as the platform was stripped of all save the strings and two French horns, for a bright, spirited reading of Haydn's symphony No. 17.

Of far greater proportions than a piano-concerto in the ordinary sense of the word, the Bax work, in three movements, assumed the proportions of a symphony. Boldly, frankly heroic in conception, though perhaps superficial, it communicated in forceful detail a saga of primitive strife, and the brutal elements of a northern scene.

To many it must have seemed ludicrous that the solo part for such a music should be played by a slim, beautiful girl, dressed in a flowing green gown, her black hair pulled straight back over her face. But Miss Cohen, English pianist to whom the work is dedicated, played broadly, firmly, dramatically, with a perfect insight into the true conception of the piece.

Quite in contrast, the Sibelius symphony struck a different—and more sincere—note. The plaintive song of the clarinet, the harsh cries of the brass, the agitated shrieks of the strings, the ominous roll of the drums suggested not a legendary past, but a living present, amid desolate, melancholy moorlands and forests. At the conclusion to the symphony, orchestra and conductor were accorded a stirring ovation.

H. C. C.

Boston Symphony

Mon. Nov 12

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

"Winter Legends," Symphonie Concertante for pianoforte and orchestra, by Arnold Bax, was the central piece on the fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season (Nov. 11-12). The Friday afternoon performance was the first in the United States. The soloist was Miss Harriet Cohen, who performed a similar service to the composer at the original production of the work in London last winter. Miss Cohen, who was heard for the first time in Boston on the present occasion, had an immediate success.

Mr. Bax has let it be known, somewhat reluctantly, that this work is associated with the Far North. Certainly it employs liberally those shimmering timbres and acrid chords by which the modern master of the orchestra may evoke vast ice fields and the glare of sun on snow. But listening to it, we wondered if the music had not been composed for an opera, or, better, for a ballet. The facture is episodic, rather than organic in the symphonic sense. The material is undistinguished and its treatment not arresting. There are moments of beauty, especially in the slow movement, but the chief interest is rhythmic. The score indeed seems to suggest that jazz rhythms have been introduced into the Arctic Circle. So in the scenario that we composed during the performance, little Eskimos, in the first act, were doing the latest steps on the ice floes. In the second act there was a chilly idyl, interrupted apparently by bombs from a Zeppelin. The last act brought a barbaric feast of the Volsungs. We're sorry if this is wrong, but without something of the sort the work would hardly hold the attention for three-quarters of an hour. On the whole, we feel that Mr. Bax's muse thrives better in the Irish climate.

Dr. Koussevitzky completed a shivery program with a thrilling account of the First—and least characteristic—Symphony of Sibelius; but his kettledrums were a little too loud in the last movement. The concert began, on Armistice Day, with a performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner," with orchestra and audience standing. The other item was a very Haydnesque symphony by Haydn for string orchestra—No. 17, in F major—beautifully played.

L. A. S.

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS ADDED GLORY

Hfd. Times 11-17-32

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Capably Interprets Popular Compositions.

SIBELIUS WORK FEATURED

Franck "Symphony" Earns Greatest Approbation—Genius of Leader Disclosed.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky inaugurated the Bushnell symphonic series at the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall last evening before a large and enthusiastic gathering of music lovers. All present joined in a spontaneous ovation to both Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians. The following program was offered.

Overture to Oberon ...... Von Weber
Symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck
Tapiola, tone poem .... Sibelius
Prelude to "Meistersingers"...Wagner

Except for the Sibelius work, the entire program was familiar to local concert goers. Tapiola will be given at New York concerts by the Bostonians this evening and Saturday afternoon, when Dr. Kousevitzky will present an all-Sibelius program.

Greatest approbation was given presentation of the Franck symphony. This, work last given here nearly two years ago by Leopold Stokowski and his Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, seemed to lend what was perhaps the greatest air of distinction to the program, and those present were quick to note the different phases of interpretation disclosed by Dr. Koussivitzky from those showed by his distinguished Philidelphia contemporary. Dr. Koussevitzky, the super-showman, and Stokowski, the zeolous dramatist, have both given Hartford noble conceptions of this symphony, utterly different in their content, yet both virile and musical episodes of surpassing interest.

From the opening measure of "Oberon" the dynamic leader gave a vividness of contrasts which betokened a unique, yet satisfactory performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky made a popular gesture when he chose the Franck "Symphony" for a place on his program. Dr. Koussevitzky, pictured contracts which at mes bordered even on the sensation-l, yet always with the musical vision which has lifted the Boston orchestra into the realm of the unusual. The opening "Lento-Allegro non Troppo" was a proper preliminary for he good things which were to folow. The opening theme, splendidly hrased, was given with almost hyptic genius for interpretation always ticeable in Dr. Koussevitzky's work. e balance of the orchestra was a ng of great interest, and the varichoirs were brought together into armonious body of musicians una leadership of great brilliancy.

Koussevitzky Orchestra In Finest Form

Hfd. Courant 11-17-32

Familiar Three-Quarters of Program Given New Values—Sibelius Tone-Poem Pleases

BY WALTER BROWN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—in first of the season's concerts of Bushnell Hall Course, Wednesday, November 16, 1932. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Program

Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Symphony in D minor .... Franck
Symphonic Poem, "Tapiola" ...... Sibelius
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner

Dr. Koussevitzky offered a program at Bushnell Memorial Hall Wednesday evening that was three-quarters familiar music with a new Sibelius tone-poem added for good measure—and played the whole list as if it were new, beautifully, zestfully, appreciatively in every measure; and the huge audience that welcomed him and the orchestra gave every evidence of the most entire satisfaction with the whole concert, as well it might.

The Franck symphony is, of course, one of the most well known of them all—as it is one of the most popular in the best sense of the word. Last season it was selected by vote of the home audiences of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra as "the" most popular of the whole symphonic list as represented in the orchestra's comprehensive programs for the year; and it is always heard with delight when it is given adequate reading—and what a virile, intense and tremendously interesting reading Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work at his Wednesday concert!

The symphony shows Cesar Franck not only as a master of melody, alive to every possibility of tonal beauties in the themes he chooses to use, but it shows, too, the spiritual qualities of the man in what seems to many listeners, a degree unusual, in a light illumining as in technical skill undoubted. And the playing of the work was unusually effective, certainly to many listeners, in the power, the virility of its beauties were sometimes only the suavity, the sweetness of them obtains. Those first measures are blessing-spreading in their loveliness, and in the playing Wednesday evening there was the wonder of light playing through some of the dark tones of sadness in the succeeding passages. There was no loss of value in this interpretation of the work, certainly, but there was a freedom, a sense of getting away from the academic that charmed and delighted—and though the audience doubtless recognized the orchestra's custom of playing the whole work without interruption, save a momentary pause there was absolutely spontaneous applause following the first movement's brilliant climax.

The loveliness of the Alle were played in exquisit ully a and the continuing a band of ness in the work cord, could be of the brilliar them. The heartment wa applause brought Dr. mastersky several times back to

---

12, 1932 Nov. Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The 14th anniversary of the signing of the Armistice which ended fighting in the World War on Nov 11, 1918, was observed at the fifth Symphony concert of the season yesterday afternoon. Dr Koussevitzky bade players and audience rise while "The Star Spangled Banner" was played.

The new music on the program was Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends," a "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra. Harriet Cohen, distinguished English pianist renowned for her interpretations of Bax and playing of Bach, was soloist. This work is dedicated to her, and was yesterday played for the first time in the United States.

"Winter Legends" was first performed in London in February of this year, with Miss Cohen as soloist. Bax has not offered any motto or any program for his work. By virtue of its title, style, and content, however, the music may likely enough represent some sequence of events, some fanciful tale, or a general impression in the mind of the composer. One might safely hazard a guess that Bax' mind was upon the verdure and the hills of Ireland when he wrote it.

Written in three movements, an allegro, a lento molto expressivo, and a molto moderato, "Winter Legends" is musing, wandering in style, and a curious blend of sounding fury and gentle introspection. Its occasional lack of continuity gives it the aspect of an orchestral improvisation.

If Bax had a definite program in mind, why did he not nail it to the masthead of his piece? It is not so much the fact of being programmatic that has won opprobrium for some music as the fact that the music itself is dull. After all, no one cares particularly whether Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," for example, tells us all about the unpleasant habits and demise of a rogue; what counts most is the distinction and vitality of the music per se. If Bax had some Celtic scene or tale in mind, why did he not make it known? The ultimate evaluation of "Winter Legends" will depend wholly upon the value of the musical matter.

At first hearing, the work is not pregnant with salient ideas, nor is it concise and to the point. Its greatest merit lies in the frail harmonic and melodic beauty of the slow movement, and in the stimulating rhythmic complexity of the finale. The instrumentation is uneven in quality, often being thick and blatant. The piano part is seemingly as intricate as the orchestral portions, and obviously requires no little physical strength to play. Many chords are massive, and numerous indeed must be the double and triple f's in the score.

Miss Cohen, playing for the first time in Boston, produced uncommon sonority. But her most enjoyable work occurred in the slow movement, where a felicitous touch enhanced Bax' gentle dreaming. The audience recalled her to the stage again and again. One would welcome opportunity of hearing her in recital, when the variety of her talents could better be revealed.

Dr Koussevitzky played Sibelius' First Symphony, in E minor, beginning the cycle of the Finnish master's works which will enrich Boston Symphony programs of the present season. The end and climax of the series will be the first performance anywhere of the new Eighth Symphony.

One could wish to be alive 100 years from now to observe in what esteem

---

Post

DAY, NOVEMBER 12,

DIVERTING PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Haydn and Sibelius for Ripeness and Bax for Recent

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In honor of Armistice Day the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon began with the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," the orchestra—save for the gentlemen of the violincellos—and the audience standing. Symphonies by Haydn, Arnold Bax and Sibelius followed.

BAX'S "LEGENDS"

This far this season, Dr. Koussevitzky has not been especially fortunate in his novelties, if exception may be made in the case of Sibelius' gloomily impressive "Tapiola" of a week ago. Bax's Symphonie Concertante for pianoforte and orchestra, titled, "Winter Legends," is, like Carpenter's "Patterns," and the suite from Prokofieff's "The Gambler," the work of a well-equipped composer who had nothing memorable to say at the time of writing.

"Winter Legends" is also the work of an incurable romanticist in music, and romanticism for the moment is not in fashion. This Symphonie Concertante makes a brave sound. There are pleasing passages, especially towards the close of both the middle and the final movements; there is richness of harmonic and orchestral treatment. But there is also a dearth of salient thematic invention and the music as a whole gives the impression that the composer had a programme in mind which, had it been divulged, might have given certain passages a significance that intrinsically they lack.

Miss Cohen at Piano

The piano-part, in this case little more than another, although highly important orchestral voice, was entrusted to the capable hands of Miss Harriet Cohen, personable English pianist, much admired in her own tensity.

"The Finnish composer dedicated 'Tapiola' to Walter Damrosch, and it was first played by this composer in New York in 1926. The piece has not since been heard in America, but has frequently been performed and greatly admired in Europe, particularly in England."

BOSTON SYMPHON WINS ADDED GLORY

Hfd. Times 11-17-32

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Capably Interprets Popular Compositions.

SIBELIUS WORK FEATURED

Franck "Symphony" Earns Greatest Approbation—Genius of Leader Disclosed.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky inaugurated the Bushnell symphonic series at the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall last evening before a large and enthusiastic gathering of music lovers. All present joined in a spontaneous ovation to both Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians. The following program was offered.

Overture to Oberon ...... Von Weber
Symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck
Tapiola, tone poem .... Sibelius
Prelude to "Meistersingers"...Wagner

Except for the Sibelius work, the entire program was familiar to local concert goers. Tapiola will be given at New York concerts by the Bostonians this evening and Saturday afternoon, when Dr. Kousevitzky will present an all-Sibelius program.

Greatest approbation was given presentation of the Franck symphony. This, work last given here nearly two years ago by Leopold Stokowski and his Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, seemed to lend what was perhaps the greatest air of distinction to the program, and those present were quck to note the different phases of interpretation disclosed by Dr. Kousivitzky from those showed by his distinguished Philidelphia contemporary. Dr. Koussevitzky, the super-showman, and Stokowski, the zeolous dramatist, have both given Hartford noble conceptions of this symphony, utterly different in their content, yet both virile and musical episodes of surpassing interest.

From the opening measure of "Oberon" the dynamic leader gave a vividness of contrasts which betokened a unique, yet satisfactory performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky made a popular gesture when he chose the Franck "Symphony" for a place on his program. Dr. Koussevitzky, always a ...ist, pictured contracts which at ...mes bordered even on the sensation...l, yet always with the musical vis...on which has lifted the Boston or...chestra into the realm of the unusual.

The opening "Lento-Allegro non Troppo" was a proper preliminary for ...he good things which were to fol...ow. The opening theme, splendidly ...hrased, was given with almost hyp...otic genius for interpretation always ...ticeable in Dr. Koussevitzky's work. ...e balance of the orchestra was a ...ng of great interest, and the vari... choirs were brought together into ...armonious body of musicians un... a leadership of great brilliancy. ...n the "Allegretto," the spell of Dr. ...ussevitzky's baton was manifest, ...d the pastel shades of the various ...ods were brought forth with de...ion and sympathetic understand...

...he concluding "Allegro" was pic...d with brilliancy and the climax ... impressive.

...e tone poem "Tapiola" was the ... novelty and the genius of the ...uctor left the proper impression. ...cately interwoven themes, with ...al phrases of hidden import, ...ed in giving a descriptive read... the composition. There was ... and delicacy, yet authority and ...iveness. As an interpreter of ...us, Dr. Koussevitzky has no su...s.

... familiar "Meistersinger" pre... was given with refreshing zest ...ramatic climaxes. The orches...semble was most satisfying. ...next concert in this series will ... December 7, when Ossip Ga...sch will bring the Detroit ...y orchestra here for its sec...pearance.

Koussevitzky Orchestra In Finest Form

Hfd. Courant 11-17-32

Familiar Three-Quarters of Program Given New Values—Sibelius Tone-Poem Pleases

BY WALTER BROWN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—in first of the season's concerts of Bushnell Hall Course, Wednesday, November 16, 1932. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Program

Overture to "Oberon" ....Weber
Symphony in D minor ....Franck
Symphonic Poem, "Tapiola" ......Sibelius
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" ....Wagner

Dr. Koussevitzky offered a program at Bushnell Memorial Hall Wednesday evening that was three-quarters familiar music with a new Sibelius tone-poem added for good measure—and played the whole list as if it were new, beautifully, zestfully, appreciatively in every measure; and the huge audience that welcomed him and the orchestra gave every evidence of the most entire satisfaction with the whole concert, as well it might.

The Franck symphony is, of course, one of the most well known of them all—as it is one of the most popular in the best sense of the word. Last season it was selected by vote of the home audiences of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra as "the" most popular of the whole symphonic list as represented in the orchestra's comprehensive programs for the year; and it is always heard with delight when it is given adequate reading—and what a virile, intense and tremendously interesting reading Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work at his Wednesday concert!

The symphony shows Cesar Franck not only as a master of melody, alive to every possibility of tonal beauties in the themes he chooses to use, but it shows, too, the spiritual qualities of the man in what seems to many listeners, a degree unusual, in a light illuminating as in technical skill undoubted. And the playing of the work was unusually effective, certainly to many listeners, in the power, the virility of its beauties were sometimes only the suavity, the sweetness of them obtains. Those first measures are blessing-spreading in their loveliness, and in the playing Wednesday evening there was the wonder of light playing through some of the dark tones of sadness in the succeeding passages. There was no loss of value in this interpretation of the work, certainly, but there was a freedom, a sense of getting away from the academic that charmed and delighted—and though the audience doubtless recognized the orchestra's custom of playing the whole work without interruption, save a momentary pause there was absolutely spontaneous applause following the first movement's brilliant climax.

The loveliness of the Allegretto were played in exquisite delicacy and the continuing sense of newness in the work; and the piling up of the brilliances of the final movement was accomplished as only a master-interpreter, with a band of artists in perfect accord, could be expected to show them. The heartiest possible applause brought Dr. Koussevitsky several times back to the stage and the orchestra, of course, was called on to rise knowledging the audience's approval.

The opening and the closing overtures were played as brilliantly as was the symphony, and in each there was the feeling of the most wonderful care and attention to every detail of melody, of single phrase, of massive climax. The Weber work is less essentially dramatic than Wagner's and so did not leave one with the feeling that necessarily the curtain must rise on the opera at the overture's close, but it shone in beauty throughout; and Wagner's stirring measures seemed possessed of the quality of eternal youth and freshness as they sounded.

The Sibelius work came brand new to the audience and was heard with the closest attention and interest. That it made an admirable first impression is undoubted, but that many felt that some further familiarity with its content might add to its values is also undoubtedly true. The pictures in tone of the Norse forests—granting program effects to the music, though these may not have been primarily in the composer's thought—are weird and strange; strange rhythms beat their way into the hearers' consciousness, strange harmonies float, strange forces strike. There are breakings-off in musical sequences unusual even in other works of Sibelius; there is an absolutely hair-raising crescendo of stormy strings to a climax almost overwhelming in volume of tone; there are some of the very loveliest of all Sibelius harmonies that follow this whirlwind's effect, and the three chords that sing the poem's close are exquisite

In the reading here, again, was the feeling of the splendid freedom that the interpreter of the music could give himself in seeking the effects he wanted from his artists. The playing even in the few passages where it seemed as if the composer's thoughts were being given what might be termed routine expression—the playing in all the work was on a par with that in all the familiar program numbers accompanying the new work here. And higher praise is unnecessary.

12, 1932 Nov. Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The 14th anniversary of the signing of the Armistice which ended fighting in the World War on Nov 11, 1918, was observed at the fifth Symphony concert of the season yesterday afterno r Dr Koussevitzky bade players and audience rise while "The Star Spangled Banner" was played.

The new music on the program was Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends," a "Symphonie Concertante" for piano and orchestra. Harriet Cohen, distinguished English pianist renowned for her interpretations of Bax and playing of Bach, was soloist. This work is dedicated to her, and was yesterday played for the first time in the United States.

"Winter Legends" was first performed in London in February of this year, with Miss Cohen as soloist. Bax has not offered any motto or any program for his work. By virtue of its title, style, and content, however, the music may likely enough represent some sequence of events, some fanciful tale, or a general impression in the mind of the composer. One might safely hazard a guess that Bax' mind was upon the verdure and the hills of Ireland when he wrote it.

Written in three movements, an allegro, a lento molto expressivo, and a molto moderato, "Winter Legends" is musing, wandering in style, and a curious blend of sounding fury and gentle introspection. Its occasional lack of continuity gives it the aspect of an orchestral improvisation.

If Bax had a definite program in mind, why did he not nail it to the masthead of his piece? It is not so much the fact of being programmatic that has won opprobrium for some music as the fact that the music itself is dull. After all, no one cares particularly whether Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," for example, tells us all about the unpleasant habits and demise of a rogue; what counts most is the distinction and vitality of the music per se. If Bax had some Celtic scene or tale in mind, why did he not make it known? The ultimate evaluation of "Winter Legends" will depend wholly upon the value of the musical matter.

At first hearing, the work is not pregnant with salient ideas, nor is it concise and to the point. Its greatest merit lies in the frail harmonic and melodic beauty of the slow movement, and in the stimulating rhythmic complexity of the finale. The instrumentation is uneven in quality, often being thick and blatant. The piano part is seemingly as intricate as the orchestral portions, and obviously requires no little physical strength to play. Many chords are massive, and numerous indeed must be the double and triple f's in the score.

Miss Cohen, playing for the first time in Boston, produced uncommon sonority. But her most enjoyable work occurred in the slow movement, where a felicitous touch enhanced Bax' gentle dreaming. The audience recalled her to the stage again and again. One would welcome opportunity of hearing her in recital, when the variety of her talents could better be revealed.

Dr Koussevitzky played Sibelius' First Symphony, in E minor, beginning the cycle of the Finnish master's works which will enrich Boston Symphony programs of the present season. The end and climax of the series will be the first performance anywhere of the new Eighth Symphony.

One could wish to be alive 100 years from now to observe in what esteem Sibelius will then be regarded. One has a secret conviction that he will by that time have emerged from the background into which the blatancies and tricksy stunts of the Hindemiths, Schoenbergs, Ravels and latter-day Stravinskys have thrust him.

What other contemporary composer whose work figures upon present day programs has so completely disregarded the cacophony, the rhythmical trickery and other devices that constitute the small change of contemporary composition? Who can better Sibelius in emotional force? And who can equal him in breadth of thought and depth of feeling?

His first symphony is derivative and not representative of him in maturity. But for all its Tchaikovskian echoes and for all its occasional groping, this work is an edifice of strength that towers over the puny structures of most of his contemporaries.

Dr Koussevitzky played the work brilliantly, with his customary intensity and splendor. The other item upon the program was Haydn's 17th Symphony, in F major, an ingratiating if somewhat monotonous work. It was agreeably played.

The orchestra will play in New York next week. The next regular concerts here will take place on Nov 25 and 26. Florent Schmitt will appear as piano soloist in his new "Symphonie Concertante."

C. W. D.

---

gown, her black hair ... back over her face. But Miss Cohen, English pianist to whom the work is dedicated, played broadly, firmly, dramatically, with a perfect insight into the true conception of the piece.

Quite in contrast, the Sibelius symphony struck a different—and more sincere—note. The plaintive song of the clarinet, the harsh cries of the brass, the agitated shrieks of the strings, the ominous roll of the drums suggested not a legendary past, but a living present, amid desolate, melancholy moorlands and forests. At the conclusion to the symphony, orchestra and conductor were accorded a stirring ovation.

H. C. C.

Post

DAY, NOVEMBER 12,

DIVERTING PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Haydn and Sibelius for Ripeness and Bax for Recent

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In honor of Armistice Day the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon began with the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," the orchestra—save for the gentlemen of the violincellos—and the audience standing. Symphonies by Haydn, Arnold Bax and Sibelius followed.

BAX'S "LEGENDS"

This far this season, Dr. Koussevitzky has not been especially fortunate in his novelties, if exception may be made in the case of Sibelius' gloomily impressive "Tapiola" of a week ago. Bax's Symphonie Concertante for pianoforte and orchestra, titled, "Winter Legends," is, like Carpenter's "Patterns," and the suite from Prokofieff's "The Gambler," the work of a well-equipped composer who had nothing memorable to say at the time of writing.

"Winter Legends" is also the work of an incurable romanticist in music, and romanticism for the moment is not in fashion. This Symphonie Concertante makes a brave sound. There are pleasing pages, especially towards the close of both the middle and the final movements; there is richness of harmonic and orchestral treatment. But there is also a dearth of salient thematic invention and the music as a whole gives the impression that the composer had a programme in mind which, had it been divulged, might have given certain passages a significance that intrinsically they lack.

Miss Cohen at Piano

The piano-part, in this case little more than another, although highly important orchestral voice, was entrusted to the capable hands of Miss Harriet Cohen, personable English pianist, much admired in her own country and making her first appearance in this city. The audience preferred to look upon her as a soloist in the ordinary sense and recalled her to the platform many times. Graciously and appropriately, she brought Dr. Koussevitzky to share in the plaudits.

It was not an altogether happy stroke of programme-making which placed the bardic First Symphony of Sibelius after the "Winter Legends" of Bax with its presumably Northern flavor. But, intending to play all of Sibelius' symphonies, this season, Dr. Koussevitzky is evidently anxious to get on with them; the Second follows at the next pair of concerts.

Sibelius' Early Work

In this First Symphony, Sibelius alternately goes his own way and remembers the ways of others. No more is it the work of the matured and ripened, highly individual composer of the Fourth Symphony, than the Strauss of "Don Juan" is the Strauss of the "Symphonia Domestica." But this Symphony, like that tone-poem, is the work of a composer who, finding that he has a voice of his own, flings his challenge to the world. For all its contradictions of style it will delight audiences for long years to come. That of yesterday received it warmly.

The Symphony of Haydn, buried under the tonal avalanche which followed, is an early one, No. 17, scored only for strings. The Allegro and Andante are not important. The gay Finale hints of the true Haydn. Nevertheless, Dr. Koussevitzky bestowed the same pains upon the piece that he did upon those of Bax and Sibelius.

---

in London last winter. Miss Cohen, who was heard for the first time in Boston on the present occasion, had an immediate success.

Mr. Bax has let it be known, somewhat reluctantly, that this work is associated with the Far North. Certainly it employs liberally those shimmering timbres and acrid chords by which the modern master of the orchestra may evoke vast ice fields and the glare of sun on snow. But listening to it, we wondered if the music had not been composed for an opera, or, better, for a ballet. The facture is episodic, rather than organic in the symphonic sense. The material is undistinguished and its treatment not arresting. There are moments of beauty, especially in the slow movement, but the chief interest is rhythmic. The score indeed seems to suggest that jazz rhythms have been introduced into the Arctic Circle. So in the scenario that we composed during the performance, little Eskimos, in the first act, were doing the latest steps on the ice floes. In the second act there was a chilly idyl, interrupted apparently by bombs from a Zeppelin. The last act brought a barbaric feast of the Volsungs. We're sorry if this is wrong, but without something of the sort the work would hardly hold the attention for three-quarters of an hour. On the whole, we feel that Mr. Bax's muse thrives better in the Irish climate.

Dr. Koussevitzky completed a shivery program with a thrilling account of the First—and least characteristic—Symphony of Sibelius; but his kettledrums were a little too loud in the last movement. The concert began, on Armistice Day, with a performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner," with orchestra and audience standing. The other item was a very Haydnesque symphony by Haydn for string orchestra—No. 17, in F major—beautifully played.

L. A. S.

2

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1932

Music and Musicians --- Plays and Players ---

News Gathered In a Round of Concert-Halls

Bax, Large, New and Northern, Introduced by Miss Cohen, Programs in Prospect

THE new work to be played at this week's Symphony Concerts is one of major proportions — Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends," for piano and orchestra. With it, to play the piano-part, comes Harriet Cohen, chief apostle of the gospel of Bak, in her own right concert-pianist of high rank. To date, "Winter Legends" has had only one performance, by the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation at Queen's Hall in London on Feb. 10, 1932. Miss Cohen was the pianist, Adrian Boult, the conductor.

Interviewed at Symphony Hall the other day, Miss Cohen's first remark about "Winter Legends" was: "It is not really a concerto at all. It is much larger. It is more like a symphony with a solo-voice." All of which Bax intended to convey when he labelled the piece "Sinfonia Concertante for Piano and Orchestra." In the note that he wrote for the program-book of the B. B. C., he began with the same thought: "This work, which is designed in three movements and on a symphonic scale, makes no pretence of being a piano-concerto in the ordinary sense. The piano is not used as a means of technical display, though it plays a difficult part." The writer can bear witness. Miss Cohen played significant portions for him. They are difficult, to the point of cruelty, for the pianist. Many a "virtuoso-concerto" does not contain their equal. The explanation, of course, is that Mr. Bax himself is a remarkably fluent pianist for whom difficulties scarcely exist.

To return to his program note: 'Neither has the piece any communicable program." (Note the qualifying adjective). The listener may associate what he hears with any heroic tale or tales of the North—of the far North, be it said. Some of these happenings may have taken place within the Arctic circle.

Legends that once were told or sung
In many a smoky fireside nook
Of Iceland, in the ancient day
By wandering Saga-man or Scald.

There is nothing consciously Celtic about this work."

Miss Cohen herself, going over the score, was good enough to paint graphic word-pictures of Northern scenes which, she believed, "Winter Legends" might suggest. During the conversation the name of Sibelius was frequently mentioned. Miss Cohen and Mr. Bax, it appeared, had visited him last summer. She had received from him new piano-pieces that she will soon play in New York. Bax and Sibelius, she affirmed, were both "poets of the North"—Bax in "Winter Legends" and some of his Celtic pieces; Sibelius in many a well-known work. Often, she contended, they proceed from similar points of view; utilize a similar approach. It was coincidence that on this program for the Symphony Concert Bax's "Winter Legends" and Sibelius's First Symphony stood side by side.

"Winter Legends," then, is a "cyclic" composition. Two "ideas" presented in the introduction are developed in all three movements. The first, originally heard as a "rhythmic tattoo" on a side-drum, presently blossoms into a broadly syncopated subject in rich chords. Much reference is made to it throughout the work. The second "idea," in ascending intervals so weird that Miss Cohen dubs it the "creeping motif," occurs immediately after the drum-tattoo, uprushing in a "kind of whirlwind on the piano." On the heights broadens out into a few measures of expansive subject. Then follows the syncopated version of the drum-rhythms. Next the first movement proper begins with a strongly rhythmed theme, "incisive, brutal." A second theme, more lyrical but also full of syncopations, is harmonized with arresting dissonances—dissonances "that people cannot fail to like." To Miss Cohen they suggest sunrise over the glittering snow and ice.

After development "a new melody is interpolated in the form of a duet for English horn and piano," after which the main theme reappears in a more romantic and tender mood than it has hitherto worn. This dream fades, and the development proper ensues. The progress does not follow sonata form. Rather, the movement may be described as an assembling and fusing of various elements for the making of a great climax. At this point the climactic upbuilding begins. The close is a triumphant and glittering version of the expansive theme at the end of the up-rushing "creeping motif" of the introduction.

To Miss Cohen the first movement suggests the glaring Northern day, the second and the third, different aspects of the dark, Northern night. The second "movement is, generally speaking, darker in color than the first, though the conclusion is serene enough. . . . The first subject is given to the piano and the earlier part of the movement may suggest a kind of dialogue between piano and orchestra." This piano-melody is almost Chopinesque in style. Curious grace-notes, leading up to certain notes in the melody, the pianist jokingly (and the composer is "in" on the joke) refers to as "skids." The ear will judge this sliding approach as highly appropriate. Once more there is a "remote and shadowy" version of the drum-tattoo, syncopated motif of the introduction, which "serves as a bridge to the second division, introduced by a menacing surge of sound derived from the piano-whirlwind of the earlier movement." The ensuing music (Bax labels it "Threateningly" in the score) is set forth in a harsh and baleful light. It subsequently softens and warms until the mood is transfigured into something similar to the previous dream-episode. The hearer will note in both these movements the softening of the harder themes. May one suggest melting ice and snow? "A long climax is established (and with it the return of the darker elements), but it finally subsides toward another allusion to the syncopated theme of the introduction. The first melody returns, again in dialogue form, and the movement ends quietly.

"The third part opens with a tuba solo—a figure used frequently during the whole work and derived from the original uprush on the piano." This figure alternates with the other motif of the introduction, "invested again with all its pristine starkness." The principal subject of the finale enters in smashing chords, says Miss Cohen, "coarse chords, suggesting the brutality of Viking drunk with blood." another, "equally primitive in character," immediately follows. Eventually there are quieter episodes, lusciously songful, "Penguins going to sleep on the winter snow" Miss Cohen suggests. The development is short and leads to an epilogue, begun with a cadenza for piano. Based on the lyric element of the finale, it expands more and more into something "beautiful and erotic." According to Mr. Bax's program-note: "This conclusion may possibly suggest the return of the sun and warm airs from the South after the long Northern winter. The principal theme of the first movement reappears in a serene form, and the music ends in, as it were, a burst of light." Or, to shift the picture back to Miss Cohen's suggestions of Day and Night, a new sunrise completes the daily cycle. A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 25 and 26—next week the orchestra will be visiting New York—when Florent Schmitt, the many-sided French composer, will be guest:

Reves (Dreams)	Schmitt
Sinfonia Concertante for Piano and Orchestra (Pianist: The Composer)	Schmitt
Symphony, No. 2, in D major	Sibelius

From Mr. Orloff, the pianist, for his concert in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 19, by which unemployed musicians in Boston will profit:

Prelude and Fugue	Mendelssohn
Sonata in A-flat major	Beethoven
Gretchen am Spinnrade	Schubert-Liszt
Morgenstandchen	Schubert-Liszt
Sonata in C minor, Op. 58	Chopin
Mazurka	Szymanovsky
The Bumble Bee	Rimsky-Korsakov
Toccata	Prokofiev
Sonata, Op. 4	Skriabin

From Mr. Rakhmaninov, the pianist, for his concert of fantasia-pieces in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 29:

Sonata-Fantasia	Skriabin
Fantasia in C major	Haydn
Fantasy-Pieces, Op. 12	Schumann
Fantasia	Chopin
Sonata, in C-sharp minor, Quasi una Fantasia, Op. 27, No. 2	Beethoven
Fantasia Quasi Sonata ("After Reading in Dante")	Liszt

From Mr. Bauer, the pianist, for his concert in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Dec. 3:

Two Choral Preludes, "Now Comes the Saviour; Christians, Rejoice" (Transcribed by Busoni)	Bach
Variations in F minor	Haydn
Presto from the String Quartet in E-flat, Op. 33, No. 2 (Transcribed by Bauer)	Haydn
Sonata in A major	Mozart
Adagio from the Sonata in B-flat major, Op. 106 S	Beethoven
Polonaise in C minor—Study in A minor, Op. 25, No. 4—Study in C-sharp minor, Op. 10, No. 4	Chopin
Fantasia-Piece in A-flat major, Op. 111,	Schumann
Impromptu in F minor, Op. 142	Schubert
Ballad, Op. 10, No. 1—Caprice, Op. 76, No. 5	Brahms
La cathédrale engloutie—L'isle joyeuse	Debussy

Incidents and Prospects

On Friday evening, Nov. 18, the Stradivarius Quartet — Messrs Wolfinsohn, Pochon, Moldavan and Warburg—will begin another series of three chamber concerts in the court of the Fogg Museum at Harvard. The first program assembles a Quartet of Haydn in G major; the Second Quartet of Arnold Bax; Beethoven's Quartet in F minor, Op. 95. There is little need to recall these concerts to those who have frequented them in the past. The concert-room, the chosen pieces, the playing, all make them agreeable. As heretofore, "the public is cordially invited."

Mr. Dukelsky's Second Symphony, heard and liked at Symphony Hall two or three seasons ago, will be played by the Chicago Orchestra at its concerts of Nov. 17 and 18.

Prokofiev's new Concerto for Piano with Orchestra, to be heard in the course of the winter at the Symphony Concerts, was played for the first time anywhere at a Philharmonic Concert in Berlin on Oct. 31. Furtwängler was conductor; the composer, pianist.

Young Mr. Markevitch's "Rebus," announced for performance at Symphony Hall as concert-piece, or imaginary ballet, will be set on the stage of the Opera House at Monte Carlo next spring. Mr. Markevitch has lately handed to the Opéra at Paris a ballet, "The Flight of Icarus," to be mounted there next winter by Mr. Lifar.

"The Cast of Thought"

Harriet Cohen

Pianist at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday in Bax's "Winter Legends: Sinfonia Concertante for Piano and Orchestra"

Herald Nov. 11

Noted Pianist Attracts Brilliant Minds to Herself as Friends

Harriet Cohen Counts Shaw, Bax, Einstein Among Admirers

HERE AS SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

By ELIZABETH BORTON

Harriet Cohen, the English pianist, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon and tomorrow night, has, besides her gift to play the piano so well that she is considered the leading woman player of modern music in Europe today, the amazing ability to attract to herself as friends the most brilliant minds in all fields of intellectual and artistic endeavor. She counts among her closest friends Bernard Shaw, Arnold Bax, Somerset Maugham, Albert Einstein, Sir Henry Wood, Ramsay MacDonald, Jan Sibelius, Edward Elgar, and hosts of others—and many great ones since dead, Busoni, Lytton Strachey, Arnold Bennett—to mention a few. What is the secret of it? It must be something more than her own distinction in the field of music, and her extraordinary beauty.

Her looks may have much to do with it, though. There is a type of loveliness, unusual and as much a part of personality as a smile or a voice, which seems to be irresistible. Miss Cohen, with night-black hair and a transparently white skin, and light green eyes fringed round with black lashes, is striking, and she loses none of that arresting quality in the way she dresses.

"Arnold Bennett used [illegible]

(Copyright by Kay Vaughan)
HARRIET COHEN

scrap, because he set down on it the pipe he was teaching her to smoke this summer. She has a little travelling picture of Sibelius framed.

Always frantic. Always rushing. She rips into her fur coat, and smashes a small purple hat down over her eyes. "This hat is two years old but I love it because a perfect stranger of a lady gave it to me in New York. She said it looked like me. It does, really. See how hard it's trying to be a good hat, but here's a little thread hanging. That's me." She has a merry wink, and a gay laugh, which sounds almost constantly. "Oh, heaven, I [illegible]

Her. MUSIC NOTES Nov 3

Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed gloriously in Cincinnati. Mr. Leighton of the Inquirer found the evening a "perfect" one; "a surpassing program; a great conductor; a splendid ensemble." . . . Koussevitsky, the conductor, has made of his ensemble a body responsible to his slightest interpretive indication. He has within himself recreative faculties that place him among the Titans of orchestral leaders. He it was who selected the program and interpreted it. So by infallible reasoning the conclusion is reached that it is to Koussevitsky that first recognition for the perfect evening must be given. . . . We haven't the space to say all we would of the countless number of excellences in the presentations. The Boston orchestra is an instrument that seems never to have exhausted its tonal resources. No matter how hushed a pianissimo, there still is left a softer hush. No matter how grandiose the climax, if needed, there is a greater fortissimo in reserve. And the conductor plays on the instrument with a master's touch. With no semblance of personal display, but with what guidance two remarkable hands and a vibrant personality can give, he recreates wonderful music in a manner to prove all its wonder and beauty."

The program of the Symphony concerts on tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute." Prokofieff, suite, "Four Character Portraits from 'The Gambler'" (first time in the United States); sibelius, "Tapiola," symphonic poem (first time in Boston). Beethoven, Symphony, No. 7. The "Portraits" are those of characters in Dostoievsky's autobiographical novel, "The Gambler"—Alexis, the Grandmother, the General, Pauline. The opera from which the suite is derived was produced at the Monnaie, Brussels. "Tapiola" was written for Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Society of New York and first performed in New York late in December, 1926. The composer undertakes to interpret in music "the wild northern forest where dwell its god and his wood sprites."

Programs to Hand

Feb. [illegible]

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 13, marking to the day the fiftieth anniversary of Wagner's death. From his operas and chamber-music:

Overture to "Rienzi"
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde"
Siegfried's Trauermusik from "Götterdämmerung"
A Siegfried Idyll
Overture to "Tannhäuser"

From the singing lads of Vienna for their concerts in the Repertory Theater on Sunday and on Tuesday evenings, Feb. 12 and 14. For Sunday:

O Sacrum Convivium	Da Croce
Allelula, Laus et Gloria	Di Lasso
Domine Non Sum Dignus	Vittoria
Ascendit Deus	Gallus
Christmas Motet, "Silent Night"	Lechthaler
The Apothecary, Opera in One Act	Haydn
Jubilate	Burkhart
Schlaf mein Jesulein	Tyrolean Folk-song
Es Hat Sich Halt Eroeffnet	Tyrolean Folk-song
Waltz, "Blue Danube"	J. Strauss

For Tuesday:

Spinning Song from "The Flying Dutchman,"
Serenade	Wagner
Angel Trio	Schubert
Ascendit Deus	Mendelssohn
Schlafe, mein Prinzchen	Gallus
Bastien and Bastienne, Opera in One Act	Mozart
Psalm	Mozart
Jubilate	Schubert
Die Wanderer in der Saegemuehle,	Burkhart
	German Folk-song
Jaeger aus Kurpfalz	German Folk-song

From Messrs. Fray and Braggiotti for their concert of pieces for two pianos in Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 9:

Prelude	Friedemann Bach
Fugue in G minor	J. S. Bach
Liebestraum	Liszt
Coronation Scene from the Opera, "Boris Godunov"	Musorgsky
Fragments from the First Movement of the Concerto in C minor	Rakhmaninov
Clair de Lune—Fetes	Debussy
Pantomime and Fire-Dance from the Ballet, "Love the Sorcerer"	de Falla
Pavane and Bolero	Ravel
Variations on "Yankee Doodle" in the manners of Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, De-[illegible]	Braggiotti

It appears that "by request" at the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Gieseking will repeat Mozart's Concerto for piano in C major that he first played here six years ago. . . . In his concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 12, Mr. Whiteman will include Gershwin's "An American in Paris" and Grofe's "Grand Canyon." A third piece will introduce William Still, Negro composer as yet unknown to Boston.

Incidents and Prospects

In opera last November, Bostonians twice heard Mme. Jeritza. A month hence, she will come again—in concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 5. . . . For another familiar and welcome singer, Roland Hayes will return to Symphony Hall on the following Sunday, March 12.

The annual music-festival at Worcester will be transferred next autumn from its ancient seat in Mechanics Hall to the new Municipal Auditorium. . . . "The Monastery: Poem for Orchestra," new piece by Paul Allen, will be heard for the first time at the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra in Jordan Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 12.

Mme. Beata Malkin, the singer from the State Opera in Berlin who has settled in Boston, announces a concert of old airs, operatic pieces and songs for Thursday evening, Feb. 16, in Jordan Hall. She was assisting singer, last autumn, in a pair of Symphony Concerts.

37

Music and Musicians --- Plays and Players --- F

News Gathered In a Round of Concert-Halls

Bax, Large, New and Northern, Introduced by Miss Cohen, Programs in Prospect

THE new work to be played at this week's Symphony Concerts is one of major proportions — Arnold Bax's "Winter Legends," for piano and orchestra. With it, to play the piano-part, comes Harriet Cohen, chief apostle of the gospel of Bak, in her own right concert-pianist of high rank. To date, "Winter Legends" has had only one performance, by the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation at Queen's Hall in London on Feb. 10, 1932. Miss Cohen was the pianist, Adrian Boult, the conductor.

Interviewed at Symphony Hall the other day, Miss Cohen's first remark about "Winter Legends" was: "It is not really a concerto at all. It is much larger. It is more like a symphony with a solo-voice." All of which Bax intended to convey when he labelled the piece "Sinfonia Concertante for Piano and Orchestra." In the note that he wrote for the program-book of the B. B. C., he began with the same thought: "This work, which is designed in three movements and on a symphonic scale, makes no pretence of being a piano-concerto in the ordinary sense. The piano is not used as a means of technical display, though it plays a difficult part." The writer can bear witness. Miss Cohen played significant portions for him. They are difficult, to the point of cruelty, for the pianist. Many a "virtuoso-concerto" does not contain their equal. The explanation, of course, is that Mr. Bax himself is a remarkably fluent pianist for whom difficulties scarcely exist.

To return to his program note: 'Neither has the piece any communicable program." (Note the qualifying adjective). The listener may associate what he hears with any heroic tale or tales of the North—of the far North, be it said. Some of these happenings may have taken place within the Arctic circle.

> Legends that once were told or sung
> In many a smoky fireside nook
> Of Iceland, in the ancient day
> By wandering Saga-man or Scald.

There is nothing consciously Celtic about this work."

Miss Cohen herself, going over the score, was good enough to paint graphic word-pictures of Northern scenes which, she believed, "Winter Legends" might suggest. During the conversation the name of Sibelius was frequently mentioned. Miss Cohen and Mr. Bax, it appeared, had visited him last summer. She had received from him new piano-pieces that she will soon play in New York. Bax and Sibelius, she affirmed, were both "poets of the North"—Bax in "Winter Legends" and some of his Celtic pieces; Sibelius in many a well-known work. Often, she contended, they proceed from similar points of view; utilize a similar approach. It was coincidence that on this program for the Symphony Concert Bax's "Winter Legends" and Sibelius's First Symphony stood side by side.

"Winter Legends," then, is a "cyclic" composition. Two "ideas" presented in the introduction are developed in all three movements. The first, originally heard as a "rhythmic tattoo" on a side-drum, presently blossoms into a broadly syncopated subject in rich chords. Much reference is made to it throughout the work. The second "idea," in ascending intervals so weird that Miss Cohen dubs it the "creeping motif," occurs immediately after the drum-tattoo, uprushing in a "kind of whirlwind on the piano." On the heights broadens out into a few measures of expansive subject. Then follows the syncopated version of the drum-rhythms. Next the first movement proper begins with a strongly rhythmed theme, "incisive, brutal." A second theme, more lyrical but also full of syncopations, is harmonized with arresting dissonances—dissonances "that people cannot fail to like." To Miss Cohen they suggest sunrise over the glittering snow and ice.

After development "a new melody is interpolated in the form of a duet for English horn and piano," after which the main theme reappears in a more romantic and tender mood than it has hitherto worn. This dream fades, and the development proper ensues. The progress does not follow sonata form. Rather, the movement may be described as an assembling and fusing of various elements for the making of a great climax. At this point the climactic upbuilding begins. The close is a triumphant and glittering version of the expansive theme at the end of the up-rushing, "creeping motif" of the introduction.

To Miss Cohen the first movement suggests the glaring Northern day, the second and the third, different aspects of the dark, Northern night. The second "movement is, generally speaking, darker in color than the first, though the conclusion is serene enough. . . . The first subject is given to the piano and the earlier part of the movement may suggest a kind of dialogue between piano and orchestra." This piano-melody is almost Chopinesque in style. Curious grace-notes, leading up to certain notes in the melody, the pianist jokingly (and the composer is "in" on the joke) refers to as "skids." The ear will judge this sliding approach as highly appropriate. Once more there is a "remote and shadowy" version of the drum-tattoo, syncopated motif of the introduction, which "serves as a bridge to the second division, introduced by a menacing surge of sound derived from the piano-whirlwind of the earlier movement." The ensuing music (Bax labels it "Threateningly" in the score) is set forth in a harsh and baleful light. It subsequently softens and warms until the mood is transfigured into something similar to the previous dream-episode. The hearer will note in both these movements the softening of the harder themes. May one suggest melting ice and snow? "A long climax is established (and with it the return of the darker elements), but it finally subsides toward another allusion to the syncopated theme of the introduction. The first melody returns, again in dialogue form, and the movement ends quietly.

"The third part opens with a tuba solo —a figure used frequently during the whole work and derived from the original uprush on the piano." This figure alternates with the other motif of the introduction, "invested again with all its pristine starkness." The principal subject of the finale enters in smashing chords, says Miss Cohen, "coarse chords, suggesting the brutality of Viking drunk with blood." another, "equally primitive in character," immediately follows. Eventually there are quieter episodes, lusciously songful, "Penguins going to sleep on the winter snow" Miss Cohen suggests. The development is short and leads to an epilogue, begun with a cadenza for piano. Based on the lyric element of the finale, it expands more and more into something "beautiful and erotic." According to Mr. Bax's program-note: "This conclusion may possibly suggest the return of the sun and warm airs from the South after the long Northern winter. The principal theme of the first movement reappears in a serene form, and the music ends in, as it were, a burst of light." Or, to shift the picture back to Miss Cohen's suggestions of Day and Night, a new sunrise completes the daily cycle. A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 25 and 26—next week the orchestra will be visiting New York—when Florent Schmitt, the many-sided French composer, will be guest:

Reves (Dreams)	Schmitt
Sinfonia Concertante for Piano and Orchestra (Pianist: The Composer)	Schmitt
Symphony, No. 2, in D major	Sibelius

From Mr. Orloff, the pianist, for his concert in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 19, by which unemployed musicians in Boston will profit:

Prelude and Fugue	Mendelssohn
Sonata in A-flat major	Beethoven
Gretchen am Spinnrade	Schubert-Liszt
Morgenstandchen	Schubert-Liszt
Sonata in C minor, Op. 58	Chopin
Mazurka	Szymanovsky
The Bumble Bee	Rimsky-Korsakov
Toccata	Prokofiev
Sonata, Op. 4	Skriabin

From Mr. Rakhmaninov, the pianist, for his concert of fantasia-pieces in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 29:

Sonata-Fantasia	Skriabin
Fantasia in C major	Haydn
Fantasy-Pieces, Op. 12	Schumann
Fantasia	Chopin
Sonata, in C-sharp minor, Quasi una Fantasia, Op. 27, No. 2	Beethoven
Fantasia Quasi Sonata ("After Reading in Dante")	Liszt

From Mr. Bauer, the pianist, for his concert in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Dec. 3:

Two Choral Preludes, "Now Comes the Saviour; Christians, Rejoice" (Transcribed by Busoni)	Bach
Variations in F minor	Haydn
Presto from the String Quartet in E-flat, Op. 33, No. 2 (Transcribed by Bauer)	Haydn
Sonata in A major	Mozart
Adagio from the Sonata in B-flat major, Op. 106 S	Beethoven
Polonaise in C minor—Study in A minor, Op. 25, No. 4—Study in C-sharp minor, Op. 10, No. 4	Chopin
Fantasia-Piece in A-flat major, Op. 111	Schumann
Impromptu in F minor, Op. 142	Schubert
Ballad, Op. 10, No. 1—Caprice, Op. 76, No. 5	Brahms
La cathédrale engloutie—L'isle joyeuse	Debussy

Incidents and Prospects

On Friday evening, Nov. 18, the Stradivarius Quartet — Messrs Wolfinsohn, Pochon, Moldavan and Warburg—will begin another series of three chamber concerts in the court of the Fogg Museum at Harvard. The first program assembles a Quartet of Haydn in G major; the Second Quartet of Arnold Bax; Beethoven's Quartet in F minor, Op. 95. There is little need to recall these concerts to those who have frequented them in the past. The concert-room, the chosen pieces, the playing, all make them agreeable. As heretofore, "the public is cordially invited."

Mr. Dukelsky's Second Symphony, heard and liked at Symphony Hall two or three seasons ago, will be played by the Chicago Orchestra at its concerts of Nov. 17 and 18.

Prokofiev's new Concerto for Piano with Orchestra, to be heard in the course of the winter at the Symphony Concerts, was played for the first time anywhere at a Philharmonic Concert in Berlin on Oct. 31. Furtwängler was conductor; the composer, pianist.

Young Mr. Markevitch's "Rebus," announced for performance at Symphony Hall as concert-piece, or imaginary ballet, will be set on the stage of the Opera House at Monte Carlo next spring. Mr. Markevitch has lately handed to the Opéra at Paris a ballet, "The Flight of Icarus," to be mounted there next winter by Mr. Lifar.

"The Cast of Thought"

Harriet Cohen

Pianist at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday in Bax's "Winter Legends: Sinfonia Concertante for Piano and Orchestra"

Herald Nov. 11

Noted Pianist Attracts Brilliant Minds to Herself as Friends

Harriet Cohen Counts Shaw, Bax, Einstein Among Admirers

HERE AS SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

By ELIZABETH BORTON

Harriet Cohen, the English pianist, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon and tomorrow night, has, besides her gift to play the piano so well that she is considered the leading woman player of modern music in Europe today, the amazing ability to attract to herself as friends the most brilliant minds in all fields of intellectual and artistic endeavor. She counts among her closest friends Bernard Shaw, Arnold Bax, Somerset Maugham, Albert Einstein, Sir Henry Wood, Ramsay MacDonald, Jan Sibelius, Edward Elgar, and hosts of others—and many great ones since dead, Busoni, Lytton Strachey, Arnold Bennett—to mention a few. What is the secret of it? It must be something more than her own distinction in the field of music, and her extraordinary beauty.

Her looks may have much to do with it, though. There is a type of loveliness, unusual and as much a part of personality as a smile or a voice, which seems to be irresistible. Miss Cohen, with night-black hair and a transparently white skin, and light green eyes fringed round with black lashes, is striking, and she loses none of that arresting quality in the way she dresses.

"Arnold Bennett used [illegible]

(Copyright by Kay Vaughan)

HARRIET COHEN

scrap, because he set down on it the pipe he was teaching her to smoke this summer. She has a little travelling picture of Sibelius framed.

Always frantic. Always rushing. She rips into her fur coat, and smashes a small purple hat down over her eyes. "This hat is two years old but I love it because a perfect stranger of a lady gave it to me in New York. She said it looked like me. It does, really. See how hard it's trying to be a good hat, but here's a little thread. hanging That's me." She has a merry wink, and a gay laugh, which sounds almost constantly. "Oh, heaven, I f[illegible]

Her.

MUSIC NOTES

1933

Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed gloriously in Cincinnati. Mr. Leighton of the Inquirer found the evening a "perfect" one; "a surpassing program; a great conductor; a splendid ensemble." . . . Koussevitsky, the conductor, has made of his ensemble a body responsible to his slightest interpretive indication. He has within himself recreative faculties that place him among the Titans of orchestral leaders. He it was who selected the program and interpreted it. So by infallible reasoning the conclusion is reached that it is to Koussevitsky that first recognition for the perfect evening must be given. . . . We haven't the space to say all we would of the countless number of excellences in the presentations. The Boston orchestra is an instrument that seems never to have exhausted its tonal resources. No matter how hushed a pianissimo, there still is left a softer hush. No matter how grandiose the climax, if needed, there is a greater fortissimo in reserve. And the conductor plays on the instrument with a master's touch. With no semblance of personal display, but with what guidance two remarkable hands and a vibrant personality can give, he recreates wonderful music in a manner to prove all its wonder and beauty."

The program of the Symphony concerts on tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute." Prokofieff, suite, "Four Character Portraits from 'The Gambler'" (first time in the United States); sibelius, "Tapiola," symphonic poem (first time in Boston). Beethoven, Symphony, No. 7. The "Portraits" are those of characters in Dostoievsky's autobiographical novel, "The Gambler"—Alexis, the Grandmother, the General, Pauline. The opera from which the suite is derived was produced at the Monnaie, Brussels. "Tapiola" was written for Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Society of New York and first performed in New York late in December, 1926. The composer undertakes to interpret in music "the wild northern forest where dwell its god and his wood sprites."

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 13, marking to the day the fiftieth anniversary of Wagner's death. From his operas and chamber-music:

Overture to "Rienzi"
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde"
Siegfried's Trauermusik from "Götterdämmerung"
A Siegfried Idyll
Overture to "Tannhäuser"

From the singing lads of Vienna for their concerts in the Repertory Theater on Sunday and on Tuesday evenings, Feb. 12 and 14. For Sunday:

O Sacrum Convivium	Da Croce
Alleluia, Laus et Gloria	Di Lasso
Domine Non Sum Dignus	Vittoria
Ascendit Deus	Gallus
Christmas Motet, "Silent Night"	Lechthaler
The Apothecary, Opera in One Act	Haydn
Jubilate	Burkhart
Schlaf mein Jesulein	Tyrolean Folk-song
Es Hat Sich Halt Eroeffnet	Tyrolean Folk-song
Waltz, "Blue Danube"	J. Strauss

For Tuesday:

Spinning Song from "The Flying Dutchman,"	Wagner
Serenade	Schubert
Angel Trio	Mendelssohn
Ascendit Deus	Gallus
Schlafe, mein Prinzchen	Mozart
Bastien and Bastienne, Opera in One Act	Mozart
Psalm	Schubert
Jubilate	Burkhart
Die Wanderer in der Saegemuehle	German Folk-song
Jaeger aus Kurpfalz	German Folk-song

From Messrs. Fray and Braggiotti for their concert of pieces for two pianos in Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 9:

Prelude	Friedemann Bach
Fugue in G minor	J. S. Bach
Liebestraum	Liszt
Coronation Scene from the Opera, "Boris Godunov"	Musorgsky
Fragments from the First Movement of the Concerto in C minor	Rakhmaninov
Clair de Lune—Fetes	Debussy
Pantomime and Fire-Dance from the Ballet, "Love the Sorcerer"	de Falla
Pavane and Bolero	Ravel
Variations [illegible] "Yankee Doodle" in the manners of Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, De- Gershwin	Braggiotti

It appears that "by request" at the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Gieseking will repeat Mozart's Concerto for piano in C major that he first played here six years ago. . . . In his concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 12, Mr. Whiteman will include Gershwin's "An American in Paris" and Grofe's "Grand Canyon." A third piece will introduce William Still, Negro composer as yet unknown to Boston.

Incidents and Prospects

In opera last November, Bostonians twice heard Mme. Jeritza. A month hence, she will come again—in concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 5. . . . For another familiar and welcome singer, Roland Hayes will return to Symphony Hall on the following Sunday, March 12.

The annual music-festival at Worcester will be transferred next autumn from its ancient seat in Mechanics Hall to the new Municipal Auditorium. . . . "The Monastery: Poem for Orchestra," new piece by Paul Allen, will be heard for the first time at the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra in Jordan Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 12.

Mme. Beata Malkin, the singer from the State Opera in Berlin who has settled in Boston, announces a concert of old airs, operatic pieces and songs for Thursday evening, Feb. 16, in Jordan Hall. She was assisting singer, last autumn, in a pair of Symphony Concerts.

38

Symphony Concert === Bax and Sibelius

Two Notable Musics Sound, Stir and Pass

Bax's "Winter Legends" and Sibelius's First Symphony From Koussevitzky

THE CONDUCTOR of the Boston Orchestra is man of his word. Having promised Haydn to his audience yesterday afternoon, Haydn he played. But the Haydn it heard was not the Haydn it expected. Instead of the mature, substantial, full-voiced "Oxford Symphony" of 1791, written in acknowledgement of an honorary degree from the university, the little Symphony in F major, No. 17, written in earlier years for string choir, began the concert. The length of the two major numbers on the program—"Winter Legends" of Bax and the First Symphony of Sibelius—enjoined the substitution. Both, moreover, exacted arduous, anxious preparation; whereas Haydn's miniature could be readily "run off" by the virtuosi of Symphony Hall. In point of fact, it was "run off," since for once in a way the strings played with less of the aptness and felicity that are usually second nature to them. Lobby gossip attributed this shortcoming to strenuous rehearsals of "Winter Legends," to a tiring journey across the State for a concert out of town, or to both. As probably the source and cause was the unevenness to which virtuoso hands and ears are ever subject. At the repetition this evening, "the Haydn" is sure to go with more smoothness and finesse; while as it was, the matinée performance was ingratiating.

In itself the little Symphony in F was pleasing to hear. It may be no more than the "house music," that many a kapellmeister-composer wrote day in and day out in this eighteenth-century Austria; but the best of them—and Haydn was at the top—made an art out of a livelihood. The first Allegro ran in happy invention, easy flow, light, neat dexterities with matter and instruments. Throughout it sounded as spontaneous as it was felicitous, workmanship and fancy hand in hand.

What Haydn's time called sentiment and our time calls melancholy suffused the succeeding Andante. Haydn mused; remembered the grace and suavity proper to that pastime in his courtly day; while the little orchestra mused with him and was partner in his skill. The composer himself was of masculine and homely habit; but when he wrote these slow movements in little, he was a very Dorothea, or Sophie, or whatever his period chose to call its nymphs, for charm. Being also canny, he did not forget to preserve that charm by an apt and ready technique.

The Finale was even surprise. It was no fleet juggling of phrases, no running race of panting strings. Lightly and pithily it set motivs in development and interplay at sprightly, but not rushing, pace: utilized modestly the timbres of the choir. Parisian writers about music in those days had a deal to say about the "agréments" of music. This little Symphony in F, though it was made in Austria, admirably exemplifies them. Haydn's prince asked no more for his salon or his dining-room.

Next the strong meat of the afternoon. Bax's symphony with pervading and outjutting piano—for "Winter Legends," whatever the sub-titling, is intrinsically that—continues through forty or forty-five minutes; employs a full orchestra of 1932; at almost everyone of those moments taxes the playing instruments. Conductor, virtuosi and pianist—Miss Harriet Cohen—on edge as they were for a first performance in America, all gave evidence of unusual strain. They seemed to disclose and vitalize the music in hand, to unfold the substance and convey the force. But no one, except Bax himself, may judge fully and finally as to that. The strain upon listeners, if they would follow, grasp and feel this intricate, uneven, changeful, full-laden music, was only less. Fortunate they if emotional response animated groping comprehension. As for the hapless reviewer, he is expected to set down immediate impressions; whereas he would gladly defer them until he has heard "Winter Legends" a second and a third time. His job makes him the disfavored child of the muses; but he has learned better than to whimper in his corner.

First the inevitable speculation about an undisclosed "program." Such a title as "Winter Legends" implies the existence in the composer's mind of an imagined and poetized background, the shaping and the conditioning of his music to an imagined and poetized scheme. Oftener and oftener the music in itself suggests as much; induces the emotional response that usually proceeds from nothing else. Yet Bax in a note written for the program-book at the first performance in London, makes a semi-technical analysis of the musical structure; waives aside all else in a curt proffer of "full liberty to each hearer to associate 'Winter Legends' with any heroic tales of the Far North." As for himself, he "has no program which can be set down in words."

Possibly this saying goes to the root of the matter. Much of Bax's mature music, as it has come and gone at Symphony Hall, seems generated by a mind and spirit surcharged and seething with images and visions, sensations [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and con[illegible] they [illegible] him into orchestral tones [illegible] molded into symphonic structure and progress. The propulsive imagination behind is in unrelaxing and insistent ferment; while the governing intellect lacks, or withholds, the selective, the clarifying faculty. Bax, in short, and strange as it seems in these days, is the unrestrained romanticist among composers. If he would, he could not put into words his program for "Winter Legends," because it is a cloud of sensations in flux upon his composing will. By the same token the impression upon us listeners is bound to be clouded, changeful, confused. But such an impression may have no small impact upon the answering emotions.

Next to the particular quality of these "Winter Legends" as so much music. Bax is obviously writing a symphony with an outflung piano; or at the least that hybrid which some call a symphonic concerto. Yet he declines more than one prescription of orthodox symphonic form. His generating motivs are seldom significant in themselves, in spite of the vivid force of the drum-rolled measures at the beginning. It is his treatment that amplifies, enriches, propels and animates them. Under it they converge and intensify into decisive climax—both movement by movement and in the progress and proportions of "Winter Legends" as a whole.

In texture the resulting music is exhaustless in counterpoint; rich and full in harmony; intense and manifold, vivid or subtle, in instrumental color. There are moments in which the counterpoint clogs itself with sheer abundance; when transition is tangled and motionless; when the thickness and richness of it all embarrass and confuse the listener. Far enough is Bax from the spareness, bareness and openness that are fashions of the modernist hour. By these evidences again he is romantic composer unalloyed and unrestrained. Furthermore: he is master of the piano, technically and expressively, in symphonic composition. He has searched out its procedures, timbres, relations to other instruments. He uses them—Miss Cohen assisting notably—to do the works of imagination and emotion.

Last and most important in general and particular effect upon an audience, the emotional quality, the imaginative repercussion, of "Winter Legends." Romanticist that he is, Bax dwells in a world of his own in which his imaginings and sensations are more real than external realities. In his earlier music, it was the misty, wistful, mystical world that some one labeled, shrewdly enough, "the Celtic twilight." Now in the later symphonies and in these "Winter Legends," it is a more Northern world of intense light and intense shadows, where all may be blaze or all may be darkness. The means are at his command to impart these intensities in tones. In this Northern, isolated world he sometimes hears a fierce, grim music—and writes it. Again the sound is keen and bitter to tongue and pen. It may also soften and still. Once more, and this world of imagination surges with sensations, and Bax up-piles his climaxes. Or it glitters before his eyes; while his harmonic and instrumental color reflect the glistening. Or it darkens and shrills with bodement. In the measures that upspring are the omen and the dread.

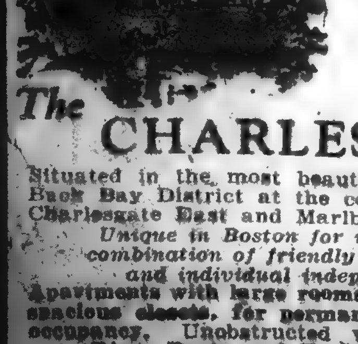
To us that in America or in Europe live the urban or the suburban life, while imagination atrophies, Bax's world teems with strange illusions and emotions, hard to vision and to feel. Yet by that very quality a romanticist's world. More and more potently as Bax matures, he gives it speech of music, while that speech imparts and emotionalizes it upon us. For many a hearer "Winter Legends," taxing as it was, is worth the effort to understand and experience. Moreover, unless impression is all at fault, the romanticism of Bax draws Dr. Koussevitzky to his later music and kindles the conductor, as it did yesterday, to signal performance.

The afternoon ended with Sibelius's First Symphony, in E minor, repertory piece through twenty years [illegible] concerts, now renewed to begin the conductor's projected cycle of the published seven and the impending eighth, so to outspread the length, breadth, height and depth of the living composer now most in vogue in American concert-halls. Only Strauss, on that score, can be compared to him. Such occasion may have stirred the conductor to draw from himself and from the orchestra a remarkably vivid, proclamatory and emotionalized performance. The whole house forgot its exertions under Bax; yielded to the outspoken intensities of Sibelius's broader melodies, to the vigors of his bolder rhythms; at the end of a concert, two hours long, lingered to outpour applause.

The chances are that the stricter Sibelians would have quarrelled with some of the conductor's procedures. If there was a hint of Chaikovsky in these unfolding, upsweeping measures, he prepared and sounded them until they seemed yet more Chaikovskian. If the ear heard Borodin in the pounding rhythms at the beginning and the end of the Scherzo, the conductor enforced them until they smote like Beethoven at wildest and heaviest. (Perhaps, after all, Beethoven is the real "influence" upon Sibelius.) The true believers say there is another way with such pages; but if there is, we have had no instance of it in Boston, even from Dr. Muck. As for Dr. Koussevitzky's courses, the effect upon an audience, preferring Sibelius full-throated and emotional to Sibelius terse and stark, was—as the ladies were saying—"tremendous."

On the other hand, the conductor overlooked little or nothing in the Symphony that not only foretells the mature Sibelius but is also the greater Sibelius in germ. At the very outset the clarinet, plaintive above a drum-roll, is pure Sibelius, not least when the melody returns, broadened and deepened, at the beginning of the Finale. The Sibelius of a tumult of rhythms may be heard in the first movement. Here and there through the whole Symphony, the woodwinds echo with his individualizing tang; his trumpets flare through the tonal mass; or the wind choir wreathes its patterns upon a background of the darker strings. The Finale ascends with the gathering Sibelian strength and sweep. Only the slow movement, with recurring Grieg-like suggestion in substance and in color, belongs to a Sibelius that, after this First Symphony, has no tomorrow. So much for the prologue to deeper deeds to come.

H. T. P.



One of Boston's most distinctive Hotels

The CHARLESGATE

Situated in the most beautiful part of the Back Bay District at the corner of Beacon, Charlesgate East and Marlboro Sts.

Unique in Boston for its unusual combination of friendly atmosphere and individual independence.

Apartments with large rooms, open fireplaces, spacious closets, for permanent or transient occupancy. Unobstructed view of Charles River Basin and Back Bay Park.

Herbert G. Summers

E BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1932

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. Harriet Cohen, the pianist, played in Boston for the first time. The performance of Bax's "Winter Legends" was the first in the United States. The program also comprised Haydn's symphony, No. 17, in F major, for strings, and the first symphony of Sibelius. "Winter Legends" is a work of great importance; a truly remarkable work. The composer had little to say about the "program basis" when the concerto was played for the first time on Feb. 4, 1932, in London, with Miss Cohen, to whom the work is dedicated, the pianist.

Bax wrote this music two or three years ago. Miss Cohen was to have played the concerto when she visited this country in 1930. It was then to have been performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but for some reason, not clear, London had the honor of the first performance.

According to the composer, this work "has no program" which could be set down in words; each hearer has "full liberty to associate it with any heroic tales of the far North, even with the Arctic Circle." But some are not pleased by the composer's reticence. It appears that this music portrays first the "glaring Northern day, and then the dark Northern light." There is here and there a "harsh and baleful light." Is it possible that this refers to the Aurora Borealis? If so, this phenomenon of nature is not appreciated, for it is a glorious, if a slightly perturbing, sight. Then comes a description of melting ice and snow: what is known in New England as a good old-fashioned January thaw. But Bax, we are told, strikes a sterner note: Coarse chords suggest "Vikings drunk with blood." There is a more peaceful, what might be called a meteorological-astronomical ending: "This conclusion may possibly suggest the return of the sun and warm airs from the South after the long Northern winter." We miss a scherzo episode: Eskimo dogs running at full speed, or the awkward gambols of a polar bear with its interesting young.

Now this music of Bax needs no explanatory notes. The title is enough. Let the hearer invent his own legends, or recall the sagas he has read. Celtic legends and tales of ancient Greece fired the imagination of Bax in earlier works. In his latest composition, he is a man of the North, as decidedly as Sibelius. (The two composers are bound together by personal friendship and mutual admiration.)

In some of his Celtic music Bax was inclined to be diffuse. In this recent work there is little or no padding, no treading of water while in doubt as to what should come next. The music is nobly imaginative: sensuousness would here be out of place; the few lyrical passages for the piano are without tenderness of sentiment, for that would be incongruous. Whatever legends Bax may have had in mind, they were certainly not of swooning or delirious lovers. There is passion, but it is the passion of heroes in conflict with nature and man. He has shaped his orchestration with this in view. Varied as is his writing for orchestra and for the piano, there is seldom a departure from the expression of strength, the virility that rejoices in its display. One may miss the mysticism of Bax's musical excursions into fairy land, but one cannot always dwell in that land, wander on the haunted hills or idle in the garden of Fand.

The piano part of this concerto is extremely difficult for the player; there are passages that are cruelly difficult, presenting a seemingly impossible task; yet all this was not apparent in the admirable performance by Miss Cohen. It is to her credit that, though this was her first appearance in Boston, she did not attempt to show vain virtuoso qualities; she played with the thorough understanding of the role allotted to her by the composer; and with an equally thorough appreciation of the relation of that role to the work as a whole. Her reputation as a player of Bach's music and the music of the saner moderns is so great in the capitals of Europe, it is a pity that the engagement to play in London the new concerto of Vaughan Williams will not permit her to give a recital in this city. But she is young, and there are years before her in which to visit this country frequently.

The little symphony by Haydn was pleasingly performed. Dr. Koussevitzky, who brought out the glorious strength of Bax's concerto, gave a dramatic, impressive interpretation of the symphony. When Sibelius wrote it he had not found out his own idiom; the idiom which has put him among the symphonic masters of the years. He had not then escaped the influence of Tchaikovsky. There are measures, especially in the second and third movements, that might have been written by the Russian. Perhaps this is one reason why this symphony, though it is not among his great, most characteristic ones, is at present the most popular.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next Friday. The program of Nov. 25-26 will comprise Florent Schmitt's "Reves," which has been heard here, and his Symphonic Concertante for orchestra and piano (first performance), and the second symphony of Sibelius. Mr. Schmitt will be the pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will open ~~its New York~~ season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 17, at 8:45, and Saturday afternoon, November 19, at 2:30.

A program of the music of Jan Sibelius will be presented at the Thursday concert. The Finnish composer's tone poem, "Tapiola," which was written for and performed by Walter Damrosch in 1926, will be revived. A suite from the incidental music to Strindberg's play "Swanwhite," will also be played. The First symphony in E minor will end the program.

At the matinee concert, John Alden Carpenter will be the guest of honor as composer and pianist in "Patterns," the piece which he wrote for this orchestra and recently performed with them in Boston. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," a ballet of modern American life, will also be performed as an orchestral piece. The program will begin with Brahms's symphony in D major, No. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 12 1932

Boston Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences announce five philharmonic performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The orchestra this season includes 110 musicians. It will appear in Brooklyn on Friday evenings, Nov. 18, Jan. 6, Feb. 2, March 3 and April 7.

"Tapiola," the most recent and in the opinion of many the maturest and most impressive of the tone poems of Jan Sibelius, has been revived by Serge Koussevitzky with notable success in Boston, and will be introduced at the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert here.

"Tapiola" is a nature piece. The title comes from Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology. The dark grandeur of the Finnish forests, which are noted for their beauty, gave the famous composer his inspiration. The following verse is at the head of this core:

Wide-spread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests,
ncient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
ithin them dwells the forest's mighty god
d wood sprites in a gloom weave magic secrets."

Sibelius develops his tone poem on a characteristic short phrase which is repeated many times with shifting instrumental colors. It develops to a tremenedous climax which is finally reached by a swift chromatic passage for the strings, which lasts for thirty-seven bars and reaches an unbelievable degree of intensity.

The Finnish composer dedicated "Tapiola" to Walter Damrosch, and it was first played by this composer in New York in 1926. The piece has not since been heard in America, but has requently been performed and greatly admired in Europe, particularly in England.

Page Eight BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBE

Symphony Concert — Bax and Sibelius

Two Notable Musics Sound, Stir and Pass

Bax's "Winter Legends" and Sibelius's First Symphony From Koussevitzky

THE CONDUCTOR of the Boston Orchestra is man of his word. Having promised Haydn to his audience yesterday afternoon, Haydn he played. But the Haydn it heard was not the Haydn it expected. Instead of the mature, substantial, full-voiced "Oxford Symphony" of 1791, written in acknowledgement of an honorary degree from the university, the little Symphony in F major, No. 17, written in earlier years for string choir, began the concert. The length of the two major numbers on the program—"Winter Legends" of Bax and the First Symphony of Sibelius—enjoined the substitution. Both, moreover, exacted arduous, anxious preparation; whereas Haydn's miniature could be readily "run off" by the virtuosi of Symphony Hall. In point of fact, it was "run off," since for once in a way the strings played with less of the aptness and felicity that are usually second nature to them. Lobby gossip attributed this shortcoming to strenuous rehearsals of "Winter Legends," to a tiring journey across the State for a concert out of town, or to both. As probably the source and cause was the unevenness to which virtuoso hands and ears are ever subject. At the repetition this evening, "the Haydn" is sure to go with more smoothness and finesse; while as it was, the matinée performance was ingratiating.

In itself the little Symphony in F was pleasing to hear. It may be no more than the "house music," that many a kapellmeister-composer wrote day in and day out in this eighteenth-century Austria; but the best of them—and Haydn was at the top—made an art out of a livelihood. The first Allegro ran in happy invention, easy flow, light, neat dexterities with matter and instruments. Throughout it sounded as spontaneous as it was felicitous, workmanship and fancy hand in hand.

What Haydn's time called sentiment and our time calls melancholy suffused the succeeding Andante. Haydn mused; remembered the grace and suavity proper to that pastime in his courtly day; while the little orchestra mused with him and was partner in his skill. The composer himself was of masculine and homely habit; but when he wrote these slow movements in little, he was a very Dorothea, or Sophie, or whatever his period chose to call its nymphs, for charm. Being also canny, he did not forget to preserve that charm by an apt and ready technique.

The Finale was even surprise. It was no fleet juggling of phrases, no running race of panting strings. Lightly and pithily it set motivs in development and interplay at sprightly, but not rushing, pace; utilized modestly the timbres of the choir. Parisian writers about music in those days had a deal to say about the "agréments" of music. This little Symphony in F, though it was made in Austria, admirably exemplifies them. Haydn's prince asked no more for his salon or his dining-room.

Next the strong meat of the afternoon. Bax's symphony with pervading and outjutting piano—for "Winter Legends," whatever the sub-titling, is intrinsically that—continues through forty or forty-five minutes; employs a full orchestra of 1932; at almost everyone of those moments taxes the playing instruments. Conductor, virtuosi and pianist—Miss Harriet Cohen—on edge as they were for a first performance in America, all gave evidence of unusual strain. They seemed to disclose and vitalize the music in hand, to unfold the substance and convey the force. But no one, except Bax himself, may judge fully and finally as to that. The strain upon listeners, if they would follow, grasp and feel this intricate, uneven, changeful, full-laden music, was only less. Fortunate they if emotional response animated groping comprehension. As for the hapless reviewer, he is expected to set down immediate impressions; whereas he would gladly defer them until he has heard "Winter Legends" a second and a third time. His job makes him the disfavored child of the muses; but he has learned better than to whimper in his corner.

First the inevitable speculation about an undisclosed "program." Such a title as "Winter Legends" implies the existence in the composer's mind of an imagined and poetized background, the shaping and the conditioning of his music to an imagined and poetized scheme. Oftener and oftener the music in itself suggests as much; induces the emotional response that usually proceeds from nothing else. Yet Bax in a note written for the program-book at the first performance in London, makes a semi-technical analysis of the musical structure; waives aside all else in a curt proffer of "full liberty to each hearer to associate 'Winter Legends' with any heroic tales of the Far North." As for himself, he "has no program which can be set down in words."

Possibly this saying goes to the root [illegible]. Much of Bax's mature music, as it has come and gone at Symphony Hall, seems generated by a mind and spirit surcharged and seething with [illegible] and visions, sensations [illegible] abundant and confused, [illegible] into orchestral [illegible] molded into symphonic structure and progress. The propulsive imagination behind is in unrelaxing and insistent ferment; while the governing intellect lacks, or withholds, the selective, the clarifying faculty. Bax, in short, and strange as it seems in these days, is the unrestrained romanticist among composers. If he would, he could not put into words his program for "Winter Legends," because it is a cloud of sensations in flux upon his composing will. By the same token the impression upon us listeners is bound to be clouded, changeful, confused. But such an impression may have no small impact upon the answering emotions.

Next to the particular quality of these "Winter Legends" as so much music. Bax is obviously writing a symphony with an outflung piano; or at the least that hybrid which some call a symphonic concerto. Yet he declines more than one prescription of orthodox symphonic form. His generating motivs are seldom significant in themselves, in spite of the vivid force of the drum-rolled measures at the beginning. It is his treatment that amplifies, enriches, propels and animates them. Under it they converge and intensify into decisive climax—both movement by movement and in the progress an proportions of "Winter Legends" as whole.

In texture the resulting music is exhaustless in counterpoint; rich and ful in harmony; intense and manifold, vivi or subtle, in instrumental color. Ther are moments in which the counterpoin clogs itself with sheer abundance; whe transition is tangled and motionless when the thickness and richness of it a embarrass and confuse the listener. Fa enough is Bax from the spareness, bareness and openness that are fashions of th modernist hour. By these evidences again he is romantic composer unalloye and unrestrained. Furthermore: he is master of the piano, technically and expressively, in symphonic composition. He has searched out its procedures, timbres relations to other instruments. He uses them—Miss Cohen assisting notably—to do the works of imagination and emotion.

Last and most important in general and particular effect upon an audience, the emotional quality, the imaginative repercussion, of "Winter Legends." Romanticist that he is, Bax dwells in a world of his own in which his imaginings and sensations are more real than external realities. In his earlier music, it was the misty, wistful, mystical world that some one labeled, shrewdly enough, "the Celtic twilight." Now in the later symphonies and in these "Winter Legends," it is a more Northern world of intense light and intense shadows, where all may be blaze or all may be darkness. The means are at his command to impart these intensities in tones. In this Northern, isolated world he sometimes hears a fierce, grim music—and writes it. Again the sound is keen and bitter to tongue and pen. It may also soften and still. Once more, and this world of imagination surges with sensations, and Bax up-piles his climaxes. Or it glitters before his eyes; while his harmonic and instrumental color reflect the glistening. Or it darkens and shrills with bodement. In the measures that upspring are the omen and the dread.

To us that in America or in Europe live the urban or the suburban life, while imagination atrophies, Bax's world teems with strange illusions and emotions, hard to vision and to feel. Yet by that very quality a romanticist's world. More and more potently as Bax matures, he gives it speech of music, while that speech imparts and emotionalizes it upon us. For many a hearer "Winter Legends," taxing as it was, is worth the effort to understand and experience. Moreover, unless impression is all at fault, the romanticism of Bax draws Dr. Koussevitzky to his later music and kindles the conductor, as it did yesterday, to signal performance.

The afternoon ended with Sibelius's First Symphony, in E minor, repertory piece [illegible] twenty years at these concerts, now renewed to begin the conductor's projected cycle of the published seven and the impending eighth, so to outspread the length, breadth, height and depth of the living composer now most in vogue in American concert-halls. Only Strauss, on that score, can be compared to him. Such occasion may have stirred the conductor to draw from himself and from the orchestra a remarkably vivid, proclamatory and emotionalized performance. The whole house forgot its exertions under Bax; yielded to the outspoken intensities of Sibelius's broader melodies, to the vigors of his bolder rhythms; at the end of a concert, two hours long, lingered to outpour applause.

The chances are that the stricter Sibelians would have quarrelled with some of the conductor's procedures. If there was a hint of Chaikovsky in these unfolding, upsweeping measures, he prepared and sounded them until they seemed yet more Chaikovskian. If the ear heard Borodin in the pounding rhythms at the beginning and the end of the Scherzo, the conductor enforced them until they smote like Beethoven at wildest and heaviest. (Perhaps, after all, Beethoven is the real "influence" upon Sibelius.) The true believers say there is another way with such pages; but if there is, we have had no instance of it in Boston, even from Dr. Muck. As for Dr. Koussevitzky's courses, the effect upon an audience, preferring Sibelius full-throated and emotional to Sibelius terse and stark, was—as the ladies were saying—"tremendous."

On the other hand, the conductor overlooked little or nothing in the Symphony that not only foretells the mature Sibelius but is also the greater Sibelius in germ. At the very outset the clarinet, plaintive above a drum-roll, is pure Sibelius, not least when the melody returns, broadened and deepened, at the beginning of the Finale. The Sibelius of a tumult of rhythms may be heard in the first movement. Here and there through the whole Symphony, the woodwinds echo with his individualizing tang; his trumpets flare through the tonal mass; or the wind choir wreathes its patterns upon a background of the darker strings. The Finale ascends with the gathering Sibelian strength and sweep. Only the slow movement, with recurring Grieg-like suggestion in substance and in color, belongs to a Sibelius that, after this First Symphony, has no tomorrow. So much for the prologue to deeper deeds to come.

H. T. P.

One of Boston's most distinctive Hotels

The CHARLESGATE

Situated in the most beautiful part of the Back Bay District at the corner of Beacon, Charlesgate East and Marlboro Sts.

Unique in Boston for its unusual combination of friendly atmosphere and individual independence.

Apartments with large rooms, open fireplaces, spacious closets, for permanent or transient occupancy. Unobstructed view of Charles River Basin and Back Bay Park.

Herbert G. Summers

IE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1932

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. Harriet Cohen, the pianist, played in Boston for the first time. The performance of Bax's "Winter Legends" was the first in the United States. The program also comprised Haydn's symphony, No. 17, in F major, for strings, and the first symphony of Sibelius. "Winter Legends" is a work of great importance; a truly remarkable work. The composer had little to say about the "program basis" when the concerto was played for the first time on Feb. 4, 1932, in London, with Miss Cohen, to whom the work is dedicated, the pianist.

Bax wrote this music two or three years ago. Miss Cohen was to have played the concerto when she visited this country in 1930. It was then to have been performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but for some reason, not clear, London had the honor of the first performance.

According to the composer, this work "has no program" which could be set down in words; each hearer has "full liberty to associate it with any heroic tales of the far North, even with the Arctic Circle." But some are not pleased by the composer's reticence. It appears that this music portrays first the "glaring Northern day, and then the dark Northern light." There is here and there a "harsh and baleful light." Is it possible that this refers to the Aurora Borealis? If so, this phenomenon of nature is not appreciated, for it is a glorious, if a slightly perturbing, sight. Then comes a description of melting ice and snow: what is known in New England as a good old-fashioned January thaw. But Bax, we are told, strikes a sterner note: Coarse chords suggest "Vikings drunk with blood." There is a more peaceful, what might be called a meteorological-astronomical ending: "This conclusion may possibly suggest the return of the sun and warm airs from the South after the long Northern winter." We miss a scherzo episode: Eskimo dogs running at full speed, or the awkward gambols of a polar bear with its interesting young.

Now this music of Bax needs no explanatory notes. The title is enough. Let the hearer invent his own legends, or recall the sagas he has read. Celtic legends and tales of ancient Greece fired the imagination of Bax in earlier works. In his latest composition, he is a man of the North, as decidedly as Sibelius. (The two composers are bound together by personal friendship and mutual admiration.)

In some of his Celtic music Bax was inclined to be diffuse. In this recent work there is little or no padding, no treading of water while in doubt as to what should come next. The music is nobly imaginative: sensuousness would here be out of place; the few lyrical passages for the piano are without tenderness of sentiment, for that would be incongruous. Whatever legends Bax may have had in mind, they were certainly not of swooning or delirious lovers. There is passion, but it is the passion of heroes in conflict with nature and man. He has shaped his orchestration with this in view. Varied as is his writing for orchestra and for the piano, there is seldom a departure from the expression of strength, the virility that rejoices in its display. One may miss the mysticism of Bax's musical excursions into fairy land, but one cannot always dwell in that land, wander on the haunted hills or idle in the garden of Fand.

The piano part of this concerto is extremely difficult for the player; there are passages that are cruelly difficult, presenting a seemingly impossible task; yet all this was not apparent in the admirable performance by Miss Cohen. It is to her credit that, though this was her first appearance in Boston, she did not attempt to show vain virtuoso qualities; she played with the thorough understanding of the role allotted to her by the composer; and with an equally thorough appreciation of the relation of that role to the work as a whole. Her reputation as a player of Bach's music and the music of the saner moderns is so great in the capitals of Europe, it is a pity that the engagement to play in London the new concerto of Vaughan Williams will not permit her to give a recital in this city. But she is young, and there are years before her in which to visit this country frequently.

The little symphony by Haydn was pleasingly performed. Dr. Koussevitzky, who brought out the glorious strength of Bax's concerto, gave a dramatic, impressive interpretation of the symphony. When Sibelius wrote it he had not found out his own idiom; the idiom which has put him among the symphonic masters of the years. He had not then escaped the influence of Tchaikovsky. There are measures, especially in the second and third movements, that might have been written by the Russian. Perhaps this is one reason why this symphony, though it is not among his great, most characteristic ones, is at present the most popular.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next Friday. The program of Nov. 25-26 will comprise Florent Schmitt's "Reves," which has been heard here, and his Symphonic Concertante for orchestra and piano (first performance), and the second symphony of Sibelius. Mr. Schmitt will be the pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

The Boston Symphony Orch Serge Koussevitzky, conductor open ~~its New York~~ season in negie Hall next Thursday eve November 17, at 8:45, and Sat afternoon, November 19, at 2:30.

A program of the music of Sibelius will be presented at Thursday concert. The Finnish poser's tone poem, "Tapiola," was written for and performed Walter Damrosch in 1926, will be vived. A suite from the incident music to Strindberg's play "Swanwhite," will also be played. The First symphony in E minor will end the program.

At the matinee concert, John Alden Carpenter will be the guest of honor as composer and pianist in "Patterns," the piece which he wrote for this orchestra and recently performed with them in Boston. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," a ballet of modern American life, will also be performed as an orchestral piece. The program will begin with Brahms's symphony in D major, No. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 12 1932

Boston Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences announces five philharmonic performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The orchestra this season includes 110 musicians. It will appear in Brooklyn on Friday evenings, Nov. 18, Jan. 6, Feb. 2, March 3 and April 7.

"Tapiola," the most recent and in the opinion of many the maturest and most impressive of the tone poems of Jan Sibelius, has been revived by Serge Koussevitzky with notable success in Boston, and will be introduced at the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert here.

"Tapiola" is a nature piece. The title comes from Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology. The dark grandeur of the Finnish forests, which are noted for their beauty, gave the famous composer his inspiration. The following verse is at the head of this score:

"Wide-spread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests.
Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
Within them dwells the forest's mighty god
And wood sprites in a gloom weave magic secrets."

Sibelius develops his tone poem on a characteristic short phrase which is repeated many times with shifting instrumental colors. It develops to a tremendous climax which is finally reached by a swift chromatic passage for the strings, which lasts for thirty-seven bars and reaches an unbelievable degree of intensity.

The Finnish composer dedicated "Tapiola" to Walter Damrosch, and it was first played by this composer in New York in 1926. The piece has not since been heard in America, but has frequently been performed and greatly admired in Europe, particularly in England.

39

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

NOV 12 1932

MATINEE SERIES BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

The attention of music lovers in this city is drawn to the opportunity conveniently to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is often called the greatest orchestra in the world under ideal conditions in Symphony hall, its own splendid auditorium in Boston. The orchestra will give a series of six concerts on Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 22. These concerts start at 3 o'clock, and end before 5. Indeed, the Tuesday afternoon series has a very large patronage from outlying towns for this reason.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has already won many laurels in its present 52nd season, which began last month. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is beginning his ninth season at the head of the orchestra, has led his men with the most brilliant success through classical and new pieces in the programs so far given. The personnel of 110 remains without change the unmatched assemblage of virtuosi from all parts of the world which it has been in seasons past.

The Tuesday afternoon subscribers will hear the full orchestra under its extraordinary leader and under ideal conditions. Dr. Koussevitzky will choose for this series the most outstanding masterpieces, both new and old, from the longer series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

The great composers will each be represented in a series, arranged, so far as the interest and balance of each program will allow, in historical sequence. The evolution of symphonic music will be laid before the hearer, as exemplified by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubent, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Strauss, Debussy and Stravinsky. Such an opportunity for a comprehensive enjoyment of symphonic music in the beauties of each epoch is the experience of a life-time.

The Tuesday concerts will be given on Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 7, March 7, March 28, and April 18.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON, MASS.
TIMES
NOV 12 1932

SYMPHONY TO GIVE SERIES OF CONCERTS

The attention of music lovers in this city is drawn to the opportunity conveniently to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is often called the greatest orchestra in the world, under ideal conditions in Symphony hall, its own splendid auditorium in Boston. The orchestra will give a series of six concerts on Tuesday afternoons, beginning Nov. 22. These concerts start at 3 o'clock, and ending before 5, fit conveniently into a shopping day of a visitor to Boston. Indeed, the Tuesday afternoon series has a very large patronage from outlying towns for this reason.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has already won many laurels in its present 52nd season, which began last month. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is beginning his ninth season at the head of the orchestra, has led his men with the most brilliant success through classical and new pieces in the programs so far given. The personnel of one hundred and ten remains without changing the unmatched assemblage of virtuosi from all parts of the world which it has been in seasons past.

N. Y. EVENING POST

NOV 12 1932

Music : By Oscar Thompson

In His All-Sibelius Program, Koussevitzky Recalls the Motto of Sunny Side Up

AS IF TO SAY, "You want Sibelius! Then you get Sibelius!" Serge Koussevitzky is propounding an all-Sibelius program for his first New York audience of the season on Thursday night, when the Boston Symphony resumes its visits to Carnegie Hall. No one who knows the Boston conductor's record of loyal and courageous pioneering for the music of Sibelius could suspect him, however, of anything that might savor remotely of disservice or of a variety of musical sabotage in so high a cause.

An all-Sibelius program is, on its face, rather a large order for a public that is by no means sure that it likes or understands the Finnish composer. For many, Sibelius may be said to be in much the same situation as was Brahms forty, even thirty, years ago. To have set before the rank and file of concertgoers of that day an all-Brahms orchestral program would have been to alienate many and stupify more. It was one of America's most distinguished critics, the late Henry T. Finck, who wrote: "If there is Brahms on the program, look for the nearest exit." We could cite instances today of concert habitues who formerly disliked Brahms, then grew to adore him and who still dislike Sibelius. For them a gradual initiation through repeated performances of the Sibelius works, given in company with other music already accepted and liked, would appear to be a more promising course than sudden baptism by complete immersion in concerts of nothing but Sibelius.

Before this notion is permitted to build up a prejudice against Mr. Koussevitzky's daring undertaking, the particular program fashioned for New York's consumption should be examined in detail. There is no Seventh Symphony here. No Fourth. The structural problems of the later symphonies—from No. 4 on—are not to be encountered in this program. Elsewhere is to be sought the tendency toward spareness, toward the elimination of all purely decorative or supplementary material, toward condensation of musical thought into kernals that can be likened to the subject matter of a fugue, to be treated as building blocks for the erection of symphonic edifices as severe as they are complex. Instead, the program will bring back the somewhat Tchaikovskian fervors of Symphony No. 1, composed more than thirty years ago; the not very ponderous incidental music written for a Swedish play, Strindberg's "Svanehvit" ("Swanwhite"), a suite of small numbers bearing such titles as "The Peacock," "The Harp," "The Maiden With Roses," "Listen, the Robin Sings" and "Song of Praise" (with two others that Mr. Koussevitzky will omit), composed in 1908, and the tone-poem, "Tapiola," a relatively recent successor of "En Saga" and "The Swan of Tuonela."

Mr. Koussevitzky has announced the Eighth and latest Sibelius symphony, as yet unknown to us, for this season's concerts. Presumably New York will share the good fortune of Boston when the time comes for the American premiere. Conceivably Thursday night's program could have been designed to break ground and prepare the way for that noteworthy event. One difficulty with respect to Sibelius is that the successive symphonies have come to our ears without our being sufficiently familiar with what has gone before. Performances have been so scattered and so haphazard as to afford no one but a few specialists and zealots the line of continuity necessary to grasp the composer's development and growth.

IN REVERTING to the First Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky is playing a work that is sufficiently popular in character to have caused some critics to describe its thematic substance as banal. Whatever the justice of his judgment, the ordinary concertgoers of Sweden and Norway—as this writer learned on a recent visit—have taken this Finnish symphony to their hearts and have made of it a fixture in their orchestral repertory. Though Sibelius lately has been exculpated of the not very heinous offense of using national folk-material anywhere in his larger works, the symphony has recognizable tunes of a folk character. Today its supposed "dourness" is to be looked upon as something of the imagination of those who were baffled by it three decades ago.

The "Svanehvit" Suite was described by Strindberg as "graceful and delicately tinted," words that seldom have had any part in reviews written of the symphonic Sibelius. Attention has been called to the "poetic fantasy" of "The Harp" and the "imaginative tone-painting" of "Listen, the Robin Sings."

"Tapiola," to be sure, is of sterner stuff. Cecil Gray of London thinks that it, alone, would have been sufficient to entitle the composer to a place among the greatest masters of all time. New York was more reserved in its judgment when this work, written on commission for the Symphony Society, was first performed here in 1926. There was the usual talk of austerity and of gloomy forests. Further experience with it may bring an altered perspective, as in the case of the now quite amiable First Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 13 1932

Program on Sibelius

"Swanwhite" Suite, Unknown in This Country, Will Be Heard.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 17, at 8.45, and Saturday afternoon, November 19, at 2.30.

A program of the music of Jan Sibelius will be presented at the Thursday concert. The Finnish composer's tone poem, "Tapiola," will be revived, also his "Swanwhite," a suite from the incidental music to Stroudsberg's play, opus 5. Sibelius' First Symphony in E minor will end the program.

The suite, unknown in this country, was published in 1909. The movements to be played are: The Peacock, The Harp, The Maiden with Roses, Listen, the Robin Sings and Song of Praise.

The tone poem is based upon a short characteristic phrase which is developed with many changes of orchestral coloring. It rises to a climax with a chromatic passage for the entire strings, reaching what Cecil Gray calls "one of the greatest climaxes in all music, like a convulsion of nature."

At the matinee concert, John Alden Carpenter will be the guest of honor as composer and pianist in "Patterns," the piece which he wrote for this orchestra and recently performed with them in Boston. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," a ballet of modern American life, will also be performed as an orchestral piece. The program will begin with Brahms' Symphony in D major, No. 2.

"Patterns," written for orchestra with piano obligato, has, according to the composer, "no literary or programmatic significance. It is not primarily a show piece for the pianist—the strictly 'solo' bits are short and infrequent. There is a slow middle section for solo violin with the piano as the principal element in the orchestral support. There is a highly sentimental waltz bit, and short fleeting passages with jazz implications, as well as an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this that the patterns are at least various."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

© Boris.

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Bos ymphony Orchestra, to Give All-Sibelius Program in First t Here Thursday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

Boston Symphony Here on Thursday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give its first pair of local concerts this season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week.

The Thursday program will be devoted entirely to music by Jan Sibelius. The opening number is the tone poem "Tapiola," which has not been heard here since Walter Damrosch conducted it in 1926. The first symphony, in E minor, and a suite from the incidental music to "Swanwhite," a play by Strindberg, complete the program.

John Alden Carpenter, the well known composer of the ballet "Skyscraper," will be the soloist in his new composition for piano and orchestra, "Patterns," on Saturday afternoon. According to Mr. Carpenter the work has "no literary or programmatic significance." The orchestra will also play the "Skyscraper" suite and the second symphony of Brahms.

UN

and Musicians

W. J. HENDERSON

A questioned the justice of lauding conductors for all that is good in orchestral performances. The question is well founded. If Mr. Toscanini, who recently made the atmosphere of Carnegie glow with celestial fires when he conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony musicians in a program of Wagner's music, should journey further downtown and assume direction of a Wagner performance at the Metropolitan Opera House, what would we hear? Would the orchestral splendors rival those of the now memorable special concert?

The Philharmonic organization rehearses arduously for each concert, and it is well known to the inner brotherhood that Mr. Toscanini spares neither his men nor himself. The opera orchestra also rehearses, but its powers of concentration are scattered over several large scores and directed by several conductors. And what is undeniable, the Philharmonic is superior in artistic quality. It is a shining example of what a concert orchestra can be in our day.

When the Philharmonic was in its youth the members of the orchestra were the society. They engaged a conductor and paid him out of the earnings of the twelve concerts of the season. If there was any surplus, they divided it among themselves. One unhappy result of this system was that when a man had become a member of the Philharmonic, it was not easy to retire him. He continued to go through the motions of playing long after his efforts had any musical value. There were gray heads at too many desks.

Today the plan is so different that the best orchestral virtuosi available are engaged in the orchestra and the artistic quality of the instrumental body is far beyond anything that enlivened the fondest dreams of Thomas or Seidl. The technical skill of a typical symphony orchestra of today is extraordinary. Frequently one hears it said that the individual orchestra players of this hour are all better than those of forty years ago. This is not an exact statement of the case. There were violinists of high ability in the early Philharmonic, but not enough of them. Now it can be said that unless a man is a first-rate orchestral player he is not engaged for a symphony orchestra of importance. Musicians who fumble or stumble or blur their passages are not employed; neither are those who are not thoroughly dependable sight readers. The fact is that the modern symphony orchestra comes pretty close to being a body of men all capable of exposed solo work.

With such large technical equipment and adequate rehearsal, most of these men have also better instruments than their predecessors. The men are better paid; they can afford better instruments. The conductors will not tolerate bad tone. If the man wishes to keep his position, he must produce good tone. He cannot do so if his instrument does not contain it. Col. Higginson, founder of the Boston orchestra, felt the importance of good instruments so keenly that he bought them for his organization. Good violins have been available for a great many years. Good wind instruments could also be had; but the improvements in both wood and brass in recent years have been priceless. The experiments of the Mahillon Freres of Brussels, for instance, have incomparably enriched and dignified the quality of brass. These makers have done almost as much for the wood winds. There are also in our own country makers who produce instruments of the first rank.

The conservatories are giving more attention to wind and percussion instruments, and they have their own orchestras in which young men and women can learn the necessary routine. Outside of the conservatories such organizations as the National Orchestral Association are providing the best of training for young players. The orchestra should indeed always be thankful and lauded for a good performance. The conductor assuredly cannot have all the glory.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

NOV 12 1932

MATINEE SERIES BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

The attention of music lovers in this city is drawn to the opportunity conveniently to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is often called the greatest orchestra in the world under ideal conditions in Symphony hall, its own splendid auditorium in Boston. The orchestra will give a series of six concerts on Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 22. These concerts start at 3 o'clock, and end before 5. Indeed, the Tuesday afternoon series has a very large patronage from outlying towns for this reason.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has already won many laurels in its present 52nd season, which began last month. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is beginning his ninth season at the head of the orchestra, has led his men with the most brilliant success through classical and new pieces in the programs so far given. The personnel of 110 remains without change the unmatched assemblage of virtuosi from all parts of the world which it has been in seasons past.

The Tuesday afternoon subscribers will hear the full orchestra under its extraordinary leader and under ideal conditions. Dr. Koussevitzky will choose for this series the most outstanding masterpieces, both new and old, from the longer series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

The great composers will each be represented in a series, arranged, so far as the interest and balance of each program will allow, in historical sequence. The evolution of symphonic music will be laid before the hearer, as exemplified by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubent, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Strauss, Debussy and Stravinsky. Such an opportunity for a comprehensive enjoyment of symphonic music in the beauties of each epoch is the experience of a life-time.

The Tuesday concerts will be given on Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 7, March 7, March 28, and April 18.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

Boston Symphony Here on Thursday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give its first pair of local concerts this season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week.

The Thursday program will be devoted entirely to music by Jan Sibelius. The opening number is the tone poem "Tapiola," which has not been heard here since Walter Damrosch conducted it in 1926. The first symphony, in E minor, and a suite from the incidental music to "Swanwhite," a play by Strindberg, complete the program.

John Alden Carpenter, the well known composer of the ballet "Skyscraper," will be the soloist in his new composition for piano and orchestra, "Patterns," on Saturday afternoon. According to Mr. Carpenter the work has "no literary or programmatic significance." The orchestra will also play the "Skyscraper" suite and the second symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON, MASS.
TIMES
NOV 12 1932

SYMPHONY TO GIVE SERIES OF CONCERTS

The attention of music lovers in this city is drawn to the opportunity conveniently to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is often called the greatest orchestra in the world, under ideal conditions in Symphony hall, its own splendid auditorium in Boston. The orchestra will give a series of six concerts on Tuesday afternoons, beginning Nov. 22. These concerts start at 3 o'clock, and ending before 5, fit conveniently into a shopping day of a visitor to Boston. Indeed, the Tuesday afternoon series has a very large patronage from outlying towns for this reason.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has already won many laurels in its present 52nd season, which began last month. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is beginning his ninth season at the head of the orchestra, has led his men with the most brilliant success through classical and new pieces in the programs so far given. The personnel of one hundred and ten remains without changing the unmatched assemblage of virtuosi from all parts of the world which it has been in seasons past.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

© Boris.

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to Give ~~All-Sibelius~~ Program in First Concert Here Thursday.

N. Y. EVENING POST

2 1932

Music : By Oscar Thompson

In His All-Sibelius Program, Koussevitzky Recalls the Motto of Sunny ~~Side Up~~

AS IF TO SAY, "You want Sibelius! Then you get Sibelius!" Serge Koussevitzky is propounding an all-Sibelius program for his first New York audience of the season on Thursday night, when the Boston Symphony resumes its visits to Carnegie Hall. No one who knows the Boston conductor's record of loyal and courageous pioneering for the music of Sibelius could suspect him, however, of anything that might savor remotely of disservice or of a variety of musical sabotage in so high a cause.

An all-Sibelius program is, on its face, rather a large order for a public that is by no means sure that it likes or understands the Finnish composer. For many, Sibelius may be said to be in much the same situation as was Brahms forty, even thirty, years ago. To have set before the rank and file of concertgoers of that day an all-Brahms orchestral program would have been to alienate many and stupify more. It was one of America's most distinguished critics, the late Henry T. Finck, who wrote: "If there is Brahms on the program, look for the nearest exit." We could cite instances today of concert habitues who formerly disliked Brahms, then grew to adore him and who still dislike Sibelius. For them a gradual initiation through repeated performances of the Sibelius works, given in company with other music already accepted and liked, would appear to be a more promising course than sudden baptism by complete immersion in concerts of nothing but Sibelius.

Before this notion is permitted to build up a prejudice against Mr. Koussevitzky's daring undertaking, the particular program fashioned for New York's consumption should be examined in detail. There is no Seventh Symphony here. No Fourth. The structural problems of the later symphonies—from No. 4 on—are not to be encountered in this program. Elsewhere is to be sought the tendency toward spareness, toward the elimination of all purely decorative or supplementary material, toward condensation of musical thought into kernals that can be likened to the subject matter of a fugue, to be treated as building blocks for the erection of symphonic edifices as severe as they are complex. Instead, the program will bring back the somewhat Tchaikovskian fervors of Symphony No. 1, composed more than thirty years ago; the not very ponderous incidental music written for a Swedish play, Strindberg's "Svanehvit" ("Swanwhite"), a suite of small numbers bearing such titles as "The Peacock "The Harp," "The Maiden W Roses," "Listen, the Robin Sings" "Song of Praise" (with two other Mr. Koussevitzky will omit), com in 1908, and the tone-poem, ola," a relatively recent succ "En Saga" and "The Swa onela," prepare the way for that noteworthy event. One difficulty with respect to Sibelius is that the successive symphonies have come to our ears without our being sufficiently familiar with what has gone before. Performances have been so scattered and so haphazard as to afford no one but a few specialists and zealots the line of continuity necessary to grasp the composer's development and growth.

IN REVERTING to the First Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky is playing a work that is sufficiently popular in character to have caused some critics to describe its thematic substance as banal. Whatever the justice of his judgment, the ordinary concertgoers of Sweden and Norway—as this writer learned on a recent visit—have taken this Finnish symphony to their hearts and have made of it a fixture in their orchestral repertory. Though Sibelius lately has been exculpated of the not very heinous offense of using national folk-material anywhere in his larger works, the symphony has recognizable tunes of a folk character. Today its supposed "dourness" is to be looked upon as something of the imagination of those who were baffled by it three decades ago.

The "Svanehvit" Suite was desc by Strindberg as "graceful and d nted," words that seldom rt in reviews written elius. Attention "poetic fan- "imagi- the

ABBEY THEATRE PLAYERS
Direct from Abbey Theatre, Dublin
Repertory of Brilliant Plays
Last 2 Times

BARBIZON
SUNDAY
"Heartily Recommended" by Stephen Rat
With the clever personalities
OPENS TOMORROW, CONTINUES
Seats at Box Office. POPULAR

CARROLL VAN
Greatest Revue GIRLS IN THE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 13 1932

Program on Sibelius

"Swanwhite" Suite, Unknown in This Country, Will Be Heard.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 17, at 8.45, and Saturday afternoon, November 19, at 2.30.

A program of the music of Jan Sibelius will be presented at the Thursday concert. The Finnish composer's tone poem, "Tapiola," will be revived, also his "Swanwhite," a suite from the incidental music to Stroudsberg's play, opus 5. Sibelius' First Symphony in E minor will end the program.

The suite, unknown in this country, was published in 1909. The movements to be played are: The Peacock, The Harp, The Maiden with Roses, Listen, the Robin Sings and Song of Praise.

The tone poem is based upon a short characteristic phrase which is developed with many changes of orchestral coloring. It rises to a climax with a chromatic passage for the entire strings, reaching what Cecil Gray calls "one of the greatest climaxes in all music, like a convulsion of nature."

At the matinee concert, John Alden Carpenter will be the guest of honor as composer and pianist in "Patterns," the piece which he wrote for this orchestra and recently performed with them in Boston. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," a ballet of modern American life, will also be performed as an orchestral piece. The program will begin with Brahms' Symphony in D major, No. 2.

"Patterns," written for orchestra with piano obligato, has, according to the composer, "no literary or programmatic significance. It is not primarily a show piece for the pianist—the strictly 'solo' bits are short and infrequent. There is a slow middle section for solo violin with the piano as the principal element in the orchestral support. There is a highly sentimental waltz bit, and short fleeting passages with jazz implications, as well as an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this that the patterns are at least various."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

A MUSIC lover lately questioned the justice of lauding conductors for all that is good in orchestral performances. The question is well founded. If Mr. Toscanini, who recently made the atmosphere of Carnegie glow with celestial fires when he conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony musicians in a program of Wagner's music, should journey further downtown and assume direction of a Wagner performance at the Metropolitan Opera House, what would we hear? Would the orchestral splendors rival those of the now memorable special concert?

The Philharmonic organization rehearses arduously for each concert, and it is well known to the inner brotherhood that Mr. Toscanini spares neither his men nor himself. The opera orchestra also rehearses, but its powers of concentration are scattered over several large scores and directed by several conductors. And what is undeniable, the Philharmonic is superior in artistic quality. It is a shining example of what a concert orchestra can be in our day.

When the Philharmonic was in its youth the members of the orchestra were the society. They engaged a conductor and paid him out of the earnings of the twelve concerts of the season. If there was any surplus, they divided it among themselves. One unhappy result of this system was that when a man had become a member of the Philharmonic, it was not easy to retire him. He continued to go through the motions of playing long after his efforts had any musical value. There were gray heads at too many desks.

Today the plan is so different that the best orchestral virtuosi available are engaged in the orchestra and the artistic quality of the instrumental body is far beyond anything that enlivened the fondest dreams of Thomas or Seidl. The technical skill of a typical symphony orchestra of today is extraordinary. Frequently one hears it said that the individual orchestra players of this hour are all better than those of forty years ago. This is not an exact statement of the case. There were violinists of high ability in the early Philharmonic, but not enough of them. Now it can be said that unless a man is a first-rate orchestral player he is not engaged for a symphony orchestra of importance. Musicians who fumble or stumble or blur their passages are not employed; neither are those who are not thoroughly dependable sight readers. The fact is that the modern symphony orchestra comes pretty close to being a body of men all capable of exposed solo work.

With such large technical equipment and adequate rehearsal, most of these men have also better instruments than their predecessors. The men are better paid; they can afford better instruments. The conductors will not tolerate bad tone. If the man wishes to keep his position, he must produce good tone. He cannot do so if his instrument does not contain it. Col. Higginson, founder of the Boston orchestra, felt the importance of good instruments so keenly that he bought them for his organization. Good violins have been available for a great many years. Good wind instruments could also be had; but the improvements in both wood and brass in recent years have been priceless. The experiments of the Mahillon Freres of Brussels, for instance, have incomparably enriched and dignified the quality of brass. These makers have done almost as much for the wood winds. There are also in our own country makers who produce instruments of the first rank.

The conservatories are giving more attention to wind and percussion instruments, and they have their own orchestras in which young men and women can learn the necessary routine. Outside of the conservatories such organizations as the National Orchestral Association are providing the best of training for young players. The orchestra should indeed always be thankful and lauded for a good performance. The conductor assuredly cannot have all the glory.

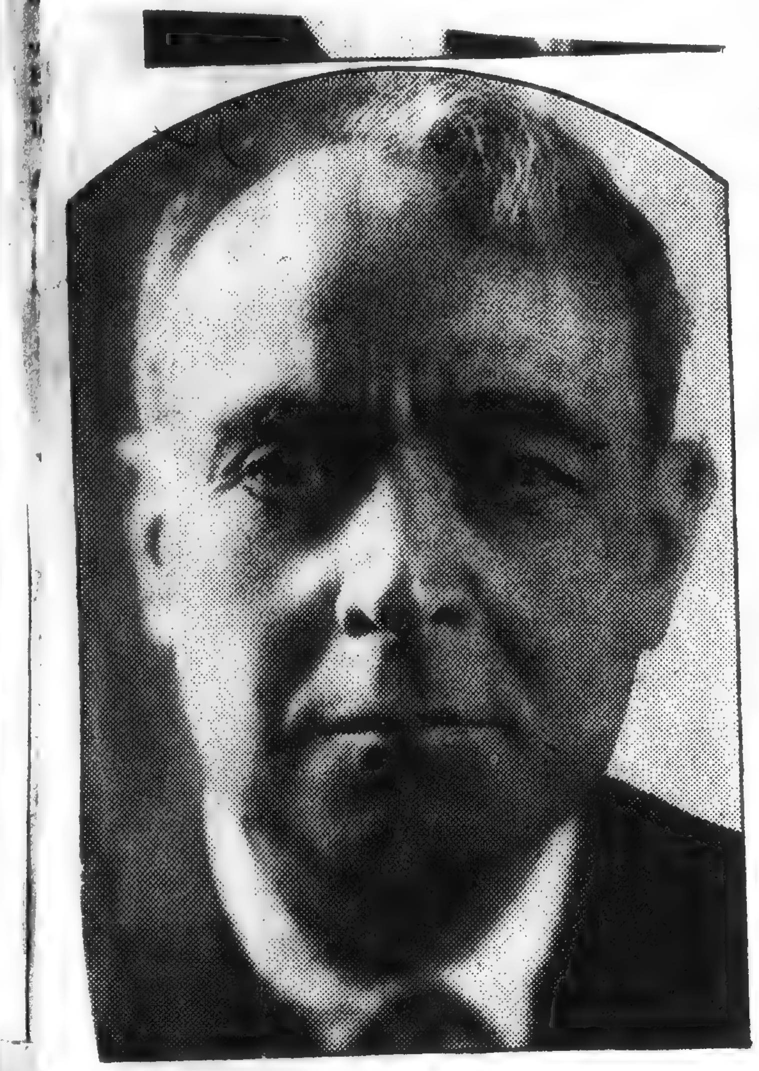
* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

All-Sibelius Evening by Boston Symphony —Ensembles and Recitalists

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the diirection of Serge Koussevitzky, comes to New York for its first concert of the season here and offers on Thursday evening an all-Sibelius program, including the "Swanwhite" suite; the tone poem, "Tapiola," and Symphony No. 1. Two compositions by John Alden Carpenter will be performed by the orchestra at its Saturday matinee concert. They are "Patterns," in which he will appear as piano soloist, and "Skyscrapers."

Feodor Chaliapin will make his first appearance in four years on the American concert stage this evening, when he gives a benefit concert at Carnegie Hall.



Boris photo, Boston

NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 13

ORCHESTRAS

hestra, in its fifty-second season and its orship of Serge Koussevitzky, will give its first New York conc the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening at 8:45 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30. The Thursday program will be devoted entirely to the music of Jan Sibelius, whose tone-poem, "Tapiola," will be heard here for the first time in six years.

"Tapiola" was composed by Sibelius on a commission from the Symphony Society of New York, which played it for the first time on December 26, 1926, at Mecca Auditorium under the direction of Walter Damrosch, who repeated the work at Carnegie Hall four days later. It has not been heard here since, but is said to have fared better in Europe. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston in the concerts of November 4 and 5. The name is derived from Tapio, the forest god in Finnish mythology.

The other numbers on Thursday's list are the first symphony, in E minor (1899), the most frequently played of the Finnish composer's seven completed works in this form, and the "Swan White" suite, taken from his incidental music, Op. 54, to Strindberg's play of this name. "Tapiola" will also be played by the Boston Symphony Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

On the Saturday afternoon program, John Alden Carpenter will be the pianist in his "Patterns" for orchestra with piano obbligato, a work first performed in the Boston concerts of October 21 and 22. This has, he writes, "no literary or programmatic significance. It is not a show piece for the pianist—the strictly 'solo' bits are short and infrequent. There is a slow middle section for solo violin with the piano as the principal element in the orchestral support. There is a highly sentimental waltz bit, and short fleeting passages with jazz implications, as well as an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this that the patterns are at least various." The program also includes the music of Mr. Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House on February 19, 1926.

The Boston Symphony management, scanning the subscription list for its Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony Hall, notes that only 700 of the 2,500 subscribers are residents of Boston. The others come from neighboring and remoter communities, making an average journey of twenty-four miles each way to hear each concert. Among remoter points represented in the subscription are Northampton, Mass.; Manchester, N. H.; Hartford, Danielson, Norwich and Stonington, Conn.; Portland, Me., and Woodstock, Vt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Brooklyn Times Union

NOV 13

Institute Announces Patrons and Patronesses For Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the first concert of the season Friday evening, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Citizen's Committee of which Adrian Van Sindersen is chairman, in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The vice chairmen of the committee are:

Frank L. Babbott
Mrs. Edward C. Blum
Judge Frederick E. Crane
Walter H. Crittenden
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. William H. Good
Frederick T. Aldridge
Dr. Joseph D. Allen
Juan A. Almirall
Frank L. Babbott, jr.
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
R. Huntington Woodman
Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.
William M. Calder
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. George W. Chauncey
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford
Judge James C. Cropsey
Judge Norman S. Dike
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. Guy DuVal
S. Raymond Estey
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Theodore L. Frothingham
William Peter Hamilton
Walter Hammitt
George Hewlett
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
William T. Hunter
Darwin R. James
Dr. William A. Jewett
James H. Jourdan
Charles D. Lay
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
George V. Laughlin
Mrs. William W. Marshall
W. S. Morton Mead
Frank C. Munson
Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. George Notman
Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
James H. Post
Charles E. Potts
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
Mrs. Donald Ross
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr.
H. Stavely Sammond
Mrs. Henry Spelman
Porter Steele
Mrs. Norman Stutzer
Miss Marion J. Terry
William Armour Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Paul E. Vernon
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Eugene A. Widman
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Surrogate George A. Wingate
Cornelius D. Wood
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Times Union

IN SEASON'

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

The ~~Boston Symphony~~ Or its first concert of the new Mannes next Sunday evening to Henry Hadley on the Orchestral Society.

Boston and Philharmonic Orchestras to Visit Boro

Koussevitzky to Play Sibelius Poem—Toscanini Plans Schubert Symphony—Manhattan Group to Open Season—Concert Notes.

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Two orchestras will be heard in B what with Serge Koussevitsky phony to the Academy of M

It is interesting to not that Mr. Koussevitsky will give Brooklyn an opportunity on Friday evening of hearing the tone poem "Tapiola" by Sibelius. This reviewer is among those who welcome the renewed interest in the Finnish composer's works which seems to have become a part of the new season. "Tapiola" was introduced to this city by Walter Damrosch with the old New York Symphony Society not so many years ago. It is not "Finlandia," but it represents a distinct phase of Sibelius' work, and personally I commend it to Brooklyn. Not that it has my heartfelt approval, but I belive both this and the seventh symphony by the same composer should be brought back into repertoire.

The Franck symphony, the vorspiel to "Meistersinger," and the overture to Weber's "Oberon" are the other program numbers arranged by Mr. Koussevitsky

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 13 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES OFFERED

Six Afternoon Concerts By Full Orchestra to Start Nov. 22

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a series of six concerts on Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 22 at Symphony hall, Boston. These concerts start at 3 o'clock and end before 5, for the convenience of out-of-town patrons. For the convenience of Worcester patrons a special sale of tickets will be held at Steinert's, 308 Main street, beginning Monday and lasting for four days.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has already won many laurels in its present 52d season, which began last month. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is beginning his ninth season as head of the orchestra, has led his men with success through classical and new works in the programs so far given. The personal of 110 remains without change. The Tuesday afternoon subscribers will hear the full orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

N. Y. Times Studio.

John Alden Carpenter, Composer, Who Will Appear as Piano Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday, in His "Patterns."

Orchestral Calendar Trans Nov 18

The pamphlet-calendar of the Symphony Orchestra for the current musical year indicates one or two departures from custom. Thus, the second concert for the Pension Fund is set for Sunday afternoon, April 30, immediately after the final subscription concerts. The first concert for the fund is announced for Sunday afternoon, Feb. 26. . . . As Saturday, Dec. 24, is Christmas Eve, the usual Symphony Concert is set back to the preceding Thursday. . . . On its annual journey Southward in February, the orchestra will play for the first time in Reading, Penn., substitute for the usual Richmond. . . . There is no mention in the calendar of a Centenary Festival, in the spring, for Brahms. But a final sentence, "Other dates to be announced," may imply it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

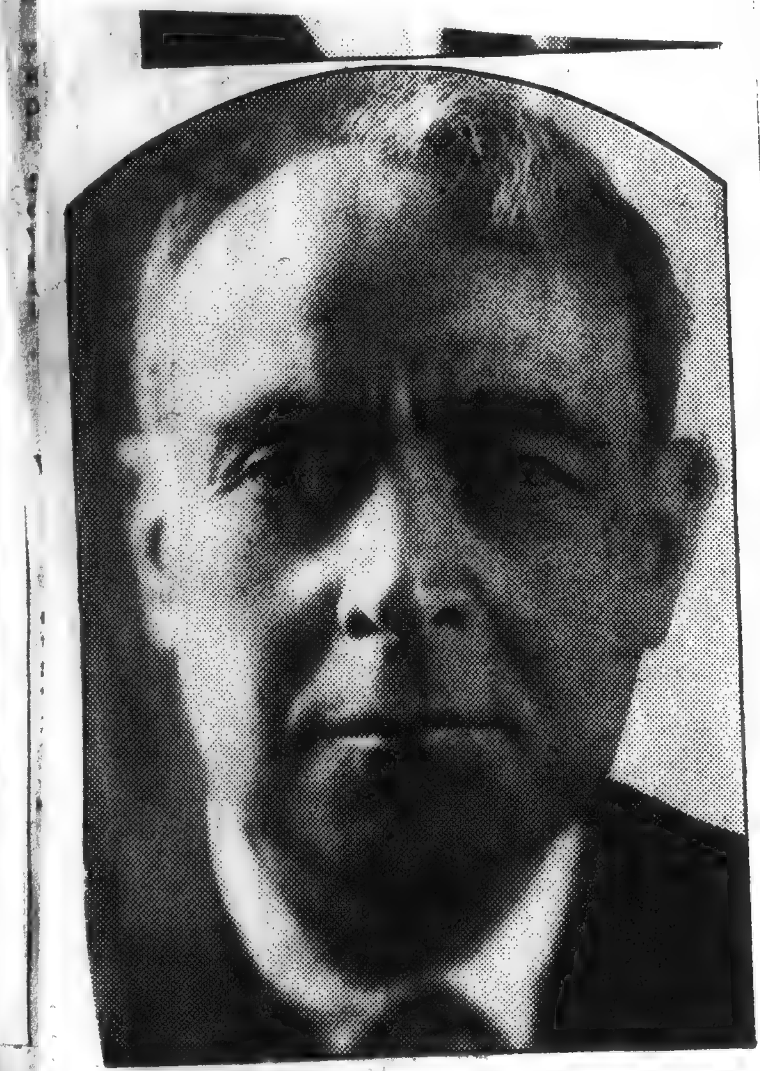
13 19

New "Decadal Hymn" Heard at Scala

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, comes to New York for its first concert of the season here and offers on Thursday evening an all-Sibelius program, including the "Swanwhite" suite; the tone poem, "Tapiola," and Symphony No. 1. Two compositions by John Alden Carpenter will be performed by the orchestra at its Saturday matinee concert. They are "Patterns," in which he will appear as piano soloist, and "Skyscrapers."

Feodor Chaliapin will make his first appearance in four years on the American concert stage this evening, when he gives a benefit concert at Carnegie Hall.

of the current week



Boris photo, Boston

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 13 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES OFFERED

Six Afternoon Concerts By Full Orchestra to Start Nov. 22

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a series of six concerts on Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 22 at Symphony hall, Boston. These concerts start at 3 o'clock and end before 5, for the convenience of out-of-town patrons. For the convenience of Worcester patrons a special sale of tickets will be held at Steinert's, 308 Main street, beginning Monday and lasting for four days.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has already won many laurels in its present 52d season, which began last month. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who is beginning his ninth season as head of the orchestra, has led his men with success through classical and new works in the programs so far given. The personal of 110 remains without change. The Tuesday afternoon subscribers will hear the full orchestra.

HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 13

ORCHESTRAS

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its fifty-second season and its eighth under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, will give its first New York concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening at 8:45 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30. The Thursday program will be devoted entirely to the music of Jan Sibelius, whose tone-poem, "Tapiola," will be heard here for the first time in six years.

"Tapiola" was composed by Sibelius on a commission from the Symphony Society of New York, which played it for the first time on December 26, 1926, at Mecca Auditorium under the direction of Walter Damrosch, who repeated the work at Carnegie Hall four days later. It has not been heard here since, but is said to have fared better in Europe. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston in the concerts of November 4 and 5. The name is derived from Tapio, the forest god in Finnish mythology.

The other numbers on Thursday's list are the first symphony, in E minor (1899), the most frequently played of the Finnish composer's seven completed works in this form, and the "Swan White" suite, taken from his incidental music, Op. 54, to Strindberg's play of this name. "Tapiola" will also be played by the Boston Symphony Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

On the Saturday afternoon program, John Alden Carpenter will be the pianist in his "Patterns" for orchestra with piano obbligato, a work first performed in the Boston concerts of October 21 and 22. This has, he writes, "no literary or programmatic significance. It is not a show piece for the pianist—the strictly 'solo' bits are short and infrequent. There is a slow middle section for solo violin with the piano as the principal element in the orchestral support. There is a highly sentimental waltz bit, and short fleeting passages with jazz implications, as well as an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this that the patterns are at least various." The program also includes the music of Mr. Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House on February 19, 1926.

The Boston Symphony management, scanning the subscription list for its Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony Hall, notes that only 700 of the 2,500 subscribers are residents of Boston. The others come from neighboring and remoter communities, making an average journey of twenty-four miles each way to hear each concert. Among remoter points represented in the subscription are Northampton, Mass.; Manchester, N. H.; Hartford, Danielson, Norwich and Stonington, Conn.; Portland, Me., and Woodstock, Vt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Brooklyn Times Union

NOV 13

Institute Announces Patrons and Patronesses For Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the first concert of the season Friday evening, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Citizen's Committee of which Adrian Van Sindersen is chairman, in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The vice chairmen of the committee are:

Frank L. Babbott
Mrs. Edward C. Blum
Judge Frederick E. Crane
Walter H. Crittenden
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. William H. Good
Frederick T. Aldridge
Dr. Joseph D. Allen
Juan A. Almirall
Frank L. Babbott, jr.
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
R. Huntington Woodman
Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.
William M. Calder
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. George W. Chauncey
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford
Judge James C. Cropsey
Judge Norman S. Dike
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. Guy DuVal
S. Raymond Estey
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Theodore L. Frothingham
William Peter Hamilton
Walter Hammitt
George Hewlett
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
William T. Hunter
Darwin R. James
Dr. William A. Jewett
James H. Jourdan
Charles D. Lay
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
George V. Laughlin
Mrs. William W. Marshall
W. S. Morton Mead
Frank C. Munson
Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. George Notman
Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
James H. Post
Charles E. Potts
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
Mrs. Donald Ross
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr.
H. Stavely Sammond
Mrs. Henry Spelman
Porter Steele
Mrs. Norman Stutzer
Miss Marion J. Terry
William Armour Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Paul E. Vernon
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Eugene A. Widman
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Surrogate George A. Wingate
Cornelius D. Wood
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

1932

N. Y. Times Studio.

John Alden Carpenter, Composer, Who Will Appear as Piano Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday, in His "Patterns."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Times Union

IN SEASON'S

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

The ~~Boston Symphony~~ O its first concert of the new Mannes next Sunday evening to Henry Hadley on the Orchestral Society.

Boston and Philharmonic Orchestras to Visit Boro

Koussevitsky to Play Sibelius Poem—Toscanini Plans Schubert Symphony—Manhattan Group to Open Season—Concert Notes.

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Two orchestras will be what with Serge Koussevits
phony to the Academy of M

It is interesting to not that Mr. Koussevitsky will give Brooklyn an opportunity on Friday evening of hearing the tone poem "Tapiola" by Sibelius. This reviewer is among those who welcome the renewed interest in the Finnish composer's works which seems to have become a part of the new season. "Tapiola" was introduced to this city by Walter Damrosch with the old New York Symphony Society not so many years ago. It is not "Finlandia," but it represents a distinct phase of Sibelius' work, and personally I commend it to Brooklyn. Not that it has my heartfelt approval, but I belive both this and the seventh symphony by the same composer should be brought back into repertoire.

The Franck symphony, the vorspiel to "Meistersinger," and the overture to Weber's "Oberon" are the other program numbers arranged by Mr. Koussevitsky

---

Orchestral Calendar Trans Nov 18

The pamphlet-calendar of the Symphony Orchestra for the current musical year indicates one or two departures from custom. Thus, the second concert for the Pension Fund is set for Sunday afternoon, April 30, immediately after the final subscription concerts. The first concert for the fund is announced for Sunday afternoon, Feb. 26. . . . As Saturday, Dec. 24, is Christmas Eve, the usual Symphony Concert is set back to the preceding Thursday. . . . On its annual journey Southward in February, the orchestra will play for the first time in Reading, Penn., substitute for the usual Richmond. . . . There is no mention in the calendar of a Centenary Festival, in the spring, for Brahms. But a final sentence, "Other dates to be announced," may imply it.

Concert-Chronicle

About Programs Nov. 14 '32

THERE were occasional complaints over the week-end that the program at the Symphony Concert had been over-heavy. That is to say, after the little Symphony of Haydn, hardly more than ten minutes long, with which it began, came Bax's "Winter Legends," lengthy, novel, and exacting; then, to conclude, the first Symphony of Sibelius long also and emotionally strenuous, but by no means new to the assembled companies. The complainants itemized were (1) those who believe that all concerts—and all plays—exist fundamentally for the business man who likes to believe himself tired, though he works no harder, and often less hard, than those who follow the professions or "merely" keep a house and a home in order and in motion; (2) those who prefer light listening and would have "sweet" music as they call it—the bit from Haydn delighted them; (3) those who resent any tax anywhere upon attention, in talk, between covers, at the theater or in the concert-hall. A "long session" over anything is their especial abhorrence.

On the other side, it may be noted that the ten minutes of Haydn were an amiable introduction to the concert as pleasing to the sternest highbrows as they were to the sweet-toothed—or rather sweet-eared—listeners. In the second place, the contrast of Sibelius after Bax was refreshing and stimulating. Sibelius's Symphony is direct, lyrical, emotionally forthright. At both concerts, under glowing performance, both audiences found it irresistible—the more because "Winter Legends" had been austere in matter, intricate in evolution, remote and grim in address to answering moods. To hear it reciprocally was to hold the perceptive faculties unrelaxingly to its progress.

Furthermore, it may not be too idealistic to believe that the Symphony Concerts, as one of the few surviving seats of the arts in Boston that still keeps to high standards, should make room as often as need be for such deep-set, strenuous music as that of Bax in "Winter Legends." Those who like to set their teeth in a resistful piece and see what they may tear from it—by no means a remnant of the public—have right to the pleasures of thought and emotion so gained. The Symphony Concerts may not reasonably be restricted to numbers that are easy or exciting listening.

Within the longest memory no conductor at Symphony Hall has been so skillful and persistent as Dr. Koussevitzky in preserving the desirable balance of programs. Recall the pairings of the current season: at the first concerts Respighi's version of Bach's Passacaglia and the lyrical Second Symphony of Brahms; at the second the rambling "Romantic Symphony" of Bruckner and the tense "Don Juan" of Strauss; at the third, the visionary Franck in his organ-loft and the actual, urban Carpenter at Coney Island; at the fourth the shadows of Sibelius's "Tapiola" beside the high lights of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. These are the programs of a conductor who does not assemble the numbers by a dip into the nearest drawer; who now for a ninth year gives to each pair of concerts a particular interest and a stimulating vitality.

No Paradise for New Pianists

As usual when a new pianist is fortunate in an orchestral piece at Symphony Hall, some are regretting that Miss Cohen does not forthwith venture a concert of her own in Boston. She is far wiser to reserve that exercise for the larger, more open-minded, public of New York. Mr. Horowitz is the only recent exception to the rule that such recitals are usually ill-attended. (Witness Mr. Iturbi's concert on a Sunday afternoon to a hall that was almost empty.) By precedent out of the five thousand who heard and applauded Miss Cohen last Friday and Saturday, a hundred and fifty might pay money at the door to hear her in solo-pieces. Mr. Gieseking and Mr. Horowitz aside, Boston is the city for elderly pianists whose reputations have outlasted their powers. Here, even Mr. Hofmann, at zenith, cannot draw a full house.

Incidents and Prospects

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will give their first concerts in New York for the current musical year. For Thursday the conductor makes an "All-Sibelius" program: the First Symphony; "Tapiola"; five of the seven numbers in the Suite for Small Orchestra of incidental music to Strindberg's fairy play, "Swanwhite," dated 1908, as yet unheard in Boston. For Saturday the program lists Brahms's Second Symphony; Mr. Carpenter's new "Patterns," with the composer as pianist; his ballet of "Skyscrapers."

No observer of programs through the first month of symphony concerts in the musical capitals of these United States can fail to note how Strauss, Sibelius and Stravinsky predominate among living composers. By decision of what Ernest Newman likes to call "the plain man," Stravinsky now has place beside the other two.

A recent performance of Franck's Symphony in London provoked demur similar to that lately raised in Boston. The reviewer for The Daily Telegraph complained of "the dross" in the Symphony. The reviewer for The Times heard an organ "with every stop newly and perfectly voiced."

Among the pieces new to Chicago that Mr. Stock has in mind for current performance are Professor Hill's tone-poem, "Lilacs"; Mr. Copland's First Symphony—for organ and orchestra; Mahler's Ninth Symphony; Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony"; Prokofiev's "They Are Seven," Ravel's new Concerto—all remembered pieces at Symphony Hall. Mr. Stock—be it also remembered—is a "conservative" conductor.

Those who were surprised at the interest and the merit of Mr. Gershwin's Piano-Concerto when they heard it last June from Mr. Sanromá and Mr. Fiedler at a "Sunday Pop," may take fresh courage as they read Mr. Robert Simon in the current New Yorker, saluting it as "the quintessence of the best Gershwin."

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

SYMPHONY OPENS BUSHNELL SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky to Conduct Concert Here To-night.

The Bushnell concert series of the current season will be auspiciously opened to-night with a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

For the capacity audience of 3,300 persons which will attend this brilliant event, another interesting symphonic program has been prepared.

Dr. Kroussevitzky will begin the evening with Weber's overture to "Oberon." Next on the program is Caesar Franck's famous "Symphony in D Minor." This will be followed by the new Sibelius tone poem, "Tapiola," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurhnberg."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This program, including as it does, three classics and an important modern work by one of the greatest living composers, has aroused enthusiastic interest among Hartford music lovers.

The concert to-night is scheduled to begin at 8:15 o'clock, William H. Mortensen, managing director of the Bushnell memorial, has announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra is giving concerts in Hartford, New York and Brooklyn. Next week Friday and Saturday the guest artist will be the eminent pianist, Florent Schmidt, who will play in his Symphonie Concertante for Orchestra and Piano, Op. 82, which will have its first performance in Boston. Also on the program will be his composition, "Reves," op. 1. Continuing the Sibelius series, the program will be completed with the Second Symphony of the great Finnish composer, that in D major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

NOV 17 1932

Musical Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEW YORK CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its 52d season and its eighth under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, will give its first New York concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening at 8:45 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30, says the N. Y. Tribune. The Thursday program will be devoted entirely to the music of Jan Sibelius, whose tone-poem, "Tapiola," will be heard here for the first time in six years.

"Tapiola" was composed by Sibelius on a commission from the Symphony Society of New York, which played it for the first time on December 26, 1926, at Mecca Auditorium under the direction of Walter Damrosch, who repeated the work at Carnegie Hall four days later. It has not been heard here since, but is said to have fared better in Europe. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston in the concerts of November 4 and 5. The name is derived from Tapio, the forest god in Finnish mythology.

The other numbers on Thursday's list are the first symphony, in E minor (1899), the most frequently played of the Finnish composer's seven complete works in this form, and the "Swan White" suite, taken from his incidental music, Op. 54, to Strindberg's play of this name. "Tapiola" will also be played by the Boston Symphony Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

On the Saturday afternoon program, John Alden Carpenter will be the pianist in his "Patterns" for orchestra with piano obbligato, a work first performed in the Boston concerts of October 21 and 22. This has, he writes, "no literary or programmatic significance. It is not a show piece for the pianist—the strictly 'solo' bits are short and infrequent. There is a slow middle section for solo violin with the piano as the principal element in the orchestral support. There is a highly sentimental waltz bit, and short fleeting passages with jazz implications, as well as an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this that the patterns are at least various." The program also includes the music of Mr. Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House on February 19, 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS ADDED GLORY

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Capably Interprets Popular Compositions.

SIBELIUS WORK FEATURED

Franck "Symphony" Earns Greatest Approbation—Genius of Leader Disclosed.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky inaugurated the Bushnell symphonic series at the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall last evening before a large and enthusiastic gathering of music lovers. All present joined in a spontaneous ovation to both Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians. The following program was offered.

Overture to Oberon	Von Weber
Symphony in D minor,	Cesar Franck
Tapiola, tone poem	Sibelius
Prelude to "Meistersingers"...	Wagner

Except for the Sibelius work, the entire program was familiar to local concert goers. Tapiola will be given at New York concerts by the Bostonians this evening and Saturday afternoon, when Dr. Kousevitzky will present an all-Sibelius program.

Greatest approbation was given presentation of the Franck symphony. This, work last given here nearly two years ago by Leopold Stokowski and his Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, seemed to lend what was perhaps the greatest air of distinction to the program, and those present were quck to note the different phases of interpretation disclosed by Dr. Kousivitzky from those showed by his distinguished Philidelphia contemporary. Dr. Koussevitzky, the super-showman, and Stokowski, the zeolous dramatist, have both given Hartford noble conceptions of this symphony, utterly different in their content, yet both virile and musical episodes of surpassing interest.

From the opening measure of "Oberon" the dynamic leader gave a vividness of contrasts which betokened a unique, yet satisfactory performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky made a popular gesture when he chose the Franck "Symphony" for a place on his program. Dr. Koussevitzky, always a tonalist, pictured contracts which at times bordered even on the sensational, yet always with the musical vision which has lifted the Boston orchestra into the realm of the unusual.

The opening "Lento-Allegro non Troppo" was a proper preliminary for the good things which were to follow. The opening theme, splendidly phrased, was given with almost hypnotic genius for interpretation always noticeable in Dr. Koussevitzky's work. The balance of the orchestra was a thing of great interest, and the various choirs were brought together into a harmonious body of musicians under a leadership of great brilliancy.

In the "Allegretto," the spell of Dr. Koussevitsky's baton was manifest, and the pastel shades of the various moods were brought forth with devotion and sympathetic understanding.

The concluding "Allegro" was pictured with brilliancy and the climax was impressive.

The tone poem "Tapiola" was the only novelty and the genius of the conductor left the proper impression. Intricately interwoven themes, with unusual phrases of hidden import, combined in giving a descriptive reading of the composition. There was grace and delicacy, yet authority and sensitiveness. As an interpreter of Sibelius, Dr. Koussevitzky has no superiors.

The familiar "Meistersinger" prelude was given with refreshing zest and dramatic climaxes. The orchestra ensemble was most satisfying.

The next concert in this series will be given December 7, when Ossip Gabrilowitsch will bring the Detroit Symphony orchestra here for its second appearance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

1932

Congratulate Conductor Aft

—Hartford Times Photo.

In the Green room back stage at the Bushnell Memorial, Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns and their daughter, Miss Dotha Bushnell Seaverns, congratulated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, on his brilliant concert. The group includes, left to right, Mr. Seaverns, chairman of the board of trustees of the Bushnell, Miss Seaverns, Mrs. Seaverns, and Dr. Koussevitzky.

4-1

Concert-Chronicle

About Programs Nov. 14 '32

THERE were occasional complaints over the week-end that the program at the Symphony Concert had been over-heavy. That is to say, after the little Symphony of Haydn, hardly more than ten minutes long, with which it began, came Bax's "Winter Legends," lengthy, novel, and exacting; then, to conclude, the first Symphony of Sibelius long also and emotionally strenuous, but by no means new to the assembled companies. The complainants itemized were (1) those who believe that all concerts—and all plays—exist fundamentally for the business man who likes to believe himself tired, though he works no harder, and often less hard, than those who follow the professions or "merely" keep a house and a home in order and in motion; (2) those who prefer light listening and would have "sweet" music as they call it—the bit from Haydn delighted them; (3) those who resent any tax anywhere upon attention, in talk, between covers, at the theater or in the concert-hall. A "long session" over anything is their especial abhorrence.

On the other side, it may be noted that the ten minutes of Haydn were an amiable introduction to the concert as pleasing to the sternest highbrows as they were to the sweet-toothed—or rather sweet-eared—listeners. In the second place, the contrast of Sibelius after Bax was refreshing and stimulating. Sibelius's Symphony is direct, lyrical, emotionally forthright. At both concerts, under glowing performance, both audiences found it irresistible—the more because "Winter Legends" had been austere in matter, intricate in evolution, remote and grim in address to answering moods. To hear it reciprocally was to hold the perceptive faculties unrelaxingly to its progress.

Furthermore, it may not be too idealistic to believe that the Symphony Concerts, as one of the few surviving seats of the arts in Boston that still keeps to high standards, should make room as often as need be for such deep-set, strenuous music as that of Bax in "Winter Legends." Those who like to set their teeth in a resistful piece and see what they may tear from it—by no means a remnant of the public—have right to the pleasures of thought and emotion so gained. The Symphony Concerts may not reasonably be restricted to numbers that are easy or exciting listening.

Within the longest memory no conductor at Symphony Hall has been so skillful and persistent as Dr. Koussevitzky in preserving the desirable balance of programs. Recall the pairings of the current season: at the first concerts Respighi's version of Bach's Passacaglia and the lyrical Second Symphony of Brahms; at the second the rambling "Romantic Symphony" of Bruckner and the tense "Don Juan" of Strauss; at the third, the visionary Franck in his organ-loft and the actual, urban Carpenter at Coney Island; at the fourth the shadows of Sibelius's "Tapiola" beside the high lights of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. These are the programs of a conductor who does not assemble the numbers by a dip into the nearest drawer; who now for a ninth year gives to each pair of concerts a particular interest and a stimulating vitality.

No Paradise for New Pianists

As usual when a new pianist is fortunate in an orchestral piece at Symphony Hall, some are regretting that Miss Cohen does not forthwith venture a concert of her own in Boston. She is far wiser to reserve that exercise for the larger, more open-minded, public of New York. Mr. Horowitz is the only recent exception to the rule that such recitals are usually ill-attended. (Witness Mr. Iturbi's concert on a Sunday afternoon to a hall that was almost empty.) By precedent out of the five thousand who heard and applauded Miss Cohen last Friday and Saturday, a hundred and fifty might pay money at the door to hear her in solo-pieces. Mr. Gieseking and Mr. Horowitz aside, Boston is the city for elderly pianists whose reputations have outlasted their powers. Here, even Mr. Hofmann, at zenith, cannot draw a full house.

Incidents and Prospects

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will give their first concerts in New York for the current musical year. For Thursday the conductor makes an "All-Sibelius" program: the First Symphony; "Tapiola"; five of the seven numbers in the Suite for Small Orchestra of incidental music to Strindberg's fairy play, "Swanwhite," dated 1908, as yet unheard in Boston. For Saturday the program lists Brahms's Second Symphony; Mr. Carpenter's new "Patterns," with the composer as pianist; his ballet of "Skyscrapers."

No observer of programs through the first month of symphony concerts in the musical capitals of these United States can fail to note how Strauss, Sibelius and Stravinsky predominate among living composers. By decision of what Ernest Newman likes to call "the plain man," Stravinsky now has place beside the other two.

A recent performance of Franck's Symphony in London provoked demur similar to that lately raised in Boston. The reviewer for The Daily Telegraph complained of "the dross" in the Symphony. The reviewer for The Times heard an organ "with every stop newly and perfectly voiced."

Among the pieces new to Chicago that Mr. Stock has in mind for current performance are Professor Hill's tone-poem, "Lilacs"; Mr. Copland's First Symphony —for organ and orchestra; Mahler's Ninth Symphony; Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony"; Prokofiev's "They Are Seven," Ravel's new Concerto—all remembered pieces at Symphony Hall. Mr. Stock —be it also remembered—is a "conservative" conductor.

Those who were surprised at the interest and the merit of Mr. Gershwin's Piano-Concerto when they heard it last June from Mr. Sanromá and Mr. Fiedler at a "Sunday Pop," may take fresh courage as they read Mr. Robert Simon in the current New Yorker, saluting it as "the quintessence of the best Gershwin."

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

19

SYMPHONY OPENS BUSHNELL SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky to Conduct Concert Here To-night.

The Bushnell concert series of the current season will be auspiciously opened to-night with a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

For the capacity audience of 3,300 persons which will attend this brilliant event, another interesting symphonic program has been prepared.

Dr. Kroussevitzky will begin the evening with Weber's overture to "Oberon." Next on the program is Caesar Franck's famous "Symphony in D Minor." This will be followed by the new Sibelius tone poem, "Tapiola," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurhnberg."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This program, including as it does, three classics and an important modern work by one of the greatest living composers, has aroused enthusiastic interest among Hartford music lovers.

The concert to-night is scheduled to begin at 8:15 o'clock, William H. Mortensen, managing director of the Bushnell memorial, has announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

NOV 16 1932

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra is giving concerts in Hartford, New York and Brooklyn. Next week Friday and Saturday the guest artist will be the eminent pianist, Florent Schmidt, who will play in his Symphonie Concertante for Orchestra and Piano, Op. 82, which will have its first performance in Boston. Also on the program will be his composition, "Reves," op. 1. Continuing the Sibelius series, the program will be completed with the Second Symphony of the great Finnish composer, that in D major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

NOV 17 1932

Musical Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEW YORK CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its 52d season and its eighth under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, will give its first New York concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening at 8:45 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30, says the N. Y. Tribune. The Thursday program will be devoted entirely to the music of Jan Sibelius, whose tone-poem, "Tapiola," will be heard here for the first time in six years.

"Tapiola" was composed by Sibelius on a commission from the Symphony Society of New York, which played it for the first time on December 26, 1926, at Mecca Auditorium under the direction of Walter Damrosch, who repeated the work at Carnegie Hall four days later. It has not been heard here since, but is said to have fared better in Europe. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston in the concerts of November 4 and 5. The name is derived from Tapio, the forest god in Finnish mythology.

The other numbers on Thursday's list are the first symphony, in E minor (1899), the most frequently played of the Finnish composer's seven complete works in this form, and the "Swan White" suite, taken from his incidental music, Op. 54, to Strindberg's play of this name. "Tapiola" will also be played by the Boston Symphony Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

On the Saturday afternoon program, John Alden Carpenter will be the pianist in his "Patterns" for orchestra with piano obbligato, a work first performed in the Boston concerts of October 21 and 22. This has, he writes, "no literary or programmatic significance. It is not a show piece for the pianist —the strictly 'solo' bits are short and infrequent. There is a slow middle section for solo violin with the piano as the principal element in the orchestral support. There is a highly sentimental waltz bit, and short fleeting passages with jazz implications, as well as an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood. You can judge from this that the patterns are at least various." The program also includes the music of Mr. Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House on February 19, 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 17 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS ADDED GLORY

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Capably Interprets Popular el Cut Oatmeal....5c lb.

4c lb., 7 for 25c
4c lb. 7 for 25c
7c lb., 4 for 25c
9c lb., 3 for 25c
5c lb.
7c lb., 2 for 25c
13c lb., 2 for 25c
nnesota Wheat Flour
2.40 .... ½ bbl. Cotton
nnesota Wheat Flour
.65....1-8 bbl. Cotton
2 lbs. for 15c
2 lbs. for 15c
3 lbs. for 25c
18c lb.
2c lb., 15 for 25c
idewalks in cold weather)
2c lb., 15 for 25c
3c lb., 10 for 25c
ANS AND PEAS
ans ....4c lb., 7 for 25c
6c lb., 5 for 25c
6c lb., 5 for 25c
6c lb. 5 for 25c
ns ....9c lb., 3 for 25c
9c lb., 3 for 25c
7c lb., 4 for 25c
9c lb., 3 for 25c
9c lb., 3 for 25c
9c lb., 3 for 25c
9c lb., 3 for 25c
FRUITS
PEELS
9c lb., 3 for 25c
7c lb., 4 for 25c
13c lb., 2 for 25c

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 17 1932

Congratulate Conductor After Concert

—Hartford Times Photo.

In the Green room back stage at the Bushnell Memorial, Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns and their daughter, Miss Dotha Bushnell Seaverns, congratulated Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, on his brilliant concert. The group includes, left to right, Mr. Seaverns, chairman of the board of trustees of the Bushnell, Miss Seaverns, Mrs. Seaverns, and Dr. Koussevitzky.

42

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

8

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

An All-Sibelius Evening at the Boston Symphony's Opening Concert

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

PROGRAM

1. Sibelius, "Swanwhite," Suite from the Incidental Music to Strindberg's Play, Op. 54.
2. Sibelius, "Tapiola," Tone Poem, Op. 112.
   Intermission
3. Sibelius, Symphony No. 1 in E Minor, Op. 39.

"NOTHING with wings!" pleaded the supper guest in Mr. George Moore's novel after she had endured an evening of "Lohengrin." Thanksgiving and the first New York visit of Mr. Koussevitzky and his symphonic Bostonians often arrive together; but this year our New England friends have come before the turkey dares. No doubt it is just as well. Euterpe and the Sacred Bird are happier apart.

We were able last evening to brave without abnormal risk of indigestion the tonal excitements offered us by the maestro of Back Bay and his shining company of virtuosi. The only wings that we needed to think of were those implied in the title of the program's first number, the "Swan White" Suite of Sibelius; and that helping was soon and easily digested.

* * *

Euterpe's eminent representative had provided for his local constituency an entertainment of unusual character. This was nothing less than an evening devoted exclusively to the music of that contemporary composer who is, according to his most active and vocal disciple, the symphonic peer of Beethoven.

It was a brave and exciting thing to do—brave and exciting, and also fanatical. But the fanatical aspect of the matter need not disturb us. It is only the fanatical artist who can be music's perfect friend, whether in the interpretative or the creative field; and to say that last evening's program was the conception of a fanatic is not to censure but to praise it.

* * *

I do not know whether it is true, as we are authoritatively assured, that Sibelius is the peer of Beethoven—the only symphonist to wear the Sovereign's mantel. We have all, no doubt, read with lively interest the announcement of Beethoven's successor made with due impressiveness by the laetificant Mr. Cecil Gray. I, for one, should rejoice to feel that the true successor of Beethoven has been discovered and authenticated. I find it immensely cheering to stand on the arid parade-ground of contemporary music and allow myself to be refreshed with the stimulating rain of Mr. Gray's torrential downpour of Sibelian encomiums — "consummate masterpiece" . . . "unimaginable pitch of intensity" . . . "grandeur and sublimity" . . . "truly terrific and overwhelming" . . . "like a convulsion of nature."

Serge Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony conductor

One thinks of the tale of the Welsh peasant who was extolling the incomparable greatness of Mr. Lloyd George. "But," protested his slightly exasperated hearer, "he's not God, you know!" "Ah, indeed, no; you are right," was the reply: "but he's young yet, look you." Sibelius, too, is young yet—a lad of sixty-six. Give him time.

* * *

But it would not become any one to look down his nose at Sibelius. Even if this singular genius has not yet given us—as Mr. Gray asserts that he has—symphonic movements that are to be set beside the first allegros of the "Eroica" and the "Ninth," Sibelius has made it abundantly clear to all whose imaginative awareness of music is sensitive and alert that he is a composer of extraordinary power and originality, a solitary and puissant voice, and an indubitable master.

This is not the occasion for a considered estimate of Sibelius. Of his immense output of works (there are 116 opus numbers in the list) relatively few are known here. M. Koussevitzky, one understands, intends to perform all of the eight symphonies in Boston; and it may be hoped that he will add to them certain of the more consequential tone-poems that are unknown in America. Possibly a few crumbs from the Sibelian feast may fall to the lot of the starved Manhattanese. Let us hope so.

* * *

Last evening's program yielded scarcely more than a glimpse of the greater Sibelius. The "Swan White" Suite, drawn from the incidental music composed almost a quarter of a century ago for Strindberg's play, is for the most part tepid, vacuous, and inconsequential.

The E minor Symphony we have ever with us. Sibelius was thirty-four when he wrote it (the age at which Beethoven wrote the "Eroica"). There is little in this First Symphony to suggest the amazingly original creator who was to give us, a dozen years later, the uncompanioned Fourth. The First Symphony is an essentially popular and sure-fire work, one that will always stir an audience when it is played as affectionately and dramatically as it was last night by Mr. Koussevitzky and his superb orchestra. Its best pages—they are few enough—foreshadow the later and essential Sibelius. Its inferior pages—and they comprise the bulk of the score—are not much better than Tchaikovsky and Rachmaninoff and Glazounoff and Saint-Saens at their most lushly and expansively banal. The string cantilena in the Finale, which Sibelius inflates with such apparent pride, is an example of sentimental symphonic balladry at its worst—Peter Ilitch would have wept with joy over it. And much of the writing elsewhere is merely pretty, platitudinous, and exterior.

* * *

There remains, so far as last evening's exhibit is concerned, the controversial "Tapiola," that symphonic poem which fell so flat when Mr. Walter Damrosch, after commissioning the work for the Symphony Society, produced it here in 1926.

The subject promised to offer a poetical scheme ideally suited to the special quality of Sibelius's genius, with its affinity for the desolate bleak countries of the mind, its tone-poetry of sunless woods and iron twilights and the harshness of Northern solitudes. But the impressiveness of the music seemed, six years ago, to reside chiefly in its program, though the big crescendo at the end (which has its prototype in the first act of "Siegfried") made its inevitable effect, as it did again last evening.

The work was far more eloquently played than at its first performance here; yet the power and brilliancy of its conveyance could not disguise the barrenness of the score as a whole. Something of the mysterious savagery and ancient terror that must have haunted the tone-poet's imagination has found its tonal equivalent in the music. But the greater part of the writing is unfertilized and uneventful.

* * *

We are far, in this work, from the excelling Sibelius of the Fourth Symphony, and of the Fifth, with their inimitable voice and accent and implications: for Sibelius, when he is most truly himself, issues no coin that is not stamped with his own unique image, the mask of a choice and unexampled spirit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

8 1932

Boston Symphony Season On

at Carnegie of Sibelius.

" is surely not to
Boston Symphony
e season last eve-
cious gifts of deep lsingfors.

stic, but the basic s upon the harmonic
the Old Believers. The nication, wrought with ls and with broad, dig-ms and orchestration characteristic of the eloquent, and exerts ll upon the hearer. The erformed with all the tone and technic for Boston orchestra is fa-
Koussevitzky effaced rendered unto Sibelius was Sibelius's.
ing music written for rg play was heard with e score is rich in deliand is a revelation trospective side of the
d. The first symphony al performance in this Boston orchestra on 1907. It is a beautiful
Its themes are dethe composer's native
cho the musical fancy
e. The harmonics are ried, but without any an embodiment of the t ugly chords are good oul. The rhythms are d incisive and the inn full of color skillfully he purpose of the work.
ymphony was produced riter said that it was could readily be ruined ate performance and oston orchestra found genial company when score. Let that dictum

ert of last evening
nind the sorry state into great Boston organiza-immediately after the arduous labor of Pierre restore its pristine ex-
l that is forgotten now.
Symphony Orchestra
n a magnificent instrugorgeous tone, a solid a competent conductor.

Alone Concert

poser's Music
t Performance Led by Koussevitzky.

By PITTS SANBORN.

VISITING New York for the first time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, devoted its concert in Carnegie Hall last evening to music by the Finnish composer Sibelius. So far as the present writer knows, Sibelius had not been treated here previously to the doubtful honor of this exclusivity.

For a concert devoted to a single composer is usually a trying ordeal—an ordeal that seems quite uncalled for, too. And this is true even when Bach or Beethoven is the composer. Seemingly Wagner, in the case of the orchestra, and Chopin, in that of the piano, bear up best, but they do so for reasons not entirely of musical eminence.

Now, last evening the first symphony of Sibelius in association with compositions by other authors, or even the "Swanwhite" suite and the tone poem "Tapiola" as preface to a symphony by somebody else would have been received with gratitude. But an all-Sibelius evening of them turned out to be a good deal of a trial.

Idolizing Movement Strong.

At present there is a formidable movement on, unconsciously and consciously, to tell the world that Sibelius is one of the loftiest of musical giants. England is especially obsessed with the idea. That particularly interesting English critic, Cecil Gray, insists that his idol is the foremost symphonist since Beethoven, if indeed Beethoven is to be excepted.

Philip Hale, in his thrice admirable program book, quotes one "G. E." as writing in the Manchester Guardian that he long has been convinced that the "Finnish master is the greatest composer not only of his generation but of modern times" and deploring the fact that "performances of his works, even now, are still ludicrously few in comparison with those of such relatively unimportant composers as Strauss, Ravel or Stravinsky, to name only three."

Performance Highly Successful.

Further, Mr. Hale quotes the indefatigable Ernest Newman as recently instructing his readers in the London Daily Times as to just how to study Sibelius.

Well, this active interest, though it may betray some partisans into extravagances of praise, is still an excellent thing, for few are going to deny Sibelius' greatness. Yet to subject him to the test of an entire program is a doubtful favor all around.

Be it said in no disparagement to either the "Swanwhite" suite or "Tapiola" that the first symphony loomed largest in last evening's program, and also it was the most successfully performed, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, by the superb orchestra, with its glorious string tone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

8 1932

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PERFORMS ENTIRE SIBELIUS PROGRAM

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

For some unexplained reason, certainly not based on popular demand, there are at present strange and simultaneous revivals of the orchestral works of Jan Sibelius, Finland's leading composer.

In New York and elsewhere the orchestras, after neglecting the Sibelius output for some years suddenly devote themselves to it with renewed energy. The visiting Boston Symphony players, under Serge Koussevitzky, went so far last evening at their Carnegie Hall concert as to devote an entire program to Sibelius, with his "Swanhite," incidental music to Strindberg's play; the tone poem "Tapiola"; and the first symphony, in E minor.

It may be that direct appeal or persuasion of private or publisher's propaganda has brought about the current Sibelius recrudescence; but, on the other hand, perhaps conscience got to work upon all the conductors at the same time and caused them to give another chance to an earnest, even if uninspired, composer whose productions failed to click decisively with the public on previous occasions.

Suffice it to say that Sibelius made his New York return under excellent auspices this season, for he has been presented by no less a luminous trio of conductors than Toscanini, Stokowski and Koussevitzky.

The last named, and his highly accomplished orchestra from Boston, lavished devoted interpretations and virtuoso playing upon the Sibelius program of last night, but the net result, so far as the writer of these lines is concerned, was the renewed conviction that the symphonist from Finland is an esoteric, brooding musical thinker, a man of few moods which he repeats constantly and at great length, and a skilful orchestrator who works with facility in the idioms of Wagner, Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss. That is not to say that Sibelius lacks in occasional powerful or even affecting moments. But they are few and far between and constitute only oases in vast stretches of prolixity and empty padding .

The audience gave respectful attention and applause. It is doubtful whether a vote taken at the concert would have represented a landslide request for a future repetition of the program.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

ORCHESTRAS SIGN CARNEGIE LEASES

Philharmonic, Philadelphia and Boston Renew Two-Year Contracts

Three of the world's greatest orchestras, the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony, have just renewed their leases of Carnegie Hall for two years, it was announced today.

An "unprecedented revival of interest in fine music," the announcement says, is responsible for the long-term contracts the three orchestras have signed for the use of the main auditorium of the hall. This revival, it continues, is further reflected by the fact that Arthur Judson, manager of the Philharmonic-Symphony, has decided to add twenty concerts to the program of that orchestra.

Reports Heavier Bookings

"During the first two months of this winter season," Louis G. Kibbe, manager of Carnegie Hall, said, "bookings have been heavier than at any previous time in the history of this musical shrine. To insure a full and uninterrupted series of concerts during the next two winters, Mr. Judson has felt it necessary to reserve the auditorium much farther ahead than usual.

"Carnegie Hall feels that it owes a great debt to the music lovers of this city. During these hard times, when we felt that we would have to suffer a great financial loss, we have met, instead, with record-breaking success.

"Other cities, especially in Europe, more renowned for their musical enthusiasms, have had to cut down materially on their schedules. Concerts that are deeply imbedded in the musical traditions of the world have been temporarily canceled.

Cuts in Other Cities

"In almost all other communities the pinch of the economic disaster has made the concert-goer cut down on his musical expenditures. We in Carnegie Hall thought that this must inevitably occur in New York, too.

"The New York public, however, has realized the vital part art plays in making life bearable. The harder the times, the greater the necessity for this spiritual outlet.

"We had determined to do the best we could during a trying period. With the unexpected support we have received, we will go right on to new heights. The Shrine of Fine Arts in America will more than ever deserve its name."

Incidents and Prospects

Trans Nov 18

The supplementary matinées of the Symphony Orchestra will begin next Tuesday at Symphony Hall. This year the six programs will exhibit the greater composers in a succession of characteristic pieces. At the first matinée, Bach, Haydn and Beethoven have place:

Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2, in F major, for Flute, Oboe, Violin and Trumpet...Bach
Symphony, No. 6, in G major ("The Surprise") ....Haydn
Symphony No. 7, in A major.. ....Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

any match does take place it will be entirely an open matter with no private understandings whatsoever. I refuse to talk to him except in the presence of a third party."

Mr. Sims also said that Mr. Culbertson had sent word that he was willing to meet him in a match, but that the match would not ostensibly be a test of bidding system.

'Well, is Mr. Culbertson already prepared to admit that he will not put his bidding system to the test against mine?" Mr. Sims asked.

Mr. Culbertson yesterday assumed the role of a bridge player weary of being challenged. Only last week, he said, he had received a wire, collect, from Texas, demanding that he go out there at once and play against a "never-slip" system.

Mr. Sims is a "corking fine player," Mr. Culbertson admitted, but he had never heard of such a thing as a Sims system. If there be such a system, Mr. Culbertson said, then Mr. Sims might play Mr. Lenz and thus qualify for a match with him.

"My life has been made miserable by all sorts of publishers who hound me to death with their challenges to a match a la Culbertson-Lenz for their budding proteges," Mr. Culbertson added.

In the opinion of many persons who know their bridge world, the possibilities of a Sims-Culbertson match seem fine. It was remembered that in the negotiations leading up to the Lenz-Culbertson match last year it took at least five months of quarreling to arrange the tournament, and that the harsher the names that were called the nearer agreement the two principals were.

Labor Wins in Denmark

Ruling Party Increases Majority After 4 Years in Office

COPENHAGEN, Denmark, Nov. 17 (AP).—The Labor party won sixty-two seats in the Folketing, the lower house of Parliament, in yesterday's election. Premier Theodore Stauning said it was a great victory, increasing the labor vote by 70,000. This is the first time

Independent Libe Single-Tax part munists won tw
the Folketing.

Lofts Marks

The Loft Candy
celebrating the day of Loft, Inc which started w numbers 130 stor president, who h career as a cand
quired control of
The organization in the last two y a recent announc be more rapid
The managemen lieves that this rental arrangem profitable for th years.

N AND 141 Broad

Incidents and Prospects Trans Nov 18

The supplementary matinées of the Symphony Orchestra will begin next Tuesday at Symphony Hall. This year the six programs will exhibit the greater composers in a succession of characteristic pieces. At the first matinée, Bach, Haydn and Beethoven have place:

Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2, in F major, for Flute, Oboe, Violin and Trumpet...Bach
Symphony, No. 6, in G major ("The Surprise") ....Haydn
Symphony No. 7, in A major........Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

NOV 18 1932

Boston Symphony Season On

Entire Program of Concert at Carnegie Hall Made Up of Works of Sibelius.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

"Timeo Bostonaos Sibelium ferentes" is surely not to be said. Let us rejoice rather that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving its first concert of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall, came bearing precious gifts of deep reflection from the northern port of Helsingfors.

The entire concert was devoted to works of Sibelius. The numbers were the suite created from the instrumental music to Strindberg's "Swanwhite," "Tapiola," a tone poem celebrating Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology, and the first symphony. These breathings of the northern spirit the urbane Mr. Koussevitzky directed with enthusiasm tempered by wisdom.

"Tapiola" was composed at the behest of Walter Damrosch for the departed Symphony Society, and had what is now called a "world premier" on December 26, 1926. Upon the same occasion Mr. Gershwin's piano concerto in F emerged into the glare of publicity. The concerto came back only a few days ago, and now the tone poem returns. The honors of revival go to the latter. The present writer attended two performances of it in 1926, but did not hear it till last night.

Cecil Gray, who recently sent forth a good book on Sibelius, asserts that this work "is the culminating point of his entire creative activity and a consummate masterpiece which could only be the outcome of a long process of spiritual growth and development. It is music of extraordinary simplicity and directness, yet there is not one bar in it from first to last that could possibly have been written by any other composer."

This music lover is not prepared to accept unreservedly the first proposition in Mr. Gray's estimate, but to the second he can subscribe without hesitation. This is the essential Sibelius. The simplicity of the work is traceable directly to its development from a thematic root placed before the hearer in the opening bars and treated with unlabored logic throughout the composition. The harmonics are frequently drastic, but the basic scheme rests upon the harmonic doctrines of the Old Believers. The mood communication, wrought with such materials and with broad, dignified rhythms and orchestration thoroughly characteristic of the composer, is eloquent, and exerts a potent spell upon the hearer. The poem was performed with all the wealth of tone and technic for which the Boston orchestra is famous. Mr. Koussevitzky effaced himself and rendered unto Sibelius that which was Sibelius's.

The charming music written for the Strindberg play was heard with pleasure. The score is rich in delicate fancy and is a revelation of the less introspective side of the Sibelius mind. The first symphony had its initial performance in this city by the Boston orchestra on February 21, 1907. It is a beautiful composition. Its themes are derived from the composer's native soil; they echo the musical fancy of his people. The harmonics are rich and varied, but without any attempt at an embodiment of the doctrine that ugly chords are good for man's soul. The rhythms are clean cut and incisive and the instrumentation full of color skillfully adapted to the purpose of the work. When the symphony was produced here this writer said that it was one which could readily be ruined by inadequate performance and that the Boston orchestra found itself in congenial company when it met this score. Let that dictum stand.

The concert of last evening brought to mind the sorry state into which the great Boston organization sank immediately after the war and the arduous labor of Pierre Monteux to restore its pristine excellence. All that is forgotten now. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is once again a magnificent instrument with a gorgeous tone, a solid technic and a competent conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

18 1932

Works of Sibelius Alone Fill Bostonians' Concert

Exclusive Use of Finnish Composer's Music Proves Ordeal to Audience at Performance Led by Koussevitzky.

By PITTS SANBORN.

VISITING New York for the first time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, devoted its concert in Carnegie Hall last evening to music by the Finnish composer Sibelius. So far as the present writer knows, Sibelius had not been treated here previously to the doubtful honor of this exclusivity.

For a concert devoted to a single composer is usually a trying ordeal—an ordeal that seems quite uncalled for, too. And this is true even when Bach or Beethoven is the composer. Seemingly Wagner, in the case of the orchestra, and Chopin, in that of the piano, bear up best, but they do so for reasons not entirely of musical eminence.

Now, last evening the first symphony of Sibelius in association with compositions by other authors, or even the "Swanwhite" suite and the tone poem "Tapiola" as preface to a symphony by somebody else would have been received with gratitude. But an all-Sibelius evening of them turned out to be a good deal of a trial.

Idolizing Movement Strong.

At present there is a formidable movement on, unconsciously and consciously, to tell the world that Sibelius is one of the loftiest of musical giants. England is especially obsessed with the idea. That particularly interesting English critic, Cecil Gray, insists that his idol is the foremost symphonist since Beethoven, if indeed Beethoven is to be excepted.

Philip Hale, in his thrice admirable program book, quotes one "G. E." as writing in the Manchester Guardian that he long has been convinced that the "Finnish master is the greatest composer not only of his generation but of modern times" and deploring the fact that "performances of his works, even now, are still ludicrously few in comparison with those of such relatively unimportant composers as Strauss, Ravel or Stravinsky, to name only three."

Performance Highly Successful.

Further, Mr. Hale quotes the indefatigable Ernest Newman as recently instructing his readers in the London Daily Times as to just how to study Sibelius.

Well, this active interest, though it may betray some partisans into extravagances of praise, is still an excellent thing, for few are going to deny Sibelius' greatness. Yet to subject him to the test of an entire program is a doubtful favor all around.

Be it said in no disparagement to either the "Swanwhite" suite or "Tapiola" that the first symphony loomed largest in last evening's program, and also it was the most successfully performed, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, by the superb orchestra, with its glorious string tone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 18 1932

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PERFORMS ENTIRE SIBELIUS PROGRAM

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

For some unexplained reason, certainly not based on popular demand, there are at present strange and simultaneous revivals of the orchestral works of Jan Sibelius, Finland's leading composer.

In New York and elsewhere the orchestras, after neglecting the Sibelius output for some years suddenly devote themselves to it with renewed energy. The visiting Boston Symphony players, under Serge Koussevitzky, went so far last evening at their Carnegie Hall concert as to devote an entire program to Sibelius, with his "Swanhite," incidental music to Strindberg's play; the tone poem "Tapiola"; and the first symphony, in E minor.

It may be that direct appeal or persuasion of private or publisher's propaganda has brought about the current Sibelius recrudescence; but, on the other hand, perhaps conscience got to work upon all the conductors at the same time and caused them to give another chance to an earnest, even if uninspired, composer whose productions failed to click decisively with the public on previous occasions.

Suffice it to say that Sibelius made his New York return under excellent auspices this season, for he has been presented by no less a luminous trio of conductors than Toscanini, Stokowski and Koussevitzky.

The last named, and his highly accomplished orchestra from Boston, lavished devoted interpretations and virtuoso playing upon the Sibelius program of last night, but the net result, so far as the writer of these lines is concerned, was the renewed conviction that the symphonist from Finland is an esoteric, brooding musical thinker, a man of few moods which he repeats constantly and at great length, and a skilful orchestrator who works with facility in the idioms of Wagner, Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss. That is not to say that Sibelius lacks in occasional powerful or even affecting moments. But they are few and far between and constitute only oases in vast stretches of prolixity and empty padding.

The audience gave respectful attention and applause. It is doubtful whether a vote taken at the concert would have represented a landslide request for a future repetition of the program.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

NOV 18 1932

ORCHESTRAS SIGN CARNEGIE LEASES

Philharmonic, Philadelphia and Boston Renew Two-Year Contracts

Three of the world's greatest orchestras, the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony, have just renewed their leases of Carnegie Hall for two years, it was announced today.

An "unprecedented revival of interest in fine music," the announcement says, is responsible for the long-term contracts the three orchestras have signed for the use of the main auditorium of the hall. This revival, it continues, is further reflected by the fact that Arthur Judson, manager of the Philharmonic-Symphony, has decided to add twenty concerts to the program of that orchestra.

Reports Heavier Bookings

"During the first two months of this winter season," Louis G. Kibbe, manager of Carnegie Hall, said, "bookings have been heavier than at any previous time in the history of this musical shrine. To insure a full and uninterrupted series of concerts during the next two winters, Mr. Judson has felt it necessary to reserve the auditorium much farther ahead than usual.

"Carnegie Hall feels that it owes a great debt to the music lovers of this city. During these hard times, when we felt that we would have to suffer a great financial loss, we have met, instead, with record-breaking success.

"Other cities, especially in Europe, more renowned for their musical enthusiasms, have had to cut down materially on their schedules. Concerts that are deeply imbedded in the musical traditions of the world have been temporarily canceled.

Cuts in Other Cities

"In almost all other communities the pinch of the economic disaster has made the concert-goer cut down on his musical expenditures. We in Carnegie Hall thought that this must inevitably occur in New York, too.

"The New York public, however, has realized the vital part art plays in making life bearable. The harder the times, the greater the necessity for this spiritual outlet.

"We had determined to do the best we could during a trying period. With the unexpected support we have received, we will go right on to new heights. The Shrine of Fine Arts in America will more than ever deserve its name."

43

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 18 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES A SIBELIUS PROGRAM

Interprets Finnish Composer at Boston Symphony's First Concert Here.

PROGRESS IN STYLE SHOWN

Examples of Both Early and Late Work Are Played—Other Sibelius Programs Expected.

By OLIN DOWNES.

No conductor in America has done as much for the music of Sibelius as Mr. Koussevitzky, who gave an entire program of that composer's works at the first New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. This program consisted of the unfamiliar suite taken from incidental music to the play of August Strindberg, "Swanwhite" (Joutsen-valkea); the tone poem, "Tapiola," opus 112, and the wild and picturesque First Symphony.

This program looked very much like a preparation for other programs of Sibelius which Mr. Koussevitzky might give in New York, as he has planned a series of all the symphonies of Sibelius for Boston. It is much to be hoped that he will do as much of this as possible in Carnegie Hall, although many concerts devoted wholly to Sibelius would be disproportionate and deprive the audience of the many other interesting works that Mr. Koussevitzky is sure to bring with him. But Sibelius's latest symphony, the Eighth, will certainly be heard here, and last night the audience was given examples of both the early and the late style of the great Finnish composer. It was an uncommonly interesting offering. The works performed are unequal in value. The First Symphony has much that is derivative in it, wild and mournful and majestic as it is. "Tapiola" is the late Sibelius. Between, in point of chronology, comes the suite of music to Strindberg's play, which is charming.

This music is an example of a master using a few instruments and displaying his genius in small forms. With these few instruments, in these small forms, Sibelius contrives to be wholly original, charming and at moments more than that. His touch is light in these pages, and fanciful. There is the flavor of northern folklore, there is the thought of sunlit glades.

The movements are five: "The Peacock," "The Harp," "The Maiden with Roses," "Listen, the Robin Sings," and "Song of Praise," which is the most extended of the five pieces, modal, and in the older style. A note constantly reiterated by a wind instrument is doubtless the cry of the peacock, but this is the most realistic moment. The robin's song is not a chirrup of flute or a chortle of clarinet. In a word, it is not merely realistic, but a fantasy of sounds of the rustling forest. The music is truly inspired, admirably stated, fresh and genuinely without affectattion.

"Tapiola" was composed as a prize composition nearly six years ago, for performance at the hands of Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra. At the time of its first hearing in this city it did not make as strong an impression as other of Sibelius's scores, but when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it recently in Boston some of the reviewers found high merit in the work, and in this they are supported by authoritative writers overseas. It is only just to the composition to mention these things, but it cannot be said here that "Tapiola"—the name is derived from that of Tapio, the Finnish god of the forest—seemed very much more significant last night than it did more than five years ago. It has the stamp of Sibelius in every measure; no other composer would express himself in this way. It has very interesting harmonic effects and certain passages mysterious and powerful, but as a whole it is not as convincing as most of Sibelius's mature orchestral music. There is too little contrast of mood and what at present appears as a pervading formlessness. That the music may impress differently in seasons to come is very possible; it is easy to remember the bewilderment that Sibelius's Fourth Symphony occasioned at its first hearing.

Therefore the musical body of last night's program was the now popular First symphony, so full of Nordic feeling and northern scenery, so impetuous and unprecedented in orchestral coloring, so plainly and unmistakably the advent, in the field of symphony, of a genius capable of speaking with the large utterance of the early gods. This symphony, too, was "caviare to the general" only a few years ago, though now it seems impossible to explain why. The reason the music moves us today is its sheer strength, inspiration and sincerity. It is not because of strange harmonies, though here and there a harmonic [illegible] peeps out from [illegible] the gown. It is not be[illegible] symphony is of unadul[illegible] Tchaikovsky. For [illegible] reiterated [illegible] work [illegible] one [illegible] and some [illegible] ing out as a little tentative [illegible] musi[illegible] free [illegible] mood and strength which is primeval. The man of genius does not strive for originality, because he does not have to. In this symphony Sibelius takes such materials as are ready to his hand and writes down the precise harmonies of which his inner ear apprises him, and we have a most significant symphony.

For some reason, Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of this work, admirably finished in detail, was not so forthright and so powerful in its character as other performances that he has given in this city of the same work. Sometimes the tempi appeared too deliberate, and then some of the lyrical phrases came perilously near the sentimental, as the lyrical theme of the last movement. This was not important enough to obscure the symphony's character or to fail to evoke the most enthusiastic plaudits from the audience, but he has given a greater First Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's program on Saturday afternoon includes Brahms's Second symphony and two works of John Alden Carpenter, who will play the piano part in the first New York performance of his "Patterns," for orchestra with piano obbligato, and be further represented as a composer by his ballet score, "Skyscrapers."

CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

NOV 18 1932

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Begin New York Series With Sibelius Program

WITH the return of the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall last night, the orchestral pageant took on the three-dimensional fullness that is characteristic of it in those purple periods when the visits of the Philadelphians and the Bostonians bring fresh challenge to the supremacy of the Philharmonic-Symphony on its own ground. This was the first of ten New York concerts announced by the Boston orchestra for the current season, the forty-seventh year of its concerts in New York and the fifty-second in Boston. Serge Koussevitzky was accorded a rousing demonstration of welcome when he emerged from the wings, moving with the deliberateness that is characteristic of his platform appearances. He passed the compliment on to his ensemble by summoning his players to their feet.

The enthusiasm of this first greeting was not afterward approached, though the audience gave further signs of an eagerness to applaud. The orchestra played with its customary virtuosity and it was not the quality of the performance that placed a checkrein on further demonstrations. The explanation was to be found in a program composed entirely of music by the admired but not always understood Finnish contemporary, Jean Julius Christian Sibelius.

Now, Sibelius is a mighty man among the few. But the many, though they entertain a growing conviction that they ought to like Sibelius, are by no means certain that they do. Mr. Koussevitzky sought to simplify their problem by beginning with some rather casual and not very consequential music for the theatre, the "Swan White" Suite; and by ending with the first and most derivative of the eight Sibelius symphonies. The only work of the program which represented the Sibelius of full stature, as that stature is viewed today, was the tone-poem "Tapiola," which New York audiences were the first to hear when Walter Damrosch gave it a world premiere on December 26, 1926.

INEVITABLY, and in spite of Ernest Newman's dictum that the way to win the layman over to Sibelius is to give him the latest and hardest nuts to crack first, it was the weakest composition of the program, the incidental music for Strindberg's play which wakened the most obvious response. In the "Swan White" Suite Sibelius is merely the gifted colorist, applying his craftsmanship to bibelots neither very substantial nor very individual. Perhaps the first persuasive chord of "The Peacock," the opening number of this group, was worth all that the five little pieces subsequently brought to light, well-written though they are.

"Tapiola," to the contrary, contains daring and resourceful music that could have come from no other pen, culminating in a string crescendo in chromatics that is one of the most stunning achievements in all orchestral writing, yet an integral part of a closely knit musical structure and in no sense a mere virtuoso effect. Perhaps the many repetitions at the outset of the terse and not very alluring theme on which the music is built weary the ear not interested in the architectonics of the work; and this irrespective of the eternally dark coloring that is the hallmark of the Sibelius orchestration. Certainly this score is anything but barren, either as to ideas or treatment. But it conveys a sense of desolation—the desolation of nature in her wastelands—that is not for the hedonist or the comfort-seeker. These are no sensuous delights. They come like the lash of chilling winds and stinging rain.

The first Symphony is an old story and need not be discussed again here, save to note that Mr. Koussevitzky dwelt as fondly on the Tchaikovskian chief themes as he did on those Finnish subsidiaries which, an imaginative commentator surmises, represent the unconscious revolt in the composer's spirit against what was then a Slavic domination of his muse. The playing throughout was that of a superb ensemble brilliantly led by one who is something of a specialist in the music of this composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 18 1932

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

Introducing Sibelius.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductinf, Carnegie Hall,

THE PROGRAM.
ALL—SIBELIUS.
"Swanwhite" Suite.
"Tapiola"—Tone-Poem—Opus 112
Symphony No. 1 in E minor (Opus 39)

There is a corner in the closet of musical lore which most of us have utterly and shamefully neglected. The works of Jean Julius Christian Sibelius constitute at once a sombre philosophy of life as an inevitable march, of death as the inevitable release, of nature as the nucleus of creation.

I feel a genuine gratitude to Mr. Koussevitzky for this resurrection of Sibelius, accomplished so majestically by the Bostonians in Carnegie Hall last night. And I also feel that an unspoken reproach has been laid justly upon our ignorance of a genius.

Sibelius defined his own temperament in a letter to Ivah Norodny: "It is true I am a dreamer and a poet of nature. I love the mysterious sounds of the fields and forest, water and mountains." And it is quite as true that others have brought the North into houses and there transmuted it to music. And their art is dependent on the shelter and, removed from it, dwindles. But Sibelius has written music innocent of roof and inclosure, music proper indeed to the vastly open, the Finnish heaven under which it grew. It is blood-brother to the wind and silence.

The furies of this music storm the highholds of the gods, its lullabies of sighing forest murmurs lave and sooth the tortured soul. Its splendors are immense, its gaieties wild and bizarre. I find myself writing of the music as a whole, for the color and mood of brooding, melancholy grandeur pervades the very fabric.

Sibelius came to the United States in 1914, arriving in New York, as the guest of the late Carl Stoeckel, to take part in the 28th meeting and concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union, held in the Music Shed at Norfolk, Conn. On June 17, 1914, the degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon him at Yale University. He has written eight symphonies.

* * *

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

NOV 18 1932

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

An All-Sibelius Program by Mr. Kaussewitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town last night, playing at Carnegie Hall an all-Sibelius program. This decidedly was news. Helsingfors and perhaps Boston aside, I doubt if an all-Sibelius program had ever before been performed anywhere. Sibelius, though we are agreed that he is a great composer, has certainly never been, up to the present at least, a popular one. He has had his audience these many years, and it has been steadily growing in numbers and in its attachment to him. Still, there is no reason to believe that the concert-going public in general as yet feels more than a stirring of interest in him. Its ultimate judgment will accord him the place he deserves, among the first of creative musicians, but it is still a long way from making that judgment. In the meantime, it calls for a certain amount of courage on a conductor's part to thrust his works upon the attention of audiences. Last evening's program was a brave gesture; Mr. Koussewitsky is to be congratulated upon it.

* * *

This all-Sibelius program was made up of a suite of incidental music to Strindberg's "Swanwhite," the tone poem "Tapiola," and the First Symphony. The "Swanwhite" suite dates from 1908 and bears the opus number 54. I cannot feel that Mr. Koussewitsky was wise in playing it, unfamiliar as it is here (last evening's performance was probably its first in New York). The disparity between the best and the worst of Sibelius is greater than is the case with other composers of equal or nearly equal stature, and the "Swanwhite" suite represents him very nearly at his worst. It is trivial, it is very nearly commonplace. It is all of the things that Sibelius can maddeningly be at times—all of the things he is not, for example, in "Tapiola."

* * *

"Tapiola" was heard here for the first and last time some seven years ago, when Walter Damrosch, who had commissioned its composition, conducted its premiere at Mecca Auditorium. Its musical scheme is, roughly, that of variations; a single theme, announced at the outset by the strings, is developed at length, with the addition of very little subsidiary material. Its ideology is less easy to define. It is an expression, perhaps, of racial atavism, somber, uncompromising, intense. To enter into the composer's thought, or, rather, into the state of consciousness which the music represents is difficult, but rewarding in so far as the effort is earnestly and patiently made. I recall that I was not impressed with "Tapiola" when Mr. Damrosch first played it for us; last evening, approaching nearer to an understanding of it, nearer to a participation in the curious mood which it slowly but irresistibly evokes, I was, and my experience was doubtless shared by others who heard both performances.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky concluded the evening with the E minor symphony, the most familiar of the seven, the least mature and least characteristic yet still an individual and arresting work. The performance was rather lethargic and heavy handed; throughout the evening, indeed, Mr. Koussewitsky's tempi seemed halting, one indication among many of what seemed to me an uncertain approach to the music that he played. The orchestral playing was superb, however; it was good to have the Bostonians back again.

44

Nov 19

Symphony Hall Goes Analytical

A Tabulation of the Geographical Distribution of Subscribers to the Tuesday Concerts and the Surprising Results That It Reveals

By William Webb

BELIEVE it or not, a typical Tuesday afternoon Symphony audience travels 60,000 miles, from New England homes to Symphony Hall and back again. This combined distance is equivalent to taking a single person twice around the globe. The coming Tuesday series, beginning next week will be patronized by more out-of-town than by Boston subscribers. In fact the proportion will be four of the former to one of the latter.

Statistics show every State in New England to be well represented at the Tuesday matinées, and the number of towns and cities so represented is beyond anyone's wildest guess. By actual count these number 122, without any padding. Subscribers from Newton, for instance, have been put down under "Newton," not under the eight different divisions of the city. Similarly, residents of Wollaston have been listed under Quincy. All subscribers in Boston have been allotted to "Boston," whether their mailing address was Roxbury, Dorchester, Back Bay or Roslindale.

The investigation has been carried further. Upon a large map at Symphony Hall, subscribers to the Tuesday concerts are indicated in their respective locations. By means of computation on railroad timetables and road maps it was possible to arrive at the mileage covered by each subscriber to and from Boston, thereby reaching the total of 60,000 miles, meaning both directions. And this figure does not include the mileage of one who comes annually from England for the Symphony season only.

Residential addresses of subscribers are distributed over the following States, in the order of number of subscribers: Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Maine and Vermont. During last summer the subscription department also carried on correspondence in these States: California, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan and New Jersey. This latter group of States represents the home addresses of students at Harvard, Wellesley, Boston University and other schools.

This widespread audience has come about partly as follows. The Boston Symphony Orchestra once visited regularly such New England cities as Worcester, Portland, New Bedford, Lawrence, Lowell, Brockton, Salem, Lynn, Fall River and other cities. Due to pressure of its schedule the orchestra was obliged to forego its visits to many of these places. Yet, music lovers in these cities had already had a taste of fine music. The longing to hear the orchestra remained. The accessibility of Boston, brought closer by motor travel over improved highways, makes it convenient for scores of persons to visit the city six times in a season, topping off shopping expeditions and a few social calls with a symphony concert. The Tuesday concert, starting as it does at three o'clock in the afternoon, enables these out-of-town visitors to make a day of it in Boston.

The tabulated list of subscribers for the Tuesday series shows the following distribution by cities and towns:

Massachusetts

Boston	696
Brookline	430
Cambridge	310
Newton	244
Wellesley	110

More Than 40 Subscribers

Belmont
Lynn
Milton
Winchester
Worcester

More Than 30 Subscribers

Arlington
Hingham
Melrose

More Than 20 Subscribers

Andover
Cohasset
Concord
Marblehead
Medford
Somerville
Waltham
Weston

More Than 10 Subscribers

Beverly
Brockton
Campello
Framingham
Gloucester
Groton
Haverhill
Lexington
Malden
Milford
Natick
Needham
Newbury
Norton
Salem
Southboro
Swampscott
Wayland
Woburn

One or More

Ashland
Athol
Ayer
Beach Bluff
Bedford
Billerica
Bradford
Braintree
Brewster
Bridgewater
Canton
Chelsea
Clinton
Danvers
Dedham
Dover
Duxbury
Everett
Fall River
Falmouth
Fitchburg
Foxboro
Gardner
Grafton
Hatchville
Holbrook
Hopedale
Ipswich
Kingston
Lancaster
Lincoln
Littleton
Longmeadow
Lowell
Manchester
Marlboro
Medfield
Methuen
Middleboro
Milford
New Bedford
Northampton
Northbridge
North Easton
Norwell
Norwood
Plymouth
Quincy
Reading
Richmond
Rochdale
Rockport
Sandwich
Saxonville
Scituate
Sharon
Sherborn
South Hamilton
Sudbury
Topsfield
Wakefield
Walpole
Watertown
Webster
West Medway
Weymouth
Winchendon
Winthrop

New Hampshire

Antrim
East Jaffrey
Hanover
Manchester
Portsmouth
Wakefield
Wilton

Connecticut

Danielson
Hartford
Norwich
Stonington

Rhode Island

Adamsville
Providence
Woonsocket

Maine

Portland
York Village

Vermont

Woodstock

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 18 1932

TOWARD THE CLOSE OF THE WEEK

BY FREDERICK P. LATIMER.

It has transpired that the author of these memoirs is now so minus of former weight that he is able again to get into his evening clothes, and that among other things indicates:

A. The chances of his stepping out slightly Saturday night have increased, although it would be a pretty pathetic adventure upon his part, all things considered.

B. He took his family to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra and see it, and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, along with a great representative audience in which the abundance of ermine and white shirts appeared strikingly to confirm the weather bureau's evening prediction of an early snowstorm.

What he, the author, does not know about music and orchestras would fill many large volumes, but he does feel and enjoy in an instinctive way, very deeply.

* * *

There is something wonderfully portentous and propitious about the few moments before the conductor comes on, the moments when the tide of impressive arrivals is at its height, with tumultuous gettings-up-and-down in the auditorium and inspiring rustling of gowns, and odors of perfumes, displays of beauty and distinction—the moments when the scores of members in the orchestra dust or brighten their instruments, adjust their chairs and music racks, and sound their A's in animated and roughly rythmic chorus. Presently there are to be grand crashes and marvelous pianissimos, codas and non troppos, fugued treatments and what-not, while brows frown, bows "saw," the eyes of the flutists and harpist become soulful and the gentleman in charge of the cymbals will arise twenty beats before the actual measure, and shine and give brass the glory. Those moments, in a degree, may suggest the thrill immediately before the whistle at the opening of a Yale-Harvard football game, or the intensity of expectancy just before the start of the boat race.

Unfortunately our hero arrived too late to get a program. His family said, "Haven't you a program?" and seemed quite unappeased when he replied, "the usher is all out of programs." He reached into his pocket, and got out his spectacle case, intending to get his glasses and look over shoulders ahead at a program in the next row. The snapper of the cover of the case unsnapped with such a loud sound that it startled a large section of the audience. With an air of resignation the case was returned to its pocket.

* * *

A mild emotion of surprise is caused when the listener thinks that the opening bars of a number, the initial strains, signalize the performance of "Die Meistersinger," Wagner's famous masterpiece, and yet gradually it is forced home upon consciousness that it really is old Weber's overture to "Oberon." Such listeners should have their musical memories polished more frequently. It is almost as bad as mistaking Wilhelm Tell for the Damnation of Faust. However, one may enjoy it, either way. Music is music and hath charms to soothe the savage breast. Particularly one marvels at the expressiveness of Dr. Koussevitzsky's hands, his back, hip shoulders, arms and features. Our family admired him extraordinarily, and altogether naturally. He deserves it. He is by no means a prosaic pounder of type, or humble yanker of bittersweet from swamp thickets.

The young lady from Chicago in the second row looked at Dr. Koussevitzsky askance. We have not been able to ascertain for what cause, although we endeavored to at least partially solve the enigma during the intermission.

* * *

What we have to say about Caesar Franck's symphony in D minor, aside from the fact that he is a direct successor of Berlioz and Liszt, is quite amateurish. But we derived an indescribable amount of comfort and encouragement from that music which seems to breathe a good strong battling spirit all the while and does not weaken with depression or melancholly, even when plaintive, but stands up and goes on and has faith and waves a flag and has an exalting mood such as nearly everyone needs to cultivate in these trying times. Not easily discouraged was Caesar Franck, who had to wait twenty-five years to get a decent recognition of his first oratorio and, indeed, was not given his just recognition until a decade after he was gathered to his fathers. He stood by himself with a rare nobility, and the world should be grateful to him for it. There is a spirituality about his work closely akin to the religious and we might say more about it, but refrain, recalling humbly how little we know about such matters. Nevertheless, when we hear the music of that symphony we feel that perhaps we can carry on for a long time yet, with luck.

We asked a tall gentleman in the corridor how he liked it, and he said, "very much." Calm and peaceful be thy sleep, rocked in the cradle of the deep.

* * *

Sibelius' "Tapioca" came next, as our family whispered, but "Tapiola" is the real name of the Finnish composer's symphonic poem about the dusky forest:

"Wide-spread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests,
Ancient, foreboding, brooding savage dreams;
Within them dwells the forest's mighty god,
And woodsprites in the gloom weave magic secrets."

And so, when the orchestra began upon this number, we closed our eyes and expected to hear something "foresty." We listened for woodland echoes or the noise of the wind in the treetops. Nothing of the kind happened. It seemed to us that we could have interpreted the music exactly as well as an ode to Cerberus shoal or an Iowa prairie as to the great woods of Finland. But that passed. In a little while anyone could have told what the tone poem was about, and when it came on to describing the woodsprites in the gloom weaving magic secrets the music was substantially the witching hour of Halloween itself. It screamed and shivered and gibbered and harrowed up the soul, as Shakespeare might have said, and made people in the auditorium look at each other with vast approval of the music and of the orchestra, the conductor being very nearly frantic with excitement, as should be. Then came a magnificent finale, just calm, suitable melody and harmony which declared, "Now the sprites and trolls and goblins have gone to rest; there is your beautiful, dusky forest, majestic, full of romance and hidden life, haven of dreams and harbinger of fates. Take it, it is yours." Sibelius is a genius.

Came home grateful for profitable experience, and stopped for sarsaparilla ice-cream soda on the way. Interpreting the same, would say that the flavoring was just a wee bit too strong. Tremendous crowding and surging there was in the misty night around about the statue of Lafayette, brandishing a mighty sword toward the beclouded sky ruddy from the lights below.

Symphony Hall Goes Analytical

A Tabulation of the Geographical Distribution of Subscribers to the Tuesday Concerts and the Surprising Results That It Reveals

By William Webb

BELIEVE it or not, a typical Tuesday afternoon Symphony audience travels 60,000 miles, from New England homes to Symphony Hall and back again. This combined distance is equivalent to taking a single person twice around the globe. The coming Tuesday series, beginning next week will be patronized by more out-of-town than by Boston subscribers. In fact the proportion will be four of the former to one of the latter.

Statistics show every State in New England to be well represented at the Tuesday matinées, and the number of towns and cities so represented is beyond anyone's wildest guess. By actual count these number 122, without any padding. Subscribers from Newton, for instance, have been put down under "Newton," not under the eight different divisions of the city. Similarly, residents of Wollaston have been listed under Quincy. All subscribers in Boston have been allotted to "Boston," whether their mailing address was Roxbury, Dorchester, Back Bay or Roslindale.

The investigation has been carried further. Upon a large map at Symphony Hall, subscribers to the Tuesday concerts are indicated in their respective locations. By means of computation on railroad timetables and road maps it was possible to arrive at the mileage covered by each subscriber to and from Boston, thereby reaching the total of 60,000 miles, meaning both directions. And this figure does not include the mileage of one who comes annually from England for the Symphony season only.

Residential addresses of subscribers are distributed over the following States, in the order of number of subscribers: Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Maine and Vermont. During last summer the subscription department also carried on correspondence in these States: California, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan and New Jersey. This latter group of States represents the home addresses of students at Harvard, Wellesley, Boston University and other schools.

This widespread audience has come about partly as follows. The Boston Symphony Orchestra once visited regularly such New England cities as Worcester, Portland, New Bedford, Lawrence, Lowell, Brockton, Salem, Lynn, Fall River and other cities. Due to pressure of its schedule the orchestra was obliged to forego its visits to many of these places. Yet, music lovers in these cities had already had a taste of fine music. The longing to hear the orchestra remained. The accessibility of Boston, brought closer by motor travel over improved highways, makes it convenient for scores of persons to visit the city six times in a season, topping off shopping expeditions and a few social calls with a symphony concert. The Tuesday concert, starting as it does at three o'clock in the afternoon, enables these out-of-town visitors to make a day of it in Boston.

The tabulated list of subscribers for the Tuesday series shows the following distribution by cities and towns:

Massachusetts

Boston	696
Brookline	430
Cambridge	310
Newton	244
Wellesley	110

More Than 40 Subscribers

Belmont
Lynn
Milton
Winchester
Worcester

More Than 30 Subscribers

Arlington
Hingham
Melrose

More Than 20 Subscribers

Andover
Cohasset
Concord
Marblehead
Medford
Somerville
Waltham
Weston

More Than 10 Subscribers

Beverly
Brockton
Campello
Framingham
Gloucester
Groton
Haverhill
Lexington
Malden
Milford
Natick
Needham
Newbury
Norton
Salem
Southboro
Swampscott
Wayland
Woburn

One or More

Ashland
Athol
Ayer
Beach Bluff
Bedford
Billerica
Bradford
Braintree
Brewster
Bridgewater
Canton
Chelsea
Clinton
Danvers
Dedham
Dover
Duxbury
Everett
Fall River
Falmouth
Fitchburg
Foxboro
Gardner
Grafton
Hatchville
Holbrook
Hopedale
Ipswich
Kingston
Lancaster
Lincoln
Littleton
Longmeadow
Lowell
Manchester
Marlboro
Medfield
Methuen
Middleboro
Milford
New Bedford
Northampton
Northbridge
North Easton
Norwell
Norwood
Plymouth
Quincy
Reading
Richmond
Rochdale
Rockport
Sandwich
Saxonville
Scituate
Sharon
Sherborn
South Hamilton
Sudbury
Topsfield
Wakefield
Walpole
Watertown
Webster
West Medway
Weymouth
Winchendon
Winthrop

New Hampshire

Antrim
East Jaffrey
Hanover
Manchester
Portsmouth
Wakefield
Wilton

Connecticut

Danielson
Hartford
Norwich
Stonington

Rhode Island

Adamsville
Providence
Woonsocket

Maine

Portland
York Village

Vermont

Woodstock

that pathetic earnestness which one I isn't.

Boston Symphony Season On

Entire Program of Concert at Carnegie Hall Made Up of Works of Sibelius.

NY Nov 18 Sun

By W. J. HENDERSON.

"Timeo Bostonaos Sibelium ferentes" is surely not to be said. Let us rejoice rather that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving its first concert of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall, came bearing precious gifts of deep reflection from the northern port of Helsingfors.

The entire concert was devoted to works of Sibelius. The numbers were the suite created from the instrumental music to Strindberg's "Swanwhite," "Tapiola," a tone poem celebrating Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology, and the first symphony. These breathings of the northern spirit the urbane Mr. Koussevitzky directed with enthusiasm tempered by wisdom.

"Tapiola" was composed at the behest of Walter Damrosch for the departed Symphony Society, and had what is now called a "world premier" on December 26, 1926. Upon the same occasion Mr. Gershwin's piano concerto in F emerged into the glare of publicity. The concerto came back only a few days ago, and now the tone poem returns. The honors of revival go to the latter. The present writer attended two performances of it in 1926, but did not hear it till last night.

Cecil Gray, who recently sent forth a good book on Sibelius, asserts that this work "is the culminating point of his entire creative activity and a consummate masterpiece which could only be the outcome of a long process of spiritual growth and development. It is music of extraordinary simplicity and directness, yet there is not one bar in it from first to last that could possibly have been written by any other composer."

This music lover is not prepared to accept unreservedly the first proposition in Mr. Gray's estimate, but to the second he can subscribe without hesitation. This is the essential Sibelius. The simplicity of the work is traceable directly to its development from a thematic root placed before the hearer in the opening bars and treated with unlabored logic throughout the com- quently drastic, but the basic scheme rests upon the harmonic doctrines of the Old Believers. The mood communication, wrought with such materials and with broad, dignified rhythms and orchestration thoroughly characteristic of the composer, is eloquent, and exerts a potent spell upon the hearer. The poem was performed with all the wealth of tone and technic for which the Boston orchestra is famous. Mr. Koussevitzky effaced himself and rendered unto Sibelius that which was Sibelius's.

The charming music written for the Strindberg play was heard with pleasure. The score is rich in delicate fancy and is a revelation of the less introspective side of the Sibelius mind. The first symphony had its initial performance in this city by the Boston orchestra on February 21, 1907. It is a beautiful composition. Its themes are derived from the composer's native soil; they echo the musical fancy of his people. The harmonies are rich and varied, but without any attempt at an embodiment of the doctrine that ugly chords are good for man's soul. The rhythms are clean cut and incisive and the instrumentation full of color skillfully adapted to the purpose of the work. When the symphony was produced here this writer said that it was one which could readily be ruined by inadequate performance and that the Boston orchestra found itself in congenial company when it met this score. Let that dictum stand.

The concert of last evening brought to mind the sorry state into which the great Boston organization sank immediately after the war and the arduous labor of Pierre Monteux to restore its pristine excellence. All that is forgotten now. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is once again a magnificent instrument with a gorgeous tone, a solid technic and a competent conductor.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Boston Orchestra's Activities.

The recent concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought many expressions of regret that the orchestra made but one visit to Hartford in a season; but the present receipt of the orchestra's list of bookings for the current season shows that Hartford is pretty well favored as a New England city in having the Boston Orchestra play for it even once. For, counting the orchestra's native Boston and adjacent Cambridge only seven New England cities hear Dr. Koussevitzky's men play—even though the New England performances naturally mount up to a high number.

Of the concerts now scheduled for the orchestra—the season from October 7 to April 30—62 are allotted to Boston, 8 to Cambridge, 4 to Providence and one each to Hartford, Wellesley, Northampton and New Haven out of a total of one hundred and three listed. There are 10 New York concerts in the season and Brooklyn gets six performances, with Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Cincinnati, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Reading, Ithaca Baltimore and Washington given one each. Seven of the cities visited are definitely "university towns."

And, while we're on the subject of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: There was a picture printed in the Hartford Times the day after the orchestra's concert at the Bushnell Memorial showing Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns and their daughter in the greenroom of the hall with Dr. Koussevitzky—a picture taken following the completion of the program And someone called me up later about the picture asking why Dr. Koussevitzky wasn't wearing dress clothes in the picture, inasmuch as he was attired for the evening at the concert.

Well, and this is the how of that. Dr. Koussevitzky doesn't "take it easy" in conducting a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In fact he works very, very hard, and he gets very, very warm—and just the minute he has finished taking his final bow of the evening in acknowledgement of the audience's applause he makes a beeline for a shower-bath and a complete change of clothes; a practice which undoubtedly helps him to keep in first class physical condition—and prevents a lot of colds that he might catch if he were less careful!

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

Boston Symphony Heard Here In First Concert of Season

The first in a series of five philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor, was given last evening in the Academy of Music. The orchestra this season includes 110 musicians.

Last night's program was as follows: Weber's Overture to "Oberon;" Franck's Symphony in D minor; Sibelius' "Tapigola," symphonic poem; Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The remaining concerts will be given in Jan. 6, Feb. 2, March 3 and April 7.

SOCIAL NEWS

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES A SIBELIUS PROGRAM

Interprets Finnish Composer at Boston Symphony's First Concert Here.

PROGRESS IN STYLE SHOWN

Examples of Both Early and Late Work Are Played—Other Sibelius Programs Expected.

NY Times Nov 19

By OLIN DOWNES.

No conductor in America has done as much for the music of Sibelius as Mr. Koussevitzky, who gave an entire program of that composer's works at the first New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. This program consisted of the unfamiliar suite taken from incidental music to the play of August Strindberg, "Swanwhite" (Joutsen-valkea); the tone poem, "Tapiola," opus 112, and the wild and picturesque First Symphony.

This program looked very much like a preparation for other programs of Sibelius which Mr. Koussevitzky might give in New York, as he has planned a series of all the symphonies of Sibelius for Boston. It is much to be hoped that he will do as much of this as possible in Carnegie Hall, although many concerts devoted wholly to Sibelius would be disproportionate and deprive the audience of the many other interesting works that Mr. Koussevitzky is sure to bring with him. But Sibelius's latest symphony, the Eighth, will certainly be heard here, and last night the audience was given examples of both the early and the late style of the great Finnish composer. It was an uncommonly interesting offering. The works performed are unequal in value. The First Symphony has much that is derivative in it, wild and mournful and majestic as it is. "Tapiola" is the late Sibelius. Between, in point of chronology, comes the suite of music to Strindberg's play, which is charming.

This music is an example of a master using a few instruments and displaying his genius in small forms. With these few instruments, in these small forms, Sibelius contrives to be wholly original, charming and at moments more than that. His touch is light in these pages, and fanciful. There is the flavor of northern folklore, there is the thought of sunlit glades.

The movements are five: "The Peacock," "The Harp," "The Maiden with Roses," "Listen, the Robin Sings," and "Song of Praise," which is the most extended of the five pieces, modal, and in the older style. A note constantly reiterated by a wind instrument is doubtless the cry of the peacock, but this is the most realistic moment. The robin's song is not a chirrup of flute or a chortle of clarinet. In a word, it is not merely realistic, but a fantasy of sounds of the rustling forest. The music is truly inspired, admirably stated, fresh and genuinely without affectattion.

"Tapiola" was composed as a prize composition nearly six years ago, for performance at the hands of Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra. At the time of its first hearing in this city it did not make as strong an impression as other of Sibelius's scores, but when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it recently in Boston some of the reviewers found high merit in the work, and in this they are supported by authoritative writers overseas. It is only just to the composition to mention these things, but it cannot be said here that "Tapiola"—the name is derived from that of Tapio, the Finnish god of the forest—seemed very much more significant last night than it did more than five years ago. It has the stamp of Sibelius in every measure; no other composer would express himself in this way. It has very interesting harmonic effects and certain passages mysterious and powerful, but as a whole it is not as convincing as most of Sibelius's mature orchestral music. There is too little contrast of mood and what at present appears as a pervading formlessness. That the music may impress differently in seasons to come is very possible; it is easy to remember the bewilderment that Sibelius's Fourth Symphony occasioned at its first hearing.

Therefore the musical body of last night's program was the now popular First symphony, so full of Nordic feeling and northern scenery, so impetuous and unprecedented in orchestral coloring, so plainly and unmistakably the advent, in the field of symphony, of a genius capable of speaking with the large utterance of the early gods. This symphony, too, was "caviare to the general" only a few years ago, though now it seems impossible to explain why. The reason the music moves us today is its sheer strength, inspiration and sincerity. It is not because of strange harmonies, though here and there a harmonic cloven foot peeps out from underneath the gown. It is not because the symphony is of unadulterated novelty. Tchaikovsky, for one, is in it, and some of its working out is a little tentative. But the net result is music of superb free brush strokes, and mood and strength which is primeval. The man of genius does not strive for originality, because he does not have to. In this symphony Sibelius takes such materials as are ready to his hand and writes down the precise harmonies of which his inner ear apprises him, and we have a most significant symphony.

For some reason, Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of this work, admirably finished in detail, was not so forthright and so powerful in its character as other performances that he has given in this city of the same work. Sometimes the tempi appeared too deliberate, and then some of the lyrical phrases came perilously near the sentimental, as the lyrical theme of the last movement. This was not important enough to obscure the symphony's character or to fail to evoke the most enthusiastic plaudits from the audience, but he has given a greater First Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's program on Saturday afternoon includes Brahms's Second symphony and two works of John Alden Carpenter, who will play the piano part in the first New York performance of his "Patterns," for orchestra with piano obbligato, and be further represented as a composer by his ballet score, "Skyscrapers."

For Permanent Record

Records of births, engagements, marriages, may be indefinitely preserved by purchasing a copy of The New York Times limited edition printed on a permanent rag-paper stock. Late city edition only. Week-day issues, per copy 75 cents; Sunday, $1.25; annual subscription, mailed daily, $100; bound volumes. $170.

Nov 19

'Conquerors

Amer NY

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PERFORMS ENTIRE SIBELIUS PROGRAM

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Reprinted from yesterday's late edition.

For some unexplained reason, certainly not based on popular demand, there are at present strange and simultaneous revivals of the orchestral works of Jan Sibelius, Finland's leading composer.

In New York and elsewhere the orchestras, after neglecting the Sibelius output for some years suddenly devote themselves to it with renewed energy. The visiting Boston Symphony players, under Serge Koussevitzky, went so far last evening at their Carnegie Hall concert as to devote an entire program to Sibelius, with his "Swanhite," incidental music to Strindberg's play; the tone poem "Tapiola"; and the first symphony, in E minor.

It may be that direct appeal or persuasion of private or publisher's propaganda has brought about the current Sibelius recrudescence; but, on the other hand, perhaps conscience got to work upon all the conductors at the same time and caused them to give another chance to an earnest, even if uninspired, composer whose productions failed to click decisively with the public on previous occasions.

Suffice it to say that Sibelius made his New York return under excellent auspices this season, for he has been presented by no less a luminous trio of conductors than Toscanini, Stokowski and Koussevitzky.

The last named, and his highly accomplished orchestra from Boston, lavished devoted interpretations and virtuoso playing upon the Sibelius program of last night, but the net result, so far as the writer of these lines is concerned, was the renewed conviction that the symphonist from Finland is an esoteric, brooding musical thinker, a man of few moods which he repeats constantly and at great length, and a skilful orchestrator who works with facility in the idioms of Wagner, Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss. That is not to say that Sibelius lacks in occasional powerful or even affecting moments. But they are few and far between and constitute only oases in vast stretches of prolixity and empty padding .

The audience gave respectful attention and applause. It is doubtful whether a vote taken at the concert would have represented a landslide request for a future repetition of the program.

* * *

Brooklyn Times Union

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Koussevitsky Here

Serge Koussevitsky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for the first in the annual series of five borough concerts. The Russian conductor offered a varied program opening with the elfin-like overture to Weber's "Oberon" and then presenting a dramatic reading of the Cesar Franck symphony.

Following the intermission Mr. Koussevitsky gave Brooklyn its first hearing of the Sibelius poem "Tapiola," which was introduced to New York by Walter Damrosch. At that time the poignant barrenness and starkness of the Northland as depicted by the Finnish composer was stressed by the interpreter. Mr. Koussevitsky last night proved that such an aspect might be eloquently indicative of that land and he tinged the work with some of that drama and fire which is found in other Sibelius numbers. The vorspiel to "Meistersinger" completed the initial program.

H. F. S.

tribution to the opening per- week's bill.

THE CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
NOV 19 1932

As Usual, Was Well Done

Boston Symphony Again Proves Its Capabilities Under Noted Leader.

by Larry Lipskin

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in inaugurating the 1932 New York series of his Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, did honor to his friend, Jean Julius Christian Sibelius.

Dr. Koussevitzky paid Master Sibelius the overwhelming compliment of devoting the entire program to excerpts from the works of the Finn. And on that score alone will any unpleasantness creep into this review.

I feel that the choice was of highly questionable value. The Boston Symphony and its conductor have many friends in this city. They flock to hear what this orchestra of virtuosos and its master have to say. They linger upon each orchestral syllable. They lament the paucity of the Boston's appearances here.

Thursday night, however, laments of another nature were to be heard. The audience would have doted upon a selection from some other master. So would this reviewer.

Library Immense

The symphonic library is so immense in scope even an attempt to mention other "giants" here would require too much space. Too many names come to mind at once.

Be that as it may, having selected three Sibelius works for his program, Dr. Koussevitzky proceeded to give them the sympathetic treatment he always gives, and his musicians again proved themselves outstanding.

Frequently barbaric in its simplicity, almost always cold with the fiery cold of the north countries, Sibelius' music was well exemplified in the program, which consisted of the Suite "Svanehvit" (Swanwhite), incidental music to Strindberg's play of that name; the tone poem, "Tapiola," and, after the intermission, the First Symphony in E Minor.

The first two selections abound in evidences of the greatness of their composer. But it is the symphony which crowned the evening. Easily the most significant of the three items, it would reveal, even to one who had never heard Sibelius, that a master had been at work.

Still Forceful

Particularly interesting to this writer is the enunciation by the drums of the major motif of the third movement in final capitulation. A radical departure at the time of its composition, it is still arresting, forceful and dramatic today.

As dramatic as anything in all the field of symphony is the very end of the Finale, when the orchestra, having risen triumphantly in a sweeping crescendo, fortissimo, falls to a pizzicato, and is silent.

Dramatist, Sibelius surely is. But, to repeat, I would have liked at least a one-scene drama by some other composer.

Symphony Renews Carnegie Hall Lease

NY Nov 19 Post

NEW YORK, Nov. 18—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has renewed its lease at Carnegie Hall here for a two-year period, it was learned, today. At the same time, it was learned that the Philharmonic-Symphony of this city and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra have also taken similar action. The three orchestras acted, it was explained, when heavy bookings for the first two months of the season, exceeding all previous records, made the action necessary if they were to continue their concerts, which distinguished the city's musical season, in the main auditorium of the hall.

According to Carnegie Hall officials, there has been an "unprecedented revival interest of fine music" in this city.

45 that pathetic earnestness which one I isn't.

Boston Symphony Season On

Entire Program of Concert at Carnegie Hall Made Up of Works of Sibelius.

NY Nov 18 Sun

By W. J. HENDERSON.

"Timeo Bostonaos Sibelium ferentes" is surely not to be said. Let us rejoice rather that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving its first concert of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall, came bearing precious gifts of deep reflection from the northern port of Helsingfors.

The entire concert was devoted to works of Sibelius. The numbers were the suite created from the instrumental music to Strindberg's "Swanwhite," "Tapiola," a tone poem celebrating Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology, and the first symphony. These breathings of the northern spirit the urbane Mr. Koussevitzky directed with enthusiasm tempered by wisdom.

"Tapiola" was composed at the behest of Walter Damrosch for the departed Symphony Society, and had what is now called a "world premier" on December 26, 1926. Upon the same occasion Mr. Gershwin's piano concerto in F emerged into the glare of publicity. The concerto came back only a few days ago, and now the tone poem returns. The honors of revival go to the latter. The present writer attended two performances of it in 1926, but did not hear it till last night.

Cecil Gray, who recently sent forth a good book on Sibelius, asserts that this work "is the culminating point of his entire creative activity and a consummate masterpiece which could only be the outcome of a long process of spiritual growth and development. It is music of extraordinary simplicity and directness, yet there is not one bar in it from first to last that could possibly have been written by any other composer."

This music lover is not prepared to accept unreservedly the first proposition in Mr. Gray's estimate, but to the second he can subscribe without hesitation. This is the essential Sibelius. The simplicity of the work is traceable directly to its development from a thematic root placed before the hearer in the opening bars and treated with unlabored logic throughout the composition. The harmonies are frequently drastic, but the basic scheme rests upon the harmonic doctrines of the Old Believers. The mood communication, wrought with such materials and with broad, dignified rhythms and orchestration thoroughly characteristic of the composer, is eloquent, and exerts a potent spell upon the hearer. The poem was performed with all the wealth of tone and technic for which the Boston orchestra is famous. Mr. Koussevitzky effaced himself and rendered unto Sibelius that which was Sibelius's.

The charming music written for the Strindberg play was heard with pleasure. The score is rich in delicate fancy and is a revelation of the less introspective side of the Sibelius mind. The first symphony had its initial performance in this city by the Boston orchestra on February 21, 1907. It is a beautiful composition. Its themes are derived from the composer's native soil; they echo the musical fancy of his people. The harmonies are rich and varied, but without any attempt at an embodiment of the doctrine that ugly chords are good for man's soul. The rhythms are clean cut and incisive and the instrumentation full of color skillfully adapted to the purpose of the work. When the symphony was produced here this writer said that it was one which could readily be ruined by inadequate performance and that the Boston orchestra found itself in congenial company when it met this score. Let that dictum stand.

The concert of last evening brought to mind the sorry state into which the great Boston organization sank immediately after the war and the arduous labor of Pierre Monteux to restore its pristine excellence. All that is forgotten now. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is once again a magnificent instrument with a gorgeous tone, a solid technic and a competent conductor.

HOTELS AND RESTAURANTS.

---

the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought many expressions of regret that the orchestra made but one visit to Hartford in a season; but the present receipt of the orchestra's list of bookings for the current season shows that Hartford is pretty well favored as a New England city in having the Boston Orchestra play for it even once. For, counting the orchestra's native Boston and adjacent Cambridge only seven New England cities hear Dr. Koussevitzky's men play—even though the New England performances naturally mount up to a high number.

Of the concerts now scheduled for the orchestra—the season from October 7 to April 30—62 are allotted to Boston, 8 to Cambridge, 4 to Providence and one each to Hartford, Wellesley, Northampton and New Haven out of a total of one hundred and three listed. There are 10 New York concerts in the season and Brooklyn gets six performances, with Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Cincinnati, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Reading, Ithaca Baltimore and Washington given one each. Seven of the cities visited are definitely "university towns."

And, while we're on the subject of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: There was a picture printed in the Hartford Times the day after the orchestra's concert at the Bushnell Memorial showing Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns and their daughter in the greenroom of the hall with Dr. Koussevitzky—a picture taken following the completion of the program And someone called me up later about the picture asking why Dr. Koussevitzky wasn't wearing dress clothes in the picture, inasmuch as he was attired for the evening at the concert.

Well, and this is the how of that. Dr. Koussevitzky doesn't "take it easy" in conducting a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In fact he works very, very hard, and he gets very, very warm—and just the minute he has finished taking his final bow of the evening in acknowledgement of the audience's applause he makes a beeline for a shower-bath and a complete change of clothes; a practice which undoubtedly helps him to keep in first class physical condition—and prevents a lot of colds that he might catch if he were less careful!

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

Boston Symphony Heard Here In First Concert of Season

The first in a series of five philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor, was given last evening in the Academy of Music. The orchestra this season includes 110 musicians.

Last night's program was as follows: Weber's Overture to "Oberon;" Franck's Symphony in D minor; Sibelius' "Tapigola," symphonic poem; Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The remaining concerts will be given in Jan. 6, Feb. 2, March 3 and April 7.

SOCIAL NEWS

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES A SIBELIUS PROGRAM

Interprets Finnish Composer at Boston Symphony's First Concert Here.

PROGRESS IN STYLE SHOWN

Examples of Both Early and Late Work Are Played—Other Sibelius Programs Expected.

NY Times Nov 19

By OLIN DOWNES.

No conductor in America has done as much for the music of Sibelius as Mr. Koussevitzky, who gave an entire program of that composer's works at the first New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. This program consisted of the unfamiliar suite taken from incidental music to the play of August Strindberg, "Swanwhite" (Joutsen-valkea); the tone poem, "Tapiola," opus 112, and the wild and picturesque First Symphony.

This program looked very much like a preparation for other programs of Sibelius which Mr. Koussevitzky might give in New York, as he has planned a series of all the symphonies of Sibelius for Boston. It is much to be hoped that he will do as much of this as possible in Carnegie Hall, although many concerts devoted wholly to Sibelius would be disproportionate and deprive the audience of the many other interesting works that Mr. Koussevitzky is sure to bring with him. But Sibelius's latest symphony, the Eighth, will certainly be heard here, and last night the audience was given examples of both the early and the late style of the great Finnish composer. It was an uncommonly interesting offering. The works performed are unequal in value. The First Symphony has much that is derivative in it, wild and mournful and majestic as it is. "Tapiola" is the late Sibelius. Between, in point of chronology, comes the suite of music to Strindberg's play, which is charming.

This music is an example of a master using a few instruments and displaying his genius in small forms. With these few instruments, in these small forms, Sibelius contrives to be wholly original, charming and at moments more than that. His touch is light in these pages, and fanciful. There is the flavor of northern folklore, there is the thought of sunlit glades.

The movements are five: "The Peacock," "The Harp," "The Maiden with Roses," "Listen, the Robin Sings," and "Song of Praise," which is the most extended of the five pieces, modal, and in the older style. A note constantly reiterated by a wind instrument is doubtless the cry of the peacock, but this is the most realistic moment. The robin's song is not a chirrup of flute or a chortle of clarinet. In a word, it is not merely realistic, but a fantasy of sounds of the rustling forest. The music is truly inspired, admirably stated, fresh and genuinely without affectattion.

"Tapiola" was composed as a prize composition nearly six years ago, for performance at the hands of Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra. At the time of its first hearing in this city it did not make as strong an impression as other of Sibelius's scores, but when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it recently in Boston some of the reviewers found high merit in the work, and in this they are supported by authoritative writers overseas. It is only just to the composition to mention these things, but it cannot be said here that "Tapiola"—the name is derived from that of Tapio, the Finnish god of the forest—seemed very much more significant last night than it did more than five years ago. It has the stamp of Sibelius in every measure; no other composer would express himself in this way. It has very interesting harmonic effects and certain passages mysterious and powerful, but as a whole it is not as convincing as most of Sibelius's mature orchestral music. There is too little contrast of mood and what at present appears as a pervading formlessness. That the music may impress differently in seasons to come is very possible; it is easy to remember the bewilderment that Sibelius's Fourth Symphony occasioned at its first hearing.

Therefore the musical body of last night's program was the now popular First symphony, so full of Nordic feeling and northern scenery, so impetuous and unprecedented in orchestral coloring, so plainly and unmistakably the advent, in the field of symphony, of a genius capable of speaking with the large utterance of the early gods. This symphony, too, was "caviare to the general" only a few years ago, though now it seems impossible to explain why. The reason the music moves us today is its sheer strength, inspiration and sincerity. It is not because of strange harmonies, though here and there a harmonic cloven foot peeps out from underneath the gown. It is not because the symphony is of unadulterated novelty. Tchaikovsky, for one, is in it, and some of its working out is a little tentative. But the net result is music of superb free brush strokes, and mood and strength which is primeval. The man of genius does not strive for originality, because he does not have to. In this symphony Sibelius takes such materials as are ready to his hand and writes down the precise harmonies of which his inner ear apprises him, and we have a most significant symphony.

For some reason, Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of this work, admirably finished in detail, was not so forthright and so powerful in its character as other performances that he has given in this city of the same work. Sometimes the tempi appeared too deliberate, and then some of the lyrical phrases came perilously near the sentimental, as the lyrical theme of the last movement. This was not important enough to obscure the symphony's character or to fail to evoke the most enthusiastic plaudits from the audience, but he has given a greater First Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's program on Saturday afternoon includes Brahms's Second symphony and two works of John Alden Carpenter, who will play the piano part in the first New York performance of his "Patterns," for orchestra with piano obbligato, and be further represented as a composer by his ballet score, "Skyscrapers."

For Permanent Record

Records of births, engagements, marriages, may be indefinitely preserved by purchasing a copy of The New York Times limited edition printed on a permanent ragpaper stock. Late city edition only. Week-day issues, per copy 75 cents; Sunday, $1.25; annual subscription, mailed daily, $100; bound volumes, $170.

Nov 19

'Conquerors

Amer NY

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PERFORMS ENTIRE SIBELIUS PROGRAM

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Reprinted from yesterday's late edition.

For some unexplained reason, certainly not based on popular demand, there are at present strange and simultaneous revivals of the orchestral works of Jan Sibelius, Finland's leading composer.

In New York and elsewhere the orchestras, after neglecting the Sibelius output for some years suddenly devote themselves to it with renewed energy. The visiting Boston Symphony players, under Serge Koussevitzky, went so far last evening at their Carnegie Hall concert as to devote an entire program to Sibelius, with his "Swanhite," incidental music to Strindberg's play; the tone poem "Tapiola"; and the first symphony, in E minor.

It may be that direct appeal or persuasion of private or publisher's propaganda has brought about the current Sibelius recrudescence; but, on the other hand, perhaps conscience got to work upon all the conductors at the same time and caused them to give another chance to an earnest, even if uninspired, composer whose productions failed to click decisively with the public on previous occasions.

Suffice it to say that Sibelius made his New York return under excellent auspices this season, for he has been presented by no less a luminous trio of conductors than Toscanini, Stokowski and Koussevitzky.

The last named, and his highly accomplished orchestra from Boston, lavished devoted interpretations and virtuoso playing upon the Sibelius program of last night, but the net result, so far as the writer of these lines is concerned, was the renewed conviction that the symphonist from Finland is an esoteric, brooding musical thinker, a man of few moods which he repeats constantly and at great length, and a skilful orchestrator who works with facility in the idioms of Wagner, Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss. That is not to say that Sibelius lacks in occasional powerful or even affecting moments. But they are few and far between and constitute only oases in vast stretches of prolixity and empty padding.

The audience gave respectful attention and applause. It is doubtful whether a vote taken at the concert would have represented a landslide request for a future repetition of the program.

* * *

Brooklyn Times Union

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Koussevitsky Here

Serge Koussevitsky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for the first in the annual series of five borough concerts. The Russian conductor offered a varied program opening with the elfin-like overture to Weber's "Oberon" and then presenting a dramatic reading of the Cesar Franck symphony.

Following the intermission Mr. Koussevitsky gave Brooklyn its first hearing of the Sibelius poem "Tapiola," which was introduced to New York by Walter Damrosch. At that time the poignant barrenness and starkness of the Northland as depicted by the Finnish composer was stressed by the interpreter. Mr. Koussevitsky last night proved that such an aspect might be eloquently indicative of that land and he tinged the work with some of that drama and fire which is found in other Sibelius numbers. The vorspiel to "Meistersinger" completed the initial program.

H. F. S.

with her, constituted her tribution to the opening per-week's bill.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
NOV 19 1932

As Usual, Was Well Done

Boston Symphony Again Proves Its Capabilities Under Noted Leader.

by Larry Lipskin

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in inaugurating the 1932 New York series of his Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, did honor to his friend, Jean Julius Christian Sibelius.

Dr. Koussevitzky paid Master Sibelius the overwhelming compliment of devoting the entire program to excerpts from the works of the Finn. And on that score alone will any unpleasantness creep into this review.

I feel that the choice was of highly questionable value. The Boston Symphony and its conductor have many friends in this city. They flock to hear what this orchestra of virtuosos and its master have to say. They linger upon each orchestral syllable. They lament the paucity of the Boston's appearances here.

Thursday night, however, laments of another nature were to be heard. The audience would have doted upon a selection from some other master. So would this reviewer.

Library Immense

The symphonic library is so immense in scope even an attempt to mention other "giants" here would require too much space. Too many names come to mind at once.

Be that as it may, having selected three Sibelius works for his program, Dr. Koussevitzky proceeded to give them the sympathetic treatment he always gives, and his musicians again proved themselves outstanding.

Frequently barbaric in its simplicity, almost always cold with the fiery cold of the north countries, Sibelius' music was well exemplified in the program, which consisted of the Suite "Svanehvit" (Swanwhite), incidental music to Strindberg's play of that name; the tone poem, "Tapiola," and, after the intermission, the First Symphony in E Minor.

The first two selections abound in evidences of the greatness of their composer. But it is the symphony which crowned the evening. Easily the most significant of the three items, it would reveal, even to one who had never heard Sibelius, that a master had been at work.

Still Forceful

Particularly interesting to this writer is the enunciation by the drums of the major motif of the third movement in final capitulation. A radical departure at the time of its composition, it is still arresting, forceful and dramatic today.

As dramatic as anything in all the field of symphony is the very end of the Finale, when the orchestra, having risen triumphantly in a sweeping crescendo, fortissimo, falls to a pizzicato, and is silent.

Dramatist, Sibelius surely is. But, to repeat, I would have liked at least a one-scene drama by some other composer.

Symphony Renews Carnegie Hall Lease

NY Nov

Pot

NEW YORK, Nov. 18—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has renewed its lease at Carnegie Hall here for a two-year period, it was learned, today. At the same time, it was learned that the Philharmonic-Symphony of this city and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra have also taken similar action. The three orchestras acted, it was explained, when heavy bookings for the first two months of the season, exceeding all previous records, made the action necessary if they were to continue their concerts, which distinguished the city's musical season, in the main auditorium of the hall.

According to Carnegie Hall officials, there has been an "unprecedented revival interest of fine music" in this city.

46

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony Plays in Brooklyn—More About Sibelfus and 'Tapiola'—Harriet Cohen's Recital

Most of the music that Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orcehstra played last evening at the first of their Brooklyn concerts this season was familiar to their audience. Weber's "Oberon" overture, the Franck symphony, Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude—all of these the conductor and his men had played before at the Academy of Music. But the program also included a novelty, the tone poem, "Tapiola," by Jean Sibelius, a work which could never previously have been heard in Brooklyn, unless Mr. Damrosch introduced it here when, years ago, he conducted its premiere performance—and I do not recall that he did.

Though it may not have impressed last evenings audience as such, "Tapiola" is really an unusually interesting score. I have already in these columns had something to say about it, apropos its performance on Thursday at Carnegie Hall, but the subject of the work is not exhausted in a few remarks. "Tapiola" is certainly not first-rate, and may not even be good second-rate Sibelius; it is none the less a mature and highly characteristic expression of its composer's genius; it presents every important aspect of his individuality to us in a clear if seldom a flattering light, and for this reason, if no other, we should derive both pleasure and profit from listening to it attentively, and trying to formulate certain impresisons which it communicates to us concerning Sibelius and his way of making music.

* * *

It is not easy to analyze Sibelious' originality. Or rather, it is easy enough up to a certain point, and well-nigh impossible beyond. Certain traits of style are conspicuous in all of his representative works—the aphoristic character of his melodies (if melodies his tightly compressed, curiously inconclusive thematic motifs may be called), the boldness of his harmonic schemes, his apparently arbitrary yet dodly forceful modulations, the strange discontinuity of his forms. These we can seize upon and define, if we choose, in precise technical terms. But when we have done so, are we any nearer than we were before to knowing what it is that makes Sibelius' music different from any other than we know—different not only in style and content, but diifferent, fundamentally, in intention and effect?

For it seems to me, and others also have doubtless felt this, that Sibelius has not written music as other composers have, to express certain emotional attitudes and experiences commonly shared or encountered by most of us. The intention behind his music is, I feel, not this at all, but something altogether different. Mis music speaks of a higher consciousness than that of self in the romantic sense; its significance expands indefinitely, till it seems to have embraced and synthesized all the little that is known or knowable of the mystery of the race. On a vast and featureless plain stands a man in stone, of heroic proportions, but expressionless; on every side the world recedes to a vacant horizon; not a sound is heard, nothing stirs; the plain, the sky, the statue—this is all that is, that has been, that will be . . . For the time being, until we have assimilated its extarordinary novelty and found in familiarity the key to its literal meaning, it is in some such inadequate image that we must sum the impression this music makes upon us.

* * *

If last evening's audience had greater pleasure out of Weber, Franck and Wagner than out of Sibelius, it were not to be wondered at. For ears unaccustomed to his idiom, Sibelius is never very lucid, but the attempt to understand what he has to say to us is more richly rewarded when it is made in connection with the second, fourth or seventh symphonies, say, than when listening, however attentively and patiently, to "Tapiola." Nevertheless, Mr. Koussewitsky was right to revive this tone, poem; it is interesting, and in a way instructive; perhaps it is even a better piece than we are now inclined to think. It was beautifully played last night, with sustained but unemphatic intensity; it showed off to splendid advantage the string tone of the orchestra, so pure, and capable of the greatest variety of texture and color. Mr. Koussewitsky has a splendid instrument to play upon, and often he proves himself worthy of it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Literary Digest

~~Who Save Our Orchestras~~

NOT EVERY ONE KNOWS THE COST of a great orchestra like the Philharmonic Symphony, the Philadelphia, or the Boston Symphony.

But they go on their way ~~in spite of the~~ depression.

In past seasons all seats were filled, and many sought admission in vain, yet in the summing up of a season one frequently read of deficits made up by generous patrons.

Mr. Lawrence Gilman reminds us in the New York Herald Tribune that "insufficient recognition has been accorded those amazingly unselfish philanthropists who are today, in the midst of unprecedented financial calamities and anxieties, continuing their support of our great but exceedingly expensive orchestras." More—

"A symphony orchestra is always a costly thing to maintain. An orchestra such as the Philharmonic Symphony or the Philadelphia or the Boston or the Chicago, with its high-priced first players and its none too humble conductors, not only is unable to pay for itself, but must necessarily, even in boom times, confront its guarantors with enormous deficits.

"Under the present fantastic and terrifying conditions, the problem of maintaining an organization like the Philharmonic or the Philadelphia Orchestra, in the face of diminished subscriptions and all-around distress and stringency, is appalling to contemplate. Yet these orchestras are proceeding on their usual course, as if the year were 1928 instead of 1932. The programs continue to offer the great works of the symphonic repertoire; the performances are as superb as they ever were; the conductors are the finest to be had.

"The public-spirited men and women who are financially responsible for these staggeringly expensive undertakings are, as is known of all, far less affluent than they once were; yet they continue uncomplainingly to stand the gaff. One can not but wonder if their unselfishness in thus enhancing the civilization of the communities they serve, their invaluable contributions to the education of the public in perceptive listening, are appreciated. One has one's doubts."

RK WORLD-TELEGRAM, FRIDAY, NOVEMBI

Works of Sibelius Alone Fill Bostonians' Concert

Exclusive Use of Finnish Composer's Music Proves Ordeal to Audience at Performance Led by Koussevitzky.

By PITTS SANBORN.

VISITING New York for the first time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, devoted its concert in Carnegie Hall last evening to music by the Finnish composer Sibelius. So far as the present writer knows, Sibelius had not been treated here previously to the doubtful honor of this exclusivity.

For a concert devoted to a single composer is usually a trying ordeal—an ordeal that seems quite uncalled for, too. And this is true even when Bach or Beethoven is the composer. Seemingly Wagner, in the case of the orchestra, and Chopin, in that of the piano, bear up best, but they do so for reasons not entirely of musical eminence.

Now, last evening the first symphony of Sibelius in association with compositions by other authors, or even the "Swanwhite" suite and the tone poem "Tapiola" as preface to a symphony by somebody else would have been received with gratitude. But an all-Sibelius evening of them turned out to be a good deal of a trial.

Idolizing Movement Strong.

At present there is a formidable movement on, unconsciously and consciously, to tell the world that Sibelius is one of the loftiest of musical giants. England is especially obsessed with the idea. That particularly interesting English critic, Cecil Gray, insists that his idol is the foremost symphonist since Beethoven, if indeed Beethoven is to be excepted.

Philip Hale, in his thrice admirable program book, quotes one "G. E." as writing in the Manchester Guardian that he long has been convinced that the "Finnish master is the greatest composer not only of his generation but of modern times" and deploring the fact that "performances of his works, even now, are still ludicrously few in comparison with those of such relatively unimportant composers as Strauss, Ravel or Stravinsky, to name only three."

Performance Highly Successful.

Further, Mr. Hale quotes the indefatigable Ernest Newman as recently instructing his readers in the London Daily Times as to just how to study Sibelius.

Well, this active interest, though it may betray some partisans into extravagances of praise, is still an excellent thing, for few are going to deny Sibelius' greatness. Yet to subject him to the test of an entire program is a doubtful favor all around.

Be it said in no disparagement to either the "Swanwhite" suite or "Tapiola" that the first symphony loomed largest in last evening's program, and also it was the most successfully performed, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, by the superb orchestra, with its glorious string tone.

NY Tribune Nov 19

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

An All-Sibelius Evening at the Boston Symphony's Opening Concert

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

PROGRAM

1. Sibelius, "Swanwhite," Suite from the Incidental Music to Strindberg's Play, Op. 54.
2. Sibelius, "Tapiola," Tone Poem, Op. 112.
   Intermission
3. Sibelius, Symphony No. 1 in E Minor, Op. 39.

"NOTHING with wings!" pleaded the supper guest in Mr. George Moore's novel after she had endured an evening of "Lohengrin." Thanksgiving and the first New York visit of Mr. Koussevitzky and his symphonic Bostonians often arrive together; but this year our New England friends have come before the turkey dares. No doubt it is just as well. Euterpe and the Sacred Bird are happier apart.

We were able Thursday evening to brave without abnormal risk of indigestion the tonal excitements offered us by the maestro of Back Bay and his shining company of virtuosi. The only wings that we needed to think of were those implied in the title of the program's first number, the "Swan White" Suite of Sibelius; and that helping was soon and easily digested.

* * *

Euterpe's eminent representative had provided for his local constituency an entertainment of unusual character. This was nothing less than an evening devoted exclusively to the music of that contemporary composer who is, according to his most active and vocal disciple, the symphonic peer of Beethoven.

It was a brave and exciting thing to do—brave and exciting, and also fanatical. But the fanatical aspect of the matter need not disturb us. It is only the fanatical artist who can be music's perfect friend, whether in the interpretative or the creative field; and to say that last evening's program was the conception of a fanatic is not to censure but to praise it.

* * *

I do not know whether it is true, as we are authoritatively assured, that Sibelius is the peer of Beethoven—the only symphonist to wear the Sovereign's mantel. We have all, no doubt, read with lively interest the announcement of Beethoven's successor made with due impressiveness by the laetificant Mr. Cecil Gray. I, for one, should rejoice to feel that the true successor of Beethoven has been discovered and authenticated. I find it immensely cheering to stand on the arid parade-ground of contemporary music and allow myself to be refreshed with the stimulating rain of Mr. Gray's torrential downpour of Sibelian encomiums—"consummate masterpiece" . . . "unimaginable pitch of intensity" . . . "grandeur and sublimity" . . . "truly terrific and overwhelming" . . . "like a convulsion of nature."

One thinks of the tale of the Welsh peasant who was extolling the incomparable greatness of Mr. Lloyd George. "But," protested his slightly exasperated hearer "he's not God, you know!" "Ah, indeed, no; you are right," was the reply: "but he's young yet, look you." Sibelius, too, is young yet—a lad of sixty-six. Give him time.

* * *

But it would not become any one to look down his nose at Sibelius. Even if this singular genius has not yet given us—as Mr. Gray asserts that he has—symphonic movements that are to be set beside the first allegros of the "Eroica" and the "Ninth," Sibelius has made it abundantly clear to all whose imaginative awareness of music is sensitive and alert that he is a composer of extraordinary power and originality, a solitary and puissant voice, and an indubitable master.

This is not the occasion for a considered estimate of Sibelius. Of his immense output of works (there are 116 opus numbers in the list) relatively few are known here. Mr. Koussevitzky, one understands, intends to perform all of the eight symphonies in Boston; and it may be hoped that he will add to them certain of the more consequential tone-poems that are unknown in America. Possibly a few crumbs from the Sibelian feast may fall to the lot of the starved Manhattanese. Let us hope so.

Serge Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony conductor

* * *

Thursday evening's program yielded scarcely more than a glimpse of the greater Sibelius. The "Swan White" Suite, drawn from the incidental music composed almost a quarter of a century ago for Strindberg's play, is for the most part tepid, vacuous, and inconsequential.

The E minor Symphony we have ever with us. Sibelius was thirty-four when he wrote it (the age at which Beethoven wrote the "Eroica"). There is little in this First Symphony to suggest the amazingly original creator who was to give us, a dozen years later, the uncompanioned Fourth. The First Symphony is an essentially popular and sure-fire work, one that will always stir an audience when it is played as affectionately and dramatically as it was Thursday night by Mr. Koussevitzky and his superb orchestra. Its best pages—they are few enough—foreshadow the later and essential Sibelius. Its inferior pages—and they comprise the bulk of the score—are not much better than Tchaikovsky and Rachmaninoff and Glazounoff and Saint-Saens at their most lushly and expansively banal. The string cantilena in the Finale, which Sibelius inflates with such apparent pride, is an example of sentimental symphonic balladry at its worst—Peter Ilitch would have wept with joy over it. And much of the writing elsewhere is merely pretty, platitudinous, and exterior.

* * *

There remains, so far as Thursday evening's exhibit is concerned, the controversial "Tapiola," that symphonic poem which fell so flat when Mr. Walter Damrosch, after commissioning the work for the Symphony Society, produced it here in 1926.

The subject promised to offer a poetical scheme ideally suited to the special quality of Sibelius's genius, with its affinity for the desolate bleak countries of the mind, its tone-poetry of sunless woods and iron twilights and the harshness of Northern solitudes. But the impressiveness of the music seemed, six years ago, to reside chiefly in its program, though the big crescendo at the end (which has its prototype in the first act of "Siegfried") made its inevitable effect, as it did again last evening.

The work was far more eloquently played than at its first performance here; yet the power and brilliancy of its conveyance could not disguise the barrenness of the score as a whole. Something of the mysterious savagery and ancient terror that must have haunted the tone-poet's imagination has found its tonal equivalent in the music. But the greater part of the writing is unfertilized and uneventful.

* * *

We are far, in this work, from the excelling Sibelius of the Fourth Symphony, and of the Fifth, with their inimitable voice and accent and implications: for Sibelius, when he is most truly himself, issues no coin that is not stamped with his own unique image, the mask of a choice and unexampled spirit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle
NOV 19 1932

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony Plays in Brooklyn—More About Sibelfus and 'Tapiola'—Harriet Cohen's Recital

Most of the music that Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orcehstra played last evening at the first of their Brooklyn concerts this season was familiar to their audience. Weber's "Oberon" overture, the Franck symphony, Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude—all of these the conductor and his men had played before at the Academy of Music. But the program also included a novelty, the tone poem, "Tapiola," by Jean Sibelius, a work which could never previously have been heard in Brooklyn, unless Mr. Damrosch introduced it here when, years ago, he conducted its premiere performance—and I do not recall that he did.

Though it may not have impressed last evenings audience as such, "Tapiola" is really an unusually interesting score. I have already in these columns had something to say about it, apropos its performance on Thursday at Carnegie Hall, but the subject of the work is not exhausted in a few remarks. "Tapiola" is certainly not first-rate, and may not even be good second-rate Sibelius; it is none the less a mature and highly characteristic expression of its composer's genius; it presents every important aspect of his individuality to us in a clear if seldom a flattering light, and for this reason, if no other, we should derive both pleasure and profit from listening to it attentively, and trying to formulate certain impresisons which it communicates to us concerning Sibelius and his way of making music.

* * *

It is not easy to analyze Sibelious' originality. Or rather, it is easy enough up to a certain point, and well-nigh impossible beyond. Certain traits of style are conspicuous in all of his representative works—the aphoristic character of his melodies (if melodies his tightly compressed, curiously inconclusive thematic motifs may be called), the boldness of his harmonic schemes, his apparently arbitrary yet dodly forceful modulations, the strange discontinuity of his forms. These we can seize upon and define, if we choose, in precise technical terms. But when we have done so, are we any nearer than we were before to knowing what it is that makes Sibelius' music different from any other than we know—different not only in style and content, but diifferent, fundamentally, in intention and effect?

For it seems to me, and others also have doubtless felt this, that Sibelius has not written music as other composers have, to express certain emotional attitudes and experiences commonly shared or encountered by most of us. The intention behind his music is, I feel, not this at all, but something altogether different. Mis music speaks of a higher consciousness than that of self in the romantic sense; its significance expands indefinitely, till it seems to have embraced and synthesized all the little that is known or knowable of the mystery of the race. On a vast and featureless plain stands a man in stone, of heroic proportions, but expressionless; on every side the world recedes to a vacant horizon; not a sound is heard, nothing stirs; the plain, the sky, the statue—this is all that is, that has been, that will be . . . For the time being, until we have assimilated its extarordinary novelty and found in familiarity the key to its literal meaning, it is in some such inadequate image that we must sum the impression this music makes upon us.

* * *

If last evening's audience had greater pleasure out of Weber, Franck and Wagner than out of Sibelius, it were not to be wondered at. For ears unaccustomed to his idiom, Sibelius is never very lucid, but the attempt to understand what he has to say to us is more richly rewarded when it is made in connection with the second, fourth or seventh symphonies, say, than when listening, however attentively and patiently, to "Tapiola." Nevertheless, Mr. Koussewitsky was right to revive this tone poem; it is interesting, and in a way instructive; perhaps it is even a better piece than we are now inclined to think. It was beautifully played last night, with sustained but unemphatic intensity; it showed off to splendid advantage the string tone of the orchestra, so pure, and capable of the greatest variety of texture and color. Mr. Koussewitsky has a splendid instrument to play upon, and often he proves himself worthy of it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Literary Digest
NOV 19 1932

Who Save Our Orchestras

NOT EVERY ONE KNOWS THE COST of a great orchestra like the Philharmonic Symphony, the Philadelphia, or the Boston Symphony.

But they go on their way ~~in spite of~~ the depression.

In past seasons all seats were filled, and many sought admission in vain, yet in the summing up of a season one frequently read of deficits made up by generous patrons.

Mr. Lawrence Gilman reminds us in the New York Herald Tribune that "insufficient recognition has been accorded those amazingly unselfish philanthropists who are today, in the midst of unprecedented financial calamities and anxieties, continuing their support of our great but exceedingly expensive orchestras." More—

"A symphony orchestra is always a costly thing to maintain. An orchestra such as the Philharmonic Symphony or the Philadelphia or the Boston or the Chicago, with its high-priced first players and its none too humble conductors, not only is unable to pay for itself, but must necessarily, even in boom times, confront its guarantors with enormous deficits.

"Under the present fantastic and terrifying conditions, the problem of maintaining an organization like the Philharmonic or the Philadelphia Orchestra, in the face of diminished subscriptions and all-around distress and stringency, is appalling to contemplate. Yet these orchestras are proceeding on their usual course, as if the year were 1928 instead of 1932. The programs continue to offer the great works of the symphonic repertoire; the performances are as superb as they ever were; the conductors are the finest to be had.

"The public-spirited men and women who are financially responsible for these staggeringly expensive undertakings are, as is known of all, far less affluent than they once were; yet they continue uncomplainingly to stand the gaff. One can not but wonder if their unselfishness in thus enhancing the civilization of the communities they serve, their invaluable contributions to the education of the public in perceptive listening, are appreciated. One has one's doubts."

K WORLD-TELEGRAM, FRIDAY, NOVEMB

Nov 19

Works of Sibelius Alone Fill Bostonians' Concert

Exclusive Use of Finnish Composer's Music Proves Ordeal to Audience at Performance Led by Koussevitzky.

By PITTS SANBORN.

VISITING New York for the first time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, devoted its concert in Carnegie Hall last evening to music by the Finnish composer Sibelius. So far as the present writer knows, Sibelius had not been treated here previously to the doubtful honor of this exclusivity.

For a concert devoted to a single composer is usually a trying ordeal—an ordeal that seems quite uncalled for, too. And this is true even when Bach or Beethoven is the composer. Seemingly Wagner, in the case of the orchestra, and Chopin, in that of the piano, bear up best, but they do so for reasons not entirely of musical eminence.

Now, last evening the first symphony of Sibelius in association with compositions by other authors, or even the "Swanwhite" suite and the tone poem "Tapiola" as preface to a symphony by somebody else would have been received with gratitude. But an all-Sibelius evening of them turned out to be a good deal of a trial.

Idolizing Movement Strong.

At present there is a formidable movement on, unconsciously and consciously, to tell the world that Sibelius is one of the loftiest of musical giants. England is especially obsessed with the idea. That particularly interesting English critic, Cecil Gray, insists that his idol is the foremost symphonist since Beethoven, if indeed Beethoven is to be excepted.

Philip Hale, in his thrice admirable program book, quotes one "G. E." as writing in the Manchester Guardian that he long has been convinced that the "Finnish master is the greatest composer not only of his generation but of modern times" and deploring the fact that "performances of his works, even now, are still ludicrously few in comparison with those of such relatively unimportant composers as Strauss, Ravel or Stravinsky, to name only three."

Performance Highly Successful.

Further, Mr. Hale quotes the indefatigable Ernest Newman as recently instructing his readers in the London Daily Times as to just how to study Sibelius.

Well, this active interest, though it may betray some partisans into extravagances of praise, is still an excellent thing, for few are going to deny Sibelius' greatness. Yet to subject him to the test of an entire program is a doubtful favor all around.

Be it said in no disparagement to either the "Swanwhite" suite or "Tapiola" that the first symphony loomed largest in last evening's program, and also it was the most successfully performed, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, by the superb orchestra, with its glorious string tone.

---

8 * NY Tribune Nov 19

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

An All-Sibelius Evening at the Boston Symphony's Opening Concert

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

PROGRAM

1. Sibelius, "Swanwhite," Suite from the Incidental Music to Strindberg's Play, Op. 54.
2. Sibelius, "Tapiola," Tone Poem, Op. 112.
   Intermission
3. Sibelius, Symphony No. 1 in E Minor, Op. 39.

Serge Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony conductor

"NOTHING with wings!" pleaded the supper guest in Mr. George Moore's novel after she had endured an evening of "Lohengrin." Thanksgiving and the first New York visit of Mr. Koussevitzky and his symphonic Bostonians often arrive together; but this year our New England friends have come before the turkey dares. No doubt it is just as well. Euterpe and the Sacred Bird are happier apart.

We were able Thursday evening to brave without abnormal risk of indigestion the tonal excitements offered us by the maestro of Back Bay and his shining company of virtuosi. The only wings that we needed to think of were those implied in the title of the program's first number, the "Swan White" Suite of Sibelius; and that helping was soon and easily digested.

* * *

Euterpe's eminent representative had provided for his local constituency an entertainment of unusual character. This was nothing less than an evening devoted exclusively to the music of that contemporary composer who is, according to his most active and vocal disciple, the symphonic peer of Beethoven.

It was a brave and exciting thing to do—brave and exciting, and also fanatical. But the fanatical aspect of the matter need not disturb us. It is only the fanatical artist who can be music's perfect friend, whether in the interpretative or the creative field; and to say that last evening's program was the conception of a fanatic is not to censure but to praise it.

* * *

I do not know whether it is true, as we are authoritatively assured, that Sibelius is the peer of Beethoven—the only symphonist to wear the Sovereign's mantel. We have all, no doubt, read with lively interest the announcement of Beethoven's successor made with due impressiveness by the laetificant Mr. Cecil Gray. I, for one, should rejoice to feel that the true successor of Beethoven has been discovered and authenticated. I find it immensely cheering to stand on the arid parade-ground of contemporary music and allow myself to be refreshed with the stimulating rain of Mr. Gray's torrential downpour of Sibelian encomiums—"consummate masterpiece" . . . "unimaginable pitch of intensity" . . . "grandeur and sublimity" . . . "truly terrific and overwhelming" . . . "like a convulsion of nature."

One thinks of the tale of the Welsh peasant who was extolling the incomparable greatness of Mr. Lloyd George. "But," protested his slightly exasperated hearer. "he's not God, you know!" "Ah, indeed, no; you are right," was the reply: "but he's young yet, look you." Sibelius, too, is young yet—a lad of sixty-six. Give him time.

* * *

But it would not become any one to look down his nose at Sibelius. Even if this singular genius has not yet given us—as Mr. Gray asserts that he has—symphonic movements that are to be set beside the first allegros of the "Eroica" and the "Ninth," Sibelius has made it abundantly clear to all whose imaginative awareness of music is sensitive and alert that he is a composer of extraordinary power and originality, a solitary and puissant voice, and an indubitable master.

This is not the occasion for a considered estimate of Sibelius. Of his immense output of works (there are 116 opus numbers in the list) relatively few are known here. Mr. Koussevitzky, one understands, intends to perform all of the eight symphonies in Boston; and it may be hoped that he will add to them certain of the more consequential tone-poems that are unknown in America. Possibly a few crumbs from the Sibelian feast may fall to the lot of the starved Manhattanese. Let us hope so.

* * *

Thursday evening's program yielded scarcely more than a glimpse of the greater Sibelius. The "Swan White" Suite, drawn from the incidental music composed almost a quarter of a century ago for Strindberg's play, is for the most part tepid, vacuous, and inconsequential.

The E minor Symphony we have ever with us. Sibelius was thirty-four when he wrote it (the age at which Beethoven wrote the "Eroica"). There is little in this First Symphony to suggest the amazingly original creator who was to give us, a dozen years later, the uncompanioned Fourth. The First Symphony is an essentially popular and sure-fire work, one that will always stir an audience when it is played as affectionately and dramatically as it was Thursday night by Mr. Koussevitzky and his superb orchestra. Its best pages—they are few enough—foreshadow the later and essential Sibelius. Its inferior pages—and they comprise the bulk of the score—are not much better than Tchaikovsky and Rachmaninoff and Glazounoff and Saint-Saens at their most lushly and expansively banal. The string cantilena in the Finale, which Sibelius inflates with such apparent pride, is an example of sentimental symphonic balladry at its worst—Peter Ilitch would have wept with joy over it. And much of the writing elsewhere is merely pretty, platitudinous, and exterior.

* * *

There remains, so far as Thursday evening's exhibit is concerned, the controversial "Tapiola," that symphonic poem which fell so flat when Mr. Walter Damrosch, after commissioning the work for the Symphony Society, produced it here in 1926.

The subject promised to offer a poetical scheme ideally suited to the special quality of Sibelius's genius, with its affinity for the desolate bleak countries of the mind, its tone-poetry of sunless woods and iron twilights and the harshness of Northern solitudes. But the impressiveness of the music seemed, six years ago, to reside chiefly in its program, though the big crescendo at the end (which has its prototype in the first act of "Siegfried") made its inevitable effect, as it did again last evening.

The work was far more eloquently played than at its first performance here; yet the power and brilliancy of its conveyance could not disguise the barrenness of the score as a whole. Something of the mysterious savagery and ancient terror that must have haunted the tone-poet's imagination has found its tonal equivalent in the music. But the greater part of the writing is unfertilized and uneventful.

* * *

We are far, in this work, from the excelling Sibelius of the Fourth Symphony, and of the Fifth, with their inimitable voice and accent and implications: for Sibelius, when he is most truly himself, issues no coin that is not stamped with his own unique image, the mask of a choice and unexampled spirit.

Herald Nov 20 '32

CONCERTS

MAELZEL and SCHMITT

The Herald has received through Mr. Philip S. Marden of Lowell an interesting letter with reference to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony which will be played Tuesday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Maelzel, whose name is inseparably connected with this symphony, visited Boston exhibiting his automata. Mr. Marden's correspondent, Mr. Francis E. Appleton of Lowell, writes:

"A reference to a family register kept by my father discloses that his uncle, William Goodrich (my great uncle), in 1809 engaged with Maelzel to travel about the country, exhibiting his panharmonicon, a combination of wind instruments played by machinery. And further, that William Goodrich, after returning from his trip with the panharmonicon, worked with the firm of Hoyts, Babcocks and Appleton, in a building which they erected in 1810 on Milk street, Boston, on the site of Franklin's birthplace, for the manufacture of pianos and organs. After the firm dissolved partnership, William Goodrich set up for himself as an organ-builder. The original panharmonicon was lost at sea, and William Goodrich built another like it, which after exhibition at a museum in Boston for a time, was also sent to foreign parts. The Appleton of the above-named firm was my grandfather. Hence I seem to have a remote (very much so), indirect connection with that rascally (?) Maelzel."

Maelzel was far from being a "rascal." But how about the dates in this letter? Maelzel did not come to the United States until 1826. He opened his exhibition in Boston on Sept. 13 of that year at Julien hall, on a corner of Milk and Congress streets. He visited Boston again in 1828 and 1833. He died on the brig Otis on his way from Havana to Philadelphia, on July 21, 1838, and was buried at sea off Charleston. The United States Gazette published his eulogy: "He has gone, we hope, where the music of his harmonicons will be exceeded."

Florent Schmitt, who will appear as composer and pianist at the Symphony concerto this week, is visiting this country for the first time. He is known here by the Symphony audiences by his "Tragedy of Salome," which has been performed here three times; "musiques de plein-air; "Reves," which is on the program of this week, but was first heard here in 1924; and the 47th Psalm; but compositions by him have been performed in other concerts here: orchestral, chamber and for voices. The first time his name appeared on a program in Boston was when the pianist, Winifred Christie, played his "Passing Bell." Schmitt was born at Blamont, Lorraine, though his parents were of Alsatian descent. He began to study music at an early age; first at Nancy, then at the Paris Conservatory, where his teachers were Dubois, Lavignac, Massenet and Gabriel Faure. In 1900 he was awarded the Prix de Rome. He journeyed in Germany and Austria, North Africa and Turkey. "His regulation stay at the Villa Medici in Rome was marked by many heroic-comic incidents caused by his love of travel. This undisciplined pensioner traversed Europe in every direction with a whim and obstinacy that more than once won him severe remonstrances. His vagabond tendency led him into the most unforeseen places and allowed him to form his imagination and his heart at the same time as his talent. These 50 months spent outside France had a decisive influence on his outlook. One may consider as essential 'in the make-up of this exceptional person the ingredient of visual experience, of the reflection on things and costumes, to the same degree as that of the musical training pure and simple. To develop himself, it was necessary for him to pick up what was lacking in the places immediately surrounding him.'"

In 1914 he was called to the French colors. He was appointed director of the Lyons Conservatory in 1921, and held that position for three years. He has composed much: ballets, music for "Antony and Cleopatra," "Salammbo," orchestral, chamber and vocal music, and many pieces for piano. He is a composer of uncommon independence and virility.

Just as Jovita Fuentes lifted up his voice in a performance of Strauss's "Salome" at Wuppertal in Germany he was greeted with a barrage of tear gas. Not that the audience objected to his voice or vocal method. He is a Philippine, and he suffered from the campaign to drive foreign artists off the boards in Germany.

"As an Englishman it is painful to have to admit it, but in artistic matters England still, as in the past, is too much the rubbish heap of Europe," said Sir Thomas Beecham, the conductor of the newly formed London Philharmonic Orchestra. I have now formed an orchestra which contains the finest players in the country, and no players are finer than those of England, but year after year foreign orchestras visit us, and in spite of the dubious playing of some of their sections, each orchestra is acclaimed as if it were the only orchestra. If, when it hears it, the British public does recognize the best, then the London Philharmonic will remain in existence for many years.

"Only the English would take these foreign visitations lying down. If I took the London Philharmonic to New York, and on its behalf made the claims that perhaps I might be entitled fairly to make, the noise caused by the Lindbergh baby tragedy wouldn't be in it for the attacks which would be directed against us from every possible quarter."

E, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1932

Koussevitzky Plays 'Patterns' By Carpenter

Chicago Composer Is Piano Soloist in Boston Symphony's Presentation

Work in One Movement

Not a Show Piece for the Pianist, Creator Explains

John Alden Carpenter, the distinguished Chicago musician, provided the feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Carpenter was heard not only as composer of a new work for piano and orchestra, but as piano soloist in the performance of the novelty under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton.

The new piece is entitled "Patterns." It is described as being "for orchestra with piano obbligato." It is not, the composer has explained, "a show piece for the pianist"; nor is it, as the literary concert goer might suppose, an instrumental commentary upon the celebrated poem of the same title by Amy Lowell. The music has no literary or programmatic significance. The implications of the title are wholly musical.

The composition is in one movement, with a slow middle section. There are suggestions of jazz; there is "an absurd bubbling up," as Mr. Carpenter genially expresses it, "of my concealed Spanish blood."

The work is deftly made, the patterns artfully designed and varied. There is charming and witty music in the score; there is an engratiating waltz section; there is an admirable play of rhythms and of contrasted instrumental textures.

Mr. Carpenter kept the solo part in just proportion to the general scheme; and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the work with evident sympathy. The audience applauded warmly the novelty and its composer.

As afterpiece, Mr. Koussevitzky revived the familiar music of Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," with the assistance of Adelle Alberts, soprano, and Rulan Y. Robison, tenor. The symphony of the afternoon was another Koussevitzkyan favorite, the second of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

NOV 20 1932

Greater Interest Shown In the Music of Sibelius

Conductors All Over America Playing It This Season; Many Works in the Largest Forms Still Unknown Here

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

ONE of the most remarkable manifestations of the present musical season has been the unwontedly great interest taken in the music of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius. There is no especial anniversary this year connected with Sibelius other than two weeks from next Thursday, on December 8, he will celebrate the sixty-seventh anniversary of his birth. Nor has there been anything else to bring him more strongly than usual to the attention of conductors or the general musical public. Perhaps Sibelius at last is beginning to receive that somewhat belated admiration which his more enthusiastic admirers have been bespeaking for him for years. But whatever the reason, it is certain that the present season will be the occasion of more performances of the work of this remarkable composer than any since his first large composition appeared.

Thus in Philadelphia within the space of one week we have had three performances of major orchestral works by Sibelius, and the fact that these were presented by three different conductors who apparently had nothing in common in making up their respective programs, adds to the idea of a greater general interest in the music of Sibelius at the present time. The works presented in Philadelphia, in the order of performance, were the fourth symphony, by Mr. Stokowski; the tone poem "En Saga," given an interpretation by Mr. Toscanini which gave many persons here a new and entirely different conception of Sibelius, and the first symphony, conducted by Dr. Rodzinsky. The two symphonies had been played in Philadelphia before and the first several times, but so far as we recall it was the first performance of "En Saga," which some musicians consider to be the composer's finest orchestral work among the tone poems.

This revival, or, rather, increase, of interest in Sibelius is certainly not the result of propaganda of any kind, and for that reason it is the more likely to remain a more or less permanent thing, partly because of its apparently spontaneous origin and partly because it is so widespread. In Boston, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced his intention of playing all eight of the symphonies of Sibelius during the present season, and he recently gave what is believed to have been the second American performance of the tone poem "Tapiola." Some of the other tone poems, of which there are many, are also likely to be performed there. To a lesser extent, the same thing prevails with the other principal orchestras not only of the United States but also of England.

* * *

ALTHOUGH Sibelius is generally known, at least in the United States as a composer of symphonies, he has written a very large amount of music in other forms. Nearly always, however, this music has been in the larger forms, and herein this important composer differed radically from his neighbor, Grieg. The latter found the smaller forms the more congenial to his talent and rarely essayed orchestral composition at all, whereas the most significant contributions of Sibelius to the literature of music have been in this medium. Each has written one concerto, Grieg his most famous work, the A minor concerto for piano and orchestra, and Sibelius the D minor violin concerto, in his typical vein. This work has been even slower than the orchestral compositions to find popularity among audiences, although it is in the repertoire of nearly all of the great violinists.

Sibelius has now composed eight symphonies and it is likely that at least one more will be added to this list before he gives up creative work. He very evidently does not agree with Brahms, who once said that a composer should cease work at 50 years of age—and then proceeded to write the fourth symphony, the G major string quintet, the great music for clarinet, both sonatas and the quintet, and other important works, when considerably past that age. Sibelius, now within a few days of 67, has been constantly at work on compositions of the larger kind ever since his first symphony appeared thirty-two years ago, his symphonies being about evenly spaced through the years of their production.

Besides the symphonies, Sibelius has composed a number of symphonic poems, the first being "En Saga," of which Mr. Toscanini gave so magnificent a reading here a couple of weeks ago, and which certain capable judges still consider to be his finest composition in this form. This was his earliest published orchestral compositions, being opus 9, and considerably antedates the first symphony. Unlike other of the earlier compositions, it is one of his most typical works and represents the great composer virtually in his creative maturity—a rare instance of a composer finding his own individuality so early, for he had not yet reached his 30th birthday when it was written.

BUT, while "En Saga" is thoroughly representative of Sibelius at his best, several of the other compositions which have achieved immense popularity, with audiences all over the world can scarcely be so considered. The name Sibelius is still best known by the "Valse Triste," the tone poem "Finlandia" and "The Swan of Tuonela." These were all written before the first symphony, the "Valse Triste" being published separately later, although it is one of the pieces of incidental music which Sibelius wrote for Jarnefeldt's drama, "Kuolema." "The Swan of Tuonela" is the first of two legends from the epic "Kalevala," the second being "Lemmekainen zieht heimwaerts," which, as far as the writer knows, has never been performed in this city, if, indeed, in the United States. "Finlandia" was his opus 26, but several orchestral works were written between "En Saga" and the later tone poem which was to become so popular.

Most of these intermediate compositions are unknown in this country, some of them being the overture and the suite "Karelia" and the "Fruehlingslied" (Spring Song). But there is also a vast amount of music besides the symphonies which came after the first symphony and which is also entirely unknown, some of these (not all for orchestra exclusively) being "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Bard," "Oceanides," "In Memoriam," "The Night-Ride and Sunrise," "Luannotar," "The Origin of Fire" and a number of others. These are all declared by Sibelius enthusiasts to be works of exceptional beauty and distinction, but especially the last two. Perhaps in the recrudescence, if it can be called that, of interest in the music of this composer, an opportunity to hear some of the lesser-known major works may be given. From the reception which was accorded to the three compositions which have been performed here recently, the audience would be receptive, to say the least.

Sibelus has also written a considerable amount of incidental music for stage works, among which that to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," Adolph Paul's "King Christian II" and Strindberg's "Svanehit" are the most important, although none of it has attained the popularity of the "Valse Triste" from the stage music to Arvid Jaenefeldt's "Kuolema." In chamber music he has done little, the principal works in this medium being an early piano sonata (opus 12) and the string quartet "Voces Intimaoe" (opus 56), although there are some later sonatinas for piano. However, the great majority of his compositions are in the larger forms, in which the genius of the composer seemed to find his most effective vehicle. None of the chamber music has been largely performed outside the native country of the composer, and, like the concerto form, it seemed not to appeal to him greatly.

* * *

WHILE Sibelius undoubtedly represents the best that Finland has given the world musically, and while probably no composer, past or present, has owed so little to his predecessors and contemporaries from the standpoint of developing his own peculiar idiom and musical personality, nevertheless, to a certain extent his music was the process of evolution, for he was not the first Finnish composer to treat national music orchestrally. This was done before Sibelius was born, for in 1860, Schantz composed his "Kullervo" overture and later Kejanus appeared with some folksong rhapsodies, the "Aino" symphony and the "Kullervo" funeral march. Still later, Kejanus, recognizing in Sibelius a greater creative talent than himself, devoted himself largely to conducting the works of the latter, of which, despite an advanced age, he is still the recognized authority.

On account of his pecularities composition, structure and orche tration, interpretation plays a m important part in the music Sibelius, and without this to consummate degree, his works ca have little effect upon an audien But, when interpreted by a sy pathetic conductor and in the tr spirit of the music, it has a ve great effect, as we in Philadelph have been privileged to learn sinc the present season opened. first hearing, this music seems be austere and almost forbiddi (the same thing was said not many years ago of the music o Brahms), but it unquestionably gains with successive hearings, very much as did the music of Brahms —always granted effective interpretation.

While Sibelius has repeatedly disclaimed the use of folk-music in its entirety in his music, nevertheless, he seldom gets very far away from the atmosphere of that folk-music. In idea, thought, melodic line, rhythm and orchestration, he generally is well within the "Kalevala," the great collection of runes and folk-lore made in 1835 by Dr. Loennrot, the "Kalevala" being a poem which sets forth the mythical history of the Finnish people in much the same manner that the "Nibelungenlied" does that of the Teutonic nations. Sibelius' method of development is strikingly original, for usually (although the slow movement of the first symphony is an exception) his symphonic movements are built up from short, almost fragmentary germs, which expand until at the climax, the complete theme is presented in its full glory. These may be some of the reasons why this splendid music has been so slow in reaching the appreciation which, this season, it seems to be achieving.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

NOV 20 1932

Shows Musical Modesty

Carpenter Within the Circle in Conducting the Boston Symphony

By DALE THRRISON
(Associated Press Staff Writer)

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP). — John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana — his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English —was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obligato-ed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 20 1932

NEW YORK APPLAUDS NEW COMPOSITION OF CHICAGO MUSICIAN

New York, Nov. 19. — [Special.] — John Alden Carpenter, Chicago musician, provided the feature of today's Boston Symphony matinée at Carnegie hall. Mr. Carpenter was heard not only as composer of a new work for piano and orchestra, but as piano soloist in the performance of the novelty under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton.

The audience applauded warmly the novelty and its composer.

The new piece is entitled "Patterns." It is described as being "for orchestra with piano obligato." It is not, the composer has explained, "a show piece for the pianist"; nor is it, as the literary concert goer might suppose, an instrumental commentary upon the celebrated poem of the same title by Amy Lowell. The music has no literary or programmatic significance. The implications of the title are wholly musical.

The composition is in one movement, with a slow middle section. There are suggestions of jazz. There is "an absurd bubbling up," as Mr. Carpenter genially expresses it, "of my concealed Spanish blood."

The work is deftly made, the patterns artfully designed and varied. There is charming and witty music; there is an engratiating Waltz section; there is an admirable play of rhythms and of contracted instrumental tex-

---

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

NOV 20 1932

A COMPOSER DODGES LIGHT.

New York Audience Gets a Lesson in Musical Modesty.

(By the Associated Press.)

NEW YORK, Nov. 19.—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie hall stage today to give New York symphony audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms second symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was scheduled as being for "orchestra, with piano obbligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra, instead of being given prominent front stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obbligato-ed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestral compositions.

47

Herald Nov 20 32

CONCERTS

MAELZEL and SCHMITT

The Herald has received through Mr. Philip S. Marden of Lowell an interesting letter with reference to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony which will be played Tuesday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Maelzel, whose name is inseparably connected with this symphony, visited Boston exhibiting his automata. Mr. Marden's correspondent, Mr. Francis E. Appleton of Lowell, writes:

"A reference to a family register kept by my father discloses that his uncle, William Goodrich (my great uncle), in 1809 engaged with Maelzel to travel about the country, exhibiting his panharmonicon, a combination of wind instruments played by machinery. And further, that William Goodrich, after returning from his trip with the panharmonicon, worked with the firm of Hoyts, Babcocks and Appleton, in a building which they erected in 1810 on Milk street, Boston, on the site of Franklin's birthplace, for the manufacture of pianos and organs. After the firm dissolved partnership, William Goodrich set up for himself as an organ-builder. The original panharmonicon was lost at sea, and William Goodrich built another like it, which after exhibition at a museum in Boston for a time, was also sent to foreign parts. The Appleton of the above-named firm was my grandfather. Hence I seem to have a remote (very much so), indirect connection with that rascally (?) Maelzel."

Maelzel was far from being a "rascal." But how about the dates in this letter? Maelzel did not come to the United States until 1826. He opened his exhibition in Boston on Sept. 13 of that year at Julien hall, on a corner of Milk and Congress streets. He visited Boston again in 1828 and 1833. He died on the brig Otis on his way from Havana to Philadelphia, on July 21, 1838, and was buried at sea off Charleston. The United States Gazette published his eulogy: "He has gone, we hope, where the music of his harmonicons will be exceeded."

Florent Schmitt, who will appear as composer and pianist at the Symphony concerto this week, is visiting this country for the first time. He is known here by the Symphony audiences by his "Tragedy of Salome," which has been performed here three times; "musiques de plein-air; "Reves," which is on the program of this week, but was first heard here in 1924; and the 47th Psalm; but compositions by him have been performed in other concerts here: orchestral, chamber and for voices. The first time his name appeared on a program in Boston was when the pianist, Winifred Christie, played his "Passing Bell." Schmitt was born at Blamont, Lorraine, though his parents were of Alsatian descent. He began to study music at an early age; first at Nancy, then at the Paris Conservatory, where his teachers were Dubois, Lavignac, Massenet and Gabriel Faure. In 1900 he was awarded the Prix de Rome. He journeyed in Germany and Austria, North Africa and Turkey. "His regulation stay at the Villa Medici in Rome was marked by many heroic-comic incidents caused by his love of travel. This undisciplined pensioner traversed Europe in every direction with a whim and obstinacy that more than once won him severe remonstrances. His vagabond tendency led him into the most unforeseen places and allowed him to form his imagination and his heart at the same time as his talent. These 50 months spent outside France had a decisive influence on his outlook. One may consider as essential 'in the make-up of this exceptional person the ingredient of visual experience, of the reflection on things and costumes, to the same degree as that of the musical training pure and simple. To develop himself, it was necessary for him to pick up what was lacking in the places immediately surrounding him.'"

In 1914 he was called to the French colors. He was appointed director of the Lyons Conservatory in 1921, and held that position for three years. He has composed much: ballets, music for "Antony and Cleopatra," "Salammbo," orchestral, chamber and vocal music, and many pieces for piano. He is a composer of uncommon independence and virility.

Just as Jovita Fuentes lifted up his voice in a performance of Strauss's "Salome" at Wuppertal in Germany he was greeted with a barrage of tear gas. Not that the audience objected to his voice or vocal method. He is a Philippine, and he suffered from the campaign to drive foreign artists off the boards in Germany.

"As an Englishman it is painful to have to admit it, but in artistic matters England still, as in the past, is too much the rubbish heap of Europe," said Sir Thomas Beecham, the conductor of the newly formed London Philharmonic Orchestra. I have now formed an orchestra which contains the finest players in the country, and no players are finer than those of England, but year after year foreign orchestras visit us, and in spite of the dubious playing of some of their sections, each orchestra is acclaimed as if it were the only orchestra. If, when it hears it, the British public does recognize the best, then the London Philharmonic will remain in existence for many years.

"Only the English would take these foreign visitations lying down. If I took the London Philharmonic to New York, and on its behalf made the claims that perhaps I might be entitled fairly to make, the noise caused by the Lindbergh baby tragedy wouldn't be in it for the attacks which would be directed against us from every possible quarter."

Trib.

E, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1932

Koussevitzky Plays 'Patterns' By Carpenter

Chicago Composer Is Piano Soloist in Boston Symphony's Presentation

Work in One Movement

Not a Show Piece for the Pianist, Creator Explains

John Alden Carpenter, the distinguished Chicago musician, provided the feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Carpenter was heard not only as composer of a new work for piano and orchestra, but as piano soloist in the performance of the novelty under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton.

The new piece is entitled "Patterns." It is described as being "for orchestra with piano obbligato." It is not, the composer has explained, "a show piece for the pianist"; nor is it, as the literary concert goer might suppose, an instrumental commentary upon the celebrated poem of the same title by Amy Lowell. The music has no literary or programmatic significance. The implications of the title are wholly musical.

The composition is in one movement, with a slow middle section. There are suggestions of jazz; there is "an absurd bubbling up," as Mr. Carpenter genially expresses it, "of my concealed Spanish blood."

The work is deftly made, the patterns artfully designed and varied. There is charming and witty music in the score; there is an engratiating waltz section; there is an admirable play of rhythms and of contrasted instrumental textures.

Mr. Carpenter kept the solo part in just proportion to the general scheme; and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the work with evident sympathy. The audience applauded warmly the novelty and its composer.

As afterpiece, Mr. Koussevitzky revived the familiar music of Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," with the assistance of Adelle Alberts, soprano, and Rulan Y. Robison, tenor. The symphony of the afternoon was another Koussevitzkyan favorite, the second of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

NOV 20 1932

Greater Interest Shown In the Music of Sibelius

Conductors All Over America Playing It This Season; Many Works in the Largest Forms Still Unknown Here

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

ONE of the most remarkable manifestations of the present musical season has been the unwontedly great interest taken in the music of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius. There is no especial anniversary this year connected with Sibelius other than two weeks from next Thursday, on December 8, he will celebrate the sixty-seventh anniversary of his birth. Nor has there been anything else to bring him more strongly than usual to the attention of conductors or the general musical public. Perhaps Sibelius at last is beginning to receive that somewhat belated admiration which his more enthusiastic admirers have been bespeaking for him for years. But whatever the reason, it is certain that the present season will be the occasion of more performances of the work of this remarkable composer than any since his first large composition appeared.

Thus in Philadelphia within the space of one week we have had three performances of major orchestral works by Sibelius, and the fact that these were presented by three different conductors who apparently had nothing in common in making up their respective programs, adds to the idea of a greater general interest in the music of Sibelius at the present time. The works presented in Philadelphia, in the order of performance, were the fourth symphony, by Mr. Stokowski; the tone poem "En Saga," given an interpretation by Mr. Toscanini which gave many persons here a new and entirely different conception of Sibelius, and the first symphony, conducted by Dr. Rodzinsky. The two symphonies had been played in Philadelphia before and the first several times, but so far as we recall it was the first performance of "En Saga," which some musicians consider to be the composer's finest orchestral work among the tone poems.

This revival, or, rather, increase, of interest in Sibelius is certainly not the result of propaganda of any kind, and for that reason it is the more likely to remain a more or less permanent thing, partly because of its apparently spontaneous origin and partly because it is so widespread. In Boston, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced his intention of playing all eight of the symphonies of Sibelius during the present season, and he recently gave what is believed to have been the second American performance of the tone poem "Tapiola." Some of the other tone poems, of which there are many, are also likely to be performed there. To a lesser extent, the same thing prevails with the other principal orchestras not only of the United States but also of England.

* * *

ALTHOUGH Sibelius is generally known, at least in the United States as a composer of symphonies, he has written a very large amount of music in other forms. Nearly always, however, this music has been in the larger forms, and herein this important composer differed radically from his neighbor, Grieg. The latter found the smaller forms the more congenial to his talent and rarely essayed orchestral composition at all, whereas the most significant contributions of Sibelius to the literature of music have been in this medium. Each has written one concerto, Grieg his most famous work, the A minor concerto for piano and orchestra, and Sibelius the D minor violin concerto, in his typical vein. This work has been even slower than the orchestral compositions to find popularity among audiences, although it is in the repertoire of nearly all of the great violinists.

Sibelius has now composed eight symphonies and it is likely that at least one more will be added to this list before he gives up creative work. He very evidently does not agree with Brahms, who once said that a composer should cease work at 50 years of age—and then proceeded to write the fourth symphony, the G major string quintet, the great music for clarinet, both sonatas and the quintet, and other important works, when considerably past that age. Sibelius, now within a few days of 67, has been constantly at work on compositions of the larger kind ever since his first symphony appeared thirty-two years ago, his symphonies being about evenly spaced through the years of their production.

Besides the symphonies, Sibelius has composed a number of symphonic poems, the first being "En Saga," of which Mr. Toscanini gave so magnificent a reading here a couple of weeks ago, and which certain capable judges still consider to be his finest composition in this form. This was his earliest published orchestral compositions, being opus 9, and considerably antedates the first symphony. Unlike other of the earlier compositions, it is one of his most typical works and represents the great composer virtually in his creative maturity—a rare instance of a composer finding his own individuality so early, for he had not yet reached his 30th birthday when it was written.

BUT, while "En Saga" is thoroughly representative of Sibelius at his best, several of the other compositions which have achieved immense popularity, with audiences all over the world can scarcely be so considered. The name Sibelius is still best known by the "Valse Triste," the tone poem "Finlandia" and "The Swan of Tuonela." These were all written before the first symphony, the "Valse Triste" being published separately later, although it is one of the pieces of incidental music which Sibelius wrote for Jarnefeldt's drama, "Kuolema." "The Swan of Tuonela" is the first of two legends from the epic "Kalevala," the second being "Lemmekainen zieht heimwaerts," which, as far as the writer knows, has never been performed in this city, if, indeed, in the United States. "Finlandia" was his opus 26, but several orchestral works were written between "En Saga" and the later tone poem which was to become so popular.

Most of these intermediate compositions are unknown in this country, some of them being the overture and the suite "Karelia" and the "Fruehlingslied" (Spring Song). But there is also a vast amount of music besides the symphonies which came after the first symphony and which is also entirely unknown, some of these (not all for orchestra exclusively) being "Pohjola's Daughter," "The Bard," "Oceanides," "In Memoriam," "The Night-Ride and Sunrise," "Luannotar," "The Origin of Fire" and a number of others. These are all declared by Sibelius enthusiasts to be works of exceptional beauty and distinction, but especially the last two. Perhaps in the recrudescence, if it can be called that, of interest in the music of this composer, an opportunity to hear some of the lesser-known major works may be given. From the reception which was accorded to the three compositions which have been performed here recently, the audience would be receptive, to say the least.

Sibelius has also written a considerable amount of incidental music for stage works, among which that to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," Adolph Paul's "King Christian II" and Strindberg's "Svanehit" are the most important, although none of it has attained the popularity of the "Valse Triste" from the stage music to Arvid Jaenefeldt's "Kuolema." In chamber music he has done little, the principal works in this medium being an early piano sonata (opus 12) and the string quartet "Voces Intimaoe" (opus 56), although there are some later sonatinas for piano. However, the great majority of his compositions are in the larger forms, in which the genius of the composer seemed to find his most effective vehicle. None of the chamber music has been largely performed outside the native country of the composer, and, like the concerto form, it seemed not to appeal to him greatly.

* * *

WHILE Sibelius undoubtedly represents the best that Finland has given the world musically, and while probably no composer, past or present, has owed so little to his predecessors and contemporaries from the standpoint of developing his own peculiar idiom and musical personality, nevertheless, to a certain extent his music was the process of evolution, for he was not the first Finnish composer to treat national music orchestrally. This was done before Sibelius was born, for in 1860, Schantz composed his "Kullervo" overture and later Kejanus appeared with some folk-song rhapsodies, the "Aino" symphony and the "Kullervo" funeral march. Still later, Kejanus, recognizing in Sibelius a greater creative talent than himself, devoted himself largely to conducting the works of the latter, of which, despite an advanced age, he is still the recognized authority.

On account of his pecularities o composition, structure and orche tration, interpretation plays a m important part in the music Sibelius, and without this to consummate degree, his works ca have little effect upon an audien But, when interpreted by a sy pathetic conductor and in the tr spirit of the music, it has a ve great effect, as we in Philadelph have been privileged to learn sinc the present season opened. first hearing, this music seems be austere and almost forbiddi (the same thing was said not many years ago of the music o Brahms), but it unquestionably gains with successive hearings, very much as did the music of Brahms —always granted effective interpretation.

While Sibelius has repeatedly disclaimed the use of folk-music in its entirety in his music, nevertheless, he seldom gets very far away from the atmosphere of that folk-music. In idea, thought, melodic line, rhythm and orchestration, he generally is well within the "Kalevala," the great collection of runes and folk-lore made in 1835 by Dr. Loennrot, the "Kalevala" being a poem which sets forth the mythical history of the Finnish people in much the same manner that the "Nibelungenlied" does that of the Teutonic nations. Sibelius' method of development is strikingly original, for usually (although the slow movement of the first symphony is an exception) his symphonic movements are built up from short, almost fragmentary germs, which expand until at the climax, the complete theme is presented in its full glory. These may be some of the reasons why this splendid music has been so slow in reaching the appreciation which, this season, it seems to be achieving.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

NOV 20 1932

Shows Musical Modesty

Carpenter Within the Circle in Conducting the Boston Symphony

By DALE THRRISON
(Associated Press Staff Writer)

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP). — John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana — his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obligato-ed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 20 1932

NEW YORK APPLAUDS NEW COMPOSITION OF CHICAGO MUSICIAN

New York, Nov. 19. — [Special.] — John Alden Carpenter, Chicago musician, provided the feature of today's Boston Symphony matinée at Carnegie hall. Mr. Carpenter was heard not only as composer of a new work for piano and orchestra, but as piano soloist in the performance of the novelty under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton.

The audience applauded warmly the novelty and its composer.

The new piece is entitled "Patterns." It is described as being "for orchestra with piano obligato." It is not, the composer has explained, "a show piece for the pianist"; nor is it, as the literary concert goer might suppose, an instrumental commentary upon the celebrated poem of the same title by Amy Lowell. The music has no literary or programmatic significance. The implications of the title are wholly musical.

The composition is in one movement, with a slow middle section. There are suggestions of jazz. There is "an absurd bubbling up," as Mr. Carpenter genially expresses it, "of my concealed Spanish blood."

The work is deftly made, the patterns artfully designed and varied. There is charming and witty music; there is an engratiating Waltz section; there is an admirable play of rhythms and of contracted instrumental textures.

COMPOSER DODGES LIGHT.

New York Audience Gets a Lesson in Musical Modesty.

(By the Associated Press.)

NEW YORK, Nov. 19.—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie hall stage today to give New York symphony audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra program with the Brahms second symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was scheduled as being for "orchestra, with piano obbligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra, instead of being given prominent front stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obbligato-ed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestral compositions.

Times, Nov 20

THE

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Brahms and Carpenter Offered in Interesting Juxtaposition by Boston Orchestra.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a fine habit of arranging his programs in such wise that the thoughtful listener, by comparing this with that, may draw conclusions regarding trends and tendencies of music past and present. Thus he presented Beethoven symphonies in sequence in order that his audience might follow the composer's development as well as enjoy the music; this season he has undertaken the same presentation of Sibelius, whose symphonies are to be given chronologically on the Boston (and, it is to be hoped, also New York) programs, culminating with the world première in the Spring of the newly completed eighth symphony.

Yesterday afternoon's program in Carnegie Hall exhibited the same interest in comparative research by setting forth, after the Brahms second symphony, two works by John Alden Carpenter, with the composer as piano soloist. The first of these, "Patterns," for orchestra with piano obbligato, was recently completed and this concert afforded its first New York performance. The well-known 'Skyscraper" ballet, written in 1924 and first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1926, followed in concert form.

Though Mr. Carpenter has disavowed any literary or programatic significance for "Patterns," the form of the piece speaks for itself. It might be labeled "Fantasy," for various musical images, amusing, meditative, astringent and uproarious, move across the orchestra, displaying Mr. Carpenter's fertile fancy, his gift for melody and his command of instrumentation. One need not knit critical brows over this piece; it is frankly unpretentious; the rather sunny musings of a sensitive traveler voyaging in his mind through musical ports of call.

Its greatest interest lay in the evidence of condensation of style manifest in the instrumentation. One has the impression that Mr. Carpenter makes a more economic and pointed use of scoring in this work than in the earlier opus which followed. The general texture is clearer and sparer and sometimes, as a result, its impact more forthright.

For all that, however, it is a less pretentious work than "Skyscrapers." It was particularly interesting to hear the latter shortly atfer another concert setting forth the more serious art forms to which jazz has been rapidly aspiring since "Skyscrapers" was writtten in 1924. Mr. Carpenter's ballet remains, in at least one opinion, by far the most successful and important application of jazz on a symphonic scale that has yet been made. Dr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra exhausted all the implications of the glittering and effective score in a brilliant reading. The result was exhilarating and fresh, which can scarcely be said of most of the most recent jazz invasions of the orchestral field. Mr. Carpenter acquitted himself admirably as pianist. Adelle Alberts, soprano, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, soloists in "Skyscrapers," added to the obvious enjoyment of a large audience.

H. H.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

Harriet Cohen, Pianist, Plays.

Harriet Cohen, the English pianist, brought with her an interesting program for her first appearance of the season here at the Town Hall last night. She began with eight transcriptions from a dozen made by twelve British composers from the works of Bach. This collection, known as the "Bach Book," was made for Miss Cohen, and the composers represented last night were William Walton, John Ireland, Constant Lambert, Eugene Goossens, Arthur Bliss, Lord Berners, Vaughan Williams and Arnold Bax. Those left out were Granville Bantock, Frank Bridge, Herbert Howells and W. Gillies Whittaker. The program also included works by Haydn and Brahms and unfamiliar music by Sibelius.

The Bach transcriptions are, for the most part, a work of supererogation. Of the eight heard last night those by Walton and Williams seemed most successful in evoking the spirit of the originals. Miss Cohen, using the score, played the eight with an understanding of what the transcribers required, as well she might.

Her Haydn—an adagio in F, an andante in E minor and the Sonata in D, No. 7—was less successful. Miss Cohen's approach to this music, as well as to the Brahms that followed, was too imperious and not sufficiently warm, leaving aside technical matters such as vagaries in tempi and rhythms.

The Sibelius group included the first New York performance of a number of Finnish "Volksweisen," "The Birch Tree" and two sonatinas. The "Volksweisen" are simple themes, set down unpretentiously by the composer. The audience was of good size and cordial.

H. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
NOV 20 1932

Lesson In Modesty Is Given By Chicago Society Musician

Piano Obligato To Boston Symphony's Performance Of His Own Work Played From Carnegie Hall Pit By J. A. Carpenter

[By the Associated Press]

New York, Nov. 19—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York Symphony audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well-known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startle his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was on the program as being for 'orchestra, with piano obligato." Mr. Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Mr. Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, played the obligato.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestrial compositions.

Mr. Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "Patterns" and he succeeded surprisingly well in making it an accompaniment to the one hundred pieces of brass, tympani and strings which Dr. Serge Koussevitsky led through the selection's modernistic eccentricities.

"Patterns' 'itself ranged from a size 16 to a 42. At first hearing it sounded as though the size 16 was in the majority. It was marked throughout with modernism, but a modernism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the Tin-pan Alley alumni have affected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

The staid hall was filled with elderly women and men and a sprinkling of youth who braved a heavy downpour to hear what the Middle Westerner had to offer the effete East. Their repeated applause indicated they thought he had plenty.

FORT WORTH, TEX.
STAR-TELEGRAM
NOV 20 1932

Composer Gives Lesson in Modesty

NEW YORK, Nov. 19.—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York symphony audiences a lesson in musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obbligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obbligato-ed.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER
NOV 20 1932

Lesson in Musical Modesty Given Audience by Chicago Composer

Carpenter Plays Piano Within Orchestra Circle at N. Y. Premiere of "Patterns," Eschewing Front-Stage Position; Hearers Approve Work

New York, Nov. 19.—(AP)—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano in Carnegie Hall today to give a New York audience a lesson in musical modesty.

The slender composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program with Brahms' Second Symphony, the latter half being given over to Carpenteriana—his well-known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obbligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, inside the circle, obbligato-ed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestral compositions.

Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "Patterns" and he succeeded surprisingly well in making it an accompaniment to the 100 pieces of brass, typani and strings which Serge Koussevitsky led through the selection's modernistic eccentricities.

"Patterns" itself ranged from size 16 to 42. At first hearing it sounded as though size 16 was in the majority. It was marked throughout with modernism, but modernism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the Tinpan Alley alumni have affected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

The said hall was filled with elderly ladies and gentlemen and a sprinkling of youth who braved a pneumonia-laden downpour to hear what the Middle Westerner had to offer the effete East. Their repeated applause indicated they thought he had plenty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
PRESS
NOV 20 1932

Carpenter Offers Something New; Modest "Reverse-English" Concerto

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP).—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York audiences a lesson in musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in musical modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obligatoed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestra compositions.

Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "Patterns" and he succeeded surprisingly well in making it an accompaniment to the 100 pieces of brass, tympani and strings which Dr. Serge Koussevitsky led thru the selection's modernistic eccentricities.

(Continued on Page Two)

"Patterns" itself ranged from a size 16 to a 42. At first hearing it sounded as tho the size 16 were in the mapority. It was marked thruout with modernism, but a modernism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the Tin Pan Alley alumni have effected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

The staid hall was filled with elderly ladies and gentlemen and a sprinkling of youth who braved a pneumonia-laden downpour to hear what the middle-westerned had to offer the effete East. Their repeated applause indicated they thought he had plenty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
CALL
NOV 20 1932

New York Gets Lesson In Musical Modesty

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP).—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago Social Register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle obligato-ed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestral compositions.

Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "patterns" and he succeeded surprisingly well in making it an accompaniment to the 100 pieces of brass, tympani and strings which Dr. Serge Koussevitsky led through the selection's modernistic eccentricities.

"Patterns" itself ranged from a size 16 to a 42. At first hearing it sounded as though the size 16 was in the majority. It was marked throughout with moderism, but a moderism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the Tin Pan Alley alumni have effected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

The staid hall was filled with elderly ladies and gentlemen and a sprinkling of youth who braved a pneumonia-laden downpour to hear what the middlewesterner had to offer the effete East. Their repeated applause indicatd they thought he had plenty.

48

Times Nov 22 THE

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Brahms and Carpenter Offered in Interesting Juxtaposition by Boston Orchestra.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a fine habit of arranging his programs in such wise that the thoughtful listener, by comparing this with that, may draw conclusions regarding trends and tendencies of music past and present. Thus he presented Beethoven symphonies in sequence in order that his audience might follow the composer's development as well as enjoy the music; this season he has undertaken the same presentation of Sibelius, whose symphonies are to be given chronologically on the Boston (and, it is to be hoped, also New York) programs, culminating with the world première in the Spring of the newly completed eighth symphony.

Yesterday afternoon's program in Carnegie Hall exhibited the same interest in comparative research by setting forth, after the Brahms second symphony, two works by John Alden Carpenter, with the composer as piano soloist. The first of these, "Patterns," for orchestra with piano obbligato, was recently completed and this concert afforded its first New York performance. The well-known 'Skyscraper" ballet, written in 1924 and first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1926, followed in concert form.

Though Mr. Carpenter has disavowed any literary or programatic significance for "Patterns," the form of the piece speaks for itself. It might be labeled "Fantasy," for various musical images, amusing, meditative, astringent and uproarious, move across the orchestra, displaying Mr. Carpenter's fertile fancy, his gift for melody and his command of instrumentation. One need not knit critical brows over this piece; it is frankly unpretentious; the rather sunny musings of a sensitive traveler voyaging in his mind through musical ports of call.

Its greatest interest lay in the evidence of condensation of style manifest in the instrumentation. One has the impression that Mr. Carpenter makes a more economic and pointed use of scoring in this work than in the earlier opus which followed. The general texture is clearer and sparer and sometimes, as a result, its impact more forthright.

For all that, however, it is a less pretentious work than "Skyscrapers." It was particularly interesting to hear the latter shortly atfer another concert setting forth the more serious art forms to which jazz has been rapidly aspiring since "Skyscrapers" was writtten in 1924. Mr. Carpenter's ballet remains, in at least one opinion, by far the most successful and important application of jazz on a symphonic scale that has yet been made. Dr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra exhausted all the implications of the glittering and effective score in a brilliant reading. The result was exhilarating and fresh, which can scarcely be said of most of the most recent jazz invasions of the orchestral field. Mr. Carpenter acquitted himself admirably as pianist. Adelle Alberts, soprano, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, soloists in "Skyscrapers," added to the obvious enjoyment of a large audience.

H. H.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

Harriet Cohen, Pianist, Plays.

Harriet Cohen, the English pianist, brought with her an interesting program for her first appearance of the season here at the Town Hall last night. She began with eight transcriptions from a dozen made by twelve British composers from the works of Bach. This collection, known as the "Bach Book," was made for Miss Cohen, and the composers represented last night were William Walton, John Ireland, Constant Lambert, Eugene Goossens, Arthur Bliss, Lord Berners, Vaughan Williams and Arnold Bax. Those left out were Granville Bantock, Frank Bridge, Herbert Howells and W. Gillies Whittaker. The program also included works by Haydn and Brahms and unfamiliar music by Sibelius.

The Bach transcriptions are, for the most part, a work of supererogation. Of the eight heard last night those by Walton and Williams seemed most successful in evoking the spirit of the originals. Miss Cohen, using the score, played the eight with an understanding of what the transcribers required, as well she might.

Her Haydn—an adagio in F, an andante in E minor and the Sonata in D, No. 7—was less successful. Miss Cohen's approach to this music, as well as to the Brahms that followed, was too imperious and not sufficiently warm, leaving aside technical matters such as vagaries in tempi and rhythms.

The Sibelius group included the first New York performance of a number of Finnish "Volksweisen," "The Birch Tree" and two sonatinas. The "Volksweisen" are simple themes, set down unpretentiously by the composer. The audience was of good size and cordial.

H. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
NOV 20 1932

Lesson In Modesty Is Given By Chicago Society Musician

Piano Obligato To Boston Symphony's Performance Of His Own Work Played From Carnegie Hall Pit By J. A. Carpenter

[By the Associated Press]

New York, Nov. 19—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York Symphony audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well-known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startle his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was on the program as being for "orchestra, with piano obligato." Mr. Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Mr. Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, played the obligato.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestrial compositions.

Mr. Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "Patterns" and he succeeded surprisingly well in making it an accompaniment to the one hundred pieces of brass, tympani and strings which Dr. Serge Koussevitsky led through the selection's modernistic eccentricities.

"Patterns' 'itself ranged from a size 16 to a 42. At first hearing it sounded as though the size 16 was in the majority. It was marked throughout with modernism, but a modernism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the Tin-pan Alley alumni have affected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

The staid hall was filled with elderly women and men and a sprinkling of youth who braved a heavy downpour to hear what the Middle Westerner had to offer the effete East. Their repeated applause indicated they thought he had plenty.

FORT WORTH, TEX.
STAR-TELEGRAM
NOV 20 1932

Composer Gives Lesson in Modesty

NEW YORK, Nov. 19.—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York symphony audiences a lesson in musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obbligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obbligato-ed.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER
NOV 20 1932

Lesson in Musical Modesty Given Audience by Chicago Composer

Carpenter Plays Piano Within Orchestra Circle at N. Y. Premiere of "Patterns," Eschewing Front-Stage Position; Hearers Approve Work

New York, Nov. 19.—(AP)—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano in Carnegie Hall today to give a New York audience a lesson in musical modesty.

The slender composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program with Brahms' Second Symphony, the latter half being given over to Carpenteriana—his well-known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obbligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, inside the circle, obbligato-ed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestral compositions.

Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "Patterns" and he succeeded surprisingly well in making it an accompaniment to the 100 pieces of brass, typani and strings which Serge Koussevitsky led through the selection's modernistic eccentricities.

"Patterns" itself ranged from size 16 to 42. At first hearing it sounded as though size 16 was in the majority. It was marked throughout with modernism, but modernism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the Tinpan Alley alumni have affected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

The said hall was filled with elderly ladies and gentlemen and a sprinkling of youth who braved a pneumonia-laden downpour to hear what the Middle Westerner had to offer the effete East. Their repeated applause indicated they thought he had plenty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
PRESS
(1) NOV 20 193

Carpenter Offers Something New; Modest "Reverse-English" Concerto

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP).—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York audiences a lesson in musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in musical modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obligatoed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestra compositions.

Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "Patterns" and he succeeded surprisingly well in making it an accompaniment to the 100 pieces of brass, tympani and strings which Dr. Serge Kousevitsky led thru the selection's modernistic eccentricities.

(Continued on Page Two)

"Patterns" itself ranged from a size 16 to a 42. At first hearing it sounded as tho the size 16 were in the mapority. It was marked thruout with modernism, but a modernism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the Tin Pan Alley alumni have effected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

The staid hall was filled with elderly ladies and gentlemen and a sprinkling of youth who braved a pneumonia-laden downpour to hear what the middle-westerned had to offer the effete East. Their repeated applause indicated they thought he had plenty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
CALL
NOV 20 1932

New York Gets Lesson In Musical Modesty

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP).—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago Social Register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage today to give New York audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle obligato-ed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestral compositions.

Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "patterns" and he succeeded surprisingly well in making it an accompaniment to the 100 pieces of brass, tympani and strings which Dr. Serge Koussevitsky led through the selection's modernistic eccentricities.

"Patterns" itself ranged from a size 16 to a 42. At first hearing it sounded as though the size 16 was in the majority. It was marked throughout with moderism, but a moderism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the Tin Pan Alley alumni have effected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

The staid hall was filled with elderly ladies and gentlemen and a sprinkling of youth who braved a pneumonia-laden downpour to hear what the middlewesterner had to offer the effete East. Their repeated applause indicatd they thought he had plenty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

20 1932

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Brahms and Carpenter Offered in Interesting Juxtaposition by Boston Orchestra.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a fine habit of arranging his programs in such wise that the thoughtful listener, by comparing this with that, may draw conclusions regarding trends and tendencies of music past and present. Thus he presented Beethoven symphonies in sequence in order that his audience might follow the composer's development as well as enjoy his music; this season he has undertaken the same presentation of Sibelius, whose symphonies are to be given chronologically on the Boston (and, it is to be hoped, also New York) programs, culminating with the world première in the Spring of the newly completed eighth symphony.

Yesterday afternoon's program in Carnegie Hall exhibited the same interest in comparative research by setting forth, after the Brahms second symphony, two works by John Alden Carpenter, with the composer as piano soloist. The first of these, "Patterns," for orchestra with piano obbligato, was recently completed, and this concert afforded its first New York performance. The well-known "Skyscrapers" ballet, written in 1924 and first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1926, followed in concert form.

Though Mr. Carpenter has disavowed any literary or programatic significance for "Patterns," the form of the piece speaks for itself. It might be labeled "Fantasy," for various musical images, amusing, meditative, astringent and uproarious, move across the orchestra, displaying Mr. Carpenter's fertile fancy, his gift for melody and his command of instrumentation. One need not knit critical brows over this piece; it is frankly unpretentious; the rather sunny musings of a sensitive traveler voyaging in his mind through musical ports of call.

Its greatest interest lay in the evidence of condensation of style manifest in the instrumentation. One has the impression that Mr. Carpenter makes a more economic and pointed use of scoring in this work than in the earlier opus which followed. The general texture is clearer and sparer and sometimes, as a result, its impact more forthright.

For all that, however, it is a less pretentious work than "Skyscrapers." It was particularly interesting to hear the latter shortly after another concert setting forth the more serious art forms to which jazz has been rapidly aspiring since "Skyscrapers" was writtten in 1924. Mr. Carpenter's ballet remains, in at least one opinion, by far the most successful and important application of jazz on a symphonic scale that has yet been made. Dr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra exhausted all the implications of the glittering and effective score in a brilliant reading. The result was exhilarating and fresh, which can scarcely be said of most of the more recent jazz invasions of the orchestral field. Mr. Carpenter acquitted himself admirably as pianist. Adelle Alberts, soprano, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, soloists in "Skyscrapers," added to the obvious enjoyment of a large audience.

H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

NOV 20 1932

Florent Schmitt To Play Own Work

A cross-section of Florent Schmitt's chamber music will constitute the program arranged by the League of Composers for the first New York appearance of the celebrated French composer Sunday night, Nov. 27, at the Town Hall Club. Mr. Schmitt has come to America to give several performances both with leading orchestras and in recitals. One of these will be the Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra when his latest work, "Symphonie Concertante," for piano and orchestra, will be produced.

The League of Composers' program will represent a 30-year period in the range of Mr. Schmitt's work, from 1897 through 1927. It will include the celebrated quintet for piano and strings. Mr. Schmitt will be assisted by the League of Composers Quartet, which includes Nicolai Berezowsky, first violin; Meyer Pollack, second violin; David Freed, cello; Mitya Stillman, viola.

For the rest of the program Mr. Schmitt will have the assistance of Miss Rita Sebastion, mezzo soprano; Alfred Wallenstein, cellist, and Maurice Decruck, saxophonist. The songs which Miss Sebastian will interpret with Mr. Schmitt's accompaniment are Kerob-Shal, written in 1924 and Tristesse au Jardin in 1897. The "Finale" for cello and piano, which Mr. Wallenstein and the composer will play, was published in 1926. There is a cello and orchestra version of this work. The remaining number is the "Legende," for saxophone and piano, written in 1918, for which Mr. Decruck will be the soloist. There is also an orchestral version of this work.

Dr. John Erskine and Ambassador Paul Claudel of France will speak before the concert begins. Schmitt was born in Blamont in the French province of Lorraine on Sept. 28, 1870. By the treaty that concluded the Franco-Prussian War his native village remained French so that he grew up and received his musical education against a typically French background.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

20 1932

Florent Schmitt, French composer-pianist, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, taking part in the first performance of his new Symphonic Concertante. The program will also include his "Reves."

Serge Koussevitzky will also conduct Sibelius's second symphony, following his plan of presenting all the Sibelius symphonies in order, completing the cycle in the spring with the first performances of his recently completed eighth symphony.

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 20 1932

John A. Carpenter Piano Soloist With Boston Symphony

Chicago Composers' 'Patterns' Presented as Feature by Mr. Koussevitzky

John Alden Carpenter, the distinguished Chicago musician, provided the feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Carpenter was heard not only as composer of a new work for piano and orchestra, but as piano soloist in the performance of the novelty under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton.

The new piece is entitled "Patterns." It is described as being "for orchestra with piano obbligato." It is not, the composer has explained, "a show piece for the pianist"; nor is it, as the literary concert goer might suppose, an instrumental commentary upon the celebrated poem of the same title by Amy Lowell. The music has no literary or programmatic significance. The implications of the title are wholly musical.

The composition is in one movement, with a slow middle section. There are suggestions of jazz; there is "an absurd bubbling up," as Mr. Carpenter genially expresses it, "of my concealed Spanish blood."

The work is deftly made, the patterns artfully designed and varied. There is charming and witty music in the score; there is an engratiating waltz section; there is an admirable play of rhythms and of contrasted instrumental textures.

Mr. Carpenter kept the solo part in just proportion to the general scheme; and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the work with evident sympathy. The audience applauded warmly the novelty and its composer.

As afterpiece, Mr. Koussevitzky revived the familiar music of Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," with the assistance of Adelle Alberts, soprano, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor. The symphony of the afternoon was another Koussevitzkyan favorite, the second of Brahms.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Florent Schmitt, as guest at the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will play the piano part in his new "Symphonie Concertante," which is then to have its first performance. The French composer's "Reves" will be on the same program.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Sibelius' Second Symphony, in pursuance of his plan to present all of the Finnish composer's symphonies in order this season, culminating in the Spring with the newly completed Eighth Symphony, which is then to have its world premiere.

N. Y. AMERICAN

20

COMPOSER AIDS PREMIERE HERE OF 'PATTERNS'

John Alden Carpenter Carnegie Hall Piano Soloist with the Boston Symphony

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

At Carnegie Hall yesterday a matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought Brahms' Second Symphony; and John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" (ballet) music, as well as a first New York performance of the same composer's "Patterns," for orchestra, with piano obbligato.

COMPOSER THE SOLOIST.

Mr. Carpenter was the soloist in the last-named piece, bright, tuneful and cleverly contrived music of which he says that its title gives its own description and denotes a species of charivari, "with a highly sentimental waltz bit, short jazz implications and an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood."

The orchestra was conducted by the gifted and temperamental Serge Koussevitzky and the vocal solo fragments in "Skyscrapers" were sung by Adtlle Roberts, soprano, and Yulon Robison, tenor.

NEW YORK MIRROR

1932

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston band, returning from a Brooklyn foray, gave the customary matinee concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Despite a moist and soggy atmosphere, the audience was comfortably large. The geometric music of Mr. John Alden Carpenter, and the Benign sophistries of Brahms's second symphony proved sufficient entertainment on a dull day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Florent Schmitt, the French composer and critic, will be the guest at the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, playing the piano part in his new "Symphonie Concertante," which is to have its first performance at this time. Mr. Schmitt's "Rêves" will be on the same program.

Serge Koussevitzky will also conduct Sibelius's Second symphony on this program. He plans to present all of the Finnish composer's symphonies in order this season, culminating in the Spring with the world première of the newly completed Eighth.

---

in a Lifetime. It was win such an honor.

Tuesday Concerts to Show Music Development From Bach---Notes

[illegible] nov 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the series of Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts which begins this week, Dr. Koussevitzky has planned a set of programmes that will show the development of symphonic music from Bach to Stravinsky, who has himself, on occasion, turned back to Bach. It goes without saying that this series will thus make not only an excellent introduction to the orchestral repertory for those who are almost wholly unacquainted with its riches, but that it will also offer programmes of masterpieces tried and true to the hearer who prefers established excellence to the interest of novelty. Nor will Dr. Koussevitzky make the error of keeping too closely to a chronological scheme; each programme will have a balance of its own. The first, for this week, offers the music of Bach and of Haydn and then the Seventh Symphony of their musical heir, Beethoven. For the second concert there will be scores from Handel and from Mozart, and then, coming down almost to our own day, a symphony of Brahms.

* * * *

But it is not only to Tuesday audiences that Dr. Koussevitzky would show some set plan of programme-making. Not the development of symphonic music in general, save incidentally, but the development of one symphonist, one of the ablest of living composers, he would demonstrate to the hearers of the regular Symphony concerts of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. Hence the symphonies of Sibelius are to be heard at those concerts in chronological sequence; already the first has been played there and the second follows at the concerts of this week. In due course will come the eighth, hitherto unheard in public performance, presumably the exemplification of the final form which the Finn's genius has assumed.

* * * *

Here in Boston Dr. Koussevitzky companioned Sibelius' First Symphony with the "Northern Legends" of the English composer Bax, but to New York last week he vouchsafed an all-Sibelius list: the suite drawn from the incidental music to Strindberg's "Swanwhite," "Tapiola," the tone-poem which Boston first heard some two weeks ago, and this First Symphony.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

NOV 21 1932

Chicago Composer Shows New York Something New

NEW YORK, November 21 (A.P.)—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago social register to a piano bench on the Carnegie hall stage to give New York symphony audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony orchestra program with the Brahms second symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana—his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "orchestra, with piano obligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of having prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obligato-ed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestral compositions.

Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "Patterns" to make it an accompaniment to the 100 pieces of brass, tympani and strings which Dr. Serge Koussevitsky led through the selection's modernistic eccentricities.

"Patterns" itself ranged from a size 16 to a 42. At first hearing it sounded as though the size 16 was in the majority. It was marked throughout with modernism, but a modernism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the tin pan alley alumni have effected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

WINSTED, CONN.
CITIZEN

NOV 21 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, played an all-Sibelius program Friday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, New York. Jean Julius Christian Sibelius came from Finland to New York in 1914 as the guest of the late Carl Stoeckel to take part in the 28th meeting and concert of the Litchfield County Choral union held in Music Shed here. Mr. Sibelius has written eight symphonies. In June 1914 the degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon him at Yale University.

NEW YORK JOURNAL

NOV 21 1932

Play Carpenter Novelty at Carnegie

By IRVING WEIL.

Nothing nowadays makes the serious—the terribly serious—young American composer so mad as to ask him if he employs jazz in his music. Six or seven years ago he got just as mad when you asked him why he didn't. But no, not now any more; not in good American musical society. To all of which Serge Koussevitzky and the quite "parfait, gentil" American composer, John Alden Carpenter, at the latest visit of the Boston Orchestra to Carnegie Hall, said a combined "tosh."

For Mr. Koussevitzky gave up the whole second half of this November visit to Mr. Carpenter and his music, and jazz went marching on. The youngsters (Mr. Carpenter isn't one of them) haven't put jazz a-mouldering in the grave yet. There was the Chicago composer's ballet-suite, "Skyscrapers," done at the Metropolitan Opera six years ago, and as American as its name, and a piece new to New York—"Patterns," for orchestra and piano obbligato.

Mr. Carpenter played the piano part himself in "Patterns" and played it very deftly and happily. It is, indeed, a deft, felicitous and enjoyable piece of music altogether—and there is a good deal more adroit skill concealed in it than the casually pleased listener imagines. For this composer is well in his fifties and has learnt how to do a great many more effective things with an orchestra than when he first turned our attention to himself with "Adventures in a Perambulator."

FANCY AND HUMOR.

That was, indeed, a splendid attention-caller, for within it one could feel the great gifts of fancy and humor; and these are also what give "Patterns" its lightly shifting appeal. It is not music that, although wholly unfamiliar, could have puzzled anyone. Pointedly orchestrated, well-controlled if a little spare in its more expressive moments, it danced from one idea to another and the ideas might have been more or less whatever you liked.

Mr. Carpenter himself says that he wasn't being literary-minded when he wrote "Patterns"—the successive bits of enmeshed music have no program. Jazz is in and out of the piece, the waltz calls up only a possible memory, there is a swift flight to Spain (Mr. Carpenter also once wrote "The Birthday of the Infanta" and sometimes refers chaffingly to "an absurd bubbling up of my concealed Spanish blood"). "Patterns," in short, is nothing to hold beetle-browed pow-wows about, but was nonetheless well worth writing.

Just speaking for ourselves, we had rather less pleasure out of "Skyscrapers." Even when the music had the stage to back it up at the Metropolitan Opera—which is what it really needs—it never seemed quite to attend to its own purposes. In spite of its idiom, one feels that Mr. Carpenter had at least one ear cocked eastward of New York.

The beginning of Mr. Koussevitzky's afternoon had to do with the Second Symphony of Brahms.

Ralph Vaughan Williams, the noted English composer, now on brief visit to this country, has accepted the invitation of the Division of Music at Harvard to be its guest. On Wednesday evening, Nov. 30, at 8.15, in Paine Hall, he will speak informally about "Music of Modern England."

Should Dr. Vaughan Williams remain in Cambridge and Boston over the week-end, the Symphony Orchestra, at its concerts on Dec. 2 and 3, might becomingly pay some compliment to a distinguished contributor, within the last ten years, to its programs.

Trans Nov 21 '32

Sibelian Evening Of Koussevitzky

His "All-Sibelins" Program In New York as Reviewers Heard and Judged It

TIMEO Bostonaos Sibelium ferentes is surely not to be said. Let us rejoice rather that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving its first concert of the season last Thursday in Carnegie Hall, came bearing precious gifts of deep reflection from the northern port of Helsingfors. The entire concert was devoted to works of Sibelius. The numbers were the suite assembled from the instrumental music to Strindberg's "Swanwhite"; "Tapiola," a tone poem celebrating Tapio, the forest god of Finnish mythology, and the First Symphony. These breathings of the northern spirit the urbane Mr. Koussevitzky directed with enthusiasm tempered by wisdom.

"Tapiola" was composed at the behest of Walter Damrosch for the departed Symphony Society, and had what is now called a "world première" on Dec. 26, 1926. The present writer attended the two performaces of the tone-poem in 1926, but did not hear it till last night. . . . This is the essential Sibelius. The simplicity of the work is traceable directly to its development from a thematic root placed before the hearer in the opening bars and treated with unlabored logic throughout tht composition. The harmonies are frequently drastic, but the basic scheme rests upon the harmonic doctrines of the Old Believeers. The mood-communication, wrought with such materials and with broad, dignified rhythms and orchestration thoroughly characteristic of the composer, is eloquent, and exerts a potent spell upon the hearer. The poem was performed with all the wealth of tone and technic for which the Boston orchestra is famous. Mr. Koussevitzky effaced himself and rendered unto Sibelius that which was Sibelius's. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Yet Again

"Tapiola" contains daring and resourceful music that could have come from no other pen, culminating in a string crescendo in chromatics that is one of the most stunning achievements in all orchestral writing, yet an integral part of a closely knit musical structure and in no sense a mere virtuoso effect. Perhaps the many repetitions at the outset of the terse and not very alluring theme on which the music is built weary the ear not interested in the architectonics of the work; and this irrespective of the eternally dark coloring that is the hallmark of Sibelius's orchestration. Certainly this score is anything but barren, either as to ideas or treatment. But it conveys a sense of desolation—the desolation of nature in her wastelands—that is not for the hedonist or the comfort-seeker. These are no sensuous delights. They come like the lash of chilling winds and stinging rain. [Oscar Thompson in The Evening Post

Dissenting Voice

There remains the controversial "Tapiola," that symphonic poem which fell so flat when Mr. Walter Damrosch, after commissioning the work for the Symphony Society, produced it here in 1926. The subject promised to offer a poetical scheme ideally suited to the special quality of Sibelius's genius, with its affinity for the desolate bleak countries of the mind, its tone-poetry of sunless woods and iron twilights and the harshness of Northern solitudes. But the impressiveness of the music seemed, six years ago, to reside chiefly in the program, though the big crescendo at the end (which has its prototype in the first act of "Siegfried") made its inevitable effect, as it did again last evening.

The work was far more eloquently played than at its first performances here; yet the power and brilliancy of the conveyance could not disguise the barrenness of the score as a whole. Something of the mysterious savagery and ancient terror that must have haunted the tone-poet's imagination has found its tonal equivalent in the music. But the greater part of the writing is unfertilized and uneventful. We are far, in this work, from the excelling Sibelius of the Fourth Symphony, and of the Fifth, with their inimitable voice and accent and implications: for Sibelius, when he is most truly himself, issues no coin that is not stamped with its own unique image, the mask of a choice and unexampled spirit. [Lawrence Gilman in the Herald Tribune

The New Suite

The charming music written for Strindberg's "Swanwhite" was heard with pleasure. The score is rich in delicate fancy and is a revelation of the less introspective side of the Sibelian mind. [Mr. Henderson

In the "Swanwhite" Suite Sibelius is merely the gifted colorist, applying his craftsmanship to bibelots neither very substantial nor very individual. Perhaps the first persuasive chord of "The Peacock," the opening number of this group, was worth all that the five little pieces subsequently brought to light, well-written though they are. [Mr. Thompson

The "Swanwhite" Suite, drawn from the incidental music composed almost a quarter of a century ago for Strindberg's play, is for the most part tepid, vacuous and inconsequential. [Mr. Gilman

The First Symphony

The First Symphony is an old story and need not be discussed again here, save to note that Mr. Koussevitzky dwelt as fondly on the Chaikovskian chief themes as he did on those Finnish subsidiaries which, an imaginative commentator surmises, represent the unconscious revolt in the composer's spirit against what was then a Slavic domination of his muse. The playing throughout was that of a superb ensemble brilliantly led by one who is something of a specialist in the music of the composer. [Mr. Thompson.

All Told

Euterpe's eminent representative had provided for his local constituency a concert of unusual character. This was nothing less than an evening devoted exclusively to the music of that contemporary composer who is, according to his most active and vocal disciple, the symphonic peer of Beethoven. It was a brave and exciting thing to do—brave and exciting, and also fanatical. But the fanatical aspect of the matter need not disturb us. It is only the fanatical artist who can be music's perfect friend, whether in the interpretive or the creative field; and to say that last evening's program was the conception of a fanatic is not to censure but to praise it. . . .

It would not become any one to look down his nose at Sibelius. Even if this singular genius has not yet given us symphonic movements that are to be set beside the first allegros of the "Eroica" and the "Ninth." Sibelius has made it abundantly clear to all whose imaginative awareness of music is sensitive and alert that he is a composer of extraordinary power and originality, a solitary and puissant voice, and an indubitable master.

And the Audience

With the return of the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall last night, the orchestral pageant took on the three-dimensional fullness that is characteristic of it in those purple periods when the visits of the Philadelphians and the Bostonians bring fresh challenge to the supremacy of the Philharmonic Society on its own ground. Serge Koussevitzky was accorded a rousing demonstration of welcome when he emerged from the wings, moving with the deliberateness that is characteristic of his platform appearances. He passed the compliment on to his ensemble by summoning the players to their feet.

The enthusiasm of this first greeting was not afterward approached, though the audience gave further signs of an eagerness to applaud. The orchestra played with its customary virtuosity and it was not the quality of the performance that placed a checkrein on further demonstrations. The explanation was to be found in a program composed entirely of music by the admired but not always understood Finnish contemporary, Jean Julius Christian Sibelius. [Mr. Thompson

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK SUN

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Offers Music by Brahms and Carpenter.

A Brahms-Carpenter program was the delectable offering concocted by Serge Koussevitzky for the season's first Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. Lest there be confusion, let it be added that though both share an Apostolical name, one is Johannes, the other John. Since there was involved the premiere of an American composition, it is certain that the capacity audience bore the first half merely from graciousness, as it comprised only a single work—a symphony in D, by the aforesaid Brahms.

The revelations followed, in the person first of the tall, meticulous Mr. Carpenter, followed by the measured tread of Dr. Koussevitzky, and finally the energetic opening measures of "Patterns." An intriguing and novel title, it opens new vistas for the description of musical works. But to one listener, at least, the choice was scarcely a happy one, for the primary implications of the word would seem to be formal design, a quality in which this work was singularly lacking. Mr. Carpenter commences boldly with a broad theme played by the unison strings, eight measures or so in length, which, at the very close of the work, reoccurs with the whole weight of the orchestra upon it. Between these two points a number of things happen. There is a section of Spanish cliches, another section of feeble musical comedy lyricism, and a few moments of labored jazziness. Aside from the opening motive and an English horn solo well along in the piece, there is little that is stimulating or interesting in these pages. The nostalgic quality that suffuses, much of it is not without pathos, but it is more in the confession implicit in such a work at this stage in his career, than in the compulsion of the music Mr. Carpenter has written.

In technical flavor, the work is predominately conservative, equally as to harmonic coloring, themes and orchestration, with a passing nod to Debussy and a deeper bow to Tchaikovsky A noticeable weakness of the composition is its constantly homophonic texture, quite barren of contrapuntal thinking or feeling. An interesting light on the current state of music and finance is disclosed with the remembrance that Mr. Carpenter once found it necessary to devote himself to commercial pursuits, avowing that music was not sufficiently stable an occupation. His reappearance in concert hall would indicate that a the concert hall would indicate that a certain revaluation has transpired.

edged the applause for his share in the work, the orchestra bent themselves to the "Skyscrapers" music. It is reasonable to say that the performance of Saturday was superior to those it enjoyed in its previous sojourn on this island. What contribution the brilliance of the rendition had in its effectivenes is not difficult to understand, yet, despite its great age of eight years, it has very much more zest and vitality than the new "Patterns." So much so, that one is tempted to regret that their chronology is not reversed, to encourage a hope that Mr. Carpenter is growing in artistry, as their relative merit would then indicate.

The performance of the symphony was tortuous and exaggerated, reducing the musical pleasure of the afternoon to a miscroscopic amount. The vocal soloists in "Skyscrapers" were Adele Alberts and Rulon Robison, who performed their small but difficult task with fine skill. I. K.

N. Y. EVENING POST

[NOV] 21 1932

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Carpenter Is Soloist When His "Patterns" Is Introduced by Bostonians—Bauer in Recital

CONTEMPORARY American music, as represented by two ponderable compositions by John Alden Carpenter of the Chicago business world, shared with a symphony of Brahms the initial Saturday afternoon program of the Boston Symphony's new series in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Carpenter participated as pianist in the first New York performance of "Patterns," his latest contribution to the orchestral repertory. Unobtrusive as was his share in the projection of his music, there was no escaping the bows demanded of him as a composer, a pianist and a personality. The other Carpenter work of the afternoon was the familiar "Skyscrapers," now about eight years old, as converted from a stage ballet to music for the concert room. The Brahms Symphony was the sunlit second, which no conductor of eminence is likely to omit permanently from his programs for Manhattan.

The new Carpenter composition wears its title well. It needs no program to explain it, as it swings along, easy and a little nonchalant of stride, neither assuming too much nor betraying any lack of confidence as to just where it is going and why. It has suggestions of jazz, moments of the sentimental popular music of a day that preceded jazz, a commonplace but attractive waltz episode, and, as the composer himself has described it, "an absurd bubbling up" of his "concealed Spanish blood." It is the music of a collector, not of books, paintings, china or postage stamps, but of patterns. The patterns color the collector's life, he gives them back with something of his inner self spun into them. If this is not important music, nor highly distinguished, it is in a sense both personal and racial. It is featly done. It holds the ear. Its substance, such as it is, has a clear and well-sounding statement.

"Skyscrapers," composed in 1924 and first produced at the Metropolitan two years later, withstands repetitions rather better, as we see it, than any other American composition for orchestra of the era except possibly Schelling's "Impressions From an Artist's Life." Saturday's audience saluted once more a work which draws upon every man's technique and yet succeeds in being American—and that in spite of, quite as much as because of, its American subject. Serge Koussevitzky conducted with ~~his usual vigor and~~ achieved performances of sharp-edged vitality.

N. Y. World-Telegram

1932

Music Notes

John Alden Carpenter was the feature of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. He played well the piano part in his own new composition for piano and orchestra, "Patterns," an eclectic and pleasing work, and there was also performed a concert version of his ballet "Skyscrapers," with Adele Alberts, soprano, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, as soloists.

"Patterns," a first time here, is a slight though skillfully made piece, which will scarcely rank among Mr. Carpenter's more important compositions. The rest of the excellent orchestra's concert, under the direction of Mr. ~~Koussevitzky,~~ was devoted to the second symphony of Brahms.

* * *

The season's second Philharmonic-Symphony concert for children, under the direction of Ernest Schelling, took place in Carnegie Hall Saturday morning. Mr. Schelling likewise lectured and played one of the solo parts in Bach's D minor concerto for three claviers, the other soloists being Olin Downes and John Erskine.

The concert was devoted to the early history of the concerto, with the fugue from Beethoven's string quartet, op. 59, No. 3, to finish it off.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

NOV 21 1932

Chicago Composer Gives His Audience Lesson in Modesty

BY DALE HARRISON.

(Associated Press Staff Writer.)

NEW YORK, Nov. 20.—John Alden Carpenter stepped from the Chicago Social Register to a piano bench on the Carnegie Hall stage yesterday to give New York symphony audiences a lesson on musical modesty.

The slender Chicago composer shared the Boston Symphony Orchestra program with the Brahms Second Symphony, the second half of the program being given over to Carpenteriana — his well known "Skyscrapers" and the first New York performance of "Patterns."

It was in "Patterns" that he startled his audience with something new in poserial modesty. The number—which might be called a piano concerto with reverse English—was programmed as being for "Orchestra, With Piano Obligato." Carpenter followed that idea faithfully. His piano was within the orchestra instead of being given prominent front-stage position. The orchestra did the work and Carpenter, from his modest position inside the circle, obligato-ed.

In its use of the piano with full orchestra, "Patterns" followed the vogue of other modernists, notably Gershwin, who has employed the pianoforte extensively in his orchestral compositions.

Carpenter, however, has taken the pyrotechnics from the instrument in "Patterns" and he succeeded surprisingly well in making it an accompaniment to the 100 pieces of brass, tympani and strings which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky led through the selection's modern eccentricities.

"Patterns" itself ranged from a size 16 to a 42. At first hearing it sounded as though the size sixteen was in the majority. It was marked throughout with modernism, but a modernism in a high hat instead of the dungarees some of the Tin Pan Alley alumni have effected in their excited offerings to the symphonic album.

Her.

TUESDAY CONCERTS OPEN

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will begin a cycle of the great composers of symphonic music from the earliest to the present day when he opens the Tuesday afternoon series of Boston symphony concerts at Symphony hall at 3 o'clock today. This, the fourth and last symphony series to be opened in Boston this season, follows on the orchestra's initial visit to New York last week, from which it has returned with brilliant successes to its credit.

Each of the great composers will be represented by one number through the course of six Tuesday afternoon concerts. Today's opening program will have music by Bach, Haydn and Beethoven. The second program will include Handel, Mozart and Brahms, and the succeeding programs will follow a course of symphonic development through Schubert, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Strauss, Debussy and Stravinsky.

Nov 22 32

Dr. Koussevitzky has substituted a Suite of Ballet Airs from Lully's seventeenth-century operas for Schmitt's tone-poem, "Dreams," as first number at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. Only once before, in the whole fifty-two years, has there been room for music from Lully—in 1922 under Mr. Monteux.

To mark the approaching visit of Vaughan Williams to Cambridge and Boston, his "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" will be played in the presence of the composer at the Symphony Concerts of Dec. 2 and 3. Tallis was a Tudor music-maker.

Symphony Is to Open Historical Series Today

Post Nov 22

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will begin a cycle of the great composers of symphonic music from the earliest to the present day when he opens the Tuesday afternoon series of Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock today.

Each of the great composers will be represented by one number through the course of six Tuesday afternoon concerts. Today's opening programme will have music by Bach, Haydn and Beethoven. The second programme will include Handel, Mozart and Brahms, and the succeeding programmes will follow a course of symphonic development through Shubert, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Strauss, Debussy and Stravinsky.

SCOTTISH CLANS TO OBSERVE 55TH YEAR

The Grand Clan of Massachusetts of the Order of Scottish Clans will celebrate its 55th year with a great gathering of clans at the Hotel Bradford ballroom tomorrow night. The different tartans of the clans, ladies auxiliaries and Daughters of Scotia Lodges will be among the great number present.

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

Bringing His Own Music to Symphony Hall

Florent Schmitt as Composer And Pianist for the Week-End Concerts

SURELY no more distinguished visitor has enjoyed the hospitality of Symphony Hall in many a day than the composer-pianist who comes this week from Paris to play the piano part in the world-premiere of his new Symphonie Concertante for Orchestra and Piano, Opus 82. If, in the days when the phrase Debussy-and-Ravel was spoken and thought as if it were a single word, a third name had been added, it might well have been that of the guest of the week—Florent Schmitt. Schmitt is eight years younger than Debussy, five years older than Ravel, which fixes the date of his birth as 1870. Though he is thus the contemporary of these other two. M. Schmitt is musically an independent; his work does not follow—or only remotely, if at all—the Debussyan trend.

M. Schmitt arrived in Boston Monday evening, was engaged in rehearsals most of yesterday: rehearsals with the Symphony Orchestra, rehearsals of ensemble numbers for private performance. When seen late yesterday, the strenuous exercises of the day had left him none the "worse for wear." In stature he is both short and slight. His eye is clear, his mien alert, his speech short-clipped and decisive. His bearing has something precise and positive about it that almost suggests a military manner. His is an abounding energy. Except for the graying beard and hair one could easily take him to be ten, almost fifteen years younger than he really is. Even a few minutes of observing him would tell one that he could not have joined the Debussyian "impressionistic" movement. He simply is not the kind of person who could think, who could express himself, in that way. He is in fact, by his very personality, an opposite of all that. One can see smoldering fires in his eyes, can imagine the volcanic eruptions which occur in his music, can sense that, whatever form it takes, his music must always be an active rather than a passive music. Not "impressions," but well-defined lines, resistant surfaces, immense masses must be the materials with which the mind behind those eyes does its work

The first movement is broadly and expansively in free sonata form. Without introduction, crashing chords at once launch this movement into an extremely agitated first theme. A second theme is more melodic. There are many icidental themes. The tonal scheme is free. "But I do not know exactly where the development begins, nor where the recapitulation begins. In fact, the recapitulation, which is more condensed than the exposition, actually begins before the end of the development." Which really means that the movement is an exceedingly fluid one. The Coda for a moment brings back both themes.

The most casual glance at the new score tells one quickly that M. Schmitt has kept pace with the advanced among musical thinkers. He has merely travelled a different path than that taken by other Frenchmen. Throughout his life he has continued to be an independent. He is Florent Schmitt, an individuality in his own right, and none other. There was no more than time at yesterday's inttrview to discuss briefly the general outlines of his Symphonie Concertante. The work is dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A line at the bottom of the last page of the score bears the date "Pyrénées, Octobre, 1931." The orchestra is the usual large modern orchestra with strong percussion choir. As in Arnold Bax's work of two weeks ago, the piano part lies somewhere between that of an old-fashioned concerto and that of mere orchestral voice, a sort of "primus inter pares." The work is in three movements, (1) Assez animé, (2) Lent, (3) Animé.

M. Schmitt was ready with the exposition of the outline of the Symphonie Concertante, but was more hesitant when asked for a statement as to the style of the work. "I hope it is a good style," and "I hope it is my own style." But no more, until with a twinkle in his eye that might almost have been interpreted as malicious, he said, "anyway, not a style on the way back to Bach, nor back to anything else. If only, because I could not possibly write like Bach. It is impossible to go back. I can only go forward."

The slow movement begins with an introduction in mysterious, shimmering sonorities, suggestive of distant bells, which M. Schmitt repeatedly referred to by the French term "sonnerie." An incidental English horn solo which grows out of these sonorities is part of this introduction. This introduction proceeds by a huge crescendo at the very top of which the first theme is heard. This theme sings itself out in an equal decrescendo. Again, "trés douce," the "sonnerie" mysteries with the English horn solo—the introduction has become interlude. The second theme begins as an expressive horn solo, continues on the G string of the violins. And yet again transition similar to the previous one, this time with a crescedo to a fortissimo statement of the incidental theme; all leading to a return of the first theme. As in the first movement the Coda sums up both the principal themes.

The finale, M. Schmitt described as an extremely brisk dance rondo in which the episodes are a solemn march-like cortège. It contains irregularities of rhythm which Dr. Koussevitzky insists on describing as among the most difficult he has ever conducted. The Symphonie Concertante is not a "cyclic" work. Each movement has its own independent themes, and no theme of any movement is heard in any other movement. Neither is the work in any sense programmatic.

Florent Schmitt's family (he is a native Alsatian, born at Blamont, a small town between Nancy and Strassburg, in the region of the Vosges Mountains) was musical. His father, willing that Florent should study music, suggested that he study organ, become an organist. But the young man insisted upon objecting that orfianists "are people who paly only in 4-4 time" and did not study that instrument. When at the conservatory at Nancy he began lessons in piano playing, he found the necessary technical drill irksome, did not fully apply himself until he was introduced to the music of Chopin, after which, in the words of his biographer, Ferroud, he studied "with frenzy." (P. O. Ferroud, "Autour de Florent Schmitt," is the source of all subsequent quotations not otherwise credited.) Soon the violin sonata of César Franck became his second love in music. At the Paris Conservatory, which he entered in 1889, the circle of his musical enthusiasms widened to include the sonatas of Beethoven, "Tristan and Isolde," the Passions and cantatas of Bach, "Antar" and "Prince Igor" from the Russians, some of the music of Chabrier, and the orchestration (rather than the actual composition) of Richard Strauss. He competed for the Prix de Rome in 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900. In the last of these years he won it. He was not highly elated. He himself has written with fine sarcasm regarding this victory that it was "thanks to my late much lamented master, Gabriel Fauré, who knew how to get enough votes among the painters and sculptors (of the Institut) to counterbalance the animosity of the musicians. . . . It was thus not, in reality, a 'prix de musique.'"

Independence asserted itself again during the Roman years. He travelled leisurely to the Villa Medici, arrived there only at the last allowable moment. Out of the years that were his at this much desired spot, he spent so much time in travel that he was repeatedly admonished by those in authority. These journeys sometimes occupied months at a time; in them he covered most of Europe from Scandinavia to Spain and Asia Minor, penetrated even into North Africa. From these years date parts of the famed Quintette; the Psalm XLVI for soprano, chorus and orchestra (heard at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1928); the symphonic étude, "Le palais harte," after Poe; the "Musiques de plein air" for orchestra; a lost symphonic poem. Schmitt thus fulfilled amply all the technical requirements imposed upon him by accepting the Prix de Rome; wrote some of the works upon which his future reputation was to rest; acquired that background which only travel can give.

Schmitt, with all his love and respect for the music of the past, with his own style founded originally in the composers of the past, has himself ever been one of the foremost champions of the new. Witness this incident: Schmitt was seated high up in the gallery of the Châtelet; the occasion was the first performance of Ravel's "Rapsodie espagnole." The Malaguena from this rhapsody "scandalized" some of the subscribers in the choicest seats down below. And French audiences have a way of making it known when they have been "scandalized." Above the confusion rang out the voice of Schmitt from the gallery: "Play it again; play it again for those down there who did not understand it." He was one of the first to come to the aid of Eric Satie; tried personally to silence the army of traditionalist objectors at the first performance of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps"; more recently entered the lists in defense of Schönberg's "Variationen für Orchester."

M. Schmitt is a writer about music as well as a composer of music. Which gives him all the more opportunity to champion the works of contemporaries. "This battle for every new cause, be it what it may, he pursues in his vigilant column in 'La Revue de France,' where he chastises vigorously all desecrators of the temple." Among the younger generation his style has had its effect upon Arthur Honegger, who "does not imitate him, but upon whom he had considerable influence, and who posseses, with him, the secret of spacious construction." Not many French composers, indeed, have this secret, but Schmitt, amid the writing of numerous small works, has composed also many "more spacious pieces in which themes are multiplied and combined in savory counterpoints."

Tempered by Two Strains

Florent Schmitt (Lipnitzki—Paris)

Composer of Many-Sided Music, To Be Guest at the Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday. In Him Alsatian Blood Runs in French Channels

Of the origins of Schmitt's style Ferroud says: "Florent Schmitt found himself naturally oriented toward 'the reputed classic forms' and at first to the great German classics. If, like everyone else, he burned a little incense on the altars of Bayreuth, if he allowed himself to be seduced for a time by the chamber music of Franck, it must be admitted that he could have chosen worse models."

Neverthless, "the harmonic style of Florent Schmitt is that of his time, which he uses as he hears it. One chord only is the object of his 'violent proscription,' that of the augmented fifth . . . as is also the empirical use of the whole tone scale, whose abuse has led to many platitudes." This statement about the use of the whole tone scale, in Schmitt's works, is, however, subject to a very small number of exceptions. In his harmonies he has liked "fat," sonorous chords—the very opposite of Debussy's evanescent, shimmering harmonies, though often, like Debussy's, based on "ninth chords" and their inversions. Such chords are frequently used by Schmitt to underscore strong and even violent effects. Ferroud also notes several embryonic suggestions of polytonality.

But Schmitt is essentially a contrapuntal rather than a harmonic composer. "His thought gushes forth spontaneously in the form of superposable motifs, which extend from modest two-part writing to a luxuriant polyphony of chords." Counterpoint, like harmony, has become for him an instrument of forceful expression "One will probably not find in all modern music an interlacing of lines at once so vigorous and so supple as in the magistral fugue expositions of the Psalm."

"The melody of Florent Schmitt exists only as a function of his counterpoint. Save in the smaller pieces, straightforward, and of frank appeal, it often shows a decided predilection for chromaticism. It is this which gives his music its special color, by which one can single it out from that of a thousand composers, and which makes it possible for him to evoke felicitously the Orient and its voluptuous pleasures. Passages in 'Légende' (for viola solo and orchestra) and in the 'Sonata libre' (violin and piano) might be considered as deriving from 'Pierrot lunaire' had they not been written before this work saw France."

"Only rarely does Schmitt make use of that transference of themes which is necessary in the so-called 'cyclic' types of sonata and symphony. Regularly, each theme is an entity in itself, has its own value, neither suffers change nor is made to do double duty in several portions of a composition. The Quintette and the Sonata libre, which are cyclic, are notable exceptions."

"Florent Schmitt thinks richly, writes richly. This richness translates itself with him into an abundance of musical development and a luxuriance which can be compared only to that of tropical vegetation. He never repeats himself. If in a form a theme is due for repetition, he always expands or condenses or somehow modifies it, as the situation may require, but never repeats it literally."

M. Louis Aubert has stated that "Florent Schmitt is a composer who moves with greater ease among vehement subjects than among others. Far from causing him anxiety, these subjects have a veritable attraction for him." Witness the tribal rejoicings in the Psalm, the violence of the Tragedy of Salome, the seeming prescience of the cataclysms of the war in "Dreams" (withdrawn from this week's program), to mention only a few.

Reference has above been made to Schmitt's smaller pieces. Many of these are written for the piano, not a few for four hands, some for two pianos. A field in which Schmitt has liked to work, in these smaller forms, is that of the waltz. "Are there not," asks Ferroud jokingly, "almot as many waltzes by Florent Schmitt as by Strauss?" and then answers by citing eight titles, most of them sets of waltzes! His larger works, other than those already mentioned, include "Antoine et Cléopâtré," six symphonic episodes, in two suites, after Shakspeare, Op. 69; two "Mirages" for piano, which have been orchestrated by the composer, Op. 70; the ballet, "Le petit elfe Ferme-l' Œil," Op. 73; "Salammbo," six symphonic episodes in three suites, after G. Flaubert, Op. 76.

A. H. M.

52

Nov. 26 Trans.

Symphony Finances === Plays and Concerts

Side-Glances At the Guest Of the Hour

Continued from Preceding Page

Florent Schmitt's method of composition is that he seldom lets his instruments stay idle; that even the preverbial rests in the drum-parts are filled in so that the drummer may not enjoy a mental vacation. He has been charged with malice; while an authorized biography even includes a confirming anecdote. Schmitt, it appears, during rehearsals of the Psalm, discovered that certain blowers of brass had too much leisure to rest their embouchures. Forthwith he marked parenthetical possibilities on his cuffs. As the story goes, the effect on various Parisian chemisiers was inspirational—the creation of a specialty, musical cuffs, with staff and clef traced in an indigo that no laundering could wash away.

Perusing Schmitt's scores, one does not find evidence of such a sweating system. To the contrary, group-scoring is a conspicuous feature in Schmitt's orchestration. Consider, for instance, the extraordinary episode in "Pompey's Camp" from the Suite of incidental music to Shakspeare's "Antony and Cleopatra, written for brass orchestra and humanely scored. On the other hand, the pianist who undertakes to play the "Sonata libre en deux parties enchainées" for violin and pianoforte must be quite ubiquitous to meet the demands of the score. This Sonata contains in title and subtitle several abstruse puns: a reference to Clemenceau and his daily newspaper which was suppressed by the censor and appeared again with the titular adjective changed from "free" to "chained"; a pun also in the Latin subtitle, "ad modum clementis aquæ," apparently alluding to Clementi's pioneer work in piano music.

It is impossible to understand why Schmitt has acquired a reputation of unworldliness. "A ferociously solitary person," he was reported to be at the time when his works reached foreign lands. An unidentifiable source branded him as "the wild boar of the Ardennes," or, more accurately as to the geography, of the Vosges. Puns were many in English and American newspapers as to the potentialities of the animal's spelling, with scant chance for the punsters, since barbaric music is seldom boring, and Schmitt was heralded as a composer of barbaric music. Schmitt's tragic Salome was adjudged lascivious beyond musical decency, and the innocuous "Rêves" were said to disclose Freudian connotations that might be unfit to print. On the other hand, Schmitt's remarkable Quintet of 1908 was found to be deficient in sensuousness, with "nothing that suggests the thought of woman in the whole work."

Thus, Schmitt seems to be master of the entire gamut of human musical emotions—from barbarity to austerity. Yet, he is one of the most wholesome personalties in music, traveling along a straight path from the days of his Prix de Rome to the present time. Like Ravel and Debussy, he never wrote a "straight" symphony or any music that may be called absolute in our parlance. Schmitt's works suggest rich imagination; while the literary program attached to them detracts nothing from their musical value.

Unlike many another master of yesterday, Florent Schmitt follows the developments of contemporary music with keen interest, and in most deserving cases, with admiration. But as a creator he keeps his own countenance. For all his admiration for Stravinsky, he never let one particle of Stravinskian brimstone fall into his brews. He confines his cultural curiosity to the literary pages of many important French publications. There he appears as large-minded, discriminating observer. What is Schönberg to him? Yet Florent Schmitt fought for him when the Five Orchestral Pieces were hissed in Paris. If we are to believe an authorized biographer, Schmitt risked a physical encounter on that occasion, and, probably defeated, suffered the loss of a lorgnon and a pupil's score. . . .

Florent Schmitt is as vibrant with the life around him as he was in his formative years. He breathes the air of all peoples, because he knows that air cannot be artificially manufactured for selected groups. Admittedly it contains bacilli and dust—atonal tropes and uncomfortable earfuls of tones—but it is our only air. Florent Schmitt likes our imperfect planet; the planet reciprocates.

NICOLAS SLONIMSKY

Finance at Symphony Hall

Annual Statement from The Trustees of the Orchestra to Subscribers and Guarantors

Present Deficits and a Generous Contribution from Players and Staff

THE program-book for the Symphony Concerts of the week contains the long-expected and long-deferred statement from the Trustees as to the financial condition, season of 1932-33, of the orchestra. The usual balance-sheet of income and outgo for the past three years, ending July 31, 1932, fills two pages. On two more the Trustees set out the present situation of their treasury, substantially as follows:

"The comparative summary of the treasurer's report for the 1931-32 season and for two previous years, shows the difficulty of maintaining an organization with the standard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon a self-supporting basis. Without further financial aid, either from endowments, or by annual contributions from those who regard the orchestra as an important cultural, artistic and educational institution of Boston and New England, its future continuance would be doubtful.

"During the season of 1931-32, . . . the orchestra gave 104 revenue-producing concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, New York, Brooklyn, and fourteen other cities, with the addition of fifty-eight Pop Concerts in Boston. The box-office receipts and season-ticket subscriptions for all these concerts, as well as incidental income from program advertising, record royalties, and similar miscellaneous sources, were applied to the cost of maintaining the orchestra. Nevertheless, the season ended with a net operating loss, or deficit, or $109,647.86.

"This operating deficit was reduced by applying the small surplus from contributions and broadcasting contracts of previous years, and the income from the endowment fund, to $93,218.60.

"This final deficit could be cared for only by the contributions from those willing and able to give, as they had so generously done in each of the previous thirteen years after Mr. Higginson laid down the heavy burden borne by him for the first thirty-seven years of the orchestra's existence. Last year such contributions amounted to $62,575.63. Consequently, the season closed with an unpaid indebtedness of $24,233.11, which must somehow be liquidated in the current or subsequent years.

"To help in meeting the present situation, the conductor and members of the orchestra, the management, and all officials and employees in Symphony Hall, have unanimously agreed to contribute from their salaries an aggregate of approximately one-half the estimated deficit of $93,000 for the current season. . . .

"Encouraged by such evidences of devotion to the orchestra, the Trustees appeal with even greater confidence than in other years, to their friends and contributors for the funds required to meet the rest of the estimated deficit of this year; and, if possible, also to liquidate the deficit balance from last year. The Trustees and management will continue their effort to keep the expenses during this period of depression down to the lowest possible point, and to take advantage of every opportunity to increase the receipts.

"We cannot close this appeal without a most grateful acknowledgment of the generous support of so many hundred contributors since we assumed responsibility for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of the thousands of ticket-subscribers in this and other cities who, almost without exception, have renewed their subscriptions for the present season.

"Contributions in any amount should be sent to Ernest B. Dane, Treasurer, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., 6 Beacon street, Boston, Massachusetts."

A New Concerto; An Old Symphony

Trans. Nov 26

Two notable works: the one, Florent Schmitt's symphonie concertante for orchestra and piano, in its world premiere, with the composer as soloist; the other, second symphony of Sibelius, continuing Dr. Koussevitzky's plan to project all eight this season, were the main part of the symphony concert yesterday afternoon.

After a quiet reading of a ballet suite from the 17th century operas of Lully, the abrupt, harshly discordant opening of the Schmitt concerto, unsoftened by introduction, fell on unready ears. And a strange effect was wrought by this work: now confounding the past with its conceptions of tonality and rhythm; again oddly reminiscent of that past with its suggestions of contrapuntal treatment.

Out of a great jumble of agitated themes, both first and third movements labor to impressive climaxes. The middle movement is slower, more quiet, but there is a restless, throbbing background upon which strange figures are traced, out of which rise, and into which subside two main themes. The whole is a work of great power and drive, yet one on which judgment should not be passed after a single hearing.

An audience attended yesterday with open mind and ear, struggled to understand, and therein failed completely. But be it understood that the composer was perfectly capable of coping with the difficult task he set himself as soloist. And above all towered the accomplishments of Dr. Koussevitzky in handling the cruel difficulties of a score before which a lesser conductor might have fallen.

Of the Sibelius second symphony, there now seems possible but one estimate. It is a glorious music, less so, perhaps, than the fourth or fifth symphonies, but still a great music. And just as at a previous concert, the first Sibelius symphony transcended a novelty, Bax's "Winter Legends," so yesterday did another novelty give way before the magnificence of conception, the strength and breadth of line of a Sibelian work.

H. C. C.

As the Tuesday Symphonies Begin

Trans Nov 23

YESTERDAY afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first concert of the season's Tuesday series. For almost any other than a symphony concert one would have said that the attendance was more than excellent. Only in comparison with the other three series can one say less. On the "floor" there was no more than a sprinkling of empty seats. The first balcony fared almost as well. The rear of the second balcony actually fared better, being all but filled. The poorest attendance, as far as the eye could tell, was along the sides of the second balcony, where seats were between two-thirds and three-fourths filled. Which is not a bad showing for the newest of the symphony series; but which also gives opportunity for such students and other music lovers who have still to make the acquaintance of symphony concerts. There could be no better introduction for them than through this series.

Upon the program Dr. Koussevitzky had placed three of the greatest masters of music: Bach, Haydn, Beethoven. Bach with a Brandenburg concerto—No. 2, in F major; Haydn with the most familiar of all his symphonies, the "Surprise," in G major; Beethoven, with this thrililngly gorgeous "Seventh," in A major. The concerto of Bach's day placed a small group of solo players over against the main body of the orchestra. In the Concerto in F major that solo group consists of a violin, a flute, an oboe, a trumpet—played yestedray by Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet, Mager. The range of the trumpet part being beyond that of the usual modern trumpet, a smaller, higher-pitched instrument is being substituted. Its tone is less brilliant and metallic than that of the regularly used trumpet, at times suggesting the broad, liquid quality of a large flute. At any rate, the free-flowing rhythms of Bach, the suavities of his melody, the frequent interchange of sonorities between solo and orchestral groups, proved themselves more than interesting to those who already were familiar with them, must have greatly intrigued those who were hearing them for the first time.

One still marvels at the freshness of this music, now over two centuries old, as likewise at the freshness of Haydn's music, almost a century and a half old. Haydn's naivety still makes its mark. There were still those, yesterday, who jumped at the "surprise" chord after Dr. Koussevitzky's unbelievably low pianissimo; and a perceptible rustling passed through the whole audience at this point. The conductor's reproduction of the naive variations of Haydn, of the rollicking, peasant-like rhythms of the minuet, the sheer, blinding virtuosity which he demanded and amply received from the orchestra in the finale, were notable.

The playing of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, that tour de force in varying rhythms, was at many points of unsurpassable excellence. One refers most particularly to the subtle management of pace, general rhythmic effect, nuance, accentuation, flow of melody, mood, in the slow movement which is not a slow movement. More than many a more brilliant and displayful piece, its playing is beset on all sides with dangers. As he plays it in 1932, Koussevitzky has avoided all its dangers, has plumbed its lowest depths. And the lightness of the scherzo, the mad, onrushing swirl of the finale, are close second to it, if second at all.

A. H. M.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST TUESDAY

Post Nov 23

Series of Educational Concerts Begun

The first of the current series of Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts brought yesterday to an audience that very nearly filled Symphony Hall, a programme of venerated classics that included Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in F major, Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

In making his lists for this second supplementary series of concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky finds himself in a bit of a dilemma. He would offer at these matinees only established pieces, old or new; he would make the concerts, in degree, educative as well as pleasurable, by presenting the chosen works in an order at least roughly chronological; and yet he would, if possible, spare his listeners the tedium and surfeit that comes from hearing at one time too many pieces of the same period.

A programme all of Bach and Handel would not do; Bach or Handel plus Haydn might still engender monotony; but Bach, Haydn and Beethoven would illustrate at a glance a century's development of orchestral music and furnish it within a still somewhat narrow radius, the much to be desired element of contrast. Already at the regular concerts this season, conductor and orchestra had played Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to general applause. The ever-popular Symphony of Haydn, heard last season at the concerts commemorating the 200th anniversary of his birth, and the Suite of Bach, with its difficult trumpet-part, are pieces that leader and men have, so to speak, at their finger tips.

The performances of all three works yesterday were technically finished and musically eloquent. The audience received them enthusiastically.

MUSIC

Glob Nov 23

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky announced this Fall that his programs for the Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts would trace in rough chronology the development of symphonic music from Bach to modern times. He accordingly chose Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto, in F major; Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, for the first concert of the series yesterday. Messrs Burgin, Laurent, Gillet, and Mager played the solo parts in the concerto.

The conductor's customary sagacity in making programs was doubly emphasized yesterday in the three pieces, which began the practical demonstration in musical history. Whereas some conductors less gifted in this respect might have proceeded pedantically and confined such a program entirely to 18th Century music, Dr Koussevitzky had a different, and a better, idea. He shrewdly placed Haydn after Bach, and Beethoven after Haydn. This not only provided wide variety of individual style—which juxtaposition of 18th Century music alone probably would not have done—but lent the added virtue of a crescendo, so to speak, from the musical serenity of Bach to Beethoven's intense, characteristic utterances in his Seventh Symphony.

Displaying the catholicity of taste and the sympathy with modern composers for which he is famous, Dr Koussevitzky also announced that the music of Stravinsky will find place in this series of concerts. This is as it should be. No doubt even the most conservative of listeners would now concede that no survey of symphonic music would be complete without some of the better music of Igor the Great, whose work once exhaled a smell of sulphur, but has since taken on the odor of sanctity.

Beethoven's Symphony was interpreted with the warmth and rhythmic gusto which Dr Koussevitzky so fully commands, and which is a first essential to performance of this glorification of rhythm. Haydn's Symphony was played in like vein.

The next concert of this series will be played Jan 3. Music by Handel, Mozart and Brahms is announced.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

Globe Nov 26

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Florent Schmitt was guest of honor at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, playing the solo part in the first public performance of his Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra. The distinguished French composer, whose music has been played here by every conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past 20 years, has not before visited this country.

Dr Koussevitzky also played a ballet suite drawn from operas by Lully and arranged for concert performance by Felix Mottl; and Sibelius' second Symphony, in D major.

If there were any in yesterday's audience who still believed composers to be romantic looking personages wearing unconventional habiliments, with long hair and wild eyes, they must have been surprised, perhaps disappointed to see a tall, spare, dignified man with gray hair and beard, dressed simply, walk briskly to the middle of the stage and bow stiffly, almost in military fashion.

Mr Schmitt has long been held in esteem for the individuality of his music. Disdaining, in his maturity, to follow the musical parade behind any idol of the day, and cleaving to no "school" or sect of composition, he has made his own way, writing down what seemed to him to be good music. He has not wallowed in the sea of impressionism, nor has he waved the "Back to Bach" standard.

At first hearing, this Symphonie Concertante discloses much that is interesting, impressive. It is concrete in outline and harmonic treatment. Schmitt does not imply; he speaks out his mind. Although many probably did not recognize it, for only the faithful minority clapped hands zealously yesterday, there is a good deal of melody buried in the dissonant polyphonic depths. Especially is this true of the first movement where the strings and some of the winds have real songs to sing.

Mr Schmitt has written for a large orchestra augmented by an array of percussion instruments. The piano part, on the whole, is treated rather as one of the instrumental voices than a solo, as in the time-honored concerto. The composer obtains some startling effects in timbres and dynamics. Because he is an artist of ripe experience and unimpeachable ideals, his work is free from the flippancy and self-consciousness which characterize that of many modernists. The shrewdness and vision of his construction is evident; there is no suggestion of hasty writing or of half-realized ideas. Above all, one senses that he wrote from a definite intellectual point of view.

Most notable of all is the vitality and wide variety of rhythms. In this respect the last of the three movements seemed terribly difficult, and the hard work which players and conductor encountered was obvious.

Where the Symphonie Concertante fails is in its lack of emotional power and of definite mood. Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" has a rough, barbaric atmosphere that thrills. With this masterpiece Schmitt's work can be compared in only one respect: the Symphonie Concertante is quite as involved rhythmically. Beethoven wrote practically a study in rhythms in his Seventh Symphony, but that masterpiece touches the heart. Perfection of formal construction, well-written harmony or counterpoint opulence of instrumentation are requisites of good music. But they alone are not enough. Musically, as well as physically, the heart remains the vital spot.

Dr Koussevitzky, Mr Schmitt and the members of the orchestra deserve the highest commendation for a brilliant, sonorous performance of an exacting score.

Lully's Ballet Suite, which began the concert, ought to be heard more often. It has a freshness and charm which nearly three centuries have failed to wither. It was played excellently, save for one apparent slip in the Gavotte. Dr Koussevitzky conducted it with just the proper intensity. Sibelius' Symphony, the final number, was accorded the warmth of feeling, the luminosity of interpretation which the conductor always gives to this music, which, as all know, he so greatly admires. Ernest Newman to the contrary, it seems inconceivable that anyone could surpass Dr Koussevitzky's reading of Sibelius.

Ralph Vaughan Williams will be present at the Symphony concerts next week, when his Fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis will be played. A Mozart Serenade for wind instruments, and Schubert's C major Symphony, No. 7, are also announced.

C. W. D.

Post

DAY, NOVEMBER 26,

SCHMITT SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Composer Plays Piano Part in First Time Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was made notable by the first performance anywhere of Florent Schmitt's "Symphonie Concertante," for orchestra and piano, by the initial appearance here of the distinguished French composer as soloist in his own work, and by a surpassingly eloquent performance of the Second Symphony of Sibelius that at the end roused the audience to a rare pitch of excitement and enthusiasm.

SCHMITT'S NEW WORK

That shy and elusive bird the musical masterpiece has become so rare of late that it is risky business to announce the discovery or an authentic specimen. Let, then, the pronouncing of Mr. Schmitt's new Concerto as great music, or even notable music, be left to future commentators, and let those who liked and admired it yesterday content themselves with calling it fine music. Even that is much nowadays.

First of all Mr. Schmitt, who both in outward appearance and as composer belies the 62 years with which he is credited, has written here as one whose mastery of every resource of orchestral composition is easy and secure.

The Tremendous Finale

Again, his themes, while they do not impress at first blush as conspicuously original and distinctive, have nevertheless character in themselves and lend themselves well to the composer's symphonic purposes with them. Often it has seemed as though Florent Schmitt composed intellectually rather than emotionally, but there are moving pages in the first two movements of this Concerto.

In some respects the most remarkable section of the work, the Finale, seemed yesterday something of a tour de force. Of the utmost rhythmic complexity, it taxed orchestra and conductor in rehearsal as few pieces have ever taxed them. And between amazement at what men and leader were accomplishing and apprehension over the ultimate outcome, it was difficult to hear the music purely as music. The outcome, let it immediately be recorded, was wholly successful and brought with it the feeling of relief that might accompany the achievement of some dangerous physical feat.

Sibelius' Second

Mr. Schmitt, who played his music competently if not exactly brilliantly, was received by the audience with due cordiality and with apparent appreciation of the value of his music and of the technical triumph of the performance. That there was not here the furore later engendered by the Finale of Sibelius' Symphony is no cause either for wonderment or for disparaging comparisons. To conclude and crown the Symphony, which is in certain ways his best, Sibelius has reared a climax that for cumulative intensity and final overwhelming power has few rivals in all music and Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday made the most of it.

The familiar and charming Lully-Mottl ballet suite began the concert and reminded us afresh that the father of French opera was as composer something more than an historical figure.

Schmitt Soloist in His New Work With Boston Symphony

Amer Nov 26

By MOSES SMITH

Florent Schmitt's new Symphonic Concertante for orchestra and piano receives its first performances at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky. It is preceded by a charming suite of Lully dances, delightfully played, and followed by a magnificent performance of the second Sibelius symphony.

The noted French composer is on hand to take honors for his Symphonie, which is dedicated to the Boston orchestra and its conductor. Schmitt, indeed, plays the piano part of the new work. (The piano can here scarcely be called a solo instrument in the conventional concerto manner.) Moreover, as played yesterday by the composer (who presumably knows how he wants his music performed) the music for the piano is rarely heard above the orchestral din.

For Schmitt does not shy at a full-sounding orchestra, as has been evident in other works of his previously heard here. But while in those the orchestral climaxes were usually sonorous and euphonious, in this latest score they are cacophonous. The Frenchman goes the modernists one better.

Written in three movements—two fast and one slow—the Symphonie employs a large modern orchestra, of which the percussion section is enormous and constantly assailing the ears. Technically the score is so involved that Mr. Koussevitzky is said to consider it one of the most difficult he has ever conducted. And so you would think, watching his left arm giving frantic cues to frightened musicians. But the work had been given extraordinary rehearsal, and the performance went very well so far as an outsider might judge.

But the music itself is another matter. It abounds in rhythmic complexities, rhythmic counterpoint; the time-meter changes frequently; the phrases are short and gasping. The climaxes are hurriedly built up, at first astonishing the listener and eventually dulling him. The hearer, in fact, vacillates between exasperation and amusement. This is scarcely great music. If it is, his previous scores are second-rate.

Amusements

Amusements

Symphony

From Lully By Schmitt To Sibelius

Symphony Concert in Which Guest-Composer Fared Not Too Well

Trans Nov. 26

THERE WAS a distinguished guest at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon—Monsieur Florent Schmitt of Alsace and Paris, playing the piano-part in his new "Symphonie Concertante," music, as it proved, of full texture and large dimension. For the third time in the fifty-two years of the Symphony Concerts, there was also room for Lully. This master of the music at the court of Louis XIV of France was born in Florence on Nov. 29, 1632. To mark the three hundredth anniversary, Dr. Koussevitzky revived the Suite of Ballet Airs arranged by the Bavarian conductor, Mottl, from Lully's pages. It had not been heard in Symphony Hall through ten years. Freshly and agreeably it sounded on most ears.

Yet before the end of the concert, the modern Schmitt and the ancient Lully were nearly effaced by the presence of the master-composer of these days, Sibelius. True, he was heard from a familiar piece, the Second Symphony, in D minor, these twenty-five years in the active repertory. But he now spoke out from a performance unsurpassed hereabouts within that quarter century. It held the listeners to the end of a long concert. It stirred them, after the close, to stamping and to shouts. It brought the first thorough-going excitement of the present season; whetted, as no other, anticipation of the repetition this evening. It may stand among the signal achievements of Dr. Koussevitzky's lengthening term. Piece for piece, to the glory of the composer as well as to their own, conductor and orchestra have seldom excelled it. Now that the projected cycle of Sibelius's symphonies is well begun, his looming shadow bids fair to encompass every concert of which one is part.

True enough, conductor and orchestra stimulated each other as men and leaders of men do when occasion heats mutual fires. That fortunate condition aside, the source and cause of such a performance are not far to seek. Along with a few tone-poems—"Saga," "Finlandia," "The Swan of Tuonela," for convenient instances—the First and the Second Symphony are Sibelius's repertory pieces, in America played early and often: from the outset hospitably received. Only when the conductor bids orchestra and audience to the third and the succeeding symphonies do the pangs of exploration begin.

Thus the two familiar symphonies are isolated from the unfamiliar five; while conductors about to play the one or the other tend to look backward rather than forward. They derive both from the "influences" under which Sibelius is presumed to write in these earlier days—of Chaikovsky, for example, of Grieg and other Northerners, of Finnish folk-life and Finnish landscape. They play them accordingly. Such handling may serve the First Symphony where these "influences" are unmistakable. But it does not suffice for the Second wherein Sibelius strikes out as plainly for himself. Matter and manner, this Second leads into the long ascending line that now ends with the Seventh. Like those other five, so far as content permits, the Second should be played.

Dr. Koussevitzky, and the orchestra with him, had the insight so to play it. They smoothed out no surfaces; subdued no accents; sentimentalized no melodies; broadened no tonal ascents; played no tricks with the time; twiddled with no details. They played the Symphony directly, starkly, severely. They agreed to the spareness of the Sibelian line, the shadows upon the Sibelian color, the isolation of the Sibelian instruments. They laid bare the asperities of the Sibelian harmonies; softened none of the Sibelian progressions; kept in high relief the individual usage of every symphonic means. They set out the germ-like motivs; shaped and propelled the melodies that coalesce from them, rise, contend, fall away; remount to new sonorities, or are still. They gained both the Sibelian contours and the Sibelian accents; achieved through them the Sibelian texture, motion, contrasts.

Most essential of all, they were playing this Second Symphony, not as a geographical or a nationalistic music, but as the expression of an individual spirit transcending environment. The outcome was revelation of the harsh Sibelian power, the austere Sibelian beauty, the somber Sibelian atmosphere, beyond any previous performance of this Second Symphony. No one thought twice of Finnish implications. The mind, the imagination, the solitude of a detached, self-contained composer prevailed. From Dr. Koussevitzky, directed insight and controlled release; from the orchestra, full-mettled and fine-tempered voices; for us of the audience deeper understanding and reciprocating emotion.

Nowadays, the music of Lully is the oldest that we usually hear at symphony concerts. He died while Bach and Handel, its reputed fathers—were in their cradles. Only an occasional Italian, also edited, may outstrip him in length of years. One of the opera-ballets from which Mottl drew yesterday's numbers dates from 1674; another from 1685; all four were primarily addressed to Louis XIV and his court. The convenient adjective for such music is "quaint" or "archaic"; but "quaint" implies something pretty and peculiar; while to be "archaic" is to be dry and withered. Lully's ballet-airs, as Mottl adapts them, suggest no such qualities. Here goes music clear as the day, when there was no luxuriant dress to cloak it; sometimes admirably terse, as in the little March from "Theseus"; again expanding, as in the ballet-airs from "The Temple of Peace," into smooth-surfaced, finely molded, artfully proportioned melody. It is a courtly music. Therefore the rhythms are measured and the movement stately; but from neither has life withered away. Lully plies a cunning hand with his little orchestra; joins, contrasts, isolates his slender choirs; at every turn makes the most of them.

It is custom to say when we hear the ballet-airs of Gluck, written a century later, that wistful melancholy haunts them. Through Lully's Minuet and other dances from "The Temple of Peace," it may be traced in germ. Ceremonious as the music is, stage-sense runs in it, to be the ear-mark of French opera through a century to come. Turn them whatever way the listener may, these ballet-airs are fascinating primitives. Yet the polish of a mannered society is already upon them. The curious may turn to other pages where the humor, the bravado, the excess, of this Italian become courtier, pushes through the Versailles veneer.

Between Lully and Sibelius, the immense "machine" of Monsieur Schmitt. For it reminded one and another hearer of nothing so much as the huge frescoes at the Salon. This "Symphonie Concertante" is written for full modern orchestra—woodwinds in threes, sufficient brass, a crowded percussion corner. It fills pages thick with notes. It requires a half hour and more for performance. Especially in the last movement, it taxes conductor and orchestra as not even Stravinsky, on pages of "Le Sacre" and the Violin-Concerto, taxed them. To the working ear, trying to follow this finale in the quick sensations of performance, the rhythms, over long stretches, seemed to change with every measure. Almost before the players could sound one, another thrust it out. Endless also were the details of color to be set in instantly, intricately. The players made a good fist of it. The conductor toiled with the valiance of professional duty and personal friendship. No orchestra will ever toss off Monsieur Schmitt's "Symphonie Concertante." Exceeding few—there is sound reason to believe—will ever "grow into it." Enough that the Boston Orchestra—and its conductor—saw their duty and did it. Even Monsieur Schmitt, masterful pianist that he is, did not often make the piano sound through the thick integument around.

There, in the casual commerce of a single hearing, the error and the fault seemed to lie. Monsieur Schmitt has invented discoverable themes out of which he expands and upbuilds his three divisions. But before ear and mind may assimilate and judge them, they are crowded out by a swarm of subsidiary motivs; lost in a wealth of detail; immersed in harmonic and instrumental color; silenced under sonorous or explosive clangors; well-nigh buried under the thickness of the tonal texture. Monsieur Schmitt, we are told, craves spaciousness, but why fill every space to the brim? Monsieur Schmitt courts complexity; but why multiply it until all but the most expert and prepared listeners lose their way in the labyrinth?

As a buffeted ship to the eye through nearly impenetrable sea-mists, so the first movement tossed and lurched upon the beclouded ear. Then for a while the slow movement brought relief and illumination. The ear heard clearly; the mind reacted to the musical thought and progress; in shimmering surfaces and remote, thinned sonorities, the imagination descried a veritable poetry of tones. A "great crescendo" and the music is thick-textured and impenetrable again. Once it reopens upon the earlier vista of poetized sound, ony to return to the murk of complexities. . . . A finale at a driving pace and in ceaseless rhythmic change, stayed here and there by broader, clearer measures. In the first movement, the "Symphonie Concertante" had tossed about cloudily; in this third it would leap and run and cry aloud. But the impression remained of a music over-thick, over-complex, over-driven.

Monsieur Schmitt keeps pace with the musical times. Through the "Symphonie Concertante" there are modernities of rhythm, color, modulation, transition, that the youngest innovator might envy him. But he has waved away the first precept of modernism, which is clarity to ear and mind. Honegger, writing for the jubilee of the orchestra a kindred symphony, has pointed the way to lucidity—and force. . . . There was warm applause for Monsieur Schmitt when he came to the stage with Dr. Koussevitzky. There were only scattering and labored plaudits when, somewhat unexpectedly, he vanished from it. Between, his vast "machine" had ground out only "paper-music."

H. T. P.

Nov Boston Symphony 26

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Symphonies Concertantes for orchestra and piano are becoming regular fare for Boston Symphony patrons. On the fifth program we had had that of Mr. Arnold Bax. On the sixth (Nov. 25-6) that of M. Florent Schmitt occupied the place of honor. M. Schmitt's new work, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra, had its first performance on this occasion. The composer, who was the pianist, was making, we believe, his first appearance in America.

Previous hearings of Mr. Schmitt's works had left us with the impression that he was the most German of French composers. This new score compels a modification of that opinion. There is still the German influence, but the Symphonie Concertante is perhaps best described as cosmopolitan, or international. It reveals fellowship not only with Wagner and Debussy, but with Ravel, with Honegger, with Stravinsky — and with Mossolov. This is not to say that the score is imitative; it is too cerebral for that. It employs for the composer's purposes the speech that these artists have made common property.

The work was rather coolly received by the Friday afternoon subscribers, but M. Schmitt need not feel too badly over that. A work so strictly intellectual and so free from any ingratiating element does not easily appeal to an audience on first hearing. There is a lyric element in the slow movement, together with some of the enchanting atmosphere which we have come to consider distinctly French; but the first and the last movements are uncompromising in their dissonance and their violence. The last movement in particular contains rhythms which seem more complicated than Stravinsky's own. The erudite workmanship is easily discernible, but the piece is not likely to become popular. This difficult score was played with the greatest virtuosity by the orchestra, which was justly called upon by the conductor to share the applause which an enthusiastic minority persisted in at the close.

The concert opened with the simple charms of the Lully-Mottl Ballet Suite, and closed with a performance of Sibelius's transitional Second Symphony so dazzling that the listeners lingered for an ovation that actually included cheers.

L. A. S.

Nov 26

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATU

MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. Florent Schmitt, composer and pianist, making his first visit to the United States, was the guest. The program was as follows: Lully, ballet suite; Schmitt, Symphonie concertante for orchestra and piano (first performance); Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D major. The whole set of Mottl's arrangement of Lully's dances was not performed. The nocturne was dropped; one of the two minuets was not played; a gavotte edited by Theodore de Lajarte was substituted. Lajarte, who wrote "The Musical Library of the Paris Opera" and other books about music, composed operas, operettas, marches, dances, choruses, edited "Dance Airs from Lully to Mehul," also "Masterpieces of the French Opera."

The dance airs and march music by Lully played yesterday are delightful in their simplicity and grace. Mottl was too fine a musician to spoil them by "modernizing" them to show what he could do. Lajarte was equally sensible, also sensitive to the beauty of old-time music when Louis XIV liked to hear it and praised the Italian scapegrace; when princesses and duchesses and other noble dames stepped and glided their prettiest in the presence of the sun-king.

Mr. Schmitt holds a high position in the esteem of French musicians and writers about music. (There is a distinction to be made between them.) Boston has heard several of his most important works at the Symphony concerts. Chief among the works thus heard are: "Tragedy of Salome," and his "47th Psalm," a most impressive work. The fine piano quintet has been performed here. (It will soon be played again in a quasi-private musical club with Mr. Schmitt the pianist.)

There is no denying the excellent musicianship of the visitor; his thorough mastery of all harmonic and orchestral resources. He has been described as robust, one might even say violent at times, if not generally. He belongs to no school, his fervent admirers boast; he worships in no chapel, does not even cross the threshold or look in the windows. Yet he won the chief prize and the lesser prizes at the Paris Conservatory.

Judging from the compositions that have been heard here he delights in problems of technic. Take this latest work, it is interesting not only because it is the most difficult music the orchestra has ever undertaken, so the players say; the most difficult to conduct, so Dr. Koussevitzky is reported to have said; furthermore it has no literary, pictorial, historical association. The music is without sensuousness. He has his own definition of beauty. One would say his pleasure lies in strange, complex rhythms, yet as a pianist rhythm is by no means his strong point, and in a series of orchestral explosions, expected, and not expected, but just to keep his hand in. Now in the first and second movements there is occasional relief, comparative quiet. He apparently does not wish to maintain this mood, it irks him. Does he fear to be sentimental, to sacrifice to the graces? Must he always ride in the whirlwind but without always directing the storm? Or perhaps he loathes impressionism, or fears to be too pretty for anything. A strange, muscular apparition among his fellow musicians. Some have been almost as noisy, but not with his display of brains. One can admire his proficiency of technic as shown in his works as one might wish that it were not always so appallingly in evidence. A thunder storm is a sublime spectacle but one does not wish it to rage all night. Occasional mutterings as the storm passes give consolation.

It was to be expected that "hurrah-boys" and setting off bombs, roman candles and rockets in the finale of Sibelius's second symphony would excite the audience to uproarious applause. Cecil Gray valiantly defends this finale; finds we should all like "happy endings"; that it is difficult for us in these days to be triumphant; that Sibelius in this finale reaches a state of "spiritual serenity." But why does Sibelius make this mighty pother about it? To some of us this finale is an ineffectual striving after grandeur—falling to the commonplace, if not music tainted with vulgarity. Although in this symphony Sibelius had not wholly got away from Tchaikovsky, there is better Tchaikovsky in the first symphony of the series than in the second.

The orchestral performance of Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante was a triumph over amazing, staggering difficulties. Now that it is all over, one remembers gratefully the music of Lully and the delicately sympathetic treatment of the dance airs.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will comprise Mozart's Serenade in B flat for doubled wind instruments (first time at these concerts); Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Tallis for string orchestra; Schubert's Symphony, C major, No. 7.

Trans

, NOVEMBER 26, 1932

Johnson's L

Side-Glances At The Guest Of The Hour

Traits of Florent Schmitt, From His Prix de Rome To This Boston Day

FLORENT SCHMITT belongs to the golden age of French music, which culminated in the first performance of Debussy's "Pelléas." It was Aldous Huxley who, in one of his "brief candles," set down this date as marking the maturity of a generation. Within a brief two years the première of Florent Schmitt's Forty-Seventh Psalm took place in Paris and marked another date—the advent of studied barbarity. The composer was a recipient of a Prix de Rome, which should have been a sufficient guarantee for good behavior. To think that this reward should go to encourage polytonal hymnology. "Is it for this sort of thing that the Prix de Rome is established?" apostrophized a dismayed Academician on the critical pages of a musical weekly a quarter of a century ago.

True, the text of the Psalm called for exuberance; but had not Saint-Saëns done this sort of thing without offence to harmony? Could not the clapping of the hands of the Psalmist be done more harmoniously? Schmitt offended the public more than Stravinsky did seven years afterward; for Stravinsky was a Russian, a Scythian, a Sarmatian, and anything could be expected of a nomad like him. But Schmitt was a Frenchman of Meurthe-et-Moselle, born during the Franco-Prussian war, native of a border State saved for France after the débacle. He was brought up in the pure Latin tradition, cultivating grace and measure, not vehemence and abandon.

Upon examination of the score of the Psalm, one must admit, even in 1932, that the objectors had sufficient cause. There is obvious polytonality at the very outset: C major defiantly projected against the pedal of F-sharp. There are parallel progressions of alternating major and minor triads with and without the benefit of an organ point. There are cymbals ("beaucoup de cymbales!" exclaims the critic in righteous terror); there are bars in five-four time. Yet there are points in the composer's favor—from the academic point of view. Florent Schmitt studiously avoids superfluous harshness of harmony (as when he takes the fifth out of an E-major chord to avoid friction with the C of the forthcoming C major). The flow and ebb of tonal power are strictly proportioned. The choral writing is eminently vocal. There is a sense of repose when, as Emile Vuillermoz beautifully describes it, the sharps are extinguished, and five flats gently illumine the staff. Florent Schmitt has not betrayed the Latin Muse, and there is nothing in his Psalm that suggests the gigantic smears of tone-color that submerge the notes and tonalities on Stravinsky's pages.

In the orrery of the heavens at the turn of the century, Florent Schmitt's star stands somewhat apart from the constellation of Debussy and Ravel. Such harmonic devices as parallel six-four chords, occasionally strengthened by a discordant tone, an augmented fourth below the base; major seconds treated as independent unresolvable units; orchestration now ethereal, with harps and celestas for foil, then barbaric, with trumpets and drums in dots and dashes—these features are common to the entire pleiad of that epoch. But the vital tissue—the horizonttal warp—is Schmitt's own. He has a keen sentiment for modality, and, in studying his writing, one cannot get away from the thought that he thinks in hexacords rather than in full-octave scales. He seems to abhor the inexorable landings at standardized tonics, preferring to build in free alternations of tones and semitones akin to Greek and ecclesiastical modes.

Thus, in a long descending line in "Salome's Dance," from violins to basses, he uses six-note units with a fresh tonic in each subsequent link. These six tones, in different guises in different works, are sometimes divided in two symmetric parts; sometimes, by cleaving the mediant in two, a seventh note is introduced; or else the scheme is extended to the full octave modally regarded. At times, this horizontal design includes skips of a third, thus giving the impression of a broken chord, that may subsequently be assembled into a vertical column by the process of simple integration. In this treatment of scales modes and chords lies the secret of Schmitt's intempestive rejection of the whole-tone scale which was the scale of all modernists of 1900. "This scale offers no variety; its harmonic integral, the augmented triad, is ambiguous in its universal applicability. Such soft-fibred meat was not for Schmitt's masculine temper.

"The Tragedy of Salome" was composed between 1907 and 1910 and dedicated to Igor Stravinsky. If the dedication was not an afterthought, then Schmitt must have dedicated it to the Stravinsky who was neither revolutionary nor barbaric, the Stravinsky before "Petrushka" and "Le Sacre." Yet this dedication seems hardly fortuitous; for the score bears a premonition of the power that Stravinsky was to loosen on the world several years later. The score also contains some wild time-signatures, such as three-and-a-half quarters, which looks startling to some even now, although it is easy to see, with the aid of first-grade arithmetic, that this measure equals seven eights—no insurmountably difficult unit.

The popular impression concerning

Continued on Following Page

LOWELL INSTITUTE
FREE PUBLIC LECTURES
In Huntington Hall, 491 Boylston St., Boston
THE ECONOMIC PROBLEMS OF SOCIALISM AND OF A PLANNED ECONOMY
Edward S. Mason, B.Litt., Ph.D.
Associate Professor of Economics in Harvard University

1—Marxian Socialism as Tactics and as Program. 2—Freedom and Authority in the Marxian State. 3—The Counting of Costs in a Socialist Society. 4—The Nature and Meaning of Costs in a Socialist Society. 5—Can a Socialist Society Utilize Its Resources Rationally? 6—Socialism and Economic Planning. 7—The Russian Experience. 8—Is Planning Compatible with Free Enterprise?

Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays at 5 P. M., Beginning Monday, December 5
A. LAWRENCE LOWELL, Trustee

ADMISSION TICKETS to the FIRST lecture, exchangeable at the Door for COURSE TICKETS WITH RESERVED SEATS, may be obtained FREE by sending to the Curator of the Lowell Institute, 491 Boylston Street, Boston, stamped, addressed envelope FOR EACH TICKET DESIRED.
W. H. LAWRENCE, Curator.
SWS(A) n 26

Symphony Tickets

Symphony Tickets—Saturday Nights
Beginning Dec. 3, two seats, floor, row DD, $30 each. Address H.P.M., Transcript, Boston.
WS(A) (4558L) n 23

Plays and

Report From Concerts at The Week-End

Better Hearing for Schmitt, English Singers in New Range and Quality

Trans Nov 27

THE second performance of Monsieur Schmitt's "Symphonie Concertante," at the Symphony Concert on Saturday, profited all concerned. The audience was more sympathetic and applausive than that of Friday. Conductor and orchestra set forth a taxing music in freer voice and firmer handling. The music itself gained by further acquaintance. Not that second hearing lessened the impression of too abundant an invention and, consequently, too thick a tonal texture. Seemingly, Monsieur Schmitt's composing mind teems with detail. Seemingly his composing imagination impels him to recurring elaboration. Often, indeed, it is as though a large ardor of creation had stifled for the while his selective faculty. He sets out a musical idea of weight and significance; into another infuses poetic suggestion. Then the passion for decoration possesses him. Soon the listener loses the course of the idea in the lavish amplifications and embroideries enwrapping it. Monsieur Schmitt must write spaciously or perish. He prefers in his larger works to be monumental. Hence the length, breadth and thickness of the "Symphonie Concertante"; the full orchestra seldom stilled: the insistence, through forty minutes, of the whole. By sheer impact except through a few pages in the slow movement, Monsieur Schmitt would conquer hearers.

In a sense he does conquer them. However confused along the course, many a hearer received from the first and the last movements of the "Symphonie Concertante" an impression of power. The thought, tortuous though it was, ran full; the projection struck home; the very richness of the ornament implied an imagination and a workmanship still fertile. Monsieur Schmitt may or may not have been profound; there is no telling after only two hearings; but certainly he writes on a scale and with an abundance that distinguish him in these days of small things and pinched exercise in the new art of music-making. In the slow movement, moreover, he poetizes at beginning and end in his own fashion, though, perhaps, with a hint or two from that Debussy whose influence he seldom quite escapes.

In fact, the whole "Symphonie Concertante" is admirable example of that grafting of new thought, mood, means and procedure upon old substance and old form which is said to be the true progress of music. Monsieur Schmitt may suffer from excesses of creative ardor; but in mind, imagination and workmanship he has never stagnated. In his sixty-third year he is writing for the new generation rather than the old. Inquiry among his youthful hearers on Saturday brought varying answer. One was rather overwhelmed by the unrelaxing impact of the music. Another was genuinely stirred, once "he had got the hang of it." A third cared not at all for the whole piece. "Too fierce," he said with a rueful shake of the head. So it went. At the least, Monsieur Schmitt set more than one of us to thinking.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 27 1932

The Kaleidoscope

Becoming statistical about the Tuesday matinees of the Boston Symphony last week, the management points out that there are more than 40 subscribers from this city, a truly excellent showing of music lovers who go down in the season for this now traditional set of Tuesday afternoon concerts, in Symphony hall.

I'd like to be a little mouse in the corner at the [illegible] Museum school on Decem[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 27 1932

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston this week will include Mozart's Serenade for Wind Instruments in B flat (K. 361), Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for string orchestra and Schubert's symphony in C major, No. 7.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 27 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky comes to Providence for its first concert in the Albee Theatre a week from next Tuesday night. The program lists Franck's Symphony in D-minor, Weber's "Oberon" overture, "Tapiola," a tone poem by Sibelius, and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The succeeding concerts will take place on Jan. 17, Feb. 21 and April 11, and it is said that virtually all of the Providence subscribers of last year have renewed their subscriptions. Those seats remaining will be placed on public sale this week.

The Bostonians are now in their 52nd season and the ninth under Dr. Koussevitzky, the longest continuous term of one conductor in the orchestra's history. The present season has had many outstanding successes including the concerts in Boston, on the tour of the Middle West a month ago, and at the New York opening on Nov. 17.

Providence is one of 122 cities and towns from which the audience is composed for the Tuesday afternoon series of the orchestra's concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, and "Believe it or not," says this department's symphony informant, that audience travels an aggregate of 60,000 miles to hear that one concert. Adamsville and Woonsocket are named as other Rhode Island communities containing subscribers to the series. All the New England States are represented, the actual Boston subscriptions numbering only one-fourth of the total audience.

The Tuesday concerts begin at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The remaining programs of the series are scheduled for Jan. 3, Feb. 7, March 7, March 28 and April 18. Arranged more or less in historical sequence they include representative masterpieces by all the great composers from the 18th century Bach to the 20th century Stravinsky.

The unusually large out-of-Boston patronage to these concerts is explained by the former visits of the Boston Symphony to various New England communities, an itinerary that has had to be curtailed for several seasons by the pressure of other engagements. But the Symphony has not lost. Like Mahomet, as long as the mountain couldn't come to the subscribers, they have continued going to the mountain.

◇ ◇ ◇

Harold Bauer is giving a piano concert

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS

1

NOV 28 1932

Pierre Key's Music Article

New York, Nov. 28.

The Boston Symphony

WITH the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Philadelphia orchestras both off to a marvelous season start, everyone was ready and waiting for the opening 1932-33 concerts by the Boston Symphony, with the immaculate and diplomatic Serge Koussevitzky wielding the conductor's stick. Few newcomer conductors here had less to offer as a beginning in this country, and few have gone on to greater popularity. Which shows what can be done by work, helped by the favor of the mighty.

The marvelous tone of the Boston band was again a dominant element in the opening program—which gave us a liberal dose of Sibelius, almost too much. The vigorous first symphony and the tone poem "Tapiola" were played with plenty of color; enough to make one realize what a superb orchestra this one is.

At the second program the Brahms second symphony was featured. Here is a work with which Mr. Koussevitzky has gained much familiarity since he first read it for us. It goes very well these days for all that the classic compositions can scarcely be termed this leader's forte.

* * *

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

A Noted Guest To Boston and To Cambridge

ToHarvard and SymphonyHall Comes Vaughan Williams, The Composer

Trans.

TOMORROW evening, Ralph Vaughan Williams, the eminent English composer, will be the guest of the Division of Music at Harvard University. On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he will be the guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Symphony Hall. At Cambridge, in Paine Hall at 8.15, he will lecture informally about modern English composers. In Boston he will listen to performances of his Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for String Orchestra. (Tallis was an Elizabethan composer. Mr. Williams's piece was first heard at the Symphony Concerts in 1922). In Cambridge his lecture will be open to the public after eight o'clock. In Boston, his audience will be the audience of the Symphony Concerts. Early in autumn an invitation from Bryn Mawr College to deliver a course of lectures on English folk-music brought Mr. Williams to Philadelphia. He is now journeying to other Eastern cities. To hail the coming of the distinguished visitor, here follows an article about him written by Basil Maine, the English reviewer and essayist, now reprinted from the London Morning Post.

The essential humble-mindedness of Ralph Vaughan Williams (Mr. Maine begins) is reflected at every point in his career. His artistic life has been a kind of pilgrimage. At first he was found at an English shrine (Parry, Stanford and Charles Wood); then at a German shrine (Max Bruch); and then at a French shrine (Ravel). Yet in spite of this long and devious journey, he ultimately fell back upon the earlier schools of English music and English folk-music for his inspirations.

All these influences have left their mark upon his work. That of Ravel was important in that it resulted in a more pointed and flexible style. But the greatest of all influences in Vaughan Williams's creative life has been the folk-song element. His has never been a merely antiquarian interest. He has never been tempted as some have been—to play at charades with these old tunes. His way, and no better example can be cited than the "Pastoral Symphony," is to live on intimate terms with folk-music and, haply, to catch its overtones from time to time, and use them for the weaving of a texture of sound to recall those remote days and bring them nearer to the veil.

Ralph Vaughan Williams

(Lambert—Bath)

No man less humble-minded than Vaughan Williams could have brought about his peculiar achievement. It is significant that even now, when his eminent position as an English composer has been determined and acknowledged (if the Philharmonic Society's gold medal can be taken as a sign), he is as enthusiastic in the part of teacher as in that of composer. I have heard him speak of a pupil's compositions with intense conviction as to their merits and promise, but have never heard him discussing his own music. He regards himself, I believe, as a curator rather than a pioneer, as a link in the chain of English traditions.

Looking at his work as a whole, it seems that he has been more intent upon strengthening the link than upon lengthening the chain. The "Norfolk Rhapsodies," the "Tallis Fantasia," the "Pastoral Symphony," "Hugh the Drover," the "Concerto Accademico"—these and many other works lend support to this view. And yet there will be many a critic who will wish to speak up for this self-effacing composer and declare that his music has clarified the English tradition; has given it fresh impetus and clear direction. They will be right, but they must be careful not to give their opinion in the composer's hearing, or they will be flatly and brusquely contradicted.

This humble-mindedness in Vaughan Williams does not always appear as such when one meets him. As likely as not, it takes on some other form and leads to a misunderstanding of the man. To some he may appear curt; to others gruff; to others clumsy, and to others an angry man.

I well remember him at one of the Leith Hill Festivals. He was taking the chorus through a final rehearsal of Bach's "St. Matthew's Passion." In shirt-sleeves, he applied himself with immense vigor to the business in hand. At intervals he barked out remarks which were never complimentary and often devastating. His wrath increased with every bar until at length he shut his score with a bang, and, wiping his brow, shouted, "You will never be able to sing Bach! Never!"

A chorus of strangers, perhaps, would have resented this sharp criticism and refused to continue the rehearsal. They would have been justified in believing that this was a crisis. But these singers knew their Vaughan Williams; knew his passionate enthusiasm for the music of Bach, and knew how deeply devoted he was to the Leith Hill Festival. They understood his anger and respected him for it.

There was a chilling silence. Then Vaughan Williams opened his score again, barked out "Bar forty-two!" and continued the rehearsal. There were no interruptions now. The chorus sang with a new voice. At the end Vaughan Williams said quietly, "Why couldn't you sing like that at first?"

Whenever he makes public appearance there is always the danger that he will be misunderstood. If he has been called to acknowledge the successful performance of one of his works—say, at a Promenade Concert—you would never guess for his flurried entry, awkward bow, and anxious retreat that he is grateful. If you are watching him conduct Bach's Mass in B minor, you will not perhaps believe that he is an extremely sensitive man, one whose conceptions are the result of the mingling of great strength and beautiful imagination. If you saw him receive the Royal Philharmonic Society's gold medal, may be you failed to deduce from his too obvious embarrassment the full significance of that event.

The truth is that Vaughan Williams is essentially a man of solitude. Whenever he has been called upon to be a public servant in the cause of music, he has succeded, only too well, in veiling his characteristics. This is true of his work as conductor of the London Bach Choir; of the rehearsing of his own works at the provincial festivals; of his public speaking and (as I believe) of his ventures into the field of opera.

It is less true of his work as professor of composition at the Royal College of Music and of his direction of the music of the English Folk-Dance Society; for in each of these connections his duties are only semi-public, and there is, therefore, a greater opportunity for him to reveal the essential qualities of his personality. Moreover, it can safely be assumed that English folk-song and the careful tending of English talent for composition are the causes nearest his heart. His belief in the arrival of an English composer as great as Byrd or Purcell is strong, and it is his chief concern to prepare the way for his coming.

It is in the solitary places that Vaughan Williams is most himself. Is he therefore unknowable? Yes, unknowable to all save musicians in tune with his musical manner of thinking. Even these sometimes complain that the manner too frequently admits mannerism; and sometimes they admit that there are mysteries which cannot be explained merely by roughness of technique but only by some imaginative quality which must be accounted unique. There are such episodes in "Flos Campi," in "Sancta Civitas" and in the beautiful slow movement of the "Concerto Accademico," episodes which tell us that the man behind this music—his sensitiveness, his depth, his aloofness, his unworldliness, his rugged strength of imagination—cannot be completely understood unless we accept the music itself as medium.

Concert-Chronicle

Monsieur Schmitt Again Nov. 29 '3

FROM a valued correspondent and occasional contributor to this department comes the following note for which it gladly makes room: "For once I feel that I must dissent from you, candidly, as to Schmitt's latest opus. If there was 'paper music' in it, it must have remained on paper, for what was audible proved most stimulating to me. In fact, I felt that the work was most extraordinary, combining as it does the modernisms of the year 1900,—all these altered ninth chords, suspended fifths, ethereal yearnings nowhither,—with elemental outbursts of power quite independent in their origin from all great and small Stravinskys of our time. What captivated me in this score was the courageous display of rhythms, quite workable and derived naturally from the melodic phrases, in fact being functions of these melodic phrases. This is an achievement.

"Perhaps you are right when you say that clarity, such as is preached by the adherents to the Gebrauchsmusik school, was to be desired; but is there more clarity, as far as tonal ingredients are concerned, in such works as Stravinsky's 'Sacre,' Prokofiev's 'Sept, ils sont Sept,' or even Strauss' 'Alpine Symphony?' For a long time I cherished the idea of having experiments made as to how much of the music played actually reaches the listeners' ears. I would have several experts, possessing the sense of absolute pitch and excellent knowledge of the score, seated in various parts of the hall at performances of complicated scores such as those I have mentioned,—or of such high-tension music as Edgar Varèse scientifically and methodically elaborates. I would intentionally omit several secondary parts in the performance or introduce an extra scale in the low register of the flute, or even a slide on the trombone in the orchestral tutti.

"Then I would question the experts separately as to what was missing in the score, what intentionally wrong notes were played, what instruments were deliberately omitted, or, more generally, what was clear and what was not clear. There is not a doubt in my mind that the answers would disclose discrepancies more startling than those recorded in the various descriptions by English college students as to the manner in which Julius Cæsar was assassinated at a performance of Shakspeare's play. . . .

[Continued on col. 3]

[Continued from col 1, below]

"Speaking of 'paper-music,' my eye is constantly offended every time I find, in venerable scores, such instances of licence as the grating of the violoncellos against the double-basses through a very suspicious looking series of ascending scales in Mendelssohn's 'Fingal-Cave' Overture. I am deeply aggrieved when I observe the manner in which Rimsky-Korsakov treats the figurations in the wood-wind, doubling suspensions and graces with the principal notes. I am disturbed every time that, in Chaikovsky's symphonies the violins interpolate a rest in a continuous musical phrase, only because they cannot play below G. I always want them to unscrew their G-string peg and at least feign the missing tone.

[Concluded on col 2, below]

"So when I hear repertory pieces with my visual memories of their illogical scoring, my ears become uncomfortably cognizant of the tonal blur, and I [illegible] myself to modernistic scores for balance and logic. But perhaps, romantic music, by definition, should not be altogether clear. If such is the case, then Florent Schmitt achieved a perfect synthesis in writing a score which is poetically opaque and modernistically delineative. . . . Dixi et animam levavi!"

En Route to Boston

Later in the season Mr. Prokofiev will again be guest at the Symphony Concerts to play the piano-part in his Fifth Concerto, in G major. It was heard for the first time, with Furtwängler conducting and the composer as pianist, at a recent Philharmonic Concert in Berlin. In praise of it Mr. Herbert Peyser writes to the New York Times: "The work which consists of five comparatively short movements, is, in my opinion, one of the very best things Mr. Prokofiev has given us—bright, witty music, written with exceptional sureness and virtuosity of touch, which achieves unfailingly all it sets out to do, and strikes sparks of cold fire in the process.

"The themes of the concerto are pert and saucy. Brittle waltz and march rhythms dominate the first three movements. The fourth—a larghetto series of variations—sounds a rather deeper note. The finale is a madcap 'vivo.' Prokofiev has attained a remarkably happy balance between orchestra and piano, and never have his own pianistic gifts shone clearer than in his scintillant performance of the solo part."

Incidents and Prospects

While Bostonians were listening last Friday and Saturday to a hodge-podge Suite of Lully's ballet music, to mark the three hundredth anniversary of his birth, the Opéra in Paris was resurrecting a whole ballet, "The Triumph of Love," set on the stage in stylized fashion.

56

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

Prov Journal Dec 4

Boston Symphony to Base First Providence Program on Works of Established Popularity.—"Tapiola" by Sibellius, New to This City

BY DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its series of concerts in the Albee Theatre in a program numbering some of the finest orchestral works known to the world of music.

With the exception of Sibelius' tone poem, "Tapiola," "which is new, all of these compositions are great favorites. Concertgoers will recall Von Weber's Overture to "Oberon" as an old friend. Caesar Franck's only symphony has enjoyed an enormous popularity which captious critics cannot shatter, and the overture to "Die Meistersinger" is immortal.

The Overture to "Oberon" begins with the famous notes for French Horn, a do re mi short phrase which gives the first horn player his opportunity. Much can be made of this announcement of three notes. Embouchure, breath capacity and control and artistry all enter into its production. This horn call, suggestive of fairies, sylvan glades and other poetic fascinations, is immediately answered by adoring strings. This is followed by a chuckling dialogue between strings and woodwinds, the strings serious and the woods gay, followed by a suggestion of elfin trumpets. This introduction of some 20 measures is most melodious and suggestive. It ends with a smashing chord and a pause of astonishment which is followed by a furious bacchanalian violin figure which is brilliantly punctuated by emphatic strings and tympani.

This is "worked out" in a most melodious manner until the horn again enters and is followed by a slow chord formation which leads to a songful figure by the clarinet, which is immediately repeated by the first violins. This figure is immediately answered by a counter subject which acts as the musical material for the remainder of the overture. As an inset into this graceful music one finds a somewhat matter of fact episode of strings reinforced by woodwind which receives masterly contrapuntal treatment. In a way this episode corresponds with the superb "Largo" in Von Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." If there ever was orchestra music of life, light and fairyland this is such. It was composed in 1826 and is still increasing in popularity and interest. Von Weber of a century ago still lives in this inimitable overture. In the minds of many it surpasses Mendelssohn's conception of the fairy world of Oberon, Titania, Puck and Ariel.

◆ ◆ ◆

In his only symphony for orchestra Caesar Franck shows enormous gifts in melodic and harmonic invention and in his rich exposition of brass and woodwind he has startled the musical world of today as none, save perhaps Tschaikowski, has done. His mind was revealed in the abundance of his genius in this great work as in no other of his enterprises. Chorales, quintets, quartets and oratorios all show greatness but in none of his works is there the evenness and variety of originality as in this symphony in D-minor.

Dr. Koussevitszky is very fond of this symphony. Under his guidance it is set forth with colorful contrasts and richness of melodic suavity such as we have heard from no other conductor. To the gifts of the batonist one must add the perfection of woodwind, strings and brass of this orchestra that cannot be surpassed anywhere. As the symphony proceeds these appear in their proper places, solidity of harmony augmented by the woodwind choir in the first movement, massive harp and songful cor Anglais with delicately weaving strings in the "Allegretto," and sounding brasses in the truly grand finale. This work sets forth exquisite melodies, most graceful contrapuntal configurations, and tonal modulations which can scarcely be found in any other work in the literature of music. No program accompanies this symphony.

The "Allegretto" begins with a dignified and somewhat solemn subject which is in reality a harp solo accompanied by plucked strings which impart a distinct pungent tang to the effect. This theme, slightly varied, is taken up by the English horn in one of the most impressive of all utterances for that reed instrument of soulful quality. This is one of the distinctive passages which has helped to make this symphony famous. This theme returns throughout the movement and recurs in the finale. Sometimes it is as a solo voice, again over contrapuntal undulations and occasionally set forth firmly and vigorously. It is a beautiful musical thought, a gem of rare beauty. The last movement is in less measured terms. In it the brass choir is often heard in full cry in varied glowing harmonies and richly embroidered modulations. Themes from earlier parts of the work are recognized as they re-enter and the symphony closes leaving striking memories of vivid colors, tremendous contrasts and unusual tonal beauties.

◆ ◆ ◆

"Tapiola" is new to us. It was composed for the Symphony Society of New York and played by it for the first time Dec. 26, 1926. Why it has taken so long to arrive here is not yet revealed. It is written to suggest a wild forest where dwelt the forest God and his wood nymphs. This subject certainly suggests all sorts of poetic possibilities. Today is one for the larger appreciation of Sibelius, who is being given unstinted praise from every quarter. Dr. Koussevitzsky is the leader of this worthy popularity and at his hands this significant tone poem is certain to receive most arsitic treatment.

◆ ◆ ◆

Within a very few years Gabriel Pierne, one of the ablest conductors and musicians of our day, said in substance: "Were one to select the single composition which contains the fullest musical merit, the most complete and perfect "short piece," choice must fall upon the overture to "Die Meistersinger."

Mature thought and many hearings have made this opinion secure in the minds of most people. For lucidity and grace of thematic material, for contrapuntal elaboration and for marvellous orchestral craftsmanship, we know of no single piece which can compare with it. Endless repetition enhances rather than diminishes its wonders. The overture alone would have made Richard Wagner's everlasting reputation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 29 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Open Season Soon

On Tuesday evening, December 6, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season with a concert in the Albee theatre at 8:15. Remaining concerts will be given on January 17, February 21 and April 11.

The Boston Symphony season now well under way is the 52nd of the great orchestra and the ninth under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Great audiences and many brillant performances characterize the present season at the concerts so far given in Boston, western cities which were visited about a month ago, and more recently New York.

Renewals of their seats by virtually all of the Providence subscribers of last year assures a full audience for each of the series in the Albee theatre. A few seats at all prices are to be had, however, and these will be placed on sale Monday morning at Steinert's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 30 1932

Agide Jacchia, 57, Boston Musical Director, Dies

SIENNA, Italy, Nov. 29 (AP).—Agide Jacchia, 57, director of the Boston Conservatory of Music, died at a hospital here today.

AGIDE JACCHIA.

Last night Mascagni, the composer, visited him and they talked a long while about musical matters. His wife and daughter were with him when he died

Funeral services will be held tomorrow. After cremation, the ashes will be sent to Milan, where he lived during the Summer. He came here a week ago.

Agide Jacchia was born at Lugo, Italy, Jan. 5, 1875, and graduated from the Rossini Conservatory, at Pesaro, Italy, in 1898 with diplomas in composition and conducting. He also studied under Mascagni.

From 1907 until 1909 he toured this country and Central America with the Milano Opera Company and from 1910 to 1914 was the musical director of the Century Opera Company.

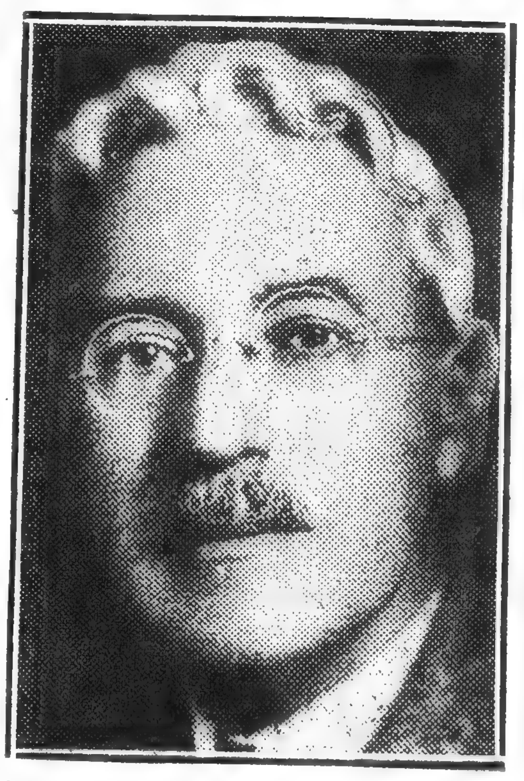
Jacchia became more generally known when he was engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra management to conduct the "Pop" concerts. He held this post from 1917 to 1926, when he resigned, giving as his reason the reduction of the number of persons in the orchestra.

Since 1920 he was director of the Boston Conservatory of Music He composed many cantatas and other arrangements of music and also had a reputation as a song writer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 29 1932

Dr. W. L. Chapman



He will Give a Series of Free Lectures On the Programs of the Concerts to Be Given By the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Lectures Will Be Given in the Boys and Girls Room at the Providence Public Library at 4 O'Clock Each Sunday Afternoon Preceding the Lecture

SYMPHONY MUSIC LECTURES SLATED

Series of Free Public Program Talks Again to Be Given Here.

DR. CHAPMAN TO SPEAK

Addresses Will Be Made in Boys' and Girls' Room of Library

The series of free lectures on programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are again being sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

Owing to the demand of the public for their continuance, arrangements have again been made with Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and the Evening Bulletin, this making the lecture's third season. The first lecture of the new series will take place Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

Through the courtesy of the Providence Public Library, the lectures, as in former years, will be given in the boys' and girls' room of the library each Sunday preceding the concerts.

Dr. Chapman will speak this coming Sunday on the program announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky for next Tuesday, taking up the lives and works of the composers, Weber, Franck, Sibelius and Wagner, who are to be represented on the program. He will talk upon the particular works the orchestra is to play, illustrating his lecture at the piano and on other instruments to point out themes and developments.

The public is cordially invited to attend the lectures whether or not it is the intention of the listener to hear the concert later. The present library committee of the club is in charge of arrangements, and the following are members: Chairman, Miss Sarah E. Wheelwright; Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, Mrs. Marguerite Watson Shaftoe and Mrs. Mary Colt Gross, ex-officio.

NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

V 30 1932

Noted Music Conductor

Herald Tribune photo—Acme

Agide Jacchia

Agide Jacchia, 57, Dies; Boston Musical Leader

Conservatory Director Had Conducted Pop Concerts 10 Years

SIENNA, Italy, Nov. 29 (AP).—Agide Jacchia, director of the Boston Conservatory of Music, died at a hospital today. He was fifty-seven years old. Last night Mascagni, the composer, visited him and they talked a long while about musical matters. His wife and daughter were with him when he died.

Agide Jacchia, who died today in Sienna, Italy, was a composer of many cantatas, arrangements and songs. For ten seasons, until 1926, he was conductor of the Boston Pop concerts, resigning unexpectedly because of a disagreement with the management's policy. He was conductor of the Cecelia Society from 1920 to 1924 and of the Fitchburg Choral Society from 1923 to 1925. He was born in Lugo, Italy, was graduated from the Rossini Conservatory at Pesaro, Italy, in 1898, with diplomas in composition and conducting, and then studied under Mascagni. He first came to America in 1902 as chief assistant to Mascagni in the Mascagni Opera Company. In the next five years he was conductor at a number of minor opera houses in Italy. He returned to the United States in 1907 to be leader of an operatic company in San Francisco and later, to conduct in Montreal and New York. He first assumed leadership of the Pop concerts in Boston in 1917. He became an American citizen in 1922. In 1911, he married Ester Ferradini, operatic soprano, who survives, with a daughter, Elsa.

Tel. Chelsea 3-8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OV 30 1932

AGIDE JACCHIA DIES IN SIENA HOSPITAL

Directed Boston Conservatory of Music Since 1920—Was a Naturalized American Citizen.

ONCE PUPIL OF MASCAGNI

First Came to This Country in 1902 as Assistant to Composer in Opera Company.

SIENA, Italy, Nov. 29 (AP).—Agide Jacchia, director of the Boston Conservatory of Music, died at a hospital today. He was 57 years old.

Last night Mascagni, the composer, visited him and they talked a long while about musical matters. His wife and daughter were with him when he died.

The funeral service will be held tomorrow and after cremation the ashes will be sent to Milan where he lived during the Summer. He came here a week ago.

A student and a close friend of Mascagni, the composer, with whom he first came to the United States in 1902, as assistant conductor of the Mascagni Opera Company, Signor Jacchia was born at Lugo, Italy, on Jan. 5, 1875, son of Leone and Volunnia Camerini Jacchia. He was a graduate of the Rossini Conservatory at Pesaro, Italy, where he received diplomas in composition and conducting. Prior to his graduation there he had been a student for five years at the Parma Conservatory and at the Liceo Musicale, where he won prizes for flute-playing, conducting and composing.

Signor Jacchia's début as a conductor came in 1898 in Brescia. A year later, and until 1900, he conducted the orchestra at the Teatro Communale in Ferrara. After his tour of the United States with Mascagni in 1902 he returned to Italy where he held successive annual engagements as a conductor at the Teatro Lirico in Milan and the Teatro Regio at Leghorn and at Siena.

As conductor of the Milan Opera Company Mr. Jacchia returned to America in 1907 and spent two years touring the United States and Central America. The next year he became general musical director for the Montreal Opera Company, a post he held for four years. In 1914 he came to New York as musical director for the Century Opera Company.

Signor Jacchia's connection with the Boston Symphony Company began in 1917 and terminated in 1926 when he resigned abruptly just before the closing concert of the season. He charged that the management of the orchestra, by excusing many musicians from the last performance, had caused the organization to become "unbalanced and inadequate." He refused to sign a contract offered him for the next season.

Mr. Jacchia had also served as conductor of the Cecilia Society of Boston, 1920-24, and the Fitchburg (Mass.) Choral Society, 1923-25. Since 1920 he had been the director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. He was noted in musical circles as a composer of songs, cantatas and various orchestral arrangements.

In March, 1911, Signor Jacchia married Ester Ferrabini, an operatic soprano, of Venice. They had a daughter, Elsa. He was naturalized as an American citizen in 1922. Since 1917 he had lived in Boston, spending his Summers in Milan.

Novel Pieces From Mozart And Williams

Serenade for Wind Choir and The "Tallis Fantasia" At Symphony Hall

Trans Dec. 1

ALMOST a novelty is the work by an honored guest on this week's program for the Symphony Concerts. Ralph Vaughan Williams's "Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis," has been played in Symphony Hall only once before, in the autumn of 1922, when Mr. Monteux was conductor. It had had first performance in this country only a few months previously, in the spring of the same year, under Mr. Damrosch in New York. It was originally written for the Three Choirs Festival in England in 1910 and it was first heard in Gloucester Cathedral. It was revised by the composer in 1913 and again in 1919 for publication in 1921.

Thomas Tallis (or Tallys or Talles) was one of the "Tudor composers" along with Gibbons, Weelkes, Morley and Byrd, probably the only group comparable with the contemporary Palestrina and his school on the Continent. The date of Tallis's birth is not known. There are arguments favoring 1505, 1510, 1515. He died in 1585. He has been called "the father of English cathedral music." He was an organist, a "Gentleman of the Chapel Royal," from his appointment under Henry VIII. through the reigns of Edward VI., Mary, and to his death in the reign of Elizabeth. For a time he was co-organist of that institution with Byrd. His output, mostly church music, is voluminous.

The theme which Dr. Vaughan Williams used for his Fantasia is one of a set of eight hymns written by Tallis in 1567 for Archbishop Parker's Metrical Psalter. Each of these tunes is in a different ecclesiastical mode. The Cantus Firmus, or "tune," in accordance with the practice of the period, is in the tenor. Tallis, in a preface, himself writes: "The tenor of these partes be for the people when they will syng alone, the other parts put for greater queers (choirs), or to such as will syng or play them privately." Tallis writes also of his eight hymns that

The first is meeke: deuout to see.
The second sad in majesty.
The third doth rage: and roughly brayth.
The fourth doth fawne: and flattery playth.
The fyfth delight: and laugheth the more.
The sixth bewaileth: it weepeth full sore.
The seventh treadeth stoute: in froward race.
The eyghth goeth milde: in modest pace.

The third of this set is the theme of the Fantasia of Vaughan Williams. The words to which Tallis applied it are a metrical version of the second Psalm, beginning:

> "Why fumeth in sight: the Gentile spite
> In fury raging stout?

In modern hymnals this tune may be found as No. 92 of the English Hymnal (also under the editorship of Vaughan Williams), where it appears in two versions, with slight rhythmic alterations, first in the modern manner, with the "tune" in the soprano, then in the ancient manner with the "tune" in the tenor.

For those who may be surprised that in medieval music the "tune" is in the tenor, let it be said that the very naming of the several parts of the four-part vocal choir depends on the reference of these parts to the tenor. The term "tenor" itself comes from the Latin verb "tenere," to hold; that is, the voice which "holds" or maintains the "Cantus Firmus," or "tune" or principal melody. Above it is the alto, from "altus," or high—the "high" part, or part immediately higher than the tenor or "holding part." Above all, the soprano, from "sopra," the part above all others. And of course at the bottom, the bass, or "bassus," at the foundation of everything.

Dr. Vaughan Williams cast his Fantasia for full string choir, in three divisions—Orchestra I; Orchestra II; a string quartet of solo voices. A note prefacing the score explains:

"The second orchestra consists of two first-violin players, two second-violin players, two viola players, two 'cello players and one contra-bass player. These should be taken from the third desk of each group (or in the case of the contra-bass by the first player of the second desk) and should, if possible, be placed apart from the first orchestra. If this is not practicable, they should play sitting in their usual places. The solo-parts are to be played by the leader of each group."

Though the composer has written a score of great richness, he has resisted all temptation toward making it a "modern piece." Admirably he has kept the spirit of the age out of which he has drawn his theme. More, he has restored in the Fantasia the very scales, the very technical devices of that age. Listen for a moment to his countryman, Mr. Fox-Srangways of the London Observer: "To the Cinquecento generally belong the constant wavering between major and minor thirds and sixths of the scale, and the 'faux bourdon' with which the theme first appears." And again: "To Palestrina's 'Stabat Mater' it [this Fantasia] owes a refrain repeated with harmonies on every other page."

The Fantasia begins with two measures of sustained introductory chords. Violas, 'cellos, basses continue the introduction with pizzicati which suggest the melody. After two such appearances, the complete hymn-tune bursts forth expressively in the rich sonorities of the G-string of second violins, together with violas and 'cellos, warmly but simply harmonized in the manner suggested by the theme and the age that first knew it. Immediately, there is an "appassionato" repetition in higher, brighter registers. After which the composer develops imaginatively various motivs from the theme. Notable is a variant in rhythm suggestive of old, florid Plain Song, "Poco piu animato; tempo rubato; cantabile," for viola solo unaccompanied; transferred to solo violin; finally spread out through the entire string quartet. The Fantasia grows more and more animated toward the end.

Rare—from Mozart

Mozart's Serenade, No. 190, in B-flat, parts of which are also to be played at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, requires but a brief note. No part of it has hitherto been heard at Symphony Hall. It is scored for two oboes, two clarinets, two basset horns (really tenor clarinets), four "Waldhörner" (to use Mozart's nomenclature), two bassoons and contra-bassoon. The complete work is in seven movements: I. Largo and Allegro molto: II. Menuetto (with two trios): III. Adagio: IV. Menuetto (not the same as the previous minuet, but again with two trios); V. Romanza (Adagio: Allegretto: Adagio); VI. Theme with Variations; VII. Rondo (Allegro molto). The last three of these movements will be heard in the current concerts.

The Serenade was written in 1780. Curiously the first three movements and the last exist also in a string quintet presumably dating as early as 1768 or earlier, when Mozart was not more than twelve years old! So trustworthy a commentator as his biographer, Otto Jahn speaks highly of the work, referring to it as the "grand serenata for wind instruments." Jahn also says: "The charm of the composition depends greatly upon the certainty with which the peculiar style of each instrument is made use of. . . . Great delicacy and diversity are shown in the grouping and treatment of the different instruments. . . . All the movements are well planned and constructed, rich in delicate and interesting touches of harmonic or thematic elaboration, and in general fresh and tuneful."

Next Week

The Symphony Orchestra will join next week in the marking, in various American capitals of music, of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the MacDowell Colony for composers at Peterborough in New Hampshire. The conductor, however, has not been content to pull MacDowell's "Indian Suite" from the library shelves and re-play the whole or parts of it. Instead, he has turned over MacDowell's earlier pieces: from them chosen the paired symphonic poems "Hamlet" and "Ophelia." Almost forty years ago in January of 1893, when Nikisch was conductor, they had a single performance at the Symphony Concerts. Yet by word of Dr. Koussevitzky they are still fresh and interesting. Other numbers on the program are Respighi's arrangements of Ancient Pieces for the Lute; the younger Cherepnin's "Magna Mater," a glorification of the pagan goddess to be played for the first times hereabouts, and, after two years' interval, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica."

A. H. M.

In Praise of Racial Spirit In Composers

Vaughan Williams Discusses Informally at Cambridge Nationalism in Music

Trans.

THE University ministers to its guests both formally and informally. Officially, in Paine Hall, last evening, Dr. Ralph Vaughan Williams, the eminent English composer, was the guest of the Division of Music in Harvard University. Actually, he spoke at his ease through an hour and a quarter to a friendly audience of professors and professors' households: graduate and undergraduate students; the Cambridge laity of both sexes and various ages; miscellaneous stragglers from the city on the opposite bank of the Charles. Professor Hill of the Division briefly introduced Vaughan Williams—as the guest prefers to be called—sparing details of his work and distinctions. So doing, he paid a pretty compliment to both composer and audience. Was there need to recite the number and the quality of his compositions? There was not, which was to free a modest music-maker from the embarrassment of such a catalogue and to reassure him — within — of a note that long since crossed the sea. By the same token the audience was a musically cultivated assembly, requiring no information as to the guest whom it gathered to honor—and survey.

Surveyed as he took his place at the reading desk, Vaughan Williams appeared an Englishman of middle years, tall and sturdily built, without the accumulation of adipose tissue that oftener marks the man of business than the worker in the arts. His face was smooth-shaven: his hair slightly tousled. A prominent nose gave character to his countenance; a decisive chin confirmed it; while deep-set eyes looked out thoughtfully, observantly, under a broad, high forehead. He carried himself as one well disposed toward occasion and surrounding. Forthwith outspread voluminous notes; at intervals rummaged among them for the sheets he would enlarge in informal discourse. From time to time he bent over the desk, arm and hand on either edge, as though to enforce the word with the earnest faith behind. Again he forsook the desk; took a step or two across the platform; thrust both hands into pockets; spoke as one man to another in his own study or living-room. Then, oftenest, came darts of quiet or mellow humor to which the audience was quickly responsive.

Of guests, as of the departed, the Roman admonition holds. Let nothing be written that is not kindly. Therefore no comparisons are in order between the diction of Vaughan Williams and that, say, of Mr. Galsworthy, by no means unremembered on public platforms hereabouts. Besides, Mr. T. S. Eliot is also present guest of the University—and hardly what his fellow-poets might call trumpet-tongued. On either side of the sea there are regrettable habits of speech. On both—to write from a divided experience—he who drops his voice at the end of a sentence is not the reporter's friend.

As it happened, however, Vaughan Williams was not addressing reporters. In fact, he was not addressing anyone. He was merely talking, as he might across a room to a semi-circle of friends, about the nationalistic tendency, by and large, of present English composers. An alert audience quickly understood, followed him as he rambled; rewarded him at the end with a round of hearty applause. Of course he was cautious. He must, as he said with a touch of humor, soon return to England and pick up his work and his living. Prudently there should be no naming of names; no distinguishing between major and minor figures. His theme, in the larger aspects, not those who might variously exemplify it, possessed Vaughan Williams.

He returned thirty years back to the dawn of nationalism upon English music. In modern times, until that dawn began, there had been no English music in any real sense of the words. The awakening brought to a new generation of composers a gradual realization of their national culture, life and arts. They discovered a national heritage of music. They perceived that the music of every country spoke a distinctive language, however universal it might be in effect. That language was rooted in the racial songs, in the racial traditions that touched music nearly. These things—they came to believe—were something precious and to be preserved. They were also generative source of music to be written by each according to his individual bent; music that was culminating expression of this national speech; music that was unmistakably derived from the scene in which the composers lived and worked, from the life around in which they shared; music, in short, that both embodied and released national traits and national spirit.

So persuaded the potential English composer began to make his studies and serve his apprenticeship at home. So convinced and imbued, he set to music-making that should not only express himself as an individual, but should also express him as an Englishman living in an English world, addressing first an English audience. In these faiths and in the consequent works, English music had flowered anew. Into every successful work had entered more than one factor and one personality.

Parenthetically, but not less earnestly, Vaughan Williams defended the theory and practice of nationalism in music-making. He cited the signal example of Wagner, impregnated with the German tradition and the German spirit; of Verdi as truly and deeply Italianate. Out of this nationalism within them they made a music that better expressed themselves; that went withal around the world. He denied point-blank the conventional saying that music is a universal language. However individualized, however wide-spreading—he contended—it remained a racial speech; drew substance and mood from racial life; took form and color from racial spirit. To say these things was not to refer it back to folk-song and so invite easy derision. From folk-music came primarily an atmosphere which it was for the good of the composer to absorb.

To draw music from the national heritage was not to hark back to archaic pedantries. What had endured in that legacy persisted because there was life within it, even to the modal harmonies with which he and other English composers had been reproached. In the ears of every composer should ring his national music. From it he must absorb, before he could give out—in his own image. In a foreign music no composer could feel truly at home. Finally, for vigorous conclusion, no music of blood and brain had escaped, or sought to escape, its national environment. . . . A composer of faiths and practice, to be frankly, loyally affirmed was this Vaughan Williams.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

DEC 3 - 1932

Announce First Boston Symphony Program Here

The program for the opening of the symphony season when the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock, was announced today.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will present Sibelius' ~~"Tapiola," one of~~ the outstanding scores which he has introduced in the present season of the orchestra in Boston, New York and elsewhere. The Finnish composer, in this, his latest swmphonic poem, is inspired by the beautiful woodlands of his native country. The title is derived from "Tapio," the God of the forests in Finnish mythology. This is considered a characteristic work by the composer whose love of nature is so often evident in his finest scores.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen the famous and popular symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck for the symphony of the evening. Weber's Overture to "Oberon" will open the concert and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," will close it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

C 3 - 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY TO PRESENT ~~SIBELIUS'S~~ "TAPIOLA" HERE

Outstanding Score on Symphony Program Tuesday Night.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which appears in the Albee Theatre, Tuesday, to open the symphony season here, will present Sibelius's "Tapiola," one of the outstanding scores which he has introduced in the present season of the orchestra in Boston and New York.

The famous and popular symphony in D-minor by Cesar Franck has been chosen by Dr. Koussevitzky as the symphony of the evening. Weber's overture to "Oberon" will open the concert, and the concluding selection will be Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

The projected revival of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" does not fit well—Dr. Koussevitzky has found—into the course of the current season. It is, therefore, deferred until another year. . . . The projected performance of Walton's remarkable choral piece, "Belshazzar's Feast," remains on the list, to be heard in the spring. It will be new to America and richly deserves production. Audience after audience in England has thrilled to it. . . . Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be played at a regular pair of concerts with the Cambridge choirs as chorus in the finale.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Dec 1

Schmitt in New York

DEPARTING hastily after the Symphony Concert of Saturday, Monsieur Florent Schmitt appeared in New York on Sunday evening for the first time. The occasion was a concert of his chamber music arranged by the League of Composers in his honor. The ever-ready Erskine introduced him to an audience well disposed to whatever novel interest pieces and performance might afford. (Mr. Thompson of The Evening Post discovered him as "gray-haired, modest of bearing and an able pianist"). He then played the piano-part in three minor works: A "Legend" for Saxophone and Piano (1918); two songs, early and late; a "Finale" for violoncello and piano (1926). In time came the celebrated Quintet for Piano and Strings of 1907, music that then helped to establish the composer's reputation and has since maintained it. Again Monsieur Schmitt played the piano-part, along with the League's own String Quartet. By agreeing report the interest was eager; the applause long and loud.

The reviewers noted the length, intricacy and incessant eloquence of the Quintet; but with one accord, they heard it to praise. "It has juice," says The Evening Post. "It is full of emotion and inspiration," cries The Times; while The Herald Tribune notes the "possessive force and rugged vigor." The more reason why The Flute Players' Club should include it, as announced, in their plans for the season in Boston. (Only once has it been heard here—years ago from the then existent Hoffmann Quartet when it was new and strange music.) Monsieur Schmitt bore bravely his first evening in a Manhattan concert-room—even when a leg of the piano slipped between the boards of the platform and, for the while, suspended proceedings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

DEC 2 - 1932

MUSICIANS CUT OWN PAY

To Make Up Half Of Boston's $93,000 Symphony Deficit.

Boston, December 1—(UP)—Classical music is displaying its charms at a net loss in Boston, it appears from the latest financial statement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The statement revealed that all Symphony musicians and Symphony Hall employees, from Conductor Serge Koussevitzky down, "have unanimously agreed to contribute from their salaries an aggregate of approximately one-half the estimated deficit of $93,000 for the current season."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

58

Symphony Conce

Afternoon of Rare Mozart And Williams

"Tallis Fantasia," Serenade For Wind Choir and Koussevitzky

Trans Dec 3

THE planning of the program for the current concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began with the idea of doing honor to a distinguished visitor, and was carried to a conclusion as a design in contrasted sonorities. Since Vaughan Williams, as he prefers to be called (Dr. Ralph Vaughan Williams, to give him his full and just due), was the visitor, a piece of his music was to be played. Once it was determined that the chosen composition would be the Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis, Dr. Koussevitzky—shrewd and sensitive program maker that he is—conceived the notion of contrasting with this piece for string orchestra another for wood-wind choir, thus leading up to the third piece for full orchestra. The music for wood-winds could hardly have been novelty from a contemporary composer: the contemporary composer was already at hand with a string piece. It would be the more desirable, even, that a piece from a "standard" composer should be a novelty! And since—strange as it may seem—there is in existence no better or more fruitful reservoir of unplayed pieces (in this community) than the complete catalogues of the works of Haydn and Mozart, it was to one of these composers that he turned for his novelty out of the past. Mozart yielded him his piece, a Serenade in B-flat for a considerable wood-wind choir, said to have pleased greatly audiences in Mozart's own day. Out of its seven movements, the conductor announced three to be played, made a last minute change and actually played five. For the orchestra as a whole he added the expansive Symphony in C major of Schubert.

By all the signs known to a reviewer, a piece by Vaughan Williams was more than welcome at this concert. If there was any tendency to demur, it was not at the idea of Vaughan Williams being played, but quite the opposite, at the idea that one of the larger of his works, as yet unknown to the audiences of Symphony Hall, say the Pastoral Symphony, or the Sea Symphony, should not have found place on this program. To any who may have felt thus be it said that conductor and management stand absolved of criticism for not choosing one of the larger works. It was the wish of the composer himself that the orchestra play his Fantasia while he was in Boston. It was in response to an inquiry from Symphony Hall as to his preference in the matter that he expressed the wish. It was a proper courtesy to him that the wish be granted. Nevertheless, the fact exists that there is an appreciable demand for a hearing of either the Pastoral or the Sea Symphony from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. When the Pastoral Symphony was performed some years ago by the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music it was exceedingly well received.

Not that any one thought any the less of the Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis. That little masterpiece brought only delight and pleasure. And surely the time for its revival had come. In it Vaughan Williams shows himself the full musician, interested alike in orchestral and choral music. The piece is entirely orchestral. The theme is borrowed from choral music. The disposition of the string orchestra which he made was surely suggested by the way in which choral conductors order their forces. Vaughan Williams asks for the solo voices of a string quartet, for a small orchestra with two players to a part, for the large orchestra consisting of the rest of the strings. One can not avoid the supposition that this arrangement was suggested to him by the frequent division of choral groups into quartets, semi-choruses and choruses. Certain it is that he knows his choral music as thoroughly as he knows the orchestra.

Yesterday's performance seated these groups—in accordance with the composer's direction in the score—in a manner that enhanced greatly the music as it was written. The large, main orchestra occupied the usual place of the strings. The solo players of the quartet—the leaders of the various divisions of the string choir—sat also in their usual places. The small orchestra was grouped together immediately in front of the organ, in the place where horns usually sit. From the effect of their several antiphonal responses, generally in ethereal tones, one could almost imagine the "choir of angels," or "celestial voices" in some great choral work, sitting off by themselves in a remote gallery, singing their music intended to suggest more than earthly beauty. Thus as if from a distance came the tones of this small orchestra—as echoes of the large orchestra, as background for the solo voices.

The piece as a whole enhances beyond belief a simple tune which no doubt would sound extraordinarily restrained and subdued to a modern ear not accustomed to the ways of sixteenth century composers. Further, no composer could thus enhance it who was not equally versed and steeped in both the magnificent music of that century and in the modern practises of our own day. For the mood of that century, of the church music of that century, Vaughan Williams evokes in a degree equal to that which would be evoked by an actual piece of ecclesiastical music by Byrd or by Palestrina. Yet the music is in fact a piece made out of the materials and by the methods of our own day. In the warmth of the combined tenor voices of the orchestra Vaughan Williams—remembering that the tune of the original hymn theme was also in the tenor—begins it; in the radiance of high strings he brings it to full fruition; between he sets solo voices against an ethereal background, in comment upon it. The whole is a thing of beauty even more than an interesting reminder of the music of a day long since gone.

Performance matched music step by step; did the composer intend to evoke the past—conductor and men sensed it, gave voice to the mood and the feeling which the composer could no more than hope someone would be able to find in the notes he put on paper; did he hope for rich fullness in beginning, for unearthly sheen toward conclusion, he had it from yesterday's forces. And an audience warmed toward it all, gave the unmistakable sign by the usual handclapping, while Vaughan Williams was ushered to the platform. There he appeared, a huge figure beside Dr. Koussevitzky, in business clothes of a tannish hue, surprisingly (for one of his experience) ill at ease, obviously pleased by the appreciation of the audience and by the performance which he had just heard.

But the performance of the movements from Mozart's Serenade had also given pleasure. One had feared that it might be nothing more than the musical chatter which composer after composer in the days of Bach, Haydn and Mozart was obliged to turn out page after page for performance at the behest and for the casual amusement of some lordly patron. One was delighted to find that commentators insisted that it was widely played and well liked in its own day; began to look forward to it with anticipation. It assembles a lucky thirteen of players—two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, a double bassoon, four horns—and two basset horns. These last instruments are variously described as the old equivalent of modern alto or tenor clarinets. The parts were taken yesterday by a bass clarinet and an English horn.

In the hearing, anticipation was rewarded. Through a Largo and Allegro, a Minuet, a Romanze, a Theme with Variations, a Rondo, one did not tire, did not find attention wandering. Never does Mozart allow his textures to thicken, never does he give an instrument prominence to the point of full satiety, always does he follow it with just the right foil, always does he find just the right music for the color of the moment, just the right color for the music. And when it is all over, when one begins to meditate on what happened, one realizes that one has not found a single tune that one could carry away and whistle (demand made only of "classical" or "modernistic" composers, anyway), but that one has somehow been attracted, pleased, that one has gone through an experience worth repeating. And after all, has music any better office?

That the audience felt similarly was evident by the applause which followed. It has been said until it will scarce bear repeating that the Friday audience at Symphony Hall is an apathetic audience. Sometimes it is. Yesterday it was not. First it called Dr. Koussevitzky back to make his bow. Then it recalled him, to bid his thirteen rise for their acknowledgement of thanks for pleasures given. Then it recalled him again, did not rest content until once more the little wood-wind band was on its feet. Thus the fate of an unknown "minor" work of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart in the year of grace, 1932.

If these two items came freshly upon the ears of a present audience, the symphony which followed is one known and liked. It is the symphony for which Schumann coined the famous phrase, "heavenly lengths," as applied to the music of Schubert. It is a fresh, invigorating music from beginning to end. Even the slow movement resembles more a gently rhythmed march than the songful outpouring which composers have so frequently written at this point in a symphony. Indeed this symphony, as one passes its themes in review one by one, in spite of the lovely melodic contours of several of them, is, like Beethoven's Seventh (though in lesser degree) essentially a symphony of rhythm. For the first themes of the movements (all but the slow movement one expects—and receives—sturdy, aggressive themes with a degree of motion. For the "second themes" the convention is for lyric moods to predominate. But the second theme of the first movement, thoroughly Schubertian, might almost be an Oriental dance, with its rhythms, its harmonies, its line. And the second theme of the last movement, with its accented repeated notes, is as highly rhythmed as any in the symphony. While in the Scherzo all the secondary ideas, as well as the entire trio, suggest the waltz. In this wise, as a symphony of motion Dr. Koussevitzky and his men played it. And thus an audience liked it.

A. H. M.

Boston Symphony

Monitor Dec 3

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Dr. Ralph Vaughan Williams was the honored guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its seventh pair of concerts (Dec. 2-3). Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave to the visitor's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis a performance which earned, and no doubt won, his grateful appreciation. Those of us whose participation consisted merely of lending our ears had equal reason to be thankful; for this composition—introduced to Boston by Mr. Monteux—revealed a beauty undimmed by the passage of a decade. Indeed, after much of the contemporary music to which we are called to listen, this score appears as conspicuously substantial. We should not be surprised if it were destined to live. As for Dr. Koussevitzky, we have but one cause of quarrel with him in this connection: Hitherto he had played but a single composition by Vaughan Williams, the Norfolk Rhapsody No. 1. Strangely enough, his "Pastoral" Symphony has never been performed by this orchestra—there's an opportunity. And the "London" Symphony well deserves revival.

It was exhibition day for the choirs of the orchestra. For before he displayed the glories of his strings in the Vaughan Williams item, Dr. Koussevitzky revealed the qualities of his winds in a Mozart Serenade in B flat for wind instruments (K. 361), played for the first time at these concerts. A lovely thing it is, which deserves to take its place in the repertory. It was set forth with remarkable virtuosity, and with subtle appreciation, in the reading, of its exploitation of the possibilities of the several instruments.

For conclusion, Schubert's "great" C major Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky makes seem shorter than most conductors in the experience of the present commentator.

L. A. S.

Dec 3

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATU

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Mozart, Serenade in B flat major for wind instruments (K. 361); Vaughan Williams, Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for string orchestra; Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7.

Five of the seven movements in Mozart's Serenade were played. The performance was the first at these concerts: it was probably the first in Boston. The Serenade in E flat major was played in 1895. The Longy Club played two or three serenades, but passed by the one in B flat.

The divertimenti and serenades by Mozart are too little known, yet there are some who find them among Mozart's finest works. Let no one think that the Serenade in B flat was chosen only to display the skill and musicianship of a section of the orchestra. The performance was indeed remarkable, for quality of tone, beauty of phrasing and for technical proficiency, but the music itself is delightful; varied, now beautiful, now gay. Variations for wind instruments—or in fact for any instruments—are often the abomination of desolation. The invention shown by Mozart in this serenade—variations in which beauty is never forgotten—is surprising. They are not exercises in variation form. It seems as if Mozart for the time being could not express his musical ideas in any other manner; there is nothing cut and dried about them, no suggestion of the conservatory's prize pupil, a pedagogue anxious to point out flaws. The audience warmly appreciated the music and the excellent performance.

The Fantasia by Vaughan Williams was first heard here under Mr. Monteux's direction in 1922. Yesterday the composer was present to acknowledge shyly the spontaneous applause that compelled him to come upon the platform two or three times. This applause was more than a welcome to a distinguished English composer who has given pleasure to the Symphony audience by his "London" symphony—there have been three performances of it—by one of his Norfolk rhapsodies, by this Fantasia; and moved other audiences in the city by his "On Wenlock Edge." It is to be hoped that at no distant day we may hear other symphonic compositions by him and his important choral works.

The Fantasia may awaken spiritual thoughts that are not suggested by texts even when they are taken from Holy Writ, as there are slow movements in Handel's concertos that soar above pathetic pages in his oratorios; as there are preludes by Bach for the Well-tempered Clavichord that breathe prayer. This Fantasia was first heard in Gloucester Cathedral; it was written for a Gloucester festival. Played in a concert hall, as it was performed yesterday, it suggested a cathedral service, with choirs solemnly chanting, now antiphonally, now with full voices. Impressive music, truly ecclesiastical; music for a cathedral, not for a Clapham chapel, not for a New England meeting house; music that purges the hearer of worldly thoughts, and sobers the understanding.

Schubert's Symphony led Schumann to rejoice in its "heavenly" length. It may be a long drawn out, damnable bore. It all depends on the conductor, when the ability of the players is taken for granted. How did the Bostonians stand it in 1852, when "the first violins were increased to four," a second oboe was added; and two extra violoncellos took the place of bassoons? Even from a full and modern orchestra have come performances that were lifeless, perfunctory. The Andante con moto dragged beyond endurance; the Scherzo and Finale only a wild scramble, a mess. Dr. Koussevitzky is especially fortunate in his treatment of this symphony; in the spirit and the proportion of his reading. What exquisite treatment of the measures for the interwoven wood-wind instruments! What fire without smoke in the headlong rushes! How adroit the slight changes in tempo without a checking of the musical flow! A performance that redounded to the glory of the conductor and the orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program will be as follows: Respighi, Old Dances and Airs for the lute; Suite 1. MacDowell, "Hamlet and Ophelia"—two poems for orchestra. A Tcherepnin, "Magna Mater" (first time in the United States). Strauss, Symphonia Domestica.

Symphony Audience Applauds Famous English Composer

Amer

By MOSES SMITH

Dec 3

The program of this week's Boston Symphony concert comes close to pleasing everyone. At least, no one is offended unduly. Those who like the "good old masters" have their Schubert in the ample and substantial C major Symphony. They have also a serenade of Mozart in B-flat for wind instruments alone.

The seekers after novelty have this same serenade, which rather strangely has never before been played at these concerts; and they have the magnificent fantasia on a theme by Tallis, done by the contemporary Englishman, Vaughan Williams, who here writes in the older style. The only possible grumblers are those cocky young modernists who must hear cacophony in order to be pleased. But the demon of dissonance does not appear at this week's concerts.

Mr. Williams was present yesterday, as he will no doubt be again tonight, to acknowledge the audience's applause for his work. It was hearty and enthusiastic applause, prompted by the serene and ethereal beauty of Williams' music, as beautifully played by the orchestra under Koussevitzky. Written for strings alone, the work calls for a divided orchestra, one group acting as a sort of heavenly choir, while there are solo parts in addition for the leaders of the various instruments. As sheer beautiful sound the effect is heavenly; while the development is masterly. Despite the length of the fantasia, it does not have a tiring moment.

The Mozart serenade is written for various wood-wind instruments and French horns. The bassett horns, which the score calls for, are now outmoded; in the place one heard the English horn and bass clarinet. The result was intriguing, especially in the light of the excellent performance.

The closing symphony of Schubert was brilliantly and ardently performed. The speed of the fast movements may have been considered excessive by a few listeners; others might regard it as an expedient shortening of the Symphony's length.

Monday Symphony

Eunice Norton, young pianist, will be the soloist at the second concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given on Monday, December 12, in Symphony Hall.

Miss Norton will play in Schumann's Piano Concerto at this concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

DEC 3 - 1932

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

teacher of piano-

* * *

Is Koussevitzky Competent?

THE pedestrian penman of these presents recently paid what he believed to be a tribute to the great Boston orchestra. He added that it had a competent conductor. There was wrath on Beacon Hill and there was tempest on the Back Bay. The expressions of displeasure ranged from "hot protest" down to "take it back." The writer stoutly refuses to take it back. He is prepared to met in mortal combat in the arena any person who will fling at him the challenge, "Koussevitzky is not competent.

This music lover has attended Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts year in, year out, and has never known the distinguished conductor to be incompetent. But one complaint was that competent was "too measured" a word. "How absolute the knave is! We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us.". This reviewer thought that in the course of the years he had exhausted in praise of Mr. Koussevitzky all the adjectives dear to rhapsodists except "celestial" and "sublime." He is saving these for some occasion of transcendent glory, when Mr. Koussevitzky soars into the fathomless ether and shakes the stars in their orbits.

59

MUSIC

Globe Dec 3

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Vaughan Williams, distinguished English composer, was present at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon to hear played his Fantasia On a Theme by Thomas Tallis for string orchestra. Called to the stage at the conclusion of the performance, both by the hearty applause of the audience and Dr Koussevitzky's beckoning, Dr Williams remained just long enough to bow to audience and players, and shake hands with conductor and concert master. Then he retired, obviously ill at ease. A tall, stury figure, clothed in brown, with massive head crowned by tousled gray hair, Dr Williams was twice more urged to acknowledge the approval of his music. He graciously did so.

In England Dr Williams has for nearly 30 years been regarded as one of the foremost modern musicians of that country. A notable fact in his career has been his ardent devotion to a distinctly nationalistic sort of style, although he was trained not only in England, but in Germany by Max Bruch, and studied in Paris, for a short time, with Ravel. Dr Williams has been conspicuous in the movement to collect and preserve English folk songs. His own style has embraced some of the procedures of 16th and 17th century English music. The composer is at present making a lecture tour in this country, and last week, as guest of the music division of Harvard, spoke informally in Paine Hall.

The Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis was first played in Boston 10 years ago last month, when Pierre Monteux was conductor of the Boston Symphony. In this work Dr Williams let his imagination function freely, but confined himself to the spirit and—more or less—the technical resources of English music of Tallis' time. The theme in question is the third of a series of eight hymns which Tallis composed in 1567 for Archbishop Parker's Metrical Psalter. Each of the hymns was written in a different church mode or scale. In those days composers did not write in our major and minor scales exclusively, but used a number of others.

Only a musician of Dr Williams' sensitivity and point of view could have succeeded with this sort of music. Writing in a style of past centuries is difficult business, for a composer is apt to put too much of his 20th century self into his work. That results, of course, in a confused, heterogeneous style that defeats its purpose. But Dr Williams has used modal harmony and the turns of melody dependent upon it, in a masterly, wholly unselfconscious manner. He seems to have recaptured in this Fantasia what one may regard as the essence of 16th century English music. By the very inherent monotony of modal harmony, a lengthy piece in this style is apt to pall. That the present work is well proportioned; that, save toward the end, it does not seem overlong, is another evidence of Dr Williams' craftsmanship.

Dr Koussevitzky began the program with a Serenade for wind instruments in B-flat (K No. 361), by Mozart. It had not previously been played at a Symphony concert. Only 13 instruments are used. The tonal depth and sonority they achieved was amazing. Credit is due, probably, both to the players' virtuosity and to Mozart's genius in scoring. There are seven movements in the Serenade, five of which were played yesterday. The lively, fleeting portions are most interesting. At first hearing this Serenade did not seem to be Mozart at his most beautiful or his most resourceful.

Schubert's C major Symphony, No. 7, was the remaining number. To one unregenerate listener Schubert said a great deal more in half the time in other compositions, his B-minor Symphony, for example.

Next week the program will comprise MacDowell's Two Poems for Orchestra, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia"; Respighi's first suite of Old Dances for the Lute; Alexander Tcherepnin's "Magna Mater," and Strauss' "Domestic Symphony." C. W. D.

PURSE SNATCHER GETS $26 IN EAST BOSTON

Set upon as she walked along Havre st, East Boston, last night, Mrs Susie DiOri, 200 Brooks st, East Boston, lost her handbag and the $26 it contained to a short, stocky youth of 16 or 17 who dashed into an alley toward Bennington st.

She described the youth as wearing blue dungarees, with a blue sweater over a white sweat-shirt. His height was about 5 feet 3 inches, she said.

DAY, DECEMBER 3,

AMIABLE MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Fantasia by Vaughan-Williams Rightly Enjoyed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon must have come as balm to those ears which are rasped and to those minds which are disturbed by contemporary violences and complexities. Yesterday amiability, pleasing solemnity, euphony and gay serenity ruled the day.

ALTOGETHER DELIGHTFUL

The programme of this altogether delightful concert was cunningly arranged. For beginning there was a Serenade of Mozart, new to Symphony Hall, for wind instruments. The 13 players, their agreeable task accomplished to their credit and to general enjoyment, left the stage, to be succeeded by what seemed in comparison a veritable army of string. From this section of the orchestra there came, in honor of that distinguished composer's presence in the hall, Ralph Vaughan Williams' beautiful Fantasia for double-string orchestra on a theme by the Tudor composer Thomas Tallis.

And when the resultant ovation to Mr. Williams had subsided and the customary intermission had intervened, the whole band, or rather as much of it as was needed to serve the purposes of Schubert, assembled to play that composer's ever-welcome Symphony in C major.

Advance Since Mozart

Whether music has in all respects advanced since the days of Mozart is a question that need not be entered into here. But the art of instrumentation has been marvellously developed. Contrast the general montony of tone that Mozart draws from so promising a combination as two oboes, two clarinets, two basset horns, two bassoons, double bassoon and four horns, with the amazing wealth and variety of tints and sonorities that Vaughan-Williams obtains from the intrinsically less colorful strings.

If Mozart now and then unwittingly reminded us of a giant bagpipe or an overgrown accordion, the Englishman made us enter the great cathedral where organ and voices, massed or single, performed music that, though often modern in texture, nevertheless breathed the spirit of a vanished day.

For Composer's Ears

If some miracle could have brought old Tallis back to life, would not his ears have rejoiced at what his successor, with a gifted conductor to aid, had made of his psalm tune? But, at least, Mr. Williams was present in the flesh, and it is pleasant to think that he was hearing his own music as he must seldom, if ever, have heard it before. Off-hand, it is impossible to think of any piece for strings alone—and Dr. Koussevitzky has ever been partial to them—that has presented the notable string choir of our orchestra in so flattering a light.

As for Vaughan-Williams' music in general, it should be oftener heard. Let us have again the "London" Symphony, not to mention the "Pastoral" Symphony as yet unheard in Symphony Hall.

Writes As an Englishman

Here is the one Englishman of modern times who writes as an Englishman and not as a cultured cosmopolite. Vaughan-Williams is the Sibelius, the Smetana, the Grieg, the DeFalla of his own land.,

Save for the disturbingly fast tempo given the recurring chief theme of the Andante, which created the impression that the piece had two Scherzos and no slow movement, the performance of the Symphony yesterday was an admirable one, and it, too, was warmly applauded.

---

4 Prov Journal Dec 6

U. E. R. CLEARS WAY FOR CONCERT RUSH

Trolley Cars and Busses Will Be Excluded from Westminster Street.

POLICE TO HANDLE TRAFFIC

Boston Orchestra Will Give Program This Evening at Albee Theatre

To facilitate the handling of vehicular traffic moving to and from the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre this evening, all trolley cars and busses will be excluded from Westminster street, between Dorrance and Empire streets, between 7:45 and 8:15 p. m. and 10 and 10:20 p. m., the United Electric Railways Company announced last night.

Removal of the trolleys and busses, coupled with elaborate arrangements made by the police traffic squad under the direction of Deputy Chief James A. Glynn, is expected to result in the prompt handling of all traffic destined to and from the concert.

"The reason for the withdrawal of service from Westminster street," an announcement of the trolley company said, "is that on such occasions street traffic always has become chaotic, resulting in long delays to schedules of street cars and busses operating over that thoroughfare. This plan is an experiment to see if all general traffic conditions may be improved."

Elmwood avenue cars will proceed over their regular route to the Union Trust building on Dorrance street, and then, outbound, will continue through Dorrance street, passing in front of City Hall to Washington street, thence to Empire street, and outward over their regular routes. Pontiac and Eden Park busses will use the same route.

Dexter street, Union avenue, Arlington Print Works and Oaklawn cars will come into the centre via Fountain street and leave via Washington and Empire streets. Olneyville square, via Westminster street, and Plainfield street cars will use this route, also.

All parking on Westminster street, between Dorrance and Empire streets, will be prohibited, and police will divert all motor cars from the area except those taking patrons to or from the concert. So far as possible, all cars going to the theatre will be required to approach it by turning from Washington street into Eddy street, through that thoroughfare to Westminster street and thence to the theatre.

A carriage check system will be in use, and cars will be given numbered tickets, marked "M" or "W." Chauffeurs holding "M" tickets will return to Mathewson street, via Washington street, at 9:30, and be permitted to wait there until the concert is over, when they will swing round and pick up their passengers. Holders of "W" tickets will approach the theatre through Washington, Eddy and Westminster streets, where they will be permitted to line up until time to pick up their passengers.

Emergency no-parking regulations will be in effect, not only on Westminster street, but also on the following streets: Mathewson street, from Washington to Weybosset streets; Washington street, south side, from Mathewson to Eddy streets; Eddy street, between Washington and Westminster; Union street, between Westminster and Washington streets; and Snow street, between Washington and Weybosset streets.

No cross traffic will be permitted through Snow and Union streets, and no traffic may enter Westminster street from Dorrance street.

Prov Journal

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1932

CONCERT TRAFFIC MOVES RAPIDLY

More Than 300 Automobiles Get Away from Theatre in 14 Minutes.

JAMS, DELAYS AVOIDED

Deputy Superintendent Glynn Directs New System.—U. E. R. Reroutes Cars, Busses

After more than 300 automobiles had discharged passengers at the Albee Theatre last night, without delay or traffic tangles, police under Deputy Superintendent James A. Glynn, using a new system of numbering cars, succeeded in reversing the process and getting all cars away from the theatre within 14 minutes.

The clogging of Westminster street and intersecting highways in the vicinity of the theatre at previous symphony concerts in the Albee, resulted in great deday, as the vehicles all converging into one highway at nearly the same point without plan, resulted in a snail's pace approach to the theatre.

Deputy Glynn and Lieut. John D. Fox prepared plans for the handling of traffic several days in advance. "No Parking" signs were placed on Westminster street, from Dorrance to Empire street; Mathewson street from Washington street to Weybosset street; Washington street, south side, from Mathewson street to Eddy street; Eddy street from Washington to Westminster street; Union street, between Westminster and Washington street, and Snow street, from Weybosset street to Washington street.

Traffic officers were stationed at all intersections from the foot of Waterman street to the theatre, and six motorcycle men were detailed to keep the streams of vehicles moving. Traffic not headed for the concert was routed, as much as possible, along Washington, Fountain and Weybosset streets, leaving Westminster street practically clear for the theatre traffic from 7:45 to 8:15 p. m.

With the co-operation of Alonzo R. Williams, general manager of the United Electric Railways Co., street car and bus traffic ordinarily routed along Westminster street, was re-routed via Weybosset or Washington streets from 7:45 to 8:15 p. m.

These arrangements permitted a double line of vehicles to approach at a rapid speed. Large placards bearing numbers were attached to motor cars discharging passengers at the theatre, and a ticket, bearing a corresponding number, was handed to one of the passengers

At 9:30 o'clock the cars started lining up on Mathewson and Westminster streets, and a line of taxicabs was maintained at Westminster and Snow streets. When an auto approached, the number attached was called out, and the passengers were ready at the curbing when the car stopped. Deputy Glenn clocked the entire exit movement at 14 minutes, without any traffic tie-up anywhere in the downtown section.

SYMPHONY CONCERT
MUSIC AT LIBRARY

Supplementing its invitation to all interested to attend Dr. Chapman's lecture this afternoon on the music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night, the Providence Public Library extends an invitation to visit its music department, where books and music scores of interest in connection with the coming concert will be displayed.

With the exception of Sibelius's "Tapiola," all of the works to be played are represented in the music collection. Weber's Overture to "Oberon" can be supplied in several arrangements, such as full orchestral score, piano solo, two pianos, eight hands; piano duet, the latter offering a choice of several transcriptions made by Ulrich, Gobbaerts, Duvernoy, Wittmann and others, and quintet for two violins, 'cello, viola and piano, transcribed by Julius Weiss.

The Cesar Franck symphony is represented by a miniature orchestral score, piano solos, one of them in the analytical series; piano duet arranged by the composer, and trio for violin, 'cello and piano, transcribed by H. E. Wollett.

For Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers" there is a transcription for piano solo by Klindworth in addition to a "Fantasie on Motives From the Opera," by Ollivier.

Music for Sibelius's "Tapiola," has been ordered and will soon be available. An account of it as played in Boston for the first time may be found in the Boston Evening Transcript of Nov. 5, which may be consulted at the library. There is also on file the program book for this same concert, having descriptive notes by Philip Hale.

As Sibelius was born in the month of December, his birth being Dec. 8, 1865, the present is an appropriate time to read about him as well as to listen to his music. Paul Rosenfeld and Cecil Gray include Sibelius in their interpretations of modern composers; Rosenfeld in his "Musical Portraits," and Gray in his "Survey of Contemporary Music." There is also an interesting article by Watson Lyle, "The Nationalism of Sibelius," found in the Musical Quarterly for October, 1927.

Descriptive program notes on Weber's Overture to "Oberon," will be found in "Symphonic Broadcasts," by Olin Downes. Franck's Symphony and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers" are described in Goepp's "Symphonies and Their Meaning," Newmarch's "Concert-Goer's Library of Descriptive Notes," and Upton's "Standard Concert Guide."

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 4 - 1932

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first Providence concert of the season Tuesday night in Albee Theatre.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Here Tuesday Evening

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to Present Weber's "Oberon" Overture as First Number of Opening Providence Concert in Albee Theatre

This week brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first of its series of four Providence concerts this season Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The novelty of the program will be Sibelius's tone poem, "Tapiola," one of the notable newly introduced scores of the orchestra's present season. The symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D-minor, one of the most popular of symphonies. It was last played by the Bostonians here in 1926. Weber's "Oberon" Overture and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" will be the opening and closing numbers of the concert.

A free lecture on the program, with musical illustrations, will be given this afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of The Providence Journal and The Evening Bulletin. The lecture resumes for the third season the series of talks on the Symphony's Providence concerts as arranged by the Monday Morning Musical Club in co-operation with the Public Library. All interested are invited to attend.

Also inaugurating its annual series of concerts is the Clavier Ensemble, which will present a chamber music program for two pianofortes and assisting string ensemble tonight in the home of Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield. Tomorrow night in Plantations Auditorium, Miss Emma Beldan, soprano of Newport, will make her Providence recital debut. Among the Christmas programs scheduled for the week is the Chopin Club's annual concert taking place Thursday morning in the Beneficent Congregational Church. Program announcements follow:

TODAY

Clavier Ensemble, concert for two pianofortes, assisted by string ensemble, home of Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield, 122 Taber avenue, evening.

Sonata No. 2 ....Clementi
Allegro assai
Larghetto espressivo
Presto
Doris Whale. Leon Laplante.
"Deux Arabesques" ....Debussy
Andantino con moto
Allegretto scherzando
Dorothy Holmes Sperry, Ingeborg Harklow Ziegler, May Atwood Anderson, Marjorie Morgan.
"Fantasie fur eine Orgelwalze............
.... Mozart-Busoni
Marjorie Morgan. Elizabeth Higgins.
"Trois Valses Romantiques"........Chabrier
Tress vite et impetuesement
Mouvement Modere de Valse
Anime
May Atwood Anderson.
George Albert Baker, Jr.
March for Two Pianafortes and Strings....
.... Hutcheson
Lydia Bell Marjorie Morgan.
Violins—Arlan R. Coolidge, George Jordan, Jan Stocklinski, Hugo Norden; Violas—Adah Fiske Smith, Victor Aberg; 'Celli—Barbara Smith, Alex Burgess, Jr.; Double Bass—Everard Appleton.

TOMORROW

Miss Emma Beldan, soprano; Mabel Woolsey, accompanist; Plantations Auditorium, 8:30 p. m.

I. "My Heart Ever Faithful"...........Bach
II. A. "The Statue at Czarskoe-Selo" ... Cui
B. "Le Papillon" ....Fourdrain
C. "Romance" ....Debussy
D. "Quvre Tes Yeux Bleus" ....Massenet
III. A. "Verbogen Heit"..............Wolfe
B. "Meine Liebe ist Grun" ......Brahms
C. "Der Schmied" ....Brahms
D. "Allerseelen" ....Strauss
E. "Zueignung" .... Strauss
IV. Aria. "Suicidio" "La Gioconda" ....
.... Ponchielli
V. A. "She Never Told Her Love" ..Haydn
B. "Night" .... Rachmaninoff
C. "Dedication" .... Franz
D. "Ah, Twine No Blossoms".......Gliere
E. "Morning Hymn" .... Henschel

TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Albee Theatre, 8:15 o'clock.

Overture to "Oberon" ....Weber
Symphony in D-minor ....Franck
I. Lento; Allegro non troppo
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro non troppo
"Tapiola," Tone Poem, opus 112 ..Sibelius
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"
Wagner

THURSDAY

Chopin Club, annual Christmas program, Beneficent Congregational Church, 10:45 a. m. Program arranged by Louise Waterman.

Organ:
Offertory on Two Christmas Hymns.....
.....................Alexander Guilmant
Walloon Christmas Rhapsody..........
.........................Gustave Ferrari
"The Caravan of the Magi"............
........................J. H. Maunder
LeRoy K. Armstrong.
Soprano:
Prophecy, "O Jerusalem, Look About Thee" (from "The Coming of the King")
...........................Dudley Buck
"Tryste Noel"....Margaret Ruthven Lang
"The Shepherds in Judea"..James Rogers
Florence Smith Erickson.
George A. Goulding (guest), accompanist.
Violin:
Andante (from Concerto in E-minor)...
..............................Mendelssohn
Andantino Quasi Allegretto (from Concerto in B-minor) ....Saint-Saens Allegretto (from Sonata in F)......Grieg
Mildred Copeland.
George T. Faulkner, accompanist.
Contralto:
"Cradle Song of the Virgin," opus 91, No. 2 ....Brahms
"Christ the Friend of Children," opus 8, No. 5 ....Cornelius
"The Christ Child," opus 8, No. 6.......
..............................Cornelius
Julia Stacy Gould.
LeRoy K. Armstrong, accompanist.
Organ:
"Venite in Bethlehem"........W. T. Best
Rhapsody.................Rossiter G. Cole
LeRoy K. Armstrong.

NEWS AND COMMENT

The library committee of the Monday Morning Musical Club which has charge of the lecture on the Boston Symphony concert by Dr. W. Louis Chapman in the Public Library this afternoon consists of Miss Sarah E. Wheelwright, chairman; Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, Mrs. Marguerite Watson Shaftoe and Mrs. Mary Colt Gross, ex-officio.

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

Boston Symphony to Base First Providence Program on Works of Established Popularity.—"Tapiola" by Sibellius, New to This City

BY DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its series of concerts in the Albee Theatre in a program numbering some of the finest orchestral works known to the world of music.

With the exception of Sibelius' tone poem, "Tapiola," "which is new, all of these compositions are great favorites. Concertgoers will recall Von Weber's Overture to "Oberon" as an old friend. Caesar Franck's only symphony has enjoyed an enormous popularity which captious critics cannot shatter, and the overture to "Die Meistersinger" is immortal.

The Overture to "Oberon" begins with the famous notes for French Horn, a do re mi short phrase which gives the first horn player his opportunity. Much can be made of this announcement of three notes. Embouchure, breath capacity and control and artistry all enter into its production. This horn call, suggestive of fairies, sylvan glades and other poetic fascinations, is immediately answered by adoring strings. This is followed by a chuckling dialogue between strings and woodwinds, the strings serious and the woods gay, followed by a suggestion of elfin trumpets. This introduction of some 20 measures is most melodious and suggestive. It ends with a smashing chord and a pause of astonishment which is followed by a furious bacchanalian violin figure which is brilliantly punctuated by emphatic strings and tympani.

This is "worked out" in a most melodious manner until the horn again enters and is followed by a slow chord formation which leads to a songful figure by the clarinet, which is immediately repeated by the first violins. This figure is immediately answered by a counter subject which acts as the musical material for the remainder of the overture. As an inset into this graceful music one finds a somewhat matter of fact episode of strings reinforced by woodwind which receives masterly contrapuntal treatment. In a way this episode corresponds with the superb "Largo" in Von Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." If there ever was orchestra music of life, light and fairyland this is such. It was composed in 1826 and is still increasing in popularity and interest. Von Weber of a century ago still lives in this inimitable overture. In the minds of many it surpasses Mendelssohn's conception of the fairy world of Oberon, Titania, Puck and Ariel.

◆ ◆ ◆

In his only symphony for orchestra Caesar Franck shows enormous gifts in melodic and harmonic invention and in his rich exposition of brass and woodwind he has startled the musical world of today as none, save perhaps Tschaikowski, has done. His mind was revealed in the abundance of his genius in this great work as in no other of his enterprises. Chorales, quintets, quartets and oratorios all show greatness but in none of his works is there the evenness and variety of originality as in this symphony in D-minor.

Dr. Koussevitszky is very fond of this symphony. Under his guidance it is set forth with colorful contrasts and richness of melodic suavity such as we have heard from no other conductor. To the gifts of the batonist one must add the perfection of woodwind, strings and brass of this orchestra that cannot be surpassed anywhere. As the symphony proceeds these appear in their proper places, solidity of harmony augmented by the woodwind choir in the first movement, massive harp and songful cor Anglais with delicately weaving strings in the "Allegretto," and sounding brasses in the truly grand finale. This work sets forth exquisite melodies, most graceful contrapuntal configurations, and tonal modulations which can scarcely be found in any other work in the literature of music. No program accompanies this symphony.

The "Allegretto" begins with a dignified and somewhat solemn subject which is in reality a harp solo accompanied by plucked strings which impart a distinct pungent tang to the effect. This theme, slightly varied, is taken up by the English horn in one of the most impressive of all utterances for that reed instrument of soulful quality. This is one of the distinctive passages which has helped to make this symphony famous. This theme returns throughout the movement and recurs in the finale. Sometimes it is as a solo voice, again over contrapuntal undulations and occasionally set forth firmly and vigorously. It is a beautiful musical thought, a gem of rare beauty. The last movement is in less measured terms. In it the brass choir is often heard in full cry in varied glowing harmonies and richly embroidered modulations. Themes from earlier parts of the work are recognized as they re-enter and the symphony closes leaving striking memories of vivid colors, tremendous contrasts and unusual tonal beauties.

◆ ◆ ◆

"Tapiola" is new to us. It was composed for the Symphony Society of New York and played by it for the first time Dec. 26, 1926. Why it has taken so long to arrive here is not yet revealed. It is written to suggest a wild forest where dwelt the forest God and his wood nymphs. This subject certainly suggests all sorts of poetic possibilities. Today is one for the larger appreciation of Sibelius, who is being given unstinted praise from every quarter. Dr. Koussevitzsky is the leader of this worthy popularity and at his hands this significant tone poem is certain to receive most arsitic treatment.

◆ ◆ ◆

Within a very few years Gabriel Pierne, one of the ablest conductors and musicians of our day, said in substance: "Were one to select the single composition which contains the fullest musical merit, the most complete and perfect "short piece," choice must fall upon the overture to "Die Meistersinger."

Mature thought and many hearings have made this opinion secure in the minds of most people. For lucidity and grace of thematic material, for contrapuntal elaboration and for marvellous orchestral craftsmanship, we know of no single piece which can compare with it. Endless repetition enhances rather than diminishes its wonders. The overture alone would have made Richard Wagner's everlasting reputation.

SYMPHONY CONCERT MUSIC AT LIBRARY

Supplementing its invitation to all interested to attend Dr. Chapman's lecture this afternoon on the music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night, the Providence Public Library extends an invitation to visit its music department, where books and music scores of interest in connection with the coming ocncert will be displayed.

With the exception of Sibelius's "Tapiola," all of the works to be played are represented in the music collection. Weber's Overture to "Oberon" can be supplied in several arrangements, such as full orchestral score, piano solo, two pianos, eight hands; piano duet, the latter offering a choice of several transcriptions made by Ulrich, Gobbaerts, Duvernoy, Wittmann and others, and quintet for two violins, 'cello, viola and piano, transcribed by Julius Weiss.

The Cesar Franck symphony is represented by a miniature orchestral score, piano solos, one of them in the analytical series; piano duet arranged by the composer, and trio for violin, 'cello and piano, transcribed by H. E. Wollett.

For Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers" there is a transcription for piano solo by Klindworth in addition to a "Fantasie on Motives From the Opera," by Ollivier.

Music for Sibelius's "Tapiola," has been ordered and will soon be available. An account of it as played in Boston for the first time may be found in the Boston Evening Transcript of Nov. 5, which may be consulted at the library. There is also on file the program book for this same concert, having descriptive notes by Philip Hale.

As Sibelius was born in the month of December, his birth being Dec. 8, 1865, the present is an appropriate time to read about him as well as to listen to his music. Paul Rosenfeld and Cecil Gray include Sibelius in their interpretations of modern composers; Rosenfeld in his "Musical Portraits," and Gray in his "Survey of Contemporary Music." There is also an interesting article by Watson Lyle, "The Nationalism of Sibelius," found in the Musical Quarterly for October, 1927.

Descriptive program notes on Weber's Overture to "Oberon," will be found in "Symphonic Broadcasts," by Olin Downes. Franck's Symphony and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers" are described in Goepp's "Symphonies and Their Meaning," Newmarch's "Concert Goer's Library of Descriptive Notes, and Upton's "Standard Concert Guide.

63

"Favorite Piece" Symposium Should Give Koussevitzky Food for Thought

Trans — Dec 5

Do not imagine that you are a shade or two finer than your neighbor when you recognize a deep, inner craving for a certain plaintive type of music. You are far from being alone, or spiritually apart from the man of the street, the shipping clerk among his barrels, the judge on his bench, or the "misunderstood" adolescent, and the regular attendant at Symphony Hall.

If you doubt that this is a common reaction to the times, and that music is the universal emotional outlet among all classes and ages of persons, note the type of "all request programs" on the radio today, the tenor of conversation between travelers and the invariable note of seriousness, if not downright pessimism, in the discourse of most thoughtful people.

What do "music lovers" crave to hear? Dr. Serge Koussevitzky said he would be interested to know what a cross-section of public opinion reveals.

At Symphony Hall the fans who come four hours before the doors open, stand in line in all kinds of weather to get tickets for the second balcony, were asked their preference, and then several patrons of good music, who are not professionals nor music critics.

Here are their favorite musical compositions, with the reasons why, as given by the balcony patrons:

Albert Nievergelt, twenty-eight, Brookline—"It is difficult to express logically why I prefer Beethoven's music, but I might say that it encourages the spirit and sustains it also, in its resistance to and protest against the spiritual domination of the machine; our reduction to the level of mere units in mechanized social order. Beethoven's music sustains and supports, as well as elevates."

Miss Miriam Ober, twenty-two, Boston: "Massenet's 'Meditation' and next to that, his 'Thais' because they satisfy me most of the time."

Miss Ruth Ober, twenty-four, Boston: "The wonder and majesty of Tchaikovsky's 'Fifth Symphony' and of Beethoven's 'Fifth Symphony' provide a ref-

Continued on Page Three

"Favorite Piece" Symposium Gives Food for Thought

Continued from Page One

uge from the sorrows of life for me. I find these symphonies soothing and elevating."

Henry W. Kaufman, twenty-three-year-old Harvard student, Lynn: "Mozart's 'Requiem' which I heard last year, has left an indelible impression upon me, and a craving to hear it often. The tragedy of it overwhelms me while the mystical influence of the whole theme sweeps me into contemplation of life beyond the grave."

John Brown, thirty, shoe dealer, Boston: "'Chaikovsky's Pathetique Symphony' overwhelms me. I cannot explain exactly why."

Mrs. Marjorie Taylor, Melrose: "I am always hoping to hear Wagner's 'Parsifal' again. I am able to slip away from my home duties seldom, so I come to this second balcony and find comfort when I am troubled. I wish we could hear more Wagner music in Boston."

Miss Erma Brandt, 19, Brookline: "Tristan and Isolde', for the magnificent beauty and wonderful melody that sinks into one's being when it is played. Next to that, 'Scheherezade'-Rimsky-Korsakov, for its crystalline beauty and occidental strains. But Beethoven's 'Eroica Symphony' reaches deepest with its great strength and varying moods."

Miss Dorothy Oberg, 19, Beverly: "Beethoven's 'Appassionata Sonata', for its beautiful melodic line; Wagner's 'Prelude to Mastersingers of Nuremberg' for the estatic mood it induces in the various themes."

The late Judge Frederick Cabot's favorite composition was Chaikovsky's "Pathetique Symphony," which was played in his memory last Jan. 12, following his death on Jan. 6.

Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and sustainer of Symphony orchestra for thirty-seven years, always enjoyed hearing Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" at the Pop concerts.

All the world remembers the last request of President McKinley, who asked that "Lead Kindly Light" be sung at his funeral. The popularity of a National Broadcasting Company program, featuring a "Lonesome Singer" has been built on melodramas such as "Red River Valley," "Here Lies Love," "Nobody Cares," and such hymns as "The Old Rugged Cross," requested by listeners from Mexico to Canada, and from coast to coast.

Is this a sign of the times, or a yearning common to everyone who loves music, whether a musical taste has been cultivated or just grew, like Topsy?

Robert Hillyer, whose book, "Head of the River," is just out, takes issue with the folks who revel in the emotional "Pathetique Symphony."

"I loathe that piece," declares Mr. Hillyer, "it is the type of music that I consider bad, for its appeal is wholly melodramatic. Brahms's First Symphony and Mozart's Symphony in D Minor have more to give because these are more careful artists. César Franck's chamber music, and one of his symphonies are fine, and of course I love everything that Schubert and Schumann wrote."

To the question, "What is your favorite musical composition and why?" the patrons' answers follow:

Eliot Wadsworth, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury: "I am afraid that my taste is not particularly valuable to the public, as far as my favorite music is concerned, but I do like such gay songs as 'Just Around the Corner,' 'There's a Rainbow in the Sky' and the like. Not particularly the words but the cheery swing of the lyrics."

Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, whose generosity in assisting young musicians is well known: "Just now I am much interested in Viennese light operas, such as are being so well received in Germany today, though I have many favorites among the world's best music. I really prefer worthwhile music to jazz, although the latter has its place. I am delighted to hear that Franz Lehar's light opera, 'Land of Desire' is being brought to this country, and that our own Charles K. Hackett of the Chicago Opera Company, will sing the principal tenor role."

Dr. David D. Scannell of the City Hospital: "Beethoven's Eighth Symphony."

Miss Elisabeth M. Herlihy, executive secretary of the City Planning Board:

This quotation says what I mean—

A few can touch the magic string,
And noisy fame is proud to win them;
Alas for those who never sing,
But die with all their music in them.

I think that one's reaction to music played or sung by another, varies under certain circumstances, in accordance with one's mood. What pleases today may be entirely out of tune tomorrow. But having in mind that your question includes sentiment as well as sound, I would say that my favorite selection for everyday use is "Just for Today."

Walter Powers, president Boston City Club: "Badner's 'Mädeln,' and I cannot explain why I like it, but it is most pleasing to me."

Joseph Lee, head of the playground movement in America: "I am somewhat surprised to find myself preferring the older masters—Haydn, Handel, Bach, and those who came after them with romantic themes, such as Beethoven, with his marvellous symphonies, each like a strong, beautiful carving, and Mozart. I emphatically do not like a mere succession of tones, which we commonly find in modern music."

Cheney C. Jones, superintendent of the New England Home for Little Wanderers: "It is hard for me to decide which of Beethoven's Symphonies I like best, for all have a virility and a harmony that elevates the spirit. I think perhaps the Seventh Symphony is my favorite, and I thoroughly enjoy his sonatas, played on the piano by my wife or daughters."

Daniel Bloomfield, manager, Retail Trade Board: "César Franck's famous Symphony, the name of which I do not now recall. This is undoubtedly my favorite composition because of its great beauty."

F. L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

5 - 1932

PLAN TO SPEED UP CONCERT TRAFFIC

Police Prepare for Movement of Cars To and From Albee Tomorrow Night.

Elaborate plans involving the use of more than 30 policemen have been prepared by Deputy Chief James A. Glynn, head of the traffic division, to insure rapid movement of motor cars to and from the Albee Theatre tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard.

There will be no parking tomorrow night on the following ~~streets~~ Westminster street, from Dorrance to Empire street; Mathewson street, from Washington to Weybosset street; Washington street, south side, from Mathewson street to Eddy street; Eddy street, from Washington to Westminster street; Union street, between Westminster and Washington streets, and Snow street, from Weybosset street to Washington street.

Space will be reserved at Westminster and Snow streets for a line of taxicabs in charge of Starter Joseph McKenna. Cabs will be called as required after the concert, and the line will be kept moving forward to a point far enough away not to prevent easy approach to the theatre by private cars.

Police request that motor cars approaching the theatre follow these routes from various parts of the city: From the East Side, down Waterman street, through Memorial square, Exchange place, up Washington street, through Eddy street to Westminster street. From the north side, down Francis street to Exchange place, Washington street, Eddy street to Westminster street.

From the west side, down Washington street, through Eddy street to Westminster street, and from the south side traffic will be routed through Empire, Washington, Eddy and Westminster streets to the theatre.

Traffic officers will be stationed at all intersections along the route to the concert, and the carriage check system, used at the last concert in Loew's Theatre, will be employed again. Tickets numbered in rotation in two series will be used. One series will bear the letter "M" and the other series will be lettered "W."

At 9:30 p. m., half an hour before the audience leaves the theatre, drivers with tickets lettered "M" will return through Washington street to Mathewson street and line up there. Holders of the "W" tickets will approach the theatre after the concert through Washington and Eddy streets, to line up on Westminster street. Half a dozen motorcycle patrolmen will keep traffic moving in a steady stream.

As usual for the better, Dr. Koussevitzky has revised the program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. It now begins with MacDowell's paired tone-poems, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia"; proceeds with Sibelius's Third Symphony in which the conductor excels; continues with Cherepnin's "Magna Mater"; ends with Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," overlooked of late at Symphony Hall.

Piper picked a ueck of pickled peppers."

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

DEC 5 - 1932

MUSICIANS TO AID

Help to Meet Symphony's Deficit From Their Salaries

By United Press.

BOSTON: Classical music is displaying its charms at a net loss in Boston, it appears from the latest financial statement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The statement revealed that all Symphony musicians and Symphony Hall employes, from Conductor Serge Koussevitsky down, "have unanimously agreed to contribute from their salaries an aggregate of approximately one-half the estimated deficit of $98,000 for the current season."

Concert-Chronicle

Choosing from Strauss

Dec 6 Trans

WHENEVER of late Dr. Koussevitzky has proposed a tone-poem of Strauss for performance at the Symphony Concerts correspondents of this department have immediately suggested another. When he announced last month a repetition of "Ein Heldenleben," they countered for a repetition of "Don Quixote" or a revival of the early "Macbeth." Again, when the conductor would have the "Sinfonia Domestica," others renewed this request for the same tone-poems. It is twenty-one years since "Macbeth" was played at Symphony Hall; while now, as then, it is excellent example of the young and sinewy Strauss, already characterizing in tones, feeling his way toward orchestral mastery, imprinting musical substance with delineative quality. There is good reason to believe that audiences would welcome it.

Certainly they welcomed the return to the active repertory, last season, of "Don Quixote"; by many signs would gladly hear it again. The connoisseurs set it above Strauss's other tone-poems. Clearly it touches the general imagination. Masterly as is many a page in "Ein Heldenleben" and the "Domestica," a year or two on the library shelves would do neither any harm in the public ear. Though played far oftener, "Death and Transfiguration," now announced for next Friday and Saturday, seems in anticipation the fresher piece. Strauss and Sibelius (with his Third Symphony) on the same program is to set side by side the two composers of our time above all the rest, save only Debussy. Almost always Dr. Koussevitzky's second thought about numbers excels his first.

Programe to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening next—a repetition of the pieces played at Symphony Hall last week:

Three Movements from the Serenade in B-flat major for Wind Instruments (K. 361)..Mozart
Fantasia for String Orchestra on a Theme by Thomas Tallis............Vaughan Williams
Symphony, No. 7, in C major........Schubert

From the New England Conservatory for the concert of its Student Orchestra on Friday evening next in Jordan Hall; Carl McKinley conductor; Howard Goding assisting pianist:

Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus"..........Liszt
Symphony, No. 38, in D major........Mozart
Concerto, No. 2, in D minor for Piano and Orchestra..................MacDowell
Legend, "The Swan of Tuonela"......Sibelius
Rákóczy March from "The Damnation of Faust".............................Berlioz

Memo.

Mr. Prokofiev is expected in New York a day or two before Christmas for a round of concerts in the United States. With orchestras he will play his new Piano Concerto, No. 5, in G major. Probably it will be heard first at Symphony Hall.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 6 - 1932

U. E. R. CLEARS WAY FOR CONCERT RUSH

Trolley Cars and Busses Will Be Excluded from Westminster Street.

POLICE TO HANDLE TRAFFIC

Boston Orchestra Will Give Program This Evening at Albee Theatre

To facilitate the handling of vehicular traffic moving to and from the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre this evening, all trolley cars and busses will be excluded from Westminster street, between Dorrance and Empire streets, between 7:45 and 8:15 p. m. and 10 and 10:20 p. m., the United Electric Railways Company announced last night.

Removal of the trolleys and busses, coupled with elaborate arrangements made by the police traffic squad under the direction of Deputy Chief James A. Glynn, is expected to result in the prompt handling of all traffic destined to and from the concert.

"The reason for the withdrawal of service from Westminster street," an announcement of the trolley company said, "is that on such occasions street traffic always has become chaotic, resulting in long delays to schedules of street cars and busses operating over that thoroughfare. This plan is an experiment to see if all general traffic conditions may be improved."

Elmwood avenue cars will proceed over their regular route to the Union Trust building on Dorrance street, and then, outbound, will continue through Dorrance street, passing in front of City Hall to Washington street, thence to Empire street, and outward over their regular routes. Pontiac and Eden Park busses will use the same route.

Dexter street, Union avenue, Arlington Print Works and Oaklawn cars will come into the centre via Fountain street and leave via Washington and Empire streets. Olneyville square, via Westminster street, and Plainfield street cars will use this route, also.

All parking on Westminster street, between Dorrance and Empire streets, will be prohibited, and police will divert all motor cars from the area except those taking patrons to or from the concert. So far as possible, all cars going to the theatre will be required to approach it by turning from Washington street into Eddy street, through that thoroughfare to Westminster street and thence to the theatre.

A carriage check system will be in use, and cars will be given numbered tickets, marked "M" or "W." Chauffeurs holding "M" tickets will return to Mathewson street, via Washington street, at 9:30, and be permitted to wait there until the concert is over, when they will swing round and pick up their passengers. Holders of "W" tickets will approach the theatre through Washington, Eddy and Westminster streets, where they will be permitted to line up until time to pick up their passengers.

Emergency no-parking regulations will be in effect, not only on Westminster street, but also on the following streets: Mathewson street, from Washington to Weybosset streets; Washington street, south side, from Mathewson to Eddy streets; Eddy street, between Washington and Westminster; Union street, between Westminster and Washington streets; and Snow street, between Washington and Weybosset streets.

No cross traffic will be permitted through Snow and Union streets, and no traffic may enter Westminster street from Dorrance street.

What Is Music?

PERSONS who go to symphony concerts, particularly that part of the audience which sits upstairs, were asked to express their preferences. The answers included most of the accepted classics and some lighter works.

Our personal attitude towards music may be barbaric, but we have exposed it to various opera singers, among whom was the late Enrico Caruso. It has been our contention that many artists, in arranging their programs, choose not simply the most pleasing and tuneful works, but, rather, those difficult to sing or play. Thus do they display their mastery of the technique of voice or instrument. Students, recognizing this skill, find themselves approving the artist and his selections.

It may be rude of us to suggest that folk songs are the truly classic works. An Italian opera may become the folk song of Italy. But Miss Alice Nielsen, prima donna, once told us her favorite song was "Old Black Joe." We rather liked her for it.

Balm for Wounds

The New-York Reviewer to Aggrieved Bostonians

THE pedestrian penman of these presents—wrote W. J. Henderson, last Saturday, at the end of his weekly musical chronicle in The Sun—recently paid what he believed to be a tribute to the great Boston orchestra. He added that it had a competent conductor. There was wrath on Beacon Hill and there was tempest on the Back Bay. The expressions of displeasure ranged from "hot protest" down to "take it back." The writer stoutly refuses to take it back. He is prepared to meet in mortal combat in the arena any person who will fling at him the challenge, "Koussevitzky is not competent."

This music-lover has attended Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts year in, year out, and has never known the distinguished conductor to be incompetent. But one complaint was that competent was "too measured" a word. "How absolute the knave is! We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us." This reviewer thought that in the course of the years he had exhausted in praise of Mr. Koussevitzky all the adjectives dear to rhapsodists except "celestial" and "sublime." He is saving these for some occasion of transcendent glory, when Mr. Koussevitzky soars into the fathomless ether and shakes the stars in their orbits.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 7 - 1932

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First in Concert Series

Capacity House Applauds Familiar Numbers, Imperishable in Their Musical Excellence, Critic Says. "Tapiola", Recent Tone Poem of Forest Gods and Deities, by Sibelius, Is Well Received.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night before a crowded house gave the first of its all too short series of concerts in the Albee theatre. With the exception of "Tapiola," Sibelius's recent tone poem of forest gods and deities, the numbers were familiar to concert goers and for that reason were more completely enjoyed. Imperishable in their musical excellence they are ever welcome nor can one become too familiar with their sterling qualities. Each rehearing reveals new features less well comprehended before and with each repetition they become more completely our own.

Von Weber's "Overture to Oberon," long a favorite on Boston Symphony Orchestra programs, was again heard in all its glittering brilliance with perfection of orchestral ensemble, beauty of horn tone and with our renewed appreciation of superb wood-wind choir.

Listeners Spellbound

Caesar Franck's Symphony in D minor is made up of far more complex material than the overture to "Oberen." Its thematic material is far more abstruse and involved and it is many times longer in its musical content. From the first measures of its sounding unison to the last bar of its finale, it held the listeners spellbound at the prodigious musical resources of the composer, the wealth of musicianship of the orchestra and the dynamic genius of the conductor, who interjected the most magnetic powers of his musical resources into his interpretation. The symphony is tremendously effective. The glowing and vital transitions of mood and key, rapidly contrasting figurations and variations of harmonic devices were moulded and yet held within bounds by Dr. Koussevitzky with his usual consummate artistry.

Musical Ingenuity Revealed

It will be observed that this concert presented forest scenes of two different moods and varieties. The woods of elves and fairies of Shakespeare's conception delicately visionary and atmospheric, and the forest of "Tapio" with "foreboding and savage dreams.' This would perhaps account for some of the differences in musical expression, which characterize the works but would not explain the fact that Sibelius had many advantages over his fellow composer of a century ago, a time when modern harmonic devices were not available.

In comparing these somewhat similar musical environments it must be borne in mind then that they are far from being identical. When Sibelius unchains his forces, he employs music material hitherto unknown, much of it of his own devising, thereby revealing a musical ingenuity which is an essential part of his genius as a composer. But the average listener is unmindful of the chords of the ninth, the chromatics, the unresolved dissonances and complex orchestration, which combine to make the tremendous cataclysmic tonal upheavals which contribute to the greatness of this tone poem. He may not realize that the theme of the work begins, with its earliest utterances and lives in various guises throughout its course but he can feel these great musical impulses and share in the emotions which the orchestra produces.

Wagner's magnificent "Overture," "Die Meistersinger" brought the concert to a close. If its tonal grandeurs seemed to dwarf 'Sibelius,' melodic beauties to please and its orchestral technique to satisfy, it must have been that we knew it and its architecture from long acquaintance and that we heard it with more wisdom and understanding.

The program:

Weber .... Overture to "Oberon"
Franck .... Symphony in D minor
I. Lento; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Sibelius . . . . "Tapiola," Tone Poem, Op. 112
Wagner ....
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"
DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 7 1932

Boston Symphony Concerts Opened

Weber, Caesare Franck and Wagner—here is an offering of gifts from the gods worthy of the highest consideration in any conclave called for the purpose of preparing an orchestral programme. It was presented to a crowded theatre last evening at the Albee in Providence as the Boston Symphony orchestra's opening concert under Serge Koussevitzky. There will be only three more of these concerts, and the throngs who were there will find complete satisfaction in a repetition of just this sort of fare.

But the numbers given the world by these three composers did not comprise the entire list. True to his convictions and in conformity with his practise, Dr. Koussevitzky introduced a modern to the company of the great. Sibelius, modern, but not new, one whose works are familiar to symphony orchestra goers, was represented by his tone poem, "Tapiola," sweetly beautiful, fanciful and thoroughly satisfying. One desires to hear this again, conscious that it requires repetition to permit its better appreciation. It will be welcomed on future programmes.

A traditional opening was the overture from von Weber's "Oberon," heard many times at these concerts and as familiar almost as the national anthem to the audiences. It was followed by Franck's D-minor Symphony, another familiar work which is always awaited eagerly by Rhode Island audiences. It was played with a superb finish by an orchestra inspired by a director whose understanding of these splendid compositions is so complete that he has not the slightest difficulty in conveying their fullest meanings through his players to his audience.

In the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which closed the concert, the listeners once more heard this great orchestra at its peak of perfection in the exposition of Richard Wagner's art. The lover of Wagner finds difficulty in restraint of language in discussing his work, particularly when that work is presented by the great Boston organization. Perhaps, then, it is sufficient to say that the prelude last night was presented with all the power of a band of players fully capable, under the direction of a master, to lay all its noble beauties before the hearer. Such a number, played as this one was, causes the listener to give thanks for the great modern orchestras which are capable of reproducing the musical thoughts of the past. It was a closing worthy of a great concert.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

DEC 7 - 1932

-:- MUSIC -:-

KOUSSEVITZKY'S TRIUMPH

The concert directed by Dr. Koussevitzky as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theater last night was of such a superlative quality that we are going to delay our comment on it for another day. Such comment as we may offer will be a challenge to genius. Dr. Koussevitzky is, in our opinion, one of the two really important persons in the musical life of this country. If we hesitate to write our final opinion on last night's concert, it is because we wonder whether we should not say of Dr. Koussevitzky that nothing which he elects to do can be done better, and very seldom as well. X. Y. Z.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 7 - [illegible]

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First of Series of ~~Concerts.~~—Numbers Familiar Ones Except for "Tapiola," Tone Poem By Sibelius

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night before a crowded house gave the first of its all too short series of concerts in the Albee theatre. With the exception of "Tapiola," Sibelius's recent tone poem of forest gods and deities, the numbers were familiar to concert goers and for that reason were more completely enjoyed. Imperishable in their musical excellence they are ever welcome nor can one become too familiar with their sterling qualities. Each rehearing reveals new features less well comprehended before and with each repetition they become more completely our own.

Von Weber's "Overture to Oberon," long a favorite on Boston Symphony Orchestra programs, was again heard in all its glittering brilliance with perfection of orchestral ensemble, beauty of horn tone and with our renewed appreciation of superb wood-wind choir.

The overture lasts for but a few cherished minutes but in them are heard graceful themes, flexibility of facile strings and orchestral development such as is not often heard in concerts. For continuity of melodic line and sound musicianship of "working out." Von Weber's overtures cannot be surpassed or the importance of their imprint upon music overestimated. Tempos such as last night's performance could not have been accomplished except by a virtuose orchestra of the very highest rank.

Listeners Spellbound

Caesar Franck's Symphony in D minor is made up of far more complex material than the overture to "Oberen." Its thematic material is far more abstruse and involved and it is many times longer in its musical content. From the first measures of its sounding unison to the last bar of its finale, it held the listeners spellbound at the prodigious musical resources of the composer, the wealth of musicianship of the orchestra and the dynamic genius of the conductor, who interjected the most magnetic powers of his musical resources into his interpretation. The symphony is tremendously effective. The glowing and vital transitions of mood and key, rapidly contrasting figurations and variations of harmonic devices were moulded and yet held within bounds by Dr. Koussevitzky with his usual consummate artistry.

Many solo features gave variety and color to the hearing. The solo horn of Mr. Boettcher was of mystic and haunting beauty in the celebrated horn call in "Oberon" which begins in splendid crescendo and motive with which the work begins. Mr. Speyer was eloquently pursuasive in his many opportunities for cor Anglais during the symphony and Mr. Zighera's harp gave smoothly rhythmic accent to the cloying and fascinating theme song of the "Allegretto."

To praise this virtuoso orchestra adequately, it would be necessary to enumerate each choir, of strings, of brass, wood-wind and what not and append every possible adjective of the highest praise. Yet it must be said that the balance of tonal volumes upon which so much depends for artistic performance depends not only upon the discriminating judgment of the players but also upon the director, who wisely holds them in hand and reserves his tremendous fortissimi for rare unleashing. This symphony was conspicuous for contrasting expressions of this kind; finely spun gossamer and heavy brocade, soft tints and the blare of riotous color gave tonal contrasts which glorified the wonders of this tremendous symphony.

Musical Ingenuity Revealed

It will be observed that this concert presented forest scenes of two different moods and varieties. The woods of elves and fairies of Shakespeare's conception delicately visionary and atmospheric, and the forest of "Tapio" with "foreboding and savage dreams.' This would perhaps account for some of the differences in musical expression, which characterize the works but would not explain the fact that Sibelius had many advantages over his fellow composer of a century ago, a time when modern harmonic devices were not available.

In comparing these somewhat similar musical environments it must be borne in mind then that they are far from being identical. When Sibelius unchains his forces, he employs music material, hitherto unknown, much of it of his own devising, thereby revealing a musical ingenuity which is an essential part of his genius as a composer. But the average listener is unmindful of the chords of the ninth, the chromatics, the unresolved dissonances and complex orchestration, which combine to make the tremendous cataclysmic tonal upheavals which contribute to the greatness of this tone poem. He may not realize that the theme of the work begins, with its earliest utterances and lives in various guises throughout its course but he can feel these great musical impulses and share in the emotions which the orchestra produces.

As this reviewer heard the work, the initial theme seemed a short episode in thirds to which the wood-wind soon gave strength and impression. Early the rushing winds appeared with a suggestion of the Oriental rather than the Nordic and the sylvan. Piccolos in rushing chromatics interrupted a peaceful calm to serve as a preface to a dance of gnomes. No libretto is needed for translation of much of this musical material. Forest twitterings soon gave way to elegiac sadness and melancholy and there seemed to be a sudden entrance of a pagan god of wrath and might. The rhythmic march seemed to be of goblins rather than elfs and the mood more of hobgoblins than of sprites.

Orchestration Magnificent

The orchestration of this tone poem is magnificent in its scope and technique, the subject matter of the work worthy of the thorough study which it will require before it can be fully comprehended. It is undoubtedly a distinct contribution to the musical literaure of today. Heaven send that we may hear it on our next incarnation when it is a century old, as we heard "Oberon," that we may know whether it has stood the test of time, upon which enduring merit depends, as well.

Wagner's magnificent "Overture," "Die Meistersinger" brought the concert to a close. If its tonal grandeurs seemed to dwarf "Sibelius," melodic beauties to please and its orchestral technique to satisfy, it must have been that we knew it and its architecture from long acquaintance and that we heard it with more wisdom and understanding.

In this sublime work the orchestra, relieved of its burden of concentration, seemed to sing more freely, voices more definite and choral speech more articulate. This work also has stood the test of time and with increasing years has grown in grace.

A capacity house applauded warmly recalling both conductor and orchestra.

The program:

Weber .... Overture to "Oberon"
Franck .... Symphony in D minor
I. Lento; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Sibelius ...... "Tapiola," Tone Poem, Op. 112
Wagner ....
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"
DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

Balm for Wounds

The New-York Reviewer to Aggrieved Bostonians

THE pedestrian penman of these presents—wrote W. J. Henderson, last Saturday, at the end of his weekly musical chronicle in The Sun—recently paid what he believed to be a tribute to the great Boston orchestra. He added that it had a competent conductor. There was wrath on Beacon Hill and there was tempest on the Back Bay. The expressions of displeasure ranged from "hot protest" down to "take it back." The writer stoutly refuses to take it back. He is prepared to meet in mortal combat in the arena any person who will fling at him the challenge, "Koussevitzky is not competent."

This music-lover has attended Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts year in, year out, and has never known the distinguished conductor to be incompetent. But one complaint was that competent was "too measured" a word. "How absolute the knave is! We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us." This reviewer thought that in the course of the years he had exhausted in praise of Mr. Koussevitzky all the adjectives dear to rhapsodists except "celestial" and "sublime." He is saving these for some occasion of transcendent glory, when Mr. Koussevitzky soars into the fathomless ether and shakes the stars in their orbits.

FLORENCE, S. C.
NEWS

DEC 8 1932

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Dec. 7 —(UP)—Classical music is displaying its charms at a net loss in Boston, it appears from the latest financial statement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The statement revealed that all Symphony musicians and Symphony Hall employes, from Conductor Serge Koussevitsky down, "have unanimously agreed to contribute from their salaries an aggregate of approximately one-half the estimated deficit of $93,00C for the current season."

Plays and Players --

Forty Years After, Return To MacDowell

Two Tone-Poems of His Youth, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia" At Symphony Hall

Tran Dec 8

ON Friday and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky again offers a double bill of unusual pieces. Upon the week's program stand the paired tone-poems, "Hamlet and Ophelia," by Edward MacDowell, as revival and as mark of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the MacDowell Colony at Peterborough in New Hampshire. Parenthetically be it noted also that the occasion comes close to the twenty-fifth anniversary of the composer's death, on Jan. 23, 1908. To "Hamlet and Ophelia" the conductor adds, by way of actual novelty, the younger Cherepnin's pagan "Magna Mater," about which a note appears elsewhere on this page.

The twin tone-poems, "Hamlet," "Ophelia," are of the earliest work of MacDowell, his first venture into orchcestral paths. Once before, by way of accompaniment, he had used the orchestra—in his First Piano-Concerto in A minor, but never before had he used it independently. With the exception of the Concerto, the earlier works were all comparatively small piano-pieces or songs. "Hamlet and Ophelia" was (were?) written at Frankfort in the winter of 1884-5, when MacDowell was making excellent beginnings in Germany. The hesitation between plural or singular is explained in the following note from John F. Porte's "Edward MacDowell":

"With the appearance of 'Hamlet and Ophelia' MacDowell found his reputation considerably increasing. The work was performed in a number of German towns soon after its final appearance, and within a year following its publication (1885) the 'Ophelia' section was played in the composer's native city, New York. In the year following this latter event the 'Hamlet' section was played in the same city. The first complete performance, at Boston, was on Jan. 28, 1893, the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing with Nikisch as conductor. 'Hamlet and Ophelia' really consists of two separate poems for orchestra, and was first published in that form [is so listed on the program at Symphony Hall], but MacDowell himself afterwards authorized the alteration into one work, and named it 'First Symphonic Poem.'

"As a youthful achievement [MacDowell was twenty-four when he wrote the tone-poems] it is very fine, the creation of a gifted, though immature, tone-poet, and full of a promise that the future was amply to fulfill. The title and dedication of the work are interesting, and both indicate its link with the English dramatic world. The performance of the English Shakspearean actors, Sir Henry Irving and Ellen Terry [to whom it is dedicated], inspired MacDowell whilst in London in 1884, on his honeymoon with Mrs. MacDowell."

At the time of Nikisch's performance of "Hamlet and Ophelia" MacDowell was well established in Boston, whither he came, direct from Germany, in 1888. The Boston Orchestra had already played his First Suite in A minor, his Second Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," and, with the composer as pianist, both his concertos. William Foster Apthorp was then editor of the program books. His note is worth quoting in full, not only for the sake of the light which it throws upon the tone-poem (or poems) but also as an indication of the difficulty which they presented to a representative and amply equipped commentator of forty years ago:

"An analysis of these two 'Poems' is no very easy task. They are so absolutely free in form and construction, they have so little in common with any recognized musical form, that ordinary musical terminology is almost helpless to deal with them. The essence is poetic, imaginative, picturesque and suggestive. Unlike Berlioz, Liszt, Saint-Saëns and other writers of symphonic poems, Mr. MacDowell has accompanied his score with no descriptive or explanatory program; he lets his music speak for itself and tell its own story. And music is famous for the way it has of telling very different stories to different listeners. Here the only clue the analyst has is the titles of the two poems. That there is an intimate ideal connection between the two is evident enough: the composer seems to have taken the ground that the characters of Hamlet and Ophelia mutually complete each other, that the two form an ideal whole. The same thematic material is, to a large extent, used in both poems; and it is to be noted that certain figures which occupy the foreground in the 'Hamlet' poem play a more subordinate part in 'Ophelia,' while the principal motive of 'Ophelia' appears as a secondary theme in 'Hamlet.' More than this one hardly ventures to say, for fear of going unpardonably wrong. Perhaps, after all, it is better to say no more, to let the music tell its own story, as Mr. MacDowell evidently intended it to do, and not lead the listener astray by an exegesis that, in this case, has every chance of being fanciful and imaginary."

After the performance all the reviewers commented on the lack of a "program," on the resulting impossibility of making a "realistic" interpretation. All agreed that the performance of the two tone-poems was the event of the concert, in spite of the fact that Paderewski played his Concerto in A minor and a group of solo-pieces—the items that attracted popular attention. With one exception the reviewers agreed as to the excellence of the performance. To the dissenting critic the playing was in "a manner at once rough and boisterous, regardless of the indicated expression, and lacking in the necessary contrasts of dynamics. . . . It is to be hoped that we may yet have these compositions played under better auspices:" For his next performance he has had to wait until 1932!

Another reviewer objected to the music: "Why Hamlet, and why Ophelia, we cannot understand. If the first be to describe the moods of Hamlet, the listener is left to discover what moods. What the wildness, the incoherency and the raving of the greater part of the first movement indicate, baffles us. If this music typifies Hamlet at all, it is a Hamlet who would have run his sword through the King, his uncle, the first time he saw him after having heard the story of the Ghost. The 'Ophelia' movement is more lucid, and has a leading theme of great beauty. The work is musicianly from beginning to end, but it is a pity that it does not tell what it has to tell more clearly."

All this only forty years ago over a couple of simple little pieces! Assuredly the student of 1932, accustomed to tracing orderly design and "coherency" in the scores of Strauss or Stravinsky, can discover them in a cursory examination of MacDowell's pages. As surely, MacDowell intended broad character-sketches in the two poems rather than specific descriptions of this or that incident or this or that trait. The emotional response of Everyman's mind at the mention of Hamlet and Ophelia is his subject-matter, not definite situations in which they figure. The proper function of music—MacDowell often contended—had to do with the communication of "soul-states," leaving to words everything specific that could be best stated in that medium. To him a detailed program was an incongruity, because a story that could be told in words lay outside the purely emotional world of music. And this from a pupil and protegé of Liszt!

"Hamlet" and "Ophelia" both suggest sonata-form—those irregular, free versions of sonata-form that the later romanticists liked to design. There is a gloomy, brooding introduction to "Hamlet." The first theme, in D minor, is heroic in character. A second, lyrical, theme in F Major follows. There is development. So far everything is regular. Toward the end of the development a new theme is introduced, which must have bothered the old analysts not a little; for the precedents for such an irregularity are few indeed. It is this theme which is to be the chief motiv of "Ophelia." No more does the recapitulation run off according to prescription. The principal theme receives the lion's share of it, the second is only hinted at, and then in the heroic manner of the first; while the whole is more concise than the exposition, and leads into an even more energetic coda.

"Ophelia" begins with the melody already heard in "Hamlet," sung pianissimo by a solo-horn unaccompanied. Soon muted strings play poignant measures. The "Ophelia" theme is taken up by strings without mutes, in much brisker tempo. The heroic theme of "Hamlet" is hinted at on the way to an impassioned second theme. Again there is development, short this time, after which woodwinds, dolcissimo, play a graceful theme suggestive of the MacDowell that is yet to comer. All of which leads to a recapitulation, again made more concise as in "Hamlet." In it the violoncellos have the leading, or "Ophelia," theme. The end is quiet.

Evidently MacDowell's purpose was to distill for his hearers the emotional residue of Hamlet and Ophelia left within him when he had put by, as unessentials, the more material matter—plot, incidents and the like—of Shakspeare's play. That remainder—MacDowell believed—was matter for music, and into music he wrought it. A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Tran Dec 8

"The Pagan Piece"

NOW and again a composing father begets a composing son. Within easy recollection the elder Cherepnin—Nicolas—was guest-composer and conductor at the Symphony Concerts. Tomorrow and Saturday, music of his son, Alexander—the younger Cherepnin—will be heard there for the first times. Born in Leningrad in 1899, he is still a young man in the early thirties; yet so prolific a composer that his opus-numbers already rise into the forties. In Leningrad he studied with his father. When they preferred exile in Paris, he continued under Gedalge his study of composition; under Philippe his study of the piano. Composing in his own right, he felt the influence of Prokofiev. For the while he is settled in New York. Ten days hence, he comes to Boston to play the piano in his own Quintet for Piano and Strings at a concert of The Flute-Players' Club.

The piece to be played at Symphony Hall bears the brief title, "Magna Mater." That is to say the goddess Cybele, the "great mother" of fertility, the protectress of the generative principle, so venerated in many a pagan cult, more especially among the Egyptians. From the composer, through a friend, comes this note: "'Magna Mater' was suggested by the ancient Egyptian worship of the generative principle and the adoration of its images. Not that it contains a 'program' of any sort. Simply the idea of creation, creation eternal and constantly expanding and evolving. It contains two germinal musical elements: negative and positive, or, humanly speaking, the masculine and feminine.

"After an introductory exposition the work progresses in a steady crescendo to its climax, culminating in the rhythmic essence of the central theme. The work is conceived in such a way that the end is a sort of purified beginning, without resolution, but which may be resolved by starting all over again. It is this 'endlessness' of creation, the 'starting all over again' that may be considered the keynote of the work. It requires about eight minutes for performance. It was first played under K. A. Winter in Munich in 1929. The following year it passed to the Colonne Concerts in Paris under Pierné. It was also heard in Stuttgart that season."

More analytically A. H. M. notes a beginning, "Moderato tranquillo" for woodwind alone and in chamber-music style; a significant theme sung by the oboe; the intonation by two trumpets of a pervading rhythm; the sounding of an expressive melody by the strings in the lower registers; a pause of relaxation; a more energetic music; soon an active and aggressive march carried to climax; another motiv in the lower strings; percussive vigors; an "apotheosis" in which several previous motivs are heard. "At height it is marked by the piercing call of two trumpets, beginning in minor seconds and continuing with the theme for oboe sounded at the outset of the piece. After a few crashing chords, conclusion comes in eight measures of violent percussion unaccompanied."

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("The Scottish") ....Mendelssohn
"Prophecy," for Orchestra and Soprano Voice ....Converse
(Singer: Beata Malkin)
Symphony, No. 4, in A minor..........Sibelius

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the second supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening next:

Overture, "Roman Carnival" (Introduction to the Second Act of the Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini") ....Berlioz
Concerto in A minor for Piano and Orchestra ....Schumann
(Pianist: Eunice Norton)
Symphony, No. 2, in D major.........Sibelius

From Mme. Pons of the Metropolitan Opera House for her concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon next, Mr. Laurent, the first flute of the Symphony Orchestra assisting:

Se tu m'ami ....Pergolesi
Charmant papillon.....................Campra
Air from the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding," Mozart
Air from the Cantata, "Il Penseroso" Handel
Concertino for Flute ....Chaminade
Pamina's Air from "The Magic Flute"..Mozart
Inutile precauzione.................Klemperer
Bell Song from the Opera "Lakmé".....Delibes
Plaisir d'amour...................Padre Martini
Dormi, fanciullo..........................Wagner
Georgian Song..................Rakhmaninov
Les filles de Cadix.........................Delibes
Mad Scene from the Opera, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ....Donizetti

From the Stradivarius Quartet for its concert in the Fogg Museum at Harvard University on Friday evening of next week:

Quartet in G major (K. 887)...........Mozart
Serenade for Strings.........................Wolf
Quartet in A major (Op. 51, No. 2)....Brahms

Incidents and Prospects

The first of the two annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund is announced for Sunday afternoon, Jan. 1, with an "All-Wagner" program to mark the fiftieth year since his death at Venice in 1883.

Mr. Kreisler left Boston in some haste yesterday afternoon to take ship from New York at midnight en route to Vienna. There his operetta, "Sisi," will be produced on Dec. 23. He intends to oversee the final rehearsals and to be present at the performance. Soon afterward, he will return to the United States and complete his tour.

Concert-Chronicle

At Cambridge

Dec 9 Trans

THERE is no need to dwell upon the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge. Unusually, the program arrayed seriatim the pieces played last Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall: Four divisions of a Serenade in B-flat, by Mozart, for Wind Instruments; Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by the Elizabethan Tallis; Schubert's lyrical Symphony in C major. The usual audience awaited Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra; bestowed upon them its usual ardors of applause. It may even have heard them with a proper pride. Now and again it has listened to a piece in preparation for performance in Boston. Yesterday it listened to three made ready publicly and privately at Symphony Hall, as though for its particular pleasure.

One circumstance is worth noting. The sensitive acoustics of the wooden walled Sanders Theater suited to perfection the fragments from Mozart and the variations of Vaughan Williams. The little choir of wind instruments sounded with a richness unattainable in the larger and less reverberating Symphony Hall; while every line and every shading in their pattern-weaving ran clear. The assembled virtuosi could have asked no more sympathetic setting. There are rare modal harmonies in Vaughan Williems's Fantasia. Above Symphony Hall Sanders Theater sensitized and characterized them. Tallis's hymn-tune as straightforward and square-cut; but the Fantasia spun around it courts the heif-churchly, half-mystical voice and mood in which the composer's imagination often flows. They evaporated a little in Symphony Hall. In Sanders Theater they touched every responseive ear. Nor could so much as one hearer miss the rarefied sensibility of the performance. A little imagination and past a high altar through a mist of incense sounded Vaughan Williams's answering strings.

Ourselves and Others

For the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow Dr. Koussevitzkq sets this program:

Symphonic Poems, "Hamlet," "Ophelia," MacDowell
Symphony, No. 3, in C major..... ...Sibelius
Magna Matar .. .. A. Cherepnin
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss

In New York, Mr. Dobrowen is leading the Philharmonic Society through these numbers:

Passacaglia for Orchestra..............Jensen
Suite from the Ballet, "The Fire-Bird," Stravinsky
Symphony, No. 2, in D major........Brahms

In Philadelphia Mr. Stokowski assembles this program:

Two Movements from the "Indian Suite," MacDowell
(In War Time; Dirge)
The Raven, after Poe's Poem.. .....Dubinsky
Two Nocturnes, "Clouds," "Fetes" . Debussy
Cantata, "Le Roi de Etoiles"......Stravinsky
(Men's Chorus from the Curtis Institute)
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia"........Sibelius

The Chicago Orchestra, under Mr. Stock, will be heard in these pieces:

Symphony in D major................Mozart
Sinfonietta .... Berezovsky
Indiana Suite..........................MacDowell
Concerto, No. 2, in C minor for Piano and Orchestra ....Rakhmaninov
(Pianist: Gitta Gradova)

PERRY, OKLA.
JOURNAL

DEC [illegible]

[illegible] Orchestra [illegible]

BOSTON (UP)—[illegible] in Boston, it appears from the [illegible] statement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The statement revealed that all symphony musicians and Symphony Hall employes, from Conductor Serge [illegible] have unani[illegible] from [illegible] approximately one-half [illegible] estimated [illegible] son."

65

Plays and Players --

Forty Years After, Return To MacDowell

Two Tone-Poems of His Youth, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia" At Symphony Hall

Jan Dec 8

ON Friday and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky again offers a double bill of unusual pieces. Upon the week's program stand the paired tone-poems, "Hamlet and Ophelia," by Edward MacDowell, as revival and as mark of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the MacDowell Colony at Peterborough in New Hampshire. Parenthetically be it noted also that the occasion comes close to the twenty-fifth anniversary of the composer's death, on Jan. 23, 1908. To "Hamlet and Ophelia" the conductor adds, by way of actual novelty, the younger Cherepnin's pagan "Magna Mater," about which a note appears elsewhere on this page.

The twin tone-poems, "Hamlet," "Ophelia," are of the earliest work of MacDowell, his first venture into orchcestral paths. Once before, by way of accompaniment, he had used the orchestra—in his First Piano-Concerto in A minor, but never before had he used it independently. With the exception of the Concerto, the earlier works were all comparatively small piano-pieces or songs. "Hamlet and Ophelia" was (were?) written at Frankfort in the winter of 1884-5, when MacDowell was making excellent beginnings in Germany. The hesitation between plural or singular is explained in the following note from John F. Porte's "Edward MacDowell":

"With the appearance of 'Hamlet and Ophelia' MacDowell found his reputation considerably increasing. The work was performed in a number of German towns soon after its final appearance, and within a year following its publication (1885) the 'Ophelia' section was played in the composer's native city, New York. In the year following this latter event the 'Hamlet' section was played in the same city. The first complete performance, at Boston, was on Jan. 28, 1893, the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing with Nikisch as conductor. 'Hamlet and Ophelia' really consists of two separate poems for orchestra, and was first published in that form [is so listed on the program at Symphony Hall], but MacDowell himself afterwards authorized the alteration into one work, and named it 'First Symphonic Poem.'

"As a youthful achievement [MacDowell was twenty-four when he wrote the tone-poems] it is very fine, the creation of a gifted, though immature, tone-poet, and full of a promise that the future was amply to fulfill. The title and dedication of the work are interesting, and both indicate its link with the English dramatic world. The performance of the English Shakspearean actors, Sir Henry Irving and Ellen Terry [to whom it is dedicated], inspired MacDowell whilst in London in 1884, on his honeymoon with Mrs. MacDowell."

At the time of Nikisch's performance of "Hamlet and Ophelia" MacDowell was well established in Boston, whither he came, direct from Germany, in 1888. The Boston Orchestra had already played his First Suite in A minor, his Second Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," and, with the composer as pianist, both his concertos. William Foster Apthorp was then editor of the program books. His note is worth quoting in full, not only for the sake of the light which it throws upon the tone-poem (or poems) but also as an indication of the difficulty which they presented to a representative and amply equipped commentator of forty years ago:

"An analysis of these two 'Poems' is no very easy task. They are so absolutely free in form and construction, they have so little in common with any recognized musical form, that ordinary musical terminology is almost helpless to deal with them. The essence is poetic, imaginative, picturesque and suggestive. Unlike Berlioz, Liszt, Saint-Saëns and other writers of symphonic poems, Mr. MacDowell has accompanied his score with no descriptive or explanatory program; he lets his music speak for itself and tell its own story. And music is famous for the way it has of telling very different stories to different listeners. Here the only clue the analyst has is the titles of the two poems. That there is an intimate ideal connection between the two is evident enough: the composer seems to have taken the ground that the characters of Hamlet and Ophelia mutually complete each other, that the two form an ideal whole. The same thematic material is, to a large extent, used in both poems; and it is to be noted that certain figures which occupy the foreground in the 'Hamlet' poem play a more subordinate part in 'Ophelia,' while the principal motive of 'Ophelia' appears as a secondary theme in 'Hamlet.' More than this one hardly ventures to say, for fear of going unpardonably wrong. Perhaps, after all, it is better to say no more, to let the music tell its own story, as Mr. MacDowell evidently intended it to do, and not lead the listener astray by an exegesis that, in this case, has every chance of being fanciful and imaginary."

After the performance all the reviewers commented on the lack of a "program," on the resulting impossibility of making a "realistic" interpretation. All agreed that the performance of the two tone-poems was the event of the concert, in spite of the fact that Paderewski played his Concerto in A minor and a group of solo-pieces—the items that attracted popular attention. With one exception the reviewers agreed as to the excellence of the performance. To the dissenting critic the playing was in "a manner at once rough and boisterous, regardless of the indicated expression, and lacking in the necessary contrasts of dynamics. . . . It is to be hoped that we may yet have these compositions played under better auspices:" For his next performance he has had to wait until 1932!

Another reviewer objected to the music: "Why Hamlet, and why Ophelia, we cannot understand. If the first be to describe the moods of Hamlet, the listener is left to discover what moods. What the wildness, the incoherency and the raving of the greater part of the first movement indicate, baffles us. If this music typifies Hamlet at all, it is a Hamlet who would have run his sword through the King, his uncle, the first time he saw him after having heard the story of the Ghost. The 'Ophelia' movement is more lucid, and has a leading theme of great beauty. The work is musicianly from beginning to end, but it is a pity that it does not tell what it has to tell more clearly."

All this only forty years ago over a couple of simple little pieces! Assuredly the student of 1932, accustomed to tracing orderly design and "coherency" in the scores of Strauss or Stravinsky, can discover them in a cursory examination of MacDowell's pages. As surely, MacDowell intended broad character-sketches in the two poems rather than specific descriptions of this or that incident or this or that trait. The emotional response of Everyman's mind at the mention of Hamlet and Ophelia is his subject-matter, not definite situations in which they figure. The proper function of music—MacDowell often contended—had to do with the communication of "soul-states," leaving to words everything specific that could be best stated in that medium. To him a detailed program was an incongruity, because a story that could be told in words lay outside the purely emotional world of music. And this from a pupil and protegé of Liszt!

"Hamlet" and "Ophelia" both suggest sonata-form—those irregular, free versions of sonata-form that the later romanticists liked to design. There is a gloomy, brooding introduction to "Hamlet." The first theme, in D minor, is heroic in character. A second, lyrical, theme in F Major follows. There is development. So far everything is regular. Toward the end of the development a new theme is introduced, which must have bothered the old analysts not a little; for the precedents for such an irregularity are few indeed. It is this theme which is to be the chief motiv of "Ophelia." No more does the recapitulation run off according to prescription. The principal theme receives the lion's share of it, the second is only hinted at, and then in the heroic manner of the first; while the whole is more concise than the exposition, and leads into an even more energetic coda.

"Ophelia" begins with the melody already heard in "Hamlet," sung pianissimo by a solo-horn unaccompanied. Soon muted strings play poignant measures. The "Ophelia" theme is taken up by strings without mutes, in much brisker tempo. The heroic theme of "Hamlet" is hinted at on the way to an impassioned second theme. Again there is development, short this time, after which woodwinds, dolcissimo, play a graceful theme suggestive of the MacDowell that is yet to come. All of which leads to a recapitulation, again made more concise as in "Hamlet." In it the violoncellos have the leading, or "Ophelia," theme. The end is quiet.

Evidently MacDowell's purpose was to distill for his hearers the emotional residue of Hamlet and Ophelia left within him when he had put by, as unessentials, the more material matter—plot, incidents and the like—of Shakspeare's play. That remainder—MacDowell believed—was matter for music, and into music he wrought it. A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Jan Dec 8

"The Pagan Piece"

NOW and again a composing father begets a composing son. Within easy recollection the elder Cherepnin—Nicolas—was guest-composer and conductor at the Symphony Concerts. Tomorrow and Saturday, music of his son, Alexander—the younger Cherepnin—will be heard there for the first times. Born in Leningrad in 1899, he is still a young man in the early thirties; yet so prolific a composer that his opus-numbers already rise into the forties. In Leningrad he studied with his father. When they preferred exile in Paris, he continued under Gedalge his study of composition; under Philippe his study of the piano. Composing in his own right, he felt the influence of Prokofiev. For the while he is settled in New York. Ten days hence, he comes to Boston to play the piano in his own Quintet for Piano and Strings at a concert of The Flute-Players' Club.

The piece to be played at Symphony Hall bears the brief title, "Magna Mater." That is to say the goddess Cybele, the "great mother" of fertility, the protectress of the generative principle, so venerated in many a pagan cult, more especially among the Egyptians. From the composer, through a friend, comes this note: "'Magna Mater' was suggested by the ancient Egyptian worship of the generative principle and the adoration of its images. Not that it contains a 'program' of any sort. Simply the idea of creation, creation eternal and constantly expanding and evolving. It contains two germinal musical elements: negative and positive, or, humanly speaking, the masculine and feminine.

"After an introductory exposition the work progresses in a steady crescendo to its climax, culminating in the rhythmic essence of the central theme. The work is conceived in such a way that the end is a sort of purified beginning, without resolution, but which may be resolved by starting all over again. It is this 'endlessness' of creation, th' 'starting all over again' that may be considered the keynote of the work. It requires about eight minutes for performance. It was first played under K. A. Winter in Munich in 1929. The following year it passed to the Colonne Concerts in Paris under Pierné. It was also heard in Stuttgart that season."

More analytically A. H. M. notes a beginning, "Moderato tranquillo" for woodwind alone and in chamber-music style; a significant theme sung by the oboe; the intonation by two trumpets of a pervading rhythm; the sounding of an expressive melody by the strings in the lower registers; a pause of relaxation; a more energetic music; soon an active and aggressive march carried to climax; another motiv in the lower strings; percussive vigors; an "apotheosis" in which several previous motives are heard. "At height it is marked by the piercing cull of two trumpets, beginning in minor seconds and continuing with the theme for oboe sounded at the outset of the piece. After a few crashing chords, conclusion comes in eight measures of violent percussion unaccompanied."

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("The Scottish") .... Mendelssohn
"Prophecy," for Orchestra and Soprano Voice .... Converse
(Singer: Beata Malkin)
Symphony, No. 4, in A minor .... Sibelius

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the second supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening next:

Overture, "Roman Carnival" (Introduction to the Second Act of the Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini") .... Berlioz
Concerto in A minor for Piano and Orchestra .... Schumann
(Pianist: Eunice Norton)
Symphony, No. 2, in D major .... Sibelius

From Mme. Pons of the Metropolitan Opera House for her concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon next, Mr. Laurent, the first flute of the Symphony Orchestra assisting:

Se tu m'ami .... Pergolesi
Charmant papillon .... Campra
Air from the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding," Mozart
Air from the Cantata, "Il Penseroso" Handel
Concertino for Flute .... Chaminade
Pamina's Air from "The Magic Flute" .. Mozart
Inutile precauzione .... Klemperer
Bell Song from the Opera "Lakmé" .... Delibes
Plaisir d'amour .... Padre Martini
Dormi, fanciullo .... Wagner
Georgian Song .... Rakhmaninov
Les filles de Cadix .... Delibes
Mad Scene from the Opera, "Lucia di Lammermoor" .... Donizetti

From the Stradivarius Quartet for its concert in the Fogg Museum at Harvard University on Friday evening of next week:

Quartet in G major (K. 887) .... Mozart
Serenade for Strings .... Wolf
Quartet in A major (Op. 51, No. 2) .... Brahms

Incidents and Prospects

The first of the two annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund is announced for Sunday afternoon, Jan. 1, with an "All-Wagner" program to mark the fiftieth year since his death at Venice in 1883.

Mr. Kreisler left Boston in some haste yesterday afternoon to take ship from New York at midnight en route to Vienna. There his operetta, "Sisi," will be produced on Dec. 23. He intends to oversee the final rehearsals and to be present at the performance. Soon afterward, he will return to the United States and complete his tour.

Concert-Chronicle

At Cambridge

Dec 9 Trans

THERE is no need to dwell upon the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge. Unusually, the program arrayed seriatim the pieces played last Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall: Four divisions of a Serenade in B-flat, by Mozart, for Wind Instruments; Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by the Elizabethan Tallis; Schubert's lyrical Symphony in C major. The usual audience awaited Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra; bestowed upon them its usual ardors of applause. It may even have heard them with a proper pride. Now and again it has listened to a piece in preparation for performance in Boston. Yesterday it listened to three made ready publicly and privately at Symphony Hall, as though for its particular pleasure.

One circumstance is worth noting. The sensitive acoustics of the wooden walled Sanders Theater suited to perfection the fragments from Mozart and the variations of Vaughan Williams. The little choir of wind instruments sounded with a richness unattainable in the larger and less reverberating Symphony Hall; while every line and every shading in their pattern-weaving ran clear. The assembled virtuosi could have asked no more sympathetic setting. There are rare modal harmonies in Vaughan Williems's Fantasia. Above Symphony Hall Sanders Theater sensitized and characterized them. Tallis's hymn-tune as straightforward and square-cut; but the Fantasia spun around it courts the helf-churchly, half-mystical voice and mood in which the composer's imagination often flows. They evaporated a little in Symphony Hall. In Sanders Theater they touched every responseive ear. Nor could so much as one hearer miss the rarefied sensibility of the performance. A little imagination and past a high altar through a mist of incense sounded Vaughan Williams's answering strings.

Ourselves and Others

For the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow Dr. Koussevitzkq sets this program:

Symphonic Poems, "Hamlet," "Ophelia," MacDowell
Symphony, No. 3, in C major .... Sibelius
Magna Matar .... A. Cherepnin
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss

In New York, Mr. Dobrowen is leading the Philharmonic Society through these numbers:

Passacaglia for Orchestra .... Jensen
Suite from the Ballet, "The Fire-Bird," Stravinsky
Symphony, No. 2, in D major .... Brahms

In Philadelphia Mr. Stokowski assembles this program:

Two Movements from the "Indian Suite," MacDowell
(In War Time; Dirge)
The Raven, after Poe's Poem .... Dubinsky
Two Nocturnes, "Clouds," "Fetes" . Debussy
Cantata, "Le Roi de Etoiles" ...... Stravinsky
(Men's Chorus from the Curtis Institute)
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia" .... Sibelius

The Chicago Orchestra, under Mr. Stock, will be heard in these pieces:

Symphony in D major .... Mozart
Sinfonietta .... Berezovsky
Indiana Suite .... MacDowell
Concerto, No. 2, in C minor for Piano and Orchestra .... Rakhmaninov
(Pianist: Gitta Gradova)

PERRY, OKLA.
JOURNAL

DEC 9

Symphony Orchestra Statement Shows Loss

BOSTON (UP)—Classical music is displaying its charm at a net loss in Boston, it appears from the latest financial statement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The statement revealed that all Symphony musicians and Symphony Hall employes, from Conductor Serge Koussevitsky down, "have unanimously agreed to contribute from their salaries an aggregate of approximately one-half the estimated deficit of $93,000 for the current season."

Trans

Symphony

Dec 10

All Sorts and Conditions Of Music-Making

From MacDowell to Cherepnin Strauss to Sibelius Cybele to Hamlet

TWO young composers had place, yesterday, in the Symphony Concert: the dead Edward MacDowell with his paired tone-poems, "Hamlet," "Ophelia" of 1885; the living, and present, Alexander Cherepnin with his "Magna Mater" of 1927. MacDowell's pieces were ressurrected as items in a simultaneous tribute, by the major American orchestras, to his memory and achievement. Only by such means, seemingly, can his music now be restored to the concert-hall. The particular occasion was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the MacDowell Colony at Peterborough, to be refuge for composers, poets, painters, in the throes of creation. In New York, the Philharmonic Society set apart a concert with speech-making, with honors to MacDowell's widow, still the guiding genius of the colony, with the receipts for increase to its now restricted income. In Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago, numbers from his music sufficed. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Stock merely pulled from the shelves the "Indian Suite" that passes for his maturest, if not most characteristic, orchestral work; rehearsed and played fragments or the whole; let it go at that. Dr. Koussevitzky preferred to go exploring; chanced upon the two tone-poems; fancied them; fetched them back to the Symphony Concerts for the first time in nearly forty years. (Next to never are they now exhumed anywhere.) Possibly no one who heard them from Nikisch, in 1893, listened to them on Friday, save only the venerable sage of the program-book, friend to the composer in his Bostonian days.

Both tone-poems are characteristic of MacDowell and their musical time. Though he was only in the middle twenties when he wrote them, was still, in a sense, making his studies in Germany, he handles matter and design skilfully enough. The recurrence in principal or secondary place of defining motivs interlocks the paired pieces. A craftsman, sufficiently practised, shapes, conducts and details both within the customary romantic procedure of the tune, now and again with unassertive individuality. He exhibits also a discreet feeling for the instrumental voices that seldom exceeds appropriate coloring. He is concerned with no ordained or avowed program; only with the reactions of his composing mind, imagination and emotions to the spiritual substance, or residue, of Hamlet and Ophelia set in contrast.

What impresses the detached hearer of 1932 is the tameness of the outcome. "Hamlet" broods; but in our sense of the word, there is no intensity in the brooding. The Hamlet motivs stir about restlessly, but with little suggestion of a high, heroical spirit self-tortured between thought, will and deed. The poem of Ophelia would be tender, piteous, poignant; but it may be doubted whether it much touches our hardened post-war ears and hearts. Gracefully it comes and goes. Both are nicely conceived, nicely made, intelligent, sensitive music; but there they stop; tangless to another generation. Playing the tone-poems, the manifold Koussevitzky imparted both the musical texture and the poetizing quality. The later piano-sonatas, the Indian Suite for orchestra, spring from a maturer, stouter-spirited, more rhapsodic MacDowell.

Out of Russia often something unexpected, even if it comes by way of Paris and New York. We listened to a fierce, barbaric, quasi-oriental music; then at the call of Dr. Koussevitzky and the applause, a clear-eyed, calm-faced, young man of cosmopolitan manner, rose from his place to bow thanks—the younger Cherepnin, Alexander Nicolaievitch, for the first time transported to these concerts. For the first time also some of us discovered—or believed we had discovered—that, though Prokofiev is still in the early forties, there is already a Prokofiev tradition for younger composers to follow. Not that Mr. Cherepnin's tonal pageant of the Egyptian "Great Mother" of fertility imitates in measures here, in measures there, the elder Russian. Mr. Cherepnin's temperman n, one suspects, absorbs rather than copies. But the whole impression of "Magna Mater" sends the listening mind back to the temple music in the young Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," with side-glances toward a Stravinsky who was little more than thirty when he wrote "Le Sacre." Mr. Cherepnin's pageant-music is as barbaric in spirit as Prokofiev's. It catches as well Prokofiev's fierce clang and splotched color. No more has the younger composer forgotten the impact of Stravinsky's rhythms, and timbres.

Which is not to say, again, that "Magna Mater" is merely tone-picturing of tumultuous processional and barbaric rites in the worship of Cybele and the symbols of generation. There is an idea within it, expressed in the interplay of two pervading motivs—the exhaustless fertility of the Great Mother of the earth and of all that are upon it, the incarnation of nature itself. In her abundance there is neither end nor beginning; only endlessness. Perhaps without Mr. Cherepnin's program-note it would leave the hearer merely puzzled. But it is there none the less. Other men of our generation have taken thought of it; Mr. O'Neill, for example, in "The Great God Brown." What lingers in recollection is the rhythm, the clang, the color of Mr. Cherepnin's music—the piercing proclamation by his trumpets, the fierce beat of his naked drums and cymbals. Here—one says to one's self—is the composer who should write scenic music for Antony and Cleopatra—in or out of the theater.

Sibelius and Strauss, for two master-spirits of our musical time, divided the remainder of the concert; but, as some would say, with secondary works. There is not a little to be said for "Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration"; but it is no "Don Quixote," "Don Juan" or even "Ein Heldenleben." Scarcely a conductor in the Western World, except Dr. Koussevitzky, keeps Sibelius's Third Symphony (in C major) in the active or the occasional repertory; while most of the commentators treat it rather patronizingly as "a transitional piece." To the audiences that first heard it in Helsingfors, Leningrad and London twenty-five years ago, it could have been no more than half such. They knew what had gone before in the first two Symphonies; but they knew not at all what was to come after in the succeeding four. We of 1932 do and discover foretelling signs and wonders in this little Third Symphony, in three movements and less than half an hour long. Especially on the technical side. Here beginneth the Sibelius of lean textures, wise speech and economical means; the Sibelius who subtilizes his string choir, who makes play with rhythmic figures until he has wrought them into a cohesive, generative music.

But did the early hearers of this Third Symphony recognize and heed these traits so much as they noted and took pleasure in other qualities? Say in the interest and the felicity of details that Dr. Koussevitzky fuses with unfailing perception and skill. Say, again, in the clear simplicities and the folk-song voice of the second movement, as though Sibelius saw the knitters in the pale summer sunshine of a still and solitary land and for the instant gave them musical speech. Say once more in the gathering of the figures that begin the last movement into a fused, upswelling music penetrated and propelled by a single rhythm as though Sibelius would thin, condense and idealize his earlier habit of sonorously expansive finales. Or in the directness and the animation of the first movement. Or in the lyrical quality of the whole. This Third Symphony savors of the soil and the folk as well as of the individual composer. It is the last symphony in which Sibelius is simple, and, as in the middle movement, songful.

Most to be noted in "Death and Transfiguration" was Dr. Koussevitzky's handling of the tone-poem. Few conductors are so discerning with Strauss; so apt in the perception of the true metal and the dross, so imaginative and adept in the projection of the one and the cloaking of the other. In these later years he poetizes the "Sinfonia Domestica"; almost waves away its commonplace and cheapness in humor. He fastens upon all that is most significant and impressive in "Ein Heldenleben"; to it proportions the rest. He makes out of "Don Quixote" (which ought soon to be repeated) the luminous character-piece that Strauss designed, even if from that design the composer sometimes lapses.

Now it was the turn of "Death and Transfiguration" to undergo this divination and cleansing. There are conductors who roll out the final pages into trailing clouds of tonal rhetoric; others who "c r- :us" them into the surge and thunder, not of the Apocalypse but of an apotheosis stage-style. For his part Dr. Koussevitzky concentrates and subdues them into mystical glow. Strauss, rolling in C major, is "redeemed" as well as the protagonist of his tone-poem. . . . Take again the measures in which memories of childhood return to the dying man. Seeking simplicity Strauss is almost banal in his inventions. Dr. Koussevitzky clears them of sentiment; persuades them into tender, haunting sound. When opportunity offers, no less does he improve it—in the wan and feverish beginning; through the pages that glorify the battle of youth and manhood for loyalties and ideals; when Death hammers to destroy; in the transition of the soul's flight into deliverance. There is not too much of the greater Strauss in "Death and Transfiguration"; but every note of him Dr. Koussevitzky sets sounding through a plangent orchestra.

H. T. P.

Symphony Plays MacDowell Work

Trav Dec 10

Events often conspire to shape symphony programs. This being the week set aside for commemoration of the founding of the now famous MacDowell colony, Dr. Koussevitzky joined in nation-wide observance by taking down from his library shelves "Hamlet and Ophelia," MacDowell's first orchestral venture. Would this work have been played except for the specal occasion? It does not seem probable. Yet 40 years after their first hearing here, the twin tone poems sounded still fresh, still interesting.

Being thus inclined, Dr. Koussevitzky saw fit to fill out his program with three other works, all by living composers. After MacDowell came another symphony in the Sibelian cycle, the third. Tcherepnin the younger was given a hearing with a first performance in this country of his "Magna Mater." And last on the program stood the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration."

In material, in themes, the Sibelius symphony seemed barren. It was as though the composer, after his impassioned second symphony, had grown suddenly inarticulate. And the work has little right to be called symphony: it has only three movements; it is taken at almost a single tempo throughout; it lacks a slow movement and a scherzo. But Sibelius has nevertheless built a piece that, if not imposing, is at least pleasing.

This is more than may be said of Tcherepnin. To this reviewer from first hand comes knowledge that the composer had a desire to write at once in both major and minor, that the music of oriental races among which he lived as a child suggested chords and scales which brought fulfillment of the desire. If the purpose of this unusual musical grammar is to baffle the occidental ear, Tcherepnin seemingly had a great success yesterday.

After all this, "Death and Transfiguration" fell on welcome ears. The death motive, the haunting song of memory, the struggle for life, the passing, and the transfiguration all sounded mightily important—as they are and always should be.

H. C. C.

Dec. 10

E BOSTON HERALD, SATU

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra's eighth concert took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: MacDowell, Two Tone Poems: Hamlet-Ophelia. Sibelius, Symphony, No. 3. Tcherepnin, A., "Magna Mater" (first time in the United States). Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration."

The leading orchestras in this country agreed to commemorate the founding of the MacDowell colony at Peterboro, N. H., by performing a work by that composer. Dr. Koussevitzky's choice was "Hamlet-Ophelia," written at Frankfort in the winter of 1884-85. The composer was then 24 years old. There had been a half-dozen performances in Germany; the tone poems had been heard in New York before MacDowell came to Boston. The first performance in Boston was by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Arthur Nilkisch in 1893.

Other orchestras in commemoration chose the "Dirge" from the "Indian" suite which without doubt is his finest woork, yet there is a romantic flavor to "Ophelia" that is peculiarly MacDowellian. Perhaps here and there it shows the influence of Raff, who was MacDowell's teacher, but this influence is not disturbing. These tone poems are dedicated to Irving and Terry. The composer having seen them in London was greatly impressed. In this instance Miss Terry probably appealed to him more than Irving if the music is informing. But what orchestral composer has been fortunate in portraying the character of Hamlet in tones? Or for that matter, the character of any hero in drama or in life? Beethoven, yes; witness his "Coriolanus" overture. Who remembers the "Hamlet" of Tchaikovsky's symphonic poem? Not by the portrayal of Hamlet; chiefly by the music for the appearance of the ghost on the platform. Who recalls a measure of Liszt's "Hamlet"?

A composer can only write measures, now of a melancholy nature, now wildly excited; with a musical allusion to Hamlet's love for Ophelia or grief over her death. In MacDowell's poem there comes twice the suggestion of a funeral march; for Ophelia? for Hamlet? To write music that the hearer can say, without a title, "That must be Hamlet" is beyond the power of any composer. Music for Ophelia is an easier task if "Ophelia" is the title. MacDowell very sensibly gave no list of themes for either poem; he furnished no "key." He undoubtedly remembered that Shakesperian commentators are not agreed as to Hamlet's character, nor have the actors presented one and the same character. "Hamlet" is interesting chiefly as an early work of a man blessed with a romantic imaginative nature. "Ophelia" is beautiful music and would be whatever the title.

A friend of Alexander Tcherepnin writes that "Magna Mater" was suggested by the ancient Egyptian cult of Phallus adoration. Herodotus gives interesting details concerning this cult and a Phallic procession, but these details are hardly suitable for quotation in a program book prepared for staid and proper Bostonians. Even the enthusiastic George Isardov contented himself with exclaiming, with reference to Tcherepnin's work: "Great Mother! Mother of Earth! Immense Producer! Every one comes from Thee and returns to Thee!" The composer is a little more explicit, the work does not contain a program of any sort; "simply the idea of creation, eternal and constantly expanding, evolving." There are "two germinal elements, negative and positive, or humanly speaking the masculine and feminine." "The ending is a sort of purified beginning, without resolution, but which may be resolved by starting all over again." The audience did not imperiously demand a repetition although the duration of the performance was only eight minutes. "Magna Mater" needs a more detailed analysis than that given by the composer. There were some in the audience no doubt who were disappointed at not being able to identify a Phallus theme. "Magna Mater" is in the ultra modern vein. It does not seem to us after one hearing a work of marked importance musical, religous, anthropological or even ethnological. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did their best to present the work favorably. The composer was called to bow his appreciation of his reception and the performance.

The program book stated that the 3d symphony of Sibelius was performed for the first time. It was heard here in 1928. The error came from a sudden change in the program. The notes for that performance in 1928 were hastily inserted without time for careful revision. In contrast to the prevailing mood of much of Sibelius's music, the symphony is for the most part delightfully cheerful. And there is a haunting charm to the persistent figure in the second movement.

Straus's familiar tone poem was played dramatically. The impressive ending was solemnly sonorous. It seemed to some that the pace of the introduction was unusually slow, but this was in fine contrast to the feverish allegro. The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of next week: Sibelius, Symphony No. 4, A minor. Converse, "Prophecy," tone poem for soprano (Beata Malkin) and orchestra. Mendelssohn, Symphony in A minor ("Scotch"). Converse's work will be performed for the first time.

COOLIDGE PRIZE

The Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge prize of $1000, offered in 1932 by the library of Congress under the provisions of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, has been awarded to a string sextet by Bohuslav Martinu. The jury consisted of John Alden Carpenter, Olin Downes, Serge Koussevitzky, Louis Persinger, and Carl Engel, ex-officio. The number of eligible compositions submitted was 145. Besides the United States, Canada, and South America, the contestants represented almost every country of Europe, as well as Australia, North and South Africa, and the Philippines. The prize winning work will have its first public performance at the Library of Congress on April 25, 1933.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 10

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Two poems for orchestra, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," by Edward MacDowell, stand at the top of the Symphony program this week. They are played as the Boston Symphony's part in the Nation-wide observance of the 25th aniversary of the founding of the MacDowell Colony at Peterboro, N H. The remaining pieces are Alexander Tcherepnin's "Magna Mater," op 41; Sibelius' Third Symphony in C major and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration.'

MacDowell's poems, according to record, had been played in Boston only once before, in 1893 by the Boston Symphony. He composed them in Germany in 1884, when he was 23. MacDowell was inspired by a performance in London of Shakespeare's drama in which Ellen Terry and Henry Irving played, and dedicated his score to them. MacDowell furnished no program or explanatory note, wisely leaving the listener to guess what was expressed in the music.

Why these pieces have gone unheard here for 39 years is puzzling. They are well written, tasteful in material, gracious and charming. They would adorn a program of any orchestra. "Ophelia," especially, is a study in instrumental delicacy, and one does not have to overwork the imagination to associate the piece with the gentle play. The ia" is exe fact that y of style ooked; the of these rrant their future than commendasearch out ast known the obvious uite."

na Mater"
nce in the
The com-Tcherepnin, oston Symng some of ater" is the cherepnin's orchestra.
t the work
cient Egyptian cult of Phallus adoration" and contains "simply the idea of creation—creation eternal and constantly expanding and evolving." The piece is, of course, modern in style, and highly rhythmic. The employment of percussion instruments is entertaining. One of the virtues of "Magna Mater" is its brevity. It was politely applauded yesterday. Mr Tcherepnin, who was in the audience, acknowledged the approval from the front of the hall.

Sibelius' Third Symphony is a curiously baffling masterpiece. It runs along quietly and, like the Fourth Symphony, in A minor, has the aspect of an orchestral improvisation. Much of the material and treatment seems almost trivial, although this is not so, and at the end, one never fails to want to hear the work again. Sibelius sometimes makes his points very quietly, and it frequently takes the casual listener a little time to grasp them.

Dr Koussevitzky's performance of "Death and Transfiguration" seemed the best that one has ever heard from him. The lyrical portions took on a poignancy so moving that one almost forgot those mighty sonorous climaxes where Strauss nearly succeeds in shaking the firmament.

Frederick Converse's new tone poem, "Prophecy," will be given first performance next week, with Beata Malkin, soprano, as soloist. Sibelius' Fourth Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony will also be played.

C. W. D.

Trans

Page Four

Symphony

Dec 10

All Sorts and Conditions Of Music-Making

From MacDowell to Cherepnin Strauss to Sibelius Cybele to Hamlet

TWO young composers had place, yesterday, in the Symphony Concert: the dead Edward MacDowell with his paired tone-poems, "Hamlet," "Ophelia" of 1885; the living, and present, Alexander Cherepnin with his "Magna Mater" of 1927. MacDowell's pieces were ressurrected as items in a simultaneous tribute, by the major American orchestras, to his memory and achievement. Only by such means, seemingly, can his music now be restored to the concert-hall. The particular occasion was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the MacDowell Colony at Peterborough, to be refuge for composers, poets, painters, in the throes of creation. In New York, the Philharmonic Society set apart a concert with speech-making, with honors to MacDowell's widow, still the guiding genius of the colony, with the receipts for increase to its now restricted income. In Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago, numbers from his music sufficed. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Stock merely pulled from the shelves the "Indian Suite" that passes for his maturest, if not most characteristic, orchestral work; rehearsed and played fragments or the whole; let it go at that. Dr. Koussevitzky preferred to go exploring; chanced upon the two tone-poems; fancied them; fetched them back to the Symphony Concerts for the first time in nearly forty years. (Next to never are they now exhumed anywhere.) Possibly no one who heard them from Nikisch, in 1893, listened to them on Friday, save only the venerable sage of the program-book, friend to the composer in his Bostonian days.

Both tone-poems are characteristic of MacDowell and their musical time. Though he was only in the middle twenties when he wrote them, was still, in a sense, making his studies in Germany, he handles matter and design skilfully enough. The recurrence in principal or secondary place of defining motivs interlocks the paired pieces. A craftsman, sufficiently practised, shapes, conducts and details both within the customary romantic procedure of the tune, now and again with unassertive individuality. He exhibits also a discreet feeling for the instrumental voices that seldom exceeds appropriate coloring. He is concerned with no ordained or avowed program; only with the reactions of his composing mind, imagination and emotions to the spiritual substance, or residue, of Hamlet and Ophelia set in contrast.

What impresses the detached hearer of 1932 is the tameness of the outcome. "Hamlet" broods; but in our sense of the word, there is no intensity in the brooding. The Hamlet motivs stir about restlessly, but with little suggestion of a high, heroical spirit self-tortured between thought, will and deed. The poem of Ophelia would be tender, piteous, poignant; but it may be doubted whether it much touches our hardened post-war ears and hearts. Gracefully it comes and goes. Both are nicely conceived, nicely made, intelligent, sensitive music; but there they stop; tangless to another generation. Playing the tone-poems, the manifold Koussevitzky imparted both the musical texture and the poetizing quality. The later piano-sonatas, the Indian Suite for orchestra, spring from a maturer, stouter-spirited, more rhapsodic MacDowell.

Out of Russia often something unexpected, even if it comes by way of Paris and New York. We listened to a fierce, barbaric, quasi-oriental music; then at the call of Dr. Koussevitzky and the applause, a clear-eyed, calm-faced, young man of cosmopolitan manner, rose from his place to bow thanks—the younger Cherepnin, Alexander Nicolaievitch, for the first time transported to these concerts. For the first time also some of us discovered—or believed we had discovered—that, though Prokofiev is still in the early forties, there is already a Prokofiev tradition for younger composers to follow. Not that Mr. Cherepnin's tonal pageant of the Egyptian "Great Mother" of fertility imitates in measures here, in measures there, the elder Russian. Mr. Cherepnin's temperman n., one suspects, absorbs rather than copies. But the whole impression of "Magna Mater" sends the listening mind back to the temple music in the young Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," with side-glances toward a Stravinsky who was little more than thirty when he wrote "Le Sacre." Mr. Cherepnin's pageant-music is as barbaric in spirit as Prokofiev's. It catches as well Prokofiev's fierce clang and splotched color. No more has the younger composer forgotten the impact of Stravinsky's rhythms, and timbres.

Which is not to say, again, that "Magna Mater" is merely tone-picturing of tumultuous processional and barbaric rites in the worship of Cybele and the symbols of generation. There is an idea within it, expressed in the interplay of two pervading motivs—the exhaustless fertility of the Great Mother of the earth and of all that are upon it, the incarnation of nature itself. In her abundance there is neither end nor beginning; only endlessness. Perhaps without Mr. Cherepnin's program-note it would leave the hearer merely puzzled. But it is there none the less. Other men of our generation have taken thought of it; M . O'Neill, for example, in "The Great God Brown." [illegible] recollection is the rhythm, the clang, the color of Mr. Cherepnin's music—the piercing proclamation by his trumpets, the fierce beat of his naked drums and cymbals. Here—one says to one's self—is the composer who should write scenic music for Antony and Cleopatra—in or out of the theater.

Sibelius and Strauss, for two master-spirits of our musical time, divided the remainder of the concert; but, as some would say, with secondary works. There is not a little to be said for "Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration"; but it is no "Don Quixote," "Don Juan" or even "Ein Heldenleben." Scarcely a conductor in the Western World, except Dr. Koussevitzky, keeps Sibelius's Third Symphony (in C major) in the active or the occasional repertory; while most of the commentators treat it rather patronizingly as "a transitional piece." To the audiences that first heard it in Helsingfors, Leningrad and London twenty-five years ago, it could have been no more than half such. They knew what had gone before in the first two Symphonies; but they knew not at all what was to come after in the succeeding four. We of 1932 do and discover foretelling signs and wonders in this little Third Symphony, in three movements and less than half an hour long. Especially on the technical side. Here beginneth the Sibelius of lean textures, wise speech and economical means; the Sibelius who subtilizes his string choir, who makes play with rhythmic figures until he has wrought them into a cohesive, generative music.

But did the early hearers of this Third Symphony recognize and heed these traits so much as they noted and took pleasure in other qualities? Say in the interest and the felicity of details that Dr. Koussevitzky fuses with unfailing perception and skill. Say, again, in the clear simplicities and the folk-song voice of the second movement, as though Sibelius saw the knitters in the pale summer sunshine of a still and solitary land and for the instant gave them musical speech. Say once more in the gathering of the figures that begin the last movement into a fused, upswelling music penetrated and propelled by a single rhythm as though Sibelius would thin, condense and idealize his earlier habit of sonorously expansive finales. Or in the directness and the animation of the first movement. Or in the lyrical quality of the whole. This Third Symphony savors of the soil and the folk as well as of the individual composer. It is the last symphony in which Sibelius is simple, and, as in the middle movement, songful.

Most to be noted in "Death and Transfiguration" was Dr. Koussevitzky's handling of the tone-poem. Few conductors are so discerning with Strauss; so apt in the perception of the true metal and the dross, so imaginative and adept in the projection of the one and the cloaking of the other. In these later years he poetizes the "Sinfonia Domestica"; almost waves away its commonplace and cheapness in humor. He fastens upon all that is most significant and impressive in "Ein Heldenleben"; to it proportions the rest. He makes out of "Don Quixote" (which ought soon to be repeated) the luminous character-piece that Strauss designed, even if from that design the composer sometimes lapses.

Now it was the turn of "Death and Transfiguration" to undergo this divination and cleansing. There are conductors who roll out the final pages into trailing clouds of tonal rhetoric; others who "circus" them into the surge and thunder, not of the Apocalypse but of an apotheosis stage-style. For his part Dr. Koussevitzky concentrates and subdues them into mystical glow. Strauss, rolling in C major, is "redeemed" as well as the protagonist of his tone-poem. . . . Take again the measures in which memories of childhood return to the dying man. Seeking simplicity Strauss is almost banal in his inventions. Dr. Koussevitzky clears them of sentiment; persuades them into tender, haunting sound. When opportunity offers, no less does he improve it—in the wan and feverish beginning; through the pages that glorify the battle of youth and manhood for loyalties and ideals; when Death hammers to destroy; in the transition of the soul's flight into deliverance. There is not too much of the greater Strauss in "Death and Transfiguration"; but every note of him Dr. Koussevitzky sets sounding through a plangent orchestra.

H. T. P.

Symphony Plays MacDowell Work

Trav Dec 10

Events often conspire to shape symphony programs. This being the week set aside for commemoration of the founding of the now famous MacDowell colony, Dr. Koussevitzky joined in nation-wide observance by taking down from his library shelves "Hamlet and Ophelia," MacDowell's first orchestral venture. Would this work have been played except for the specal occasion? It does not seem probable. Yet 40 years after their first hearing here, the twin tone poems sounded still fresh, still interesting.

Being thus inclined, Dr. Koussevitzky saw fit to fill out his program with three other works, all by living composers. After MacDowell came another symphony in the Sibelian cycle, the third. Tcherepnin the younger was given a hearing with a first performance in this country of his "Magna Mater." And last on the program stood the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration."

In material, in themes, the Sibelius symphony seemed barren. It was as though the composer, after his impassioned second symphony, had grown suddenly inarticulate. And the work has little right to be called symphony: it has only three movements; it is taken at almost a single tempo throughout; it lacks a slow movement and a scherzo. But Sibelius has nevertheless built a piece that, if not imposing, is at least pleasing.

This is more than may be said of Tcherepnin. To this reviewer from first hand comes knowledge that the composer had a desire to write at once in both major and minor, that the music of oriental races among which he lived as a child suggested chords and scales which brought fulfillment of the desire. If the purpose of this unusual musical grammar is to baffle the occidental ear, Tcherepnin seemingly had a great success yesterday.

After all this, "Death and Transfiguration" fell on welcome ears. The death motive, the haunting song of memory, the struggle for life, the passing, and the transfiguration all sounded mightily important—as they are and always should be.

H. C. C.

Dec. 10

E BOSTON HERALD, SATU

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra's eighth concert took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: MacDowell, Two Tone Poems: Hamlet-Ophelia. Sibelius, Symphony, No. 3. Tcherepnin, A., "Magna Mater" (first time in the United States). Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration."

The leading orchestras in this country agreed to commemorate the founding of the MacDowell colony at Peterboro, N. H., by performing a work by that composer. Dr. Koussevitzky's choice was "Hamlet-Ophelia," written at Frankfort in the winter of 1884-85. The composer was then 24 years old. There had been a half-dozen performances in Germany; the tone poems had been heard in New York before MacDowell came to Boston. The first performance in Boston was by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Arthur Nilkisch in 1893.

Other orchestras in commemoration chose the "Dirge" from the "Indian" suite which without doubt is his finest woork, yet there is a romantic flavor to "Ophelia" that is peculiarly MacDowellian. Perhaps here and there it shows the influence of Raff, who was MacDowell's teacher, but this influence is not disturbing. These tone poems are dedicated to Irving and Terry. The composer having seen them in London was greatly impressed. In this instance Miss Terry probably appealed to him more than Irving if the music is informing. But what orchestral composer has been fortunate in portraying the character of Hamlet in tones? Or for that matter, the character of any hero in drama or in life? Beethoven, yes; witness his "Coriolanus" overture. Who remembers the "Hamlet" of Tchaikovsky's symphonic poem? Not by the portrayal of Hamlet; chiefly by the music for the appearance of the ghost on the platform. Who recalls a measure of Liszt's "Hamlet"?

A composer can only write measures, now of a melancholy nature, [illegible] wildly excited; with a musical al- [illegible] love for Ophelia or [illegible]

[illegible] teresting [illegible] and a Phallic proce[illegible] details are hardly suitable for [illegible] in a program book prepared for staid and proper Bostonians. Even the enthusiastic George Isardov contented himself with exclaiming, with reference to Tcherepnin's work: "Great Mother! Mother of Earth! Immense Producer! Every one comes from Thee and returns to Thee!" The composer is a little more explicit, the work does not contain a program of any sort; "simply the idea of creation, eternal and constantly expanding, evolving." There are "two germinal elements, negative and positive, or humanly speaking the masculine and feminine." "The ending is a sort of purified beginning, without resolution, but which may be resolved by starting all over again." The audience did not imperiously demand a repetition although the duration of the performance was only eight minutes. "Magna Mater" needs a more detailed analysis than that given by the composer. There were some in the audience no doubt who were disappointed at not being able to identify a Phallus theme. "Magna Mater" is in the ultra modern vein. It does not seem to us after one hearing a work of marked importance musical, religous, anthropological or even ethnological. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did their best to present the work favorably. The composer was called to bow his appreciation of his reception and the performance.

The program book stated that the 3d symphony of Sibelius was performed for the first time. It was heard here in 1928. The error came from a sudden change in the program. The notes for that performance in 1928 were hastily inserted without time for careful revision. In contrast to the prevailing mood of much of Sibelius's music, the symphony is for the most part delightfully cheerful. And there is a haunting charm to the persistent figure in the second movement.

Straus's familiar tone poem was played dramatically. The impressive ending was solemnly sonorous. It seemed to some that the pace of the introduction was unusually slow, but this was in fine contrast to the feverish allegro. The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of next week: Sibelius, Symphony No. 4, A minor. Converse, "Prophecy," tone poem for soprano (Beata Malkin) and orchestra. Men-

---

True to his promise that a group of Massachusetts people temporarily in the South should not forget Boston baked beans and brown bread any longer if he could prevent it, Mayor Curley yesterday arranged for the shipment of 70 pots of beans and 70 loaves of brown bred from Thompson's Spa to Miss the finest residences in Roxbury. He leaves his wife and three children.

---

HERBERT S. LEE

Funeral services were held in Mt. Pleasant cemetery, Arlington, yesterday, for Herbert S. Lee of East Arlington, retired New York paper manufacturer. The service at the grave, combining the funeral and committal services, was conducted by the Rev. Gordon E. Bigelow, pastor of the Trinity Baptist Church, East Arlington.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 10

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Two poems for orchestra, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," by Edward MacDowell, stand at the top of the Symphony program this week. They are played as the Boston Symphony's part in the Nation-wide observance of the 25th aniversary of the founding of the MacDowell Colony at Peterboro, N H. The remaining pieces are Alexander Tcherepnin's "Magna Mater," op 41; Sibelius' Third Symphony in C major and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration.'

MacDowell's poems, according to record, had been played in Boston only once before, in 1893 by the Boston Symphony. He composed them in Germany in 1884, when he was 23. MacDowell was inspired by a performance in London of Shakespeare's drama in which Ellen Terry and Henry Irving played, and dedicated his score to them. MacDowell furnished no program or explanatory note, wisely leaving the listener to guess what was expressed in the music.

Why these pieces have gone unheard here for 39 years is puzzling. They are well written, tasteful in material, gracious and charming. They would adorn a program of any orchestra. "Ophelia," especially, is a study in instrumental delicacy, and one does not have to overwork the imagination to associate the piece with the gentle character in Shakespeare's play. The instrumentation of "Ophelia" is extraordinarily beautiful. The fact that distinction and homogeneity of style are lacking may be overlooked; the simple, unaffected warmth of these poems is sufficient to warrant their being heard oftener in the future than in the past.

Dr Koussevitzky deserves commendation for taking the pains to search out some of MacDowell's least known music rather than doing the obvious and playing the "Indian Suite."

Mr Tcherepnin's "Magna Mater" was given first performance in the United States yesterday. The composer is a son of Nicolai Tcherepnin, who appeared with the Boston Symphony last year, conducting some of his own music. "Magna Mater" is the first of the younger Tcherepnin's work to be played by this orchestra. The composer has said that the work "was suggested by the ancient Egyptian cult of Phallus adoration" and contains "simply the idea of creation—creation eternal and constantly expanding and evolving." The piece is, of course, modern in style, and highly rhythmic. The employment of percussion instruments is entertaining. One of the virtues of "Magna Mater" is its brevity. It was politely applauded yesterday. Mr Tcherepnin, who was in the audience, acknowledged the approval from the front of the hall.

Sibelius' Third Symphony is a curiously baffling masterpiece. It runs along quietly and, like the Fourth Symphony, in A minor, has the aspect of an orchestral improvisation. Much of the material and treatment seems almost trivial, although this is not so, and at the end, one never fails to want to hear the work again. Sibelius sometimes makes his points very quietly, and it frequently takes the casual listener a little time to grasp them.

Dr Koussevitzky's performance of "Death and Transfiguration" seemed the best that one has ever heard from him. The lyrical portions took on a poignancy so moving that one almost forgot those mighty sonorous climaxes where Strauss nearly succeeds in shaking the firmament.

Frederick Converse's new tone poem, "Prophecy," will be given first performance next week, with Beata Malkin, soprano, as soloist. Sibelius' Fourth Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony will also be played.

C. W. D.

67

SYMPHONY PLAYSEARLY MACDOWELL

Tone Poems Unheard Since 1893 Given in Memory

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Desiring to commemorate at the Symphony Concerts of this week the 25th anniversary of the founding of the MacDowell Colony at Peterboro, N. H., Dr. Koussevitzky, with his customary tact and taste in such matters, selected for performance not that composer's once over-played and over-praised Indian Suite, but the two early tone-poems, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," unheard at these concerts since 1893.

HAVE ENDURING APPEAL

Had MacDowell died before he reached his 30th year, there would have been ample reason to believe that a career of remarkable promise had been prematurely cut short. The composer who in his middle twenties could write the paired tone-poems of yesterday's concert, the Second Piano Concerto and the "Lancelot and Elaine" which some of us would like also revived, though he still showed the influence of his teacher Raff, of Liszt and of Wagner, was nevertheless a music-maker of poetic imagination, of fine sensibility and of no mean degree of technical competence. More original no doubt in matter and in manner, more individual and characteristic, especially in their harmonic structure, the later volumes of short piano pieces that have made MacDowell's name a household word, the Indian Suites, the "Norse" and "Keltic" Sonatas, have not the enduring appeal of some of the earlier works.

To put it bluntly, MacDowell did not grow and develop in the degree that such charming if derivative works as the two tone-poems so beautifully and sympathetically performed yesterday afternoon now suggest that he might have grown.

Sibelius' Third More Typical

Continuing with the symphonies of Sibelius, Dr. Koussevitzky came yesterday to the Third—another feather in his cap, since he was among all the conductors of our orchestra who first discerned the haunting and elusive beauty, the rare poetry, the biting forcefulness of this symphony, so much more reticent, so much more restrained, continent and compressed, terse and trenchant than its predecessors, and by so much the more typical of its composer's genius.

There was a new piece yesterday, "Magna Mater," by Alexander Tcherepnin, son of Nikolai Tcherepnin, who appeared at the Symphony concerts of last season as conductor of his own music.

The younger Tcherepnin in this instance chose for his theme nothing less than the continuing creation and reproduction of life itself, and handled this theme ingeniously by means of a long-drawn crescendo and a final striking passage for percussion alone as a sort of unresolved dissonance.

Cordially Applauded

These young composers are attracted by cosmic themes: witness the 25-year-old Strauss of "Death and Transfiguration," which closed yesterday's concert in a suffusing splendor of orchestral tone. But music, even from the hands of a Strauss, may not encompass them.

Mr. Tcherepnin, who was present in the audience, was cordially applauded. The performance of Strauss' tone-poem provoked enthusiasm. For those of the music of MacDowell and of Sibelius no praise would be too high.

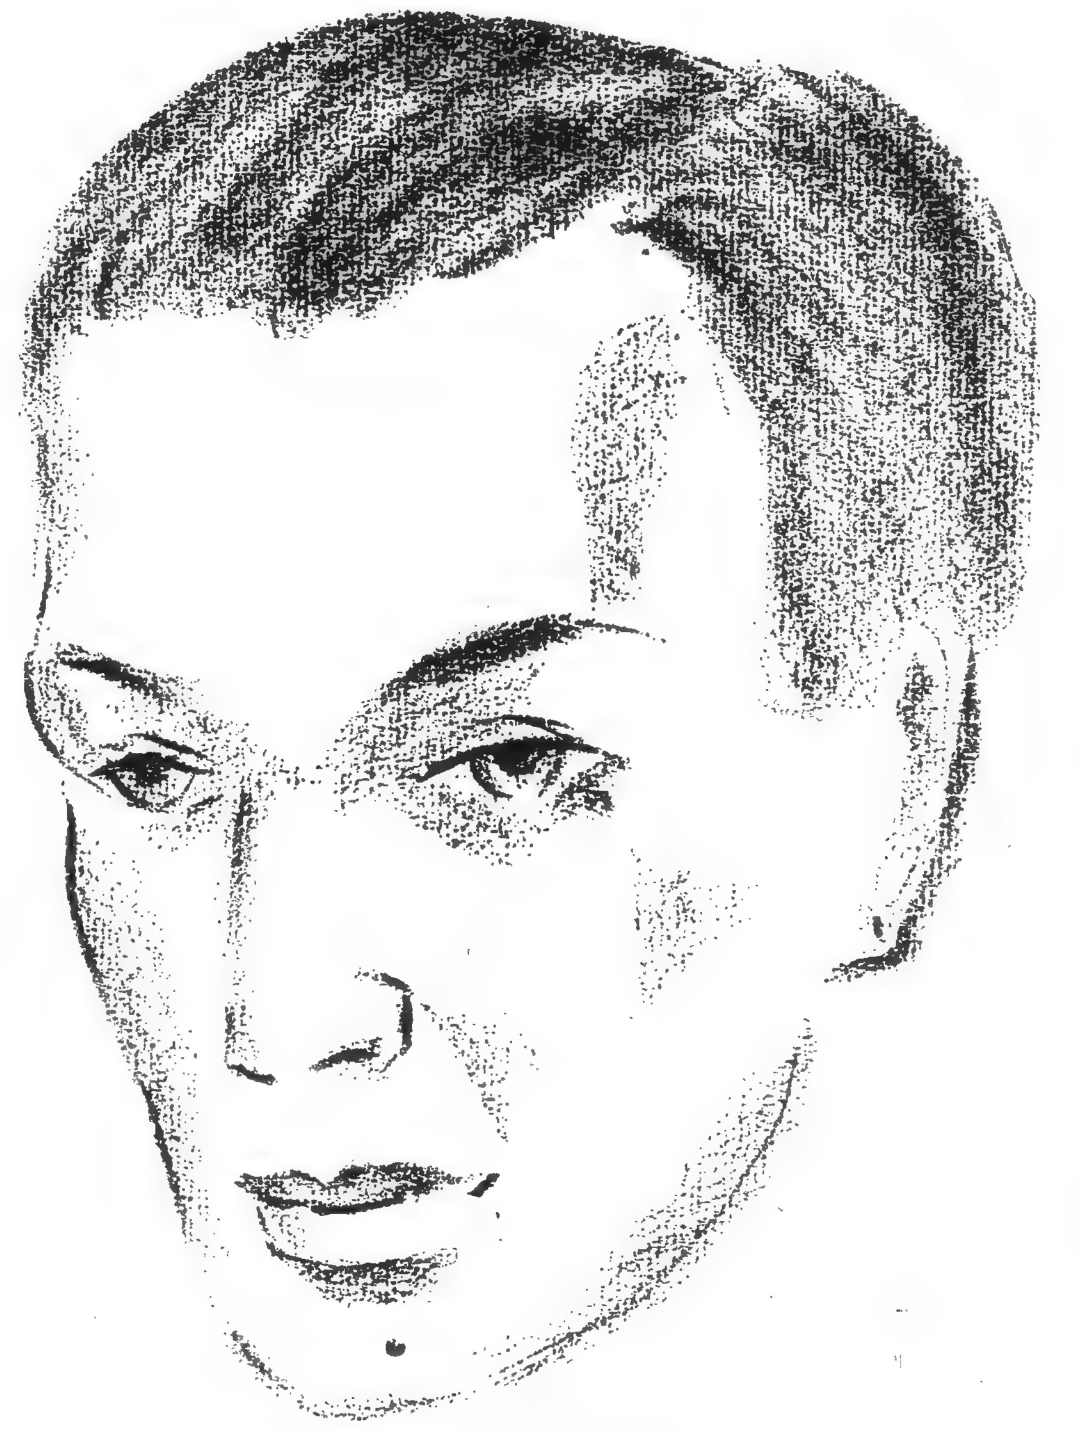
---

8 Dec. 10

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DE

Concerts to Come

Now and Again Comes Youth



Alexander Cherepnin

Guest-Composer, Yesterday and Today at the Symphony Concerts. The Sketch by Maud Bourne

-CONCERTS HERE AND ABROAD

Ha Dec 11

By PHILIP HALE

William J. Henderson of the New York Sun replies in an amusing manner to letters of protest he received recently from more or less "prominent" Bostonians:

"The pedestrian penman of these presents recently paid what he believed to be a tribute to the great Boston orchestra. He added that it had a competent conductor. There was wrath on Beacon Hill and there was tempest on the Back Bay. 'The expressions of displeasure ranged from 'hot protest' down to 'take it back.' The writer stoutly refuses to take it back. He is prepared to meet in mortal combat in the arena any person who will fling at him the challenge 'Koussevitzky is not competent.'

"This music lover has attended Boston symphony orchestra concerts year in and year out, and has never known the distinguished conductor to be incompetent. But one complaint was that competent was 'too measured' a word. 'How absolute the knave is! We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us.' This reviewer thought that in the course of the years he had exhausted in praise of Mr. Koussevitzky all the adjectives dear to rhapsodists except 'celestial' and 'sublime.' He is saving these for some occasion of transcendent glory, when Mr. Koussevitzky soars into the fathomless ether and shakes the stars in their orbits."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 11 1932

Society Folk Hear Concert

Brilliant Scene Marks Opening of Boston Symphony's Providence Series

A "First Night," important socially as well as musically, drew hundreds to the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening for the opening program of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Society in motor cars approached the theatre in a continuous line of orderly traffic for over half an hour before the program started, and spread a panorama of beautiful costumes and scintillating jewels before the interested eyes of bystanders who lined the sidewalks.

The sight within the foyer was brilliant. Chatting groups lent animation and color to the scene, the women wearing vividly hued evening wraps, the men in formal black and white. Every nuance of the current mode was reflected in cloaks and capes of soft velvet, lustrous fur or rich metal cloth, which revealed glimpses of smart gowns beneath.

Eyes accustomed to these scenes found familiar figures in their usual places in boxes, loges and orchestra circle. Among holders of seats in the boxes were Mrs. Rowland Hazard and Miss Carol Hazard, Mr. and Mrs. Louis M. Ream, Mr. and Mrs. Edson R. Rand, Mrs. Maude C. Hamblin, Dr. and Mrs. Walter H. Butterfield, Miss Catherine H. Gorman, Miss Madeline K. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Blanchard and Mr. and Mrs. Maurice L. Freedman.

The loges were well filled. Among those occupying seats at the right were Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, Miss Louise Hoppin, Mrs. Hoppin Jacob, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Powel, Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Merriman, Jr., Miss Esther Merriman, Mr. Theodore P. Bogert, Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, Miss Peggy C. Mowry, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Livingston Kelley, Mrs. Eugene A. Kingman, Miss Amey Kingman, Mr. Lucius Kingman, Mrs. Elisha H. Howard, Mrs. A. G. Harkness, Mr. Albert Harkness, Mr. and Mrs. Clinton R. Fuller, Miss Margaret A. Fuller, Mrs. Augustus R. Pierce, Mrs. S. Foster Hunt, Miss Alice W. Hunt, Mrs. C. Moulton Stone and Mrs. Florence C. G. Moore.

Loges at the left held parties which included Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, Mr. and Mrs. Rush Sturges, Mr. and Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Shaw, Mrs. Carl B Marshall, Miss Marion K Marshall, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Holding, Dr. and Mrs. Eric Stone, Miss Helen Hackney, Mrs. William B Greenough, Miss Bertha C. Greenough, Mr and Mrs. John A. Tillinghast, Mrs. Lewis A. Waterman, Jr., Mrs. Richard W. Blanding, Mrs. Clifford G. King, Mrs. Russell N. Dana, Mrs. Robert S. Emerson, Mrs. Frederick H. Young, the Hon. Jeremiah E. O'Connell and Mrs. O'Connell, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph R. Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. Roger T. Clapp, Mrs. W. Howard Street, Miss Mary L. Mason, Mr. Howard Hales, Mrs. James L. Wheaton, Mr. Ray A. Gardiner, Mrs C. V. Pohlson.

An appreciable number of the younger frequenters of the Symphony Concerts would be glad to hear again Monsieur Schmitt's "Symphonie Concertante." Not a few in an elder generation would resent a repetition. For the moment Dr. Koussevitzky is undecided. Certainly, no music heard of late in Symphony Hall stands to gain more by further hearing. Those that listened at the Saturday as well as the Friday concert in November, were surprised at the clearer impression.

Mr. Copland's "Symphonic Ode," written for the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra and first heard at the Symphony Concerts, was played last month in Mexico City by the Mexican Symphony Orchestra, with Carlos Chavez, the composer, conducting. Though the region is volcanic, there were no convulsions of nature or any blind furies among the audience.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

DEC 13 1932

Inquiry Reveals Favorite Pieces

[From the Boston Transcript]

Do not imagine that you are a shade or two finer than your neighbor when you recognize a deep, inner craving for a certain plaintive type of music. You are far from being alone, or spiritually apart from the man of the street, the shipping clerk among his barrels, the judge on his bench, or the "misunderstood" adolescent, and the regular attendant at Symphony Hall.

—o—

What do "music lovers" crave to hear? Dr. Serge Koussevitzky said he would be interested to know what a cross-section of public opinion reveals.

At Symphony Hall the fans who come four hours before the doors open, stand in line in all kinds of weather to get tickets for the second balcony, were asked their preference, and then several patrons of good music, who are not professionals nor music critics.

Here are their favorite musical compositions, with the reasons why, as given by the balcony patrons:

Albert Nievergelt, 28, Brookline: "It is difficult to express logically why I prefer Beethoven's music, but I might say it encourages the spirit and sustains it also in its resistance to and protest against the spiritual domination of the machine; our reduction to the level of mere units in mechanized social order. Beethoven's music sustains and supports as well as elevates."

Henry W. Kaufman, 23-year-old Harvard student, Lynn: "Mozart's Requiem, which I heard last year, has left an indelible impression upon me and a craving to hear it often. The tragedy of it overwhelms me, while the mystical influence of the whole theme sweeps me into contemplation of life beyond the grave."

John Brown, 30, shoe dealer, Boston: "Tschaikowsky's Pathetique Symphony overwhelms me."

—o—

All the world remembers the last request of President McKinley, who asked that Lead Kindly Light be sung at his funeral. The popularity of a National Broadcasting Company program, featuring a Lonesome Singer, has been built on melodramas such as Red River Valley, Here Lies Love, Nobody Cares, and such hymns as The Old Rugged Cross, requested by listeners from Mexico to Canada and from coast to coast.

Robert Hillyer, whose book, Head of the River, is just out, takes issue with the folk who revel in the emotional Pathetique Symphony.

"I loathe that piece," declares Mr. Hillyer, "it is the type of music that I consider bad, for its appeal is wholly melodramatic. Brahms' First Symphony and Mozart's Symphony in D Minor have more to give because these are more careful artists. César Franck's chamber music and one of his symphonies are fine, and, of course, I love everything that Schubert and Schumann wrote."

—o—

Eliot Wadsworth, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury: "I am afraid that my taste is not particularly valuable to the public, as far as my favorite music is concerned, but I do like such gay songs as Just Around the Corner, There's a Rainbow in the Sky and the like. Not particularly the words but the cheery swing of the lyrics."

Joseph Lee, head of the playground movement in America: "I am somewhat surprised to find myself preferring the older masters, Haydn, Händel, Bach, and those who came after them with romantic themes, such as Beethoven, with his marvelous symphonies, each like a strong, beautiful carving, and Mozart."

DECEMBER 13, 1932 Trans.

ayers === Films === Othe

Sibelius for the Monday Concerts

His Second Symphony as It Is Heard Again from Dr. Koussevitzky

REGARDLESS of virtues and excellences of other items, the real event of last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the playing of the Second Symphony, in D major, of Sibelius. How this symphony grows upon one after a few h arings not too far apart! How in it Sibelian traits begin to crystallize! Already one finds in it more that is elusive than in the First. And the elusive is to figure in all the later symphonies of Sibelius. Not too quickly can one grasp their beauties, not too certain can one be of the significance of this or that passage. But that it is rich in significance one can feel assured. A factor of haunting mystery there is, that mystery which is so prime a factor of much great music. Out of it grow surges of elemental power, power that seems without limit or bound. Out of it grow also lines of melody, melody that warms the heart. One is charmed with the riches of figure which Sibelius bestows upon every fragment of the musical matter of the symphony. The very accompaniment figure of the beginning seems as if it were thematic; when upon it floats the real music, the theme out of which the movement grows. Again at the beginning of the second movement, the pizzicatti of basses seem charged with the very essence of musical effect. But soon one finds that they are no more than background for the lugubrious melody of the bassoons. Th melodies themselves are of surpassing emotional content.

It would be difficult to overestimate the qualities which went into the performance of the music. Mr. Ernest Newman, reviewing a performance of this symphony in London at the end of October, cast aspersions upon Sir Hamilton Harty's readings, nominated the seventy-six-years-old Kajanus of Helsingfors as "the most satisfactory conductor of Sibelius." But Mr. Newman continued: "I do not say that we shall never get better performances than his: on the contrary, the same understanding, plus fifty per cent more virtuosity and minus thirty years in the matter of age, would produce even better results." To some of us it seems that in such a dictum Mr. Newman described better than he knew a Koussevitzkian interpretation of Sibelius. Some of us know the Kajanus readings of the composer through the medium of phonographic recordings, can therefore with something more than a guess assure Mr. Newman of his fifty per cent greater virtuosity in such a performance as that of last night, can assure him further of twenty (if not thirty) years more youthfulness in Koussevitzky as far as the calendar goes, and at least thirty years in spirit. To those seeking virtuosity one need only commend such a movement as the scherzo of this symphony in last evening's performance. To those seeking insight, the beginnings of the second movement, the tremendous advance through scherzo through to the end of the finale. To those seeking fresh youtfulness, the whole performance from beginning to end.

Insight of another kind Dr. Koussevitzky showed in the concerto (Schumann in A minor) which preceded the smphony, and in which Miss Eunice Norton was the soloist. Miss Norton is a well equipped young pianist making her bow to a larger public. She gave competent, pleasurable performance, feeling with Schumann the warmth and the ardor of his melodies, th piquancy of his rhythms, the sentiment, the inward glow of a typically romantic concerto. Withal, there was in the background an anxious quality, centering on performance as much as on concerto, wondering how it would rate with known standards. Possibly not a little of the charm of these youthful performances lies in the thoughtful restraints which surround them. And to them Dr. Koussevitzky attuned his reading until modest pianist and proud orchestra seemed as if cast into a single mold.

One need add no more than a word of record for the performance of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. Once more virtuosity, dash, verve, brilliance,—and the tale is told.

A. H. M.

Young Soloist Applauded

Amer. Dec 13

By MOSES SMITH

The Boston debut of Eunice Norton, a young American pianist, who is said to have appeared successfully with other major orchestras, was the novelty attached to the second Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky.

Miss Norton played the solo part of the Schumann concerto, which might be called a pianist's paradise for it shows off the instrument and the performer most gratefully. The soloist's way with this work was not that of romantic ardor and passion and of youthful exuberance, but rather the modern manner of glint and sparkle, of surface excitement, and of light virtuosity. For this conception she was admirably equipped, not only by temperament (presumably), and striking musicality, but by a clear and brilliant technic and by studied grace and poise unusual in a youthful pianist.

Many old-fashioned listeners prefer their Schumann more full-bodied, but there is no gainsaying the modernists. Miss Norton, indeed, went to the extreme in the matter of pedalling, using the damper-pedal so little that at times the music seemed to lose its Schumannesque character. On the whole, however, it was a virtuoso performance, admirably and sympathetically abetted by the orchestra under Koussevitzky. And Miss Norton was enthusiastically acclaimed by the audience.

The opening number was Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture, which was performed with startling brilliance and romantic fire —con adore, as if Koussevitzky were leading a first performance. Of the Sibelius second symphony, which closed the program, there is nothing to add to the list of superlatives with which were described at the performance of the same work several weeks ago, the masterly music and masterly presentation.

Music

Monitor Dec 13

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the second of its Monday series of concerts in Symphony Hall last night. The program was made up of the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" Overture, the Schumann Piano Concerto and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, in D major.

Miss Eunice Norton, young American pianist, was the soloist. She revealed a promising talent. Chief among her present musical virtues—and an important one—is a strong sense of rhythm. She has also a good technique and a tone of no little beauty and of considerable sonority. She is wanting at present in the variety of tone color, the subtlety of phrasing and the depth of emotion that are necessary to the full exposition of this type of music. No doubt, with growth and experience, she will add these qualities to her equipment. She had a popular success, being recalled four times.

The Overture received the usual highly dramatized Koussevitzkyan reading and brilliant performance. The Monday subscribers were especially blessed in receiving the crumb of Sibelius from the table of the Friday and Saturday series, so abundantly loaded this season with this course. The Second Symphony, with its stupendous climax, made its usual appeal, and the fervid performance brought the customary tribute to conductor and men.

L. A. S.

SYMPHONY HALL

Globe Dec 13

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky elected to begin the Boston Symphony concert last evening —the second of the Monday series— with Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture. This piece has shared the general neglect into which most of Berlioz' work has fallen in recent years. It is fashionable but not altogether justified to regard Berlioz as "old hat." Some of this music, to be sure, has not retained all its freshness, but this overture gives no indication of having faded. The performance was brilliant and opulent, one which the composer might have been hard put to describe even with his marvelous literary style.

How strange and baffling the overture must have seemed in 1844! There are passages which still seem marvelously original and barbaric, even after 88 years. And the work reveals anew just how much Berlioz contributed to the art of instrumentation. Above all, how transparently is this overture scored. For all its richness of color it is extraordinarily fine-textured. More thanks to Dr Koussevitzky for reviving it once again.

Eunice Norton, a talented young pianist from Minnesota, was the soloist, playing the Schumann A minor concerto. Although Miss Norton appeared for the first time in Boston last evening, it was not her first appearance with the Boston Symphony. She played with the Orchestra at a concert in Brooklyn several seasons ago.

Miss Norton has early conquered the technical difficulties of her instrument. She plays intelligently and with beauty of tone. The only element which seems to be lacking in her equipment is the maturity of interpretation that comes only with the years. Miss Norton is one of the most enjoyable and promising young artists who have appeared with the Boston Symphony in several seasons. She richly deserved the applause which brought her back to the stage several times at the conclusion of her performance.

The remaining number on the program was Sibelius' Second Symphony, in D major, a work none the less distinguished because it derives from Tchaikovsky and is not representative of Sibelius in maturity. It was played intensely, eloquently.

The next concert of this series will take place Jan 23.

AMUSEMENTS

Trans

DECEMBER 15, 1932

s === Films

Day's Chronicle of The Concert-Halls

New Piece from Mr. Converse, Programs in Prospect, January Dates

TO the concerts of the week-end at Symphony Hall comes a singer new to Boston with a new work written for her and for this present performance. The singer is Beata Malkin, soprano, with a fine record in opera houses of Berlin and Milan. As to the new piece, the full title as it appears on the score is "Prophecy, tone poem for Soprano Voice and Orchestra. Text arranged from the Book of Isaiah. Composed by F. S. Converse. 1932."

Last spring—so Mr. Converse told the interviewer — Dr. Koussevitzky heard Miss Malkin sing, at once promised her an appearance, presently suggested to Mr. Converse that he write something for her. Mr. Converse, equally impressed by the voice, gladly accepted the suggestion. Casting about for a suitable text, Mr. Converse bethought him of the old Hebrew prophet as containing exactly the qualities needed for a piece for Miss Malkin's voice. Hence from Isaiah he arranged this text for his new "Prophecy":

"Come near, ye nations, to hear; and hearken, ye people: let the earth hear, and all that is therein; the world and all things that come forth from it.

"For the indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and His fury upon all their armies: he hath utterly destroyed them, he hath delivered them to the slaughter.

"And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth from the vine, and as a falling fig from a fig-tree.

"For it is the day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of recompense for the controversy of Zion.

"And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone.

"They shall call the nobles thereof to the kingdom, but none shall be there, and all her princes shall be nothing.

"But the cormorant and the bittern shall possess it; the owl also and the raven shall dwell in it.

"And thorns shall come up in her palaces, nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof: and it shall be an habitation of dragons, and a court of owls.

"Say to them that are of fearful heart, Be strong, fear not; behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a ecompense, He will come and save you.

"The desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose.

"Then shall the eyes of the blind be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man eap as an hart and the tongue of the dumb sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert.

"And an highway shall be there, and t shall be called the highway of holiness; he unclean shall not pass over it, but the redeemed shall walk there.

"They shall obtain joy and gladness nd sorrow and sighing shal flee away."

This text Mr. Converse, divides into hree parts, gives to each a setting designed to bring out and to underscore its piritual and emotional significance. The rst is purely introductory: the call to the ations to attend to the word of the Lord's prophet. The second portion de c ibes the wrath of the Lord, His high ndignation, the dire punishment which He is sure to mete out to an evil world. And the final part tells of the mercy and goodness of the Lord, of the rewards that re certain to come to the faithful.

The music follows closely all the implications of the text. The music for the division which expresses the wrath of the Lord is often dramatically, or even realistically conceived. An example of such realism is found in the peculiar revolving motion of the musical figures which accompany "the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll." Verse by verse Mr. Converse is equally faithful to the great prose poetry of Isaiah. The music for the division which expresses the mercy and goodness of the Lord is most felicitously described by two words to which Mr. Converse returned again and again when discussiing "Prophecy" with the interviewer: "lyric and ecstatic."

There is no thematic development, no inter-relationship of themes in this work, save for one exception. Otherwise it is reshly composed, to suit the demands of the text, verse by verse. The one exception is that the theme heard at the very beginning of the introduction is heard again in the very last verses in more expansive and beatific treatment. Mr. Converse explained that the theme is one which he had previously used and liked and had always wanted to use in a larger way. In "Prophecy" he found his opportunity.

Mr. Converse spoke with engaging frankness about the essentially melodious character of his new tone poem. "I believe a modern composer is supposed to be not too melodious in his music: but I—well—I have made this music as much a music of melody as possible. I tried to make it a music which a singer should actually like to sing. And Miss Malkin really does like to sing it." In truth Mr. Converse has made his music a music for solo voice with orchestra; not a music in which the voice is merely a leader in a group of orchestral colors. Nor is the singer interrupted frequently by orchestral developments. During the entire piece the orchestra does not play alone, without the singer, for more than perhaps thirty measures. And these measures mark the division points between the three sections as well as the short introduction. Assuredly Mr. Converse has availed himself of the opportunity created for him by the presence of a notable singer, and the opportunity which has further come through the inspiration afforded by a magnificent text.

A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of Thursday evening, Dec. 22—instead of Saturday, Dec. 24—and of Friday afternoon, Dec. 23:

Suite from the Opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
String Quartet with Orchestra..........Martinu Fantastic Symphony ....Berlioz

Martinu's music will be played for the first times in America. It is cast in an unusual form that of late has attracted other young composers. The string quartet is the equivalent of the solo instrument in a concerto; while the orchestra functions as in such a piece. Conrad Beck, the Swiss Parisian, has also tried the experiment. His Concerto, as he calls it, proved interesting when it was played at Harvard last spring. Martinu's Quartet was heard in London last autumn and well received.

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra to increase its Pension Fund, on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 1, with a "Wagner Program" nd Paul Althouse for assisting singer:

rom "Tannhauser"—Venusberg Music.
From "Lohengrin"—Lohengrin's Narrative
From "Siegfried"—Forest Music
From "Götterdämmerung"—Siegfried's Death and Funeral Music
From "Tristan and Isolde"—Prelude and Closing Scene
From "Die Meistersinger"—Walther's "Prize-Song"
From "Die Meistersinger"—Prelude

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the second supplementary matinée of the Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Jan. 3:

Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor, for String Orchestra....................Handel
Symphony, No. 35, in G minor........Mozart
Symphony, No. 7, in C major..........Schubert

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 15 1932

1

Today's Best Story

Two Negro soldiers were discussing the relative merits of their company buglers. Said one:

"Fellah, when dat boy o' ouahs plays a call, it sounds 'zactly like de Boston Symphony Orchestra playin' de ~~'Rosary'.~~"

The second colored boy snorted: "Brothah, you ain't got no bugler atal. When Snowball Jones wraps his lips aroun' dat bugle of his'n plays mess call I looks down at mah beans an' I sez: 'Strawberries behave! You is kickin' de whipped cream out of de plate'."

Sentence Sermon

MUSIC

Globe Dec. 17

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

"Prophecy," a new tone poem for soprano and orchestra, by Frederick S. Converse, was given first performance yesterday at the Boston Symphony concert. The work, according to a statement by Mr Converse in the program book, was written at the suggestion of Dr Koussevitzky for Beata Malkin, who was soloist, and was dedicated to her.

The remaining numbers were Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, in A minor, and Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony, likewise in A minor.

The composer has written of "Prophecy": "I have called the work a tone poem for soprano voice and orchestra. . . . The text I drew from the 34th and 35th chapters of the Book of Isaiah and arranged the lines in a dramatic sequence to express a certain spiritual idea which I think will be clear to all who read it. The music is entirely free in form, but follows the phychological and dramatic development of the text. I have attempted throughout to treat the voice in an effective way from the standpoint of the singer, and yet give interesting color and expression to the orchestral background. I do not think that any further comments on the details of the work are necessary at this time."

The Biblical text exhorts all that dwell in the earth to pay heed, for the day of the Lord's vengeance is nigh, and the iniquitous will be delivered up to punishment, and the righteous given just reward. Mr Converse's music is properly conceived on a large scale to convey the breadth and magnitude of such a subject.

The orchestral part of "Prophecy" sets the mood and reflects the implications of the text, but, save for a few notable exceptions, seems to be subordinated to the vocal portion. This stands out in relief against the instrumental background. Mr Converse's harmony is mordern but not ultra-modern; the instrumentation is firm in texture, but neither thick nor blatant. The work moves spaciously, and with dignity.

The Biblical warning is taken up dramatically, in a sort of melodic recitative. After a powerful and sonorous climax, the end is reached in quieter mood, upon the lines promising reward to the righteous. This last part is invested with an expansive, warmly emotional melody.

Miss Malkin is esteemed in Europe, where she has sung at the Berlin State Opera and at La Scala. She had not, according to record, previously appeared in Boston. Her voice is exceptionally fine, pure, and resonant. She sang her arduous and exacting part with extraordinary beauty of tone. Miss Malkin is a sister of Joseph Malkin, a former first cellist of the Boston Symphony.

Mr Converse was present and shared the very warm applause with Miss Malkin and Dr Koussevitzky. All were recalled to the stage.

Sibelius' Fourth Symphony at present stands out as one of the great master pieces of the last quarter century or so. Because it is always both idle and dangerous to prophesy about the esteem in which a composition will be held 25 or 50 years hence, any such speculations regarding this work are passed over.

In the three Symphonies which preceded this one in A minor, there is always something to suggest the far Northern land which gave Sibelius birth. No doubt this Fourth Symphony has the same qualities. But here is an indefinable something which expresses more than anything else, at least to one listener, a unique temperament and mind. Sibelius has a great deal to say in this work, and he speaks quietly, tersely, with unsurpassed directness, in a musical speech that seems to have no likenesses anywhere. There are no pompous, sonorous perorations, no long-phrased sentimental melodies. Yet in the third movement, perhaps the greatest of all four, he bursts into an inimitable spontaneous song that, in its fashion, is as moving as any ever penned.

Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony, placed at the end of the program, came as an anti-climax. In only one movement, the second, does the composer approach either grace or charm, and there he reverts to the style of his "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Elsewhere his stormings, and his melancholy lingerings over the dusty past of Scottish royalty, are tiresome and empty. Not even the grandiloquent performance that Dr Koussevitzky conceived could bring back this work from the nether world of the musical dead.

A String Quartet with Orchestra by Bohuslav Martinu, a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," and Berloiz' "Fantastic" Symphony will be played.

C. W. D.

Preferred

"You don't seem to care much for original ideas," said a would-be contributor as he gathered up a rejected manuscript.

"No," replied the editor; "we'd rather have good ones!"—Vancouver Province.

Post Dec 17

BOSTO

CONVERSE'S "PROPHESY" PERFORMED

Symphony Assisted by Beata Malkin Soprano

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A new soprano, Beata Malkin, in a new piece, "Prophecy," by the resident composer, Frederick S. Converse, caused a considerable stir at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. Singer and composer alike can be credited with a distinct popular success.

WRITTEN FOR SINGER

According to his own words, as quoted in the programme notes, Mr. Converse, at Dr. Koussevitzky's instigation, wrote "Prophecy" especially for Miss Malkin—who, by the way, is sister of Joseph Malkin, erstwhile first 'cellist of the Symphony Orchestra—and the piece is dedicated to her. The text, taken from the 34th and 35th chapters of Isaiah, begins with a prophecy of doom and destruction and ends with a foretelling of deliverance: strong contrasts tempting to the composer. A general sense of fatefulness and of a wrathful Jehovah is imparted by the first division of Mr. Converse's tone-poem, although each and every word of the text is not always illuminated and underscored in the music; one can conjecture what some composers might have done with streams of pitch and dust turned to brimstone.

Persuasively, however, Mr. Converse's desert blossoms as a rose, and the concluding pages, which obviously inspired the audience's enthusiasm, have a Straussian gorgeousness and opulence.

Rich and Powerful Voice

Miss Malkin's task was a difficult one yesterday and she performed it nobly. The music lies much of the time in the upper register of the voice, and the singer must pit herself against a strenuous and sonorous orchestra. Not always did Miss Malkin make clear her words; at times the orchestra actually submerged her. But she did disclose a voice of richness and of power as well as an aptitude for the dramatic style with which we would gladly have further acquaintance.

Two symphonies in A minor, having in common nothing but their titles, made the rest of yesterday's concert: the one, Sibelius' Fourth; the other, Mendelssohn's Third or "Scotch" Symphony, hitherto unheard here from Dr. Koussevitzky.

Sibelius' Fourth

In this Fourth Symphony may be found the quintessential Sibelius. It is the goal to which the Third Symphony of last week's concerts, a work of transition, was leading. This music, so concentrated, so purged of all excrescences and superfluities, requires of the listener the utmost degree of attention, but it is music to which we can return again and again with no feeling of satiety or repletion, music for the Sibelius enthusiast who is willing to meet half way and more the now wholly self-contained composer. Yet yesterday's audience received the work by no means indifferently, and even those who do not warm to the music must have discerned the outstanding merit of the performance. Sceptical at one time of the value of Sibelius' music, Dr. Koussevitzky has become his most revealing interpreter as far as Bostonian experience is concerned.

Good to Hear "Scotch" Again

It was good to hear again the "Scotch" Symphony, which has still in it enough of romantic mood, of imaginatively pictorial suggestion, to offset those pages that are of the smugly conventional, now outmoded Mendelssohn.

The performance scored another Koussevitzkian triumph; to Mendelssohn as to Sibelius the conductor brings a sympathetic and a responsive ear.

Amer. Dec 17

Local Composer's Tone Poem Given Symphony Premiere

By MOSES SMITH

"Prophecy," a tone poem for soprano and orchestra recently completed by F. S. Converse, was given its first performance at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky. The other works on the program were the fourth symphony of Sibelius and and the Scotch symphony of Mendelssohn.

Mr. Converse, who is not only a distinguished composer but also dean of the New England Conservatory of Music, wrote his latest work for Beata Malkin, who was the soloist in yesterday's premiere. The music uses for text some provocative verses out of the book of Isaiah. The score is naturally well made; the orchestration shows the hand of the craftsman. The music is most often operatic in manner, and has some arresting moments. But it suffers from lack of variety, and, more specifically, from not following closely and descriptively enough the text. The singer, by the way, has been given a hard task. But Mme. Malkin's beautiful and expressive voice was equal to the task. The end of the performance was followed by a prolonged outbreak of applause, directed principally at the singer, but intended as well for the conductor and orchestra, and for the composer who reluctantly came on the stage to acknowledge it.

The Scotch Symphony, which was caressingly treated by Koussevitzky and his men, failed to stir the listener. For the most part, this work is now outmoded. One wonders how it could ever have been considered a masterpiece, despite its moments of charm. But the Sibelius Symphony is another matter. Here is a masterwork, plausibly considered by many as Sibelius' masterpiece.

Hearing this beautiful work, superbly performed by the Boston orchestra, one is reassured about the art of music. One feels happy that there is still alive an artist of Sibelius' stature.

Bowdoin Square

The Bowdoin Square, beginning tomorrow, features Boris Karloff, Lewis Stone, Karen Morley, Myrna Loy and Jean Hersholt in "The Mask of Fu Manchu."

Boston Orchestra

Monitor Dec. 17

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's ninth program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra season (Dec. 16-17) carried his grand tour of the Sibelius symphonies to the halfway point. The Fourth Symphony, in A minor which opened this program, certainly marks the highest peak attained by Sibelius in the symphonic form up to the time of its composition. When Dr. Koussevitzky revived it a year ago, after it had lain on the Symphony Hall shelves for 14 years, it was received distantly by the Friday audience. On the present occasion, the conductor's patience and persistence were rewarded. The applause was sufficiently prolonged to justify his calling the players to their feet and shaking their collective hand as represented in the concertmaster, Mr. Burgin. The simple loveliness and profound feeling of this masterpiece have at last made themselves felt, thanks largely to the devotion of conductor and orchestra. The composer could have had no more sympathetic or eloquent interpreters. Every subtlety of phrase and accent was observed, balance was justly maintained—except that the glockenspeil was too loud in the Finale—and the brooding vision of the artist was movingly revealed.

The novelty of the program was a new tone poem, called "Prophecy," for soprano and orchestra, by Mr. Frederick Converse, which had its first performance at the Friday afternoon concert. It was written at the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky, for Mlle. Beata Malkin (the soloist) and dedicated to her. The text was darwn from the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters of Isaiah by the composer, who "arranged the lines in a dramatic sequence to express a certain spiritual idea, which I think will be clear to all who read it." The first part recounts the call to the nations, the second the wrath of Jehovah, the third the promise of salvation. The music is adapted to the text in a straightforward, unaffected way. Mlle. Malkin, who is gifted with a voice of heroic proportions, sang it resoundingly and with a modicum of expression.

The rather naïve and somewhat faded charms of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, concealed from Bostonians for a decade, were unveiled to bring the concert to an anti-climactic conclusion. It would have been better all round if the two symphonies had been transposed on the program.

L. A. S.

---

at 11:30 P. M.

Amusemen

Converse Work by Symphony

Trav Dec 17

There was a novelty of a distinctive sort at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, a novelty that was made the more interesting by elements of local color and personal interest. It was the first performance of Frederic Shepherd Converse's "Prophecy": a tone poem for soprano voice and orchestra.

This new work was undertaken by the dean of the New England Conservatory of Music at the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky. And it was written expressly for Beata Malkin, daughter of a former 'cellist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has had numerous operatic successes on the continent, but whose appearance yesterday as soloist was her first here.

"Prophecy" is a grand, an exalted music. Based on the 34th and 35th chapters of the Book of Isaiah, it opens with a brief introduction, as though to summon the nations and the peoples of the earth to listen. There follows a dramatically realistic portrayal of the wrath of the Lord. But the tone softens, and, with the second half of the work, there is a beatific exposition of the redemption.

There was, of course, an enthusiastic ovation. But taking away the applause for the composer, who came to the platform, for the conductor, who was responsible for the work and for the soloist, who displayed a big and brilliant voice, one wonders how much of it was for the "Prophecy."

As to the rest of the program, it opened with the Fourth symphony of Sibelius and closed with Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. The fourth is at once the shortest and the greatest of the Sibelius symphonies. There are no blarings of brass, no massive chords, no thunderous climaxes, but, in a quiet way, themes are sounded that attain universal importance.

The "occasional" tag has long since been hung on the "Scotch" symphony: witness the fact that it has not been played at these concerts in some 20 years. Why is this so? To be sure, the composer is superficial, only mildly expressive, but for those who love a graceful melody, a pretty tune, he holds a charm that must not be denied.

H. C. C.

Concert-Chronicle

Mendelssohn, 1932

Trans Dec 19

FREQUENTERS of the Symphony Concerts may recall the immediate success of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony when Dr. Koussevitzky revived it a few seasons back. From the boldest modernist to the tightest conservative, nearly every one liked and praised it. The performance was sympathetic and illuminating. It disclosed and brightened the qualities by which Mendelssohn's music, wisely chosen, deserves to be heard in a time at odds with his. This "Italian" Symphony might even keep company at a modest distance with the perdurable music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Last Friday and Saturday the conductor returned to Mendelssohnian revival. He now chose the "Scotch" Symphony, which may or may not, in final judgment, be inferior to the "Italian." Certainly, it fell upon indifferent ears. Most of the matinée audience listened in apparent boredom; returned scattered, perfunctory applause; hastened away as soon as the final measures had sounded. By report the evening audience was little more responsive.

Now Dr. Koussevitzky chose to play the "Scotch" Symphony largely, stressfully, sonorously, grandiloquently; whereas upon the "Italian" he laid a relatively light and plastic hand. Perhaps the "Scotch" sounded so to Victorian audiences. Perhaps Mendelssohn himself intended it so to sound. His symphonic music, however, when it is played at all, survives into the present age by the lighter qualities—felicities with harmonic and instrumental color; lyric flow and pointed rhythms; the fancy that imbues it, the grace that often shapes it. To hear it in perfection sit before a performance of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," at a State Theater in Germany when the State Opera House has lent an orchestra of, say, thirty virtuosi and the ablest of its assistant conductors. Then one hears every happy Mendelssohnian trait. Half the pleasure of the "Italian" Symphony revived was the sensibility, finesse and pervading lightness of the performance. In contrast, the over-stressing of the "Scotch" Symphony defeated the conductor's end; made it sound hollower than it actually is; by a rushing pace, as in the two Allegros, blurred the Mendelssohnian virtues.

Some of us, remembering the little orchestras in Munich or Dresden or Frankfurt for the music to Shakspeare's comedy, would gladly hear the "Italian" or the "Scotch" Symphony played with the smallest possible numbers. (Dr. Koussevitzky's similar experiments with Mozart and Haydn have invariably succeeded). Mendelssohn in 1932 depends much on suavity, finesse and light animation in the conductor. "How lucid is the texture of the writing," exclaimed Mr. Gilman in The Herald Tribune last October after he had heard the "Italian" Symphony from Toscanini, "how pleasurable its fancy, how adroit and sure its workmanship. To overstress Mendelssohn nowadays is to overcloud him. Without "infectious élan"—to quote Mr. Gilman again—he becomes the bore that he seemed, last Friday and Saturday, at Symphony Hall.

H. T. P.

For the Children

Here in Boston

Mr. Prokofiev, who is now in the North Atlantic on voyage to New York, will be guest-composer and pianist at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Dec. 30 and Saturday, Dec. 31. At both, and subsequently in New York, he will play his new Concerto, No. 5, notably well received within the past two months at concerts in Berlin, Moscow and Leningrad.

The choir of The Cecilia will be chorus to the Symphony Orchestra in the approaching performances—the first in America—of Mr. Walton's cantata, "Belshazzar's Feast." Mr. Fiedler is now preparing the singers in a music that will stretch their powers to the utmost. Since the cantata is relatively brief, Mr. Walton is unrelentless.

70

Trans

DECEMBER 21, 1932

s --- Films

The News from Concert-Halls Here and Now

Martinu's "Pattern" Music, Loeffler and Whitman by The Apollo Club

THIS week, by intervention of Christmas Eve, the evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra, transferred to Thursday, precedes the usual Friday matinée. At both Dr. Koussevitzky introduces to Boston Bohuslav Martinu's "String Quartet with Orchestra." London heard it on Oct. 10 of this year from the Philharmonic Orchestra under Dr. Malcolm Sargent, with the Pro Arte Quartet, to whom it is dedicated, as soloists. A few sentences from a review in The Musical Times may prepare the way: "The new work by the Czech composer, Martinu, bore no other title but 'String Quartet with Orchestra.' It suggests a Concerto Grosso with the string quartet as concertino. The three movements—Allegro vivo, Adagio and Tempo moderato—are in character, and their dependence upon definite schemes of rhythm adds to the resemblance. In other respects, the music is very much of the twentieth century, with almost arithmetically calculated dissonances, many cross threads and involutions of texture, entire occupation with its own surface and its acrid flavor."

A few facts about Martinu's music and general style may be gleaned from an article upon him by Andreas Liess in the little German magazine, "Der Weihergarten": "Martinu is a neo-classicist of the purest water, if we understand by the term a union of all those modern tendencies which are striving afresh toward a pure, self-contained music, and which are going back to the past (whether consciously or not) for the means necessary to a classical style. Bach is the composer most used for model in this endeavor. Martinu, aloof from the general trend, probably stands alone in drawing his particular brand of classicism from Mozartean backgrounds.

"The soundness of his musical instinct leads him in the direction of simplicity and naturalness; protects him from going astray in the morass of theoretical problem-making. Yet one can hardly say that the problems of the day have left no traces upon his creative work. Chief among those that have affected him are rhythmic and formal problems. On the rhythmic side the influence of jazz is superimposed upon that of folk-rhythm. This double quality comes to the fore in his Violin-Sonata, the formal scheme of which is built upon a syncopation. His orchestral piece, 'Half-Time,' especially requires a rhythmic-dynamic explanation. The jazz influence is also found in his piano-pieces and in the little stage work, 'La Revue de Cuisine,' a stylistic amalgam of jazz with Mozart. . . .

"The formal element is strongly emphasized in all neo-classical endeavors. It is treated with concentration; becomes concise without seeming to be abbreviated. Martinu never handles his forms merely schematically, but allows them to evolve out of the inner necessities of his themes. This trait merits especial mention; for too often neo-classicists are inclined to err by merely filling in certain historic forms, instead of causing them to grow out of their thematic material.

"Sound neo-classicism demands simplicity. The overloaded orchestra of romanticism disappears from the negation of the purely coloristic element. The chamber orchestra succeeds it. Martinu makes only comparatively slight demands upon the players. The sonata-form, which with the romanticists consisted in the opposition of two themes, often interpreted as a struggle between two mutually contradictory principles, now becomes a field in which two complementary themes are placed side by side. Which is the reigning principle with Hindemith, Fortner and Beck, as well as with Martinu. . . . That which is individual in Martinu's music is . . . the delicate drawing of his genre music, the intimate nature of his music in general. His own confession of a turning toward the art of Mozart is only the wise recognition of the dominant element in his own music."

To return to the "String Quartet with Orchestra." The orchestra scarcely extends beyond chamber proportions. Martinu asks only fourteen wind instruments—two each of flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, trumpets, trombones, in addition to a single pair of kettle drums and the usual strings. Since the piece is the most "absolute" of self-contained music, only thematic analysis is possible. The first movement is in sonata form. The solo-quartet has the initial well-rhythmed theme. After some eighteen measures the full orchestra repeats it. A transitional theme in triplets, in octaves and unisons, soon follows. The solo-quartet also announces the second or lyric theme. The development is short. Both themes reappear without the intervening transitional theme. There is further development of the lyric theme which leads to the coda in which the principal theme appears in a heightened version at the end.

"In the Adagio the solo strings present sixteen measures of the most sustained quartet music; are then joined by the orchestra. There is considerable use of an ascending chromatic scale in the first development. Then, against pizzicato repeated chords in the orchestra, the quartet plays a highly florid and ornate imitative counterpoint that grows out of the theme of the beginning. The last movement is clearly a rondo. Woodwinds begin with a gay little theme in which major and minor curiously alternate. After an episode of no thematic character, it is repeated by the quartet. Then the quartet ushers in a more melodic middle section. Finally the theme twice repeated with the episode between. . . . Poring over this score the reader is reminded of Mr. Carpenter, seeking a title for his latest piece, played last October, finally lighting upon "Patterns." For this music of Martinu is "pattern-music" if ever there was such a thing. Patterns small and patterns large; objective music, self-contained, first, last and always music of pure design.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

DEC 21 1932

NOTED ORCHESTRA TO START WEEKLY SERIES ON DEC. 31

There is good news for the nation's music lovers this morning. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is coming on the air in a series of weekly broadcasts.

With the acquisition of this notable organization, the broadcasters can now point proudly to the sponsorship of every important symphony orchestra in the United States. Heretofore, the Boston group has been heard only intermittently on the radio, its broadcasts confined to one or two of its regular season recitals and a few "pop" concerts in Summer.

The Boston band will begin its radio series on Saturday night, Dec. 31, and the concerts will be heard each week for a period of ten weeks over a nationwide network of the N. B. C. The programs, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be a part of the regular season of the orchestra in Boston.

DIPLOMATS' CHILDREN.

International Christ ro-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

DEC 22 1932

HubSymphony Over NBC

Orchestra to Give Series of Ten Weekly Concerts Throughout Winter.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's greatest musical organizations, will be heard over National Broadcasting Company networks throughout the Winter in a series of ten weekly concerts.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra for the benefit of the nation at large, as well as for his immediate audience, each Saturday evening, beginning December 31. The full concert will be broadcast over an NBC-WJZ network, starting at 8.15 p. m., Eastern Standard Time.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first really permanent orchestra in America, according to Elson's History of American Music, having been heard regularly in full concert series since 1881, and is world famous.

It has been heard by radio only at rare intervals before, and never has broadcast its Saturday season series for nationwide audiences.

Serge Koussevitzky, who has directed the Boston orchestra since 1924, when he came to this country from Europe, is a brilliant conductor, with a long and distinguished career. He was born in Tver, Russia, in 1874, and at the age of twelve became chef d'orchestre in the theater of his birthplace, composing whatever music was required in the plays, and conducting the entr'actes.

At fourteen Koussevitzky went to Moscow to study, became the double-bass soloist of the Imperial Opera, and toured Europe for ten years with great success. In 1909 he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and in addition to performing throughout the season in Moscow and Petrograd, toured the provinces in the Summer, presenting his orchestra and famous soloists in Volga villages, where the peasants not only had never heard an orchestra, but had never seen many of the instruments.

After the war, in 1921, Koussevitzky began a series of tours through the capitals of Europe which were immensely successful, and he continued these until 1924 when he came to America to take over the leadership of the Boston orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALLIANCE, O.
REVIEW

DEC 22 193

BOSTON SYMPHONY GOES ON NETWORK

Kris Kringle Distributes Contracts To Stars For Christmas

NEW YORK, Dec. 22—(AP)—Two-hour concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be a Saturday night network feature the first ten weeks of the new year. Starting on New Year's eve, the programs will be carried to a WJZ-NBC chain via WBZ-WBZA as the key station. The broadcasts open at 8:15.

At Symphony

By MOSES SMITH

Because of the approaching holiday the Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was advanced to last night. The schedule for this afternoon's matinee was not affected. The program conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, began with a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Czar Saltan," and ended with the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz. In between came the first American performance of a string quartet with orchestra, by the Czech composer, Martinu

There was a dazzling and virtuosic performance of the music by Rimsky, which is itself written by a virtuoso composer. Modern developments in the orchestra notwithstanding, Rimsky-Korsakov remains a master of instrumentation, as was apparent last night in the score, which leans heavily, incidentally, on folk-music. As played on this occasion the familiar "Flight of the Bumble-Bee" was included, giving Georges Laurent an opportunity for his fireworks with his flute.

The new work of Martinue illustrates that composer in his latest phase of ultra-modernism, which is to say neo-classicism. This music is in three movements and in form like the old concerto grosso of Handel and the Italians; also like some of Bach's Brandenburg concerti. The resemblance to Bach (rather than to Mozart, as some have said) is heightened by the character of the thematic material, aspecially the lively theme of the third movement which is so similar to the trumpet subject opening one of the Brandenburg concerti.

What originality lies in the new score is in the studious use of dissonance, and in the unemotional development of the material—and this can scarcely be called originality today. And although the performance of last night seemed capably executed, there were stretches when the string quartet was inaudible in the welter of orchestral sound—a fault, quite likely, of the composer. Yet the work was received by the audience with some enthusiasm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

NEW SYMPHONY SERIES BOOKED

Boston Orchestra to Be Heard Weekly Over NBC Network.

By LYNDEN MORROW.
Radio Editor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard over NBC networks throughout the winter in a series of 10 weekly concerts starting December 31 at 8:15 and reaching the local audience through KDKA. The full concerts, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will be sent over the air.

According to Elson's History of American Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first really permanent orchestra in America, having been heard in full concert series regularly since 1881. It has been heard over the air only at rare intervals before, and never has broadcast its Saturday season series for nationwide audiences.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

THE LOUDS

A Notable Capture.

In signing the Boston Symphony for a series of concerts the air lords have captured the last important musical body of the land that had shown resistance to their pleas. It has always been a mystery to us why this group so persistenly defied the broadcasters. Maybe, it shrewdly sensed that its eventual surrender would become all the bigger news. And the bigger the news, the bigger the price involved.

Today, there are only two big pieces of musical news left for the broadcasters to achieve. One is marked "Kreisler," the other "Paderewski."

* * *

Anyway, the broadcasters can really say that, musically, the radio was never more imposing than it is right now. Every musical group making the least pretensions to greatness is on their payroll. And if any of the latter had misgivings about the ability of the microphone to reproduce their immortal music or the appreciation on the part of the armchairs toward that music they long since discarded them.

* * *

The symphony bands have today an enormous following. Much of it is due, I believe, to the firm determination on the part of the fiddlers and their conductors not to play down to the public in their radio recitals.

Unlike so many of radio's regulars they credit their public with intelligence and artistic appreciation. The public, grateful, responds with stilled parlors and attentive ears.

* * *

And so we have the illuminating picture of present-day America more familiar with Wagner and Beethoven than the America of the Nineties was with Von Tilzer and Charles K. Harris.

If you don't believe it, ask Dad. He knows.

Herald Dec 23

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

In order to leave the holidays free, the regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which would have been given this afternoon and tomorrow evening were arranged so that the Saturday subscribers attended last night, while the Friday afternoon concert will be given today as usual. The program was not one to soothe the savage beast, but rather to excite him. It was as follows: Suite from the opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakoff, including Allegretto alla marcia, Introduction to Act II, The Flight of the Bumble Bee, and The Three Wonders (introduction to last scene). String quartet with orchestra, Martinu, in three movements—allegro vivo, adagio and tempo moderato. Symphonie Fantastique in C major, Berlioz. 1, Dreams, Passions. 2, A Ball. 3, Scene in the Meadows. 4. March to the Scaffold. 5. A Witches' Sabbath.

Bohuslav Martinu, the Czech composer whose quartet with orchestra was given its first performance in the United States last night, could not ask for a better performance than his work received at the hands of Dr. Koussevitsky, intuitively and sympathetically alive to all the possibilities in so dynamic a score, and the Burgin quartet, a virtuoso group, consisting of Richard Burgin and Robert Gundersen, violins; Jean LeFranc, viola; Jean Bedetti, violoncello.

The music was well-made, of amazing climaxes and rhythmic developments. It did not seem to be quartet music; it was symphonic music. Whenever the quartet sounded alone, it was [illegible] better handed directly to full orchestra, for the players were asked more than their instruments, even played so ably, could give. The orchestra itself, sharply enunciating the curt rhythmic figures of the first movement, spoke all the important musical thought of the section. The rising climax, from the themes given out first by the quartet, then by full orchestra, and at last, triumphantly, by single trumpet, was astoundingly effective. In the second movement, an undercurrent of voices from the orchestra, heavy and relentless beneath the patterns woven by the nimble strings of the quartet, rose on a mounting scale to an intensification of the first theme of the movement. Again in the last movement, Martinu made use of a sort of obsessional rythmic figure—this time in the percussion mainly—of hypnotic effect, rising to a full-voiced climax. The security with which Martinu achieves his musical ends, the salty tang of his orchestration, and the vigor of his rhythmic thought and dynamic apotheoses, place him in a class with Stravinsky and Prokofiev. He is a composer really at home in the modern musical milieu—not a romanticist coloring up his 18th century melodies with dark 19th century dissonances.

The orchestra was in fine spirits for the Rimsky-Korsakoff fairy tale. They vigorously "dipped their mustaches in it," contrary to the usual procedure in Russian folk tales, according to the program notes. Imaginative, glittering, with those moments of richly sensuous melody and sparkling harmonic brilliance that make Rimsky-Korsakoff's music to the body of western music what the Arabian Nights Tales are to western literature, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" opened the concert with sounds of festivity appropriate to the season. Needless to say, the suite was superbly played by the orchestra, which, especially in "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," redemonstrated its virtuosity in ensemble.

The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony, still fantastic even to modern ears, inured though they be to auditory experiments and audacities from young modern orchestrators, still dramatically powerful, still a marvel of how to get the utmost in effectiveness out of the orchestra, closed the program. Dr. Koussevitsky gave it an electrifying reading.

E. B.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 23

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Because Christmas Eve comes tomorrow, the evening Symphony concert this week was set over from Saturday to Thursday. Dr Koussevitzky conducted the first performance in the United States of a "String Quartet With Orchestro," by the Czech composer, Bohuslav Martinu. The remaining numbers were a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," and Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony. The solo parts in Martinu's work were played by Messrs Burgin and Gundersen, violins; LeFranc, viola, and Bedetti, cello.

Martinu is remembered in Boston for the performance by the Boston Symphony in 1927 of his "La Bagarre" and of "La Symphonie" in 1928. His present work is in the nature of a concerto for orchestra and string quartet, and could even be compared to the archaic concerto grosso, with the four solo instruments as concertino. As befits a composer of reputed neoclassical tendencies, Martinu calls for a relatively small orchestra—two of each wind instrument and the body of strings.

It is as well to avoid discussion here of neoclassicism in general, for that is a subject upon which much has and will be written. In this case, such a tendency does not seem to have caused the pages of Martinu's piece to be dry and barren, as might be expected. The work starts out so well it ought to be better. The two allegros begin full of ideas, vitality and rhythmic promise and the intervening adagio has its birth in some interesting contrapuntal measures for the solo instruments. This section, by the way, is unusual for its felicitous combination of recognizable melody and agreeably dissonant harmony. But although novel dynamic effects and peculiar sonorities are obtained here and there, all three movements soon begin to sag, and all finish rather monotonously, without sufficient variety of rhythm, tone color, or harmony to sustain interest. And, worst of all, Mr Martinu has occasionally indulged in what appear to be cliches of early American ragtime. That procedure is hardly likely to bear musical fruit in these days. In other portions, jazz rhythms of the present figure prominently and cleverly. As in more than one performance of such music, the Symphony players failed to capture the spirit and subtlety of this sort of rhythm.

Martinu apparently has not overlooked the fact that, even in these uncertain days, the "common" chord is still at par on the musical exchange, and he thus ends two movements in peace and concord.

The suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera when heard in the concert hall fails to stir one. Indeed, it is interesting only for its rhythmic vigor and opulence of instrumentation. And when placed on the same program with Berlioz' marvelously imaginative symphony, it actually suffers by comparison. Here is a prime demonstration of the fact that any sort of "program" music lives by the music alone. Both these pieces are a dramatic sort of composition, appended to each is a species of "program." But in the symphony the composer by sheer genius transformed his ideas and flights of imagination into a musical organism so vital, so expressive, that today, 100 years later, the work thrills and moves the listener whether or not he thinks about the "program."

This is not the case with Rimsky's suite. His music may be vivid and powerful when heard in the opera house, but elsewhere it requires much assistance from the "program" to make any effect.

The performance of Berlioz' Symphony was one of sheer splendor and irresistible force, in which Dr Koussevitzky displayed anew his superb talent for interpreting this sort of music. Even the prolix "meadow" section held one in its spell.

Serge Prokofieff, the Russian composer, will be piano soloist at the Symphony concerts next week in the first American performance of his new Fifth Piano Concerto. Dr Koussevitzky will also conduct Brahms' Third Symphony, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice."

C. W. D.

AY, DECEMBER 23,

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW MUSIC

Martinu's Quartet With Orchestra for First Time in U. S.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To employ a terminology now become obsolete, Public Rehearsal and Symphony Concert are appearing this week in reverse order. In other words since Saturday is Christmas Eve, the evening concert took place last night while the matinee comes this afternoon as usual.

MERELY POLITE TO BEE

Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky did have holidays in mind when he chose for the opening number the colorful Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," introduced to us by Mr. Monteux. It was interesting and no doubt instructive to observe that the third number of this Suite, the "Flight of the Bumble-Bee," which provoked a veritable furore when first played here, received last evening scarcely more than polite applause. Thus do tidbits have their day. Taken as a whole, the Suite exemplifies Rimsky's dependence upon orchestral color.

First Time in U. S.

Had the order of the two remaining pieces been changed they might have pointed a musical moral. At the end of the concert came one of the earliest, yet at the same time one of the most extravagant examples of musical romanticism, the youthful Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony. Before it, for the first time in the United States, came a piece titled merely String Quartet with Orchestra by a young man of today, the Parisianized Czech Bohuslav Martinu, a perfect sample of the present-day neo-classicism that is the natural, inevitable reaction to the romanticism of Berlioz and his successors.

Mr. Martinu's music, like that of many another contemporary composer, addresses itself not to the imagination nor the heart nor even to the ear, save in the stimulating quality of its rhythms and its dissonances, but to the mind.

The Solo Quartet

Mr. Martinu contrives for his second movement an Adagio without song, sentiment or mood. The first and third sections, in which he moves more freely are muscular, athletic, wholly unsensuous and very difficult to play.

Presumably the answering applause, which was warm and long continued, was not so much the music as for the performance by the solo quartet, Messrs. Burgin, Gundersen, LeFranc and Bedetti, and their supporting colleagues.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SU

MUSICIANS WHO WELCOME XMAS

RICHARD BURGIN
Symphony violinst.

JESUS SANROMA
Symphony pianist.

71

Herald Dec 25, 1932

PAGE FOUR

Symphony Players Make Plans For Their Christmas Holidays

Cosmopolitan Musicians Punctuate Rehearsal Intermission with Exchange of Confidences

By ELIZABETH BORTON

Dr. Koussevitsky rapped sharply on his desk. Attention. "There will be no more rehearsals until after Christmas." Applause from the men. Feet scraping against the floor and violin bows ticking merrily against the wood of fiddles. (The typically orchestral manifestation of joy and approval.) And there was genuine applause from the pianistically inclined, including Arthur Fiedler at the celesta, Jesus Sanroma at the piano behind the scenes, and Bernard Zighera, who is a pianist as well as harpist. Hooray, hooray. No more rehearsals until after Christmas.

"Now the last movement once more." Silence. Every man alert, poised, ready. The music sings out, warm and full, to the brilliant climax. Dr. Koussevitsky, perspiring in his woolen sweater, throws a cloak over his shoulders, and leaves the conductor's stand. It is the break in the rehearsal period. One by one the men drift toward the musicians' room. carrying clarinets, flutes, or scores. All the stringed instrument players have left their violas and violins lying on their chairs, the bows dangling from the music stands. The 'cellos lie on their sides by the deserted chairs of the 'cellists. The double-basses lean against the walls in back. A few weary and worn players keep their seats, running desultory scales, or talking with each other.

CASCADE OF CONVERSATION

There is a cascade of conversation in many languages in the halls and in the musicians' room. Through the thick, blue atmosphere progress fresh little clouds of smoke, and assorted vowels and consonants with Russian, French, German, Italian, and Dutch implications.

"What are you going to do on Christmas?" they are all asking each other.

Jesus Sanroma, always busy with a practical joke or relaying an musing anecdote, is shaking hands with all those wags who have rushed up to congratulate him on his playing in the Berlioz Fantastique Symphony. (He had at least 10 notes to play.)

"I'll be at home on Christmas day, and in the evening at a party in Dr. Koussevitsky's home. He always entertains a few of us very simply. I look forward to it." (With the mischievous Sanroma around, it wouldn't be necessary to make more than simple preparations for a party. He would do the rest.)

"It's a long time since I spent Christmas at home in Porto Rico," said he. "There we celebrate with midnight mass on Christmas eve, of course, but the exchanging of gifts comes later. On the sixth of January, all the little children then make ready to greet the Magi—the three kings who came from afar with gifts for the child Jesus. The children put out boxes of grass for the horses of the travel-weary Magi, and in the morning the grass is gone, and the boxes are full of presents from the kings."

SOME OF THE PLANS

Various bachelor members of the orchestra (there are only 15) refuse to divulge the nature of their movements on Christmas day. Some are going to Philadelphia. Some will stay in Boston. One went so far as to reveal that he would spend Christmas in a cabin in the White mountains, all alone with a turkey and a large quantity of snow.

Richard Burgin, famous as the most absent-minded genius of all the genii in the orchestra, will spend the evening of Christmas day at the home of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, unless he forgets the date, as he has been known to do on occasion.

Jean Cauhape, of the viola section, has two children, so he is going to do Christmas up American style, with turkey and fixings and a real Christmas tree, though the tree is not customary in France. In France the children put their shoes by the fire, and the morning they find them full of presents. And, of course, every one attends mass on Christmas eve, afterward eating a late supper.

Bernard Zighera, recently made a father by the arrival of a baby in Paris, expects to keep the cable hot over the holidays, as indeed he does every week-end, anyway. He has not seen his progeny, and in order to keep his mental pictures of the infant somewhere near actuality, he has its weekly weight cabled to him on Saturdays.

"In France, if I were there, I would sleep all Christmas day," he said. "We begin celebrating Christmas eve, and it lasts so late, that on Christmas day we are all sleeping. The same happens on New Year's eve."

Mr. Valkenier, the horn player, is a Dutchman, and his wife is German. They have three children, none of whom believe in Santa Claus any more. It's very distressing.

"Even the littlest one doesn't believe in him any more," said Mr. Valkenier. "He was up town, and he saw so many of them, that he was confused. 'Who's that, Daddy?' 'That's Santa Claus.' 'But we just saw Santa Claus.' 'Well, this is his brother.' 'My, he has a lot of brothers.' So I'm afraid even his faith is pretty badly shaken."

As to the Christmas dinner, almost anything in the way of delicious food—German, Dutch, French, or Italian—is likely to come out of the talented Mrs. Valkenier's kitchen. It remains one of Mr. Valkenier's rights as a husband, that his dinner be a surprise to him, so he can't even say what will grace the board on Christmas day.

Yves Chardon, who has two children, submits that in France it is not customary to spend so much money on Christmas presents as we do here. To his surprise, and possibly a bit to the dampening of his spirits, he received itemized lists from his offspring as to what would be acceptable gifts from Santa Claus tomorrow.

Mr. Bettoney, the bass clarinet player, is English. It will be a real Dickensian Christmas that he will celebrate with his family. All the relatives will be there, and there will be goose and a ham, and apple sauce, and everything plummy and good. And Mr. Bettoney will probably be required to dress up in red and be Santa Claus. There'll be a tree, of course, loaded with gifts.

Georges Laurent, first flutist, declares that his Christmas day will consist of large sections of rest and relaxation, with, of course, the usual good Christmas dinner being worked into the day somewhere.

The bell. Cigarettes dropped and ground under heels. Back to rehearsal.

Herald Dec 23

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

In order to leave the holidays free, the regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which would have been given this afternoon and tomorrow evening were arranged so that the Saturday subscribers attended last night, while the Friday afternoon concert will be given today as usual. The program was not one to soothe the savage beast, but rather to excite him. It was as follows: Suite from the opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakoff, including Allegretto alla marcia, Introduction to Act II, The Flight of the Bumble Bee, and The Three Wonders (introduction to last scene). String quartet with orchestra, Martinu, in three movements—allegro vivo, adagio and tempo moderato. Symphonie Fantastique in C major, Berlioz. 1, Dreams, Passions. 2. A Ball. 3, Scene in the Meadows. 4. March to the Scaffold. 5. A Witches' Sabbath.

Bohuslav Martinu, the Czech composer whose quartet with orchestra was given its first performance in the United States last night, could not ask for a better performance than his work received at the hands of Dr. Koussevitsky, intuitively and sympathetically alive to all the possibilities in so dynamic a score, and the Burgin quartet, a virtuoso group, consisting of Richard Burgin and Robert Gundersen, violins; Jean LeFranc, viola; Jean Bedetti, violoncello.

The music was well-made, of amazing climaxes and rhythmic developments. It did not seem to be quartet music; it was symphonic music. Whenever the quartet sounded alone, it was given music better handed directly to full orchestra, for the players were asked more than their instruments, even played so ably, could give. The orchestra itself, sharply enunciating the curt rhythmic figures of the first movement, spoke all the important musical thought of the section. The rising climax, from the themes given out first by the quartet, then by full orchestra, and at last, triumphantly, by single trumpet, was astoundingly effective. In the second movement, an undercurrent of voices from the orchestra, heavy and relentless beneath the patterns woven by the nimble strings of the quartet, rose on a mounting scale to an intensification of the first theme of the movement. Again in the last movement, Martinu made use of a sort of obsessional rythmic figure—this time in the percussion mainly—of hypnotic effect, rising to a full-voiced climax. The security with which Martinu achieves his musical ends, the salty tang of his orchestration, and the vigor of his rhythmic thought and dynamic apotheoses, place him in a class with Stravinsky and Prokofiev. He is a composer really at home in the modern musical milieu—not a romanticist coloring up his 18th century melodies with dark 19th century dissonances.

The orchestra was in fine spirits for the Rimsky-Korsakoff fairy tale. They vigorously "dipped their mustaches in it," contrary to the usual procedure in Russian folk tales, according to the program notes. Imaginative, glittering, with those moments of richly sensuous melody and sparkling harmonic brilliance that make Rimsky-Korsakoff's music to the body of western music what the Arabian Nights Tales are to western literature, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" opened the concert with sounds of festivity appropriate to the season. Needless to say, the suite was superbly played by the orchestra, which, especially in "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," redemonstrated its virtuosity in ensemble.

The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony, still fantastic even to modern ears, inured though they be to auditory experiments and audacities from young modern orchestrators, still dramatically powerful, still a marvel of how to get the utmost in effectiveness out of the orchestra, closed the program. Dr. Koussevitsky gave it an electrifying reading.

E. B.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 23

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Because Christmas Eve comes tomorrow, the evening Symphony concert this week was set over from Saturday to Thursday. Dr Koussevitzky conducted the first performance in the United States of a "String Quartet With Orchestro," by the Czech composer, Bohuslav Martinu. The remaining numbers were a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," and Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony. The solo parts in Martinu's work were played by Messrs Burgin and Gundersen, violins; LeFranc, viola, and Bedetti, cello.

Martinu is remembered in Boston for the performance by the Boston Symphony in 1927 of his "La Bagarre" and of "La Symphonie" in 1928. His present work is in the nature of a concerto for orchestra and string quartet, and could even be compared to the archaic concerto grosso, with the four solo instruments as concertino. As befits a composer of reputed neoclassical tendencies, Martinu calls for a relatively small orchestra—two of each wind instrument and the body of strings.

It is as well to avoid discussion here of neoclassicism in general, for that is a subject upon which much has and will be written. In this case, such a tendency does not seem to have caused the pages of Martinu's piece to be dry and barren, as might be expected. The work starts out so well it ought to be better. The two allegros begin full of ideas, vitality and rhythmic promise and the intervening adagio has its birth in some interesting contrapuntal measures for the solo instruments. This section, by the way, is unusual for its felicitous combination of recognizable melody and agreeably dissonant harmony. But although novel dynamic effects and peculiar sonorities are obtained here and there, all three movements soon begin to sag, and all finish rather monotonously, without sufficient variety of rhythm, tone color, or harmony to sustain interest. And, worst of all, Mr Martinu has occasionally indulged in what appear to be cliches of early American ragtime. That procedure is hardly likely to bear musical fruit in these days. In other portions, jazz rhythms of the present figure prominently and cleverly. As in more than one performance of such music, the Symphony players failed to capture the spirit and subtlety of this sort of rhythm.

Martinu apparently has not overlooked the fact that, even in these uncertain days, the "common" chord is still at par on the musical exchange, and he thus ends two movements in peace and concord.

The suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera when heard in the concert hall fails to stir one. Indeed, it is interesting only for its rhythmic vigor and opulence of instrumentation. And when placed on the same program with Berlioz' marvelously imaginative symphony, it actually suffers by comparison. Here is a prime demonstration of the fact that any sort of "program" music lives by the music alone. Both these pieces are a dramatic sort of composition, appended to each is a species of "program." But in the symphony the composer by sheer genius transformed his ideas and flights of imagination into a musical organism so vital, so expressive, that today, 100 years later, the work thrills and moves the listener whether or not he thinks about the "program."

This is not the case with Rimsky's suite. His music may be vivid and powerful when heard in the opera house, but elsewhere it requires much assistance from the "program" to make any effect.

The performance of Berlioz' Symphony was one of sheer splendor and irresistible force, in which Dr Koussevitzky displayed anew his superb talent for interpreting this sort of music. Even the prolix "meadow" section held one in its spell.

Serge Prokofieff, the Russian composer, will be piano soloist at the Symphony concerts next week in the first American performance of his new Fifth Piano Concerto. Dr Koussevitzky will also conduct Brahms' Third Symphony, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice."

C. W. D.

AY, DECEMBER 23,

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW MUSIC

Martinu's Quartet With Orchestra for First Time in U. S.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To employ a terminology now become obsolete, Public Rehearsal and Symphony Concert are appearing this week in reverse order. In other words since Saturday is Christmas Eve, the evening concert took place last night while the matinee comes this afternoon as usual.

MERELY POLITE TO BEE

Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky did have holidays in mind when he chose for the opening number the colorful Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," introduced to us by Mr. Monteux. It was interesting and no doubt instructive to observe that the third number of this Suite, the "Flight of the Bumble-Bee," which provoked a veritable furore when first played here, received last evening scarcely more than polite applause. Thus do tidbits have their day. Taken as a whole, the Suite exemplifies Rimsky's dependence upon orchestral color.

First Time in U. S.

Had the order of the two remaining pieces been changed they might have pointed a musical moral. At the end of the concert came one of the earliest, yet at the same time one of the most extravagant examples of musical romanticism, the youthful Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony. Before it, for the first time in the United States, came a piece titled merely String Quartet with Orchestra by a young-man of today, the Parisianized Czech Bohuslav Martinu, a perfect sample of the present-day neo-classicism that is the natural, inevitable reaction to the romanticism of Berlioz and his successors.

Mr. Martinu's music, like that of many another contemporary composer, addresses itself not to the imagination nor the heart nor even to the ear, save in the stimulating quality of its rhythms and its dissonances, but to the mind.

The Solo Quartet

Mr. Martinu contrives for his second movement an Adagio without song, sentiment or mood. The first and third sections, in which he moves more freely are muscular, athletic, wholly unsensuous and very difficult to play.

Presumably the answering applause, which was warm and long continued, was not so much the music as for the performance by the solo quartet, Messrs. Burgin, Gundersen, LeFranc and Bedetti, and their supporting colleagues.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SU

MUSICIANS WHO WELCOME XMAS

RICHARD BURGIN
Symphony violinst.

JESUS SANROMA
Symphony pianist.

71

Herald Dec 25 1932

PAGE FOUR

Symphony Players Make Plans For Their Christmas Holidays

Cosmopolitan Musicians Punctuate Rehearsal Intermission with Exchange of Confidences

By ELIZABETH BORTON

Dr. Koussevitsky rapped sharply on his desk. Attention. "There will be no more rehearsals until after Christmas." Applause from the men. Feet scraping against the floor and violin bows ticking merrily against the wood of fiddles. (The typically orchestral manifestation of joy and approval.) And there was genuine applause from the pianistically inclined, including Arthur Fiedler at the celesta, Jesus Sanroma at the piano behind the scenes, and Bernard Zighera, who is a pianist as well as harpist. Hooray, hooray. No more rehearsals until after Christmas.

"Now the last movement once more." Silence. Every man alert, poised, ready. The music sings out, warm and full, to the brilliant climax. Dr. Koussevitsky, perspiring in his woolen sweater, throws a cloak over his shoulders, and leaves the conductor's stand. It is the break in the rehearsal period. One by one the men drift toward the musicians' room, carrying clarinets, flutes, or scores. All the stringed instrument players have left their violas and violins lying on their chairs, the bows dangling from the music stands. The 'cellos lie on their sides by the deserted chairs of the 'cellists. The double-basses lean against the walls in back. A few weary and worn players keep their seats, running desultory scales, or talking with each other.

CASCADE OF CONVERSATION

There is a cascade of conversation in many languages in the halls and in the musicians' room. Through the thick, blue atmosphere progress fresh little clouds of smoke, and assorted vowels and consonants with Russian, French, German, Italian, and Dutch implications.

"What are you going to do on Christmas?" they are all asking each other.

Jesus Sanroma, always busy with a practical joke or relaying an musing anecdote, is shaking hands with all those wags who have rushed up to congratulate him on his playing in the Berlioz Fantastique Symphony. (He had at least 10 notes to play.)

"I'll be at home on Christmas day, and in the evening at a party in Dr. Koussevitsky's home. He always entertains a few of us very simply. I look forward to it." (With the mischievous Sanroma around, it wouldn't be necessary to make more than simple preparations for a party. He would do the rest.)

"It's a long time since I spent Christmas at home in Porto Rico," said he. "There we celebrate with midnight mass on Christmas eve, of course, but the exchanging of gifts comes later. On the sixth of January, all the little children then make ready to greet the Magi—the three kings who came from afar with gifts for the child Jesus. The children put out boxes of grass for the horses of the travel-weary Magi, and in the morning the grass is gone, and the boxes are full of presents from the kings."

SOME OF THE PLANS

Various bachelor members of the orchestra (there are only 15) refuse to divulge the nature of their movements on Christmas day. Some are going to Philadelphia. Some will stay in Boston. One went so far as to reveal that he would spend Christmas in a cabin in the White mountains, all alone with a turkey and a large quantity of snow.

Richard Burgin, famous as the most absent-minded genius of all the genii in the orchestra, will spend the evening of Christmas day at the home of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, unless he forgets the date, as he has been known to do on occasion.

Jean Cauhape, of the viola section, has two children, so he is going to do Christmas up American style, with turkey and fixings and a real Christmas tree, though the tree is not customary in France. In France the children put their shoes by the fire, and the morning they find them full of presents. And, of course, every one attends mass on Christmas eve, afterward eating a late supper.

Bernard Zighera, recently made a father by the arrival of a baby in Paris, expects to keep the cable hot over the holidays, as indeed he does every weekend, anyway. He has not seen his progeny, and in order to keep his mental pictures of the infant somewhere near actuality, he has its weekly weight cabled to him on Saturdays.

"In France, if I were there, I would sleep all Christmas day," he said. "We begin celebrating Christmas eve, and it lasts so late, that on Christmas day we are all sleeping. The same happens on New Year's eve."

Mr. Valkenier, the horn player, is a Dutchman, and his wife is German. They have three children, none of whom believe in Santa Claus any more. It's very distressing.

"Even the littlest one doesn't believe in him any more," said Mr. Valkenier. "He was up town, and he saw so many of them, that he was confused. 'Who's that, Daddy?' 'That's Santa Claus.' 'But we just saw Santa Claus.' 'Well, this is his brother.' 'My, he has a lot of brothers.' So I'm afraid even his faith is pretty badly shaken."

As to the Christmas dinner, almost anything in the way of delicious food—German, Dutch, French, or Italian—is likely to come out of the talented Mrs. Valkenier's kitchen. It remains one of Mr. Valkenier's rights as a husband, that his dinner be a surprise to him, so he can't even say what will grace the board on Christmas day.

Yves Chardon, who has two children, submits that in France it is not customary to spend so much money on Christmas presents as we do here. To his surprise, and possibly a bit to the dampening of his spirits, he received itemized lists from his offspring as to what would be acceptable gifts from Santa Claus tomorrow.

Mr. Bettoney, the bass clarinet player, is English. It will be a real Dickensian Christmas that he will celebrate with his family. All the relatives will be there, and there will be goose and a ham, and apple sauce, and everything plummy and good. And Mr. Bettoney will probably be required to dress up in red and be Santa Claus. There'll be a tree, of course, loaded with gifts.

Georges Laurent, first flutist, declares that his Christmas day will consist of large sections of rest and relaxation, with, of course, the usual good Christmas dinner being worked into the day somewhere.

The bell. Cigarettes dropped and ground under heels. Back to rehearsal.

72

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Dec. 28

By All Means

RUMOR goes about that when Mr. Burgin, as deputy-conductor, takes over the Symphony Concerts of Jan. 13 and 14, he will include in the program Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral Symphony." Of all the composer's works none has better or longer deserved place there. Into the symphony Vaughan Williams infuses not only his own meditative temperament but also the quiet beauty of the English countryside in summer; clothes both in a rare poetry of tones. Thanks to Mr. Goodrich, a few in Boston have heard the music from the student orchestra at the Conservatory. It should be heard no less by the wider public and in the more adept performance of the Symphony Orchestra. In his annual program-making, Mr. Burgin has seldom made happier choice. Announcement should confirm it.

At Symphony Hall

A revised calendar through January and February contains these announcements, hitherto unpublished. For the Symphony Orchestra: Albert Spalding, the violinist, will be assisting artist at the concerts of Jan. 13 and 14, when Mr. Burgin conducts. . . . The promised performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony with assisting soloists and the Harvard-Radcliffe choirs is set for the concerts of Feb. 10 and 11. . . Mr. Gieseking, the eminent pianist, will be assisting artist at the concerts of Feb. 17 and 18.

For others: Mr. Paderewski may be expected for a single concert of piano-pieces on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 12. . . . Mme. Lotte Lehmann, the notable singing actress whom Bostonians discovered a year ago in "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger," will be heard for the first time here as singer of songs on Tuesday evening, Feb. 21. She excels with them. . . . The Harvard Glee Club, with Dr. Davison conducting, announces for Thursday evening, Feb. 16, its annual concert for the collegiate and the general public. . . . The Hall Johnson Negro Choir, which instinctively dramatizes whatever it touches, will return on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 19. . . . John Goss and his English singers of sea-chanties will also return on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 5.

MUSIC

Her [illegible] 21

SYMPHONY NOTES

Prokofieff's piano concerto No. 5 will be performed by the composer and the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night. These performances will be the first in this country. The concerto was introduced at Berlin on Oct. 31 when it was played by Prokofieff and the Philharmonic orchestra conducted by Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

This new concerto is in five movements. The first follows more or less the traditions, but toward the end there is the anticipation of the chief theme of the finale. The second movement rests on staccato chords for the brass. An energetic theme is contrasted with a theme for the piano alone.

Third movement. There is a brilliant cadenza for the piano, and two themes of the first movement reappear. The fourth movement is a set of variations on a theme given to the piano accompanied by the strings. A new subject is developed by the strings. The finale has the orthodox motives with the development in the "concertante" manner, but the Coda brings in a third motive.

This concerto was composed in 1932. Prokofieff played his third piano concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1926; his second concerto in 1929. Has his first, composed in 1911, been performed in this country or his fourth?

The program of this week will also comprise two preludes by Bach—one the preface to the D minor fugue No. 9 for organ; the other the prelude of the Third Partita—arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli — they were played here at the concerts of Oct. 17-18, 1930; Brahms's symphony No. 3, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish themes.

The orchestra will give concerts in New York on Jan. 5 and 7. Mr. Prokofieff will play his concerto at both concerts and with the orchestra at Brooklyn on Jan. 6. In New York the symphony on Thursday evening, the 5th, will be the Fantastic of Berlioz; on Saturday afternoon, the 7th, the Seventh by Beethoven.

The program of the symphony's pension fund concert next Sunday afternoon will be made up of excerpts from "Tannhaeuser," "Lohengrin," Siegfried," "Dusk of the Gods," "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg." Paul Althouse, tenor, will sing Lohengrin's Narrative and Walther's Prize Song.

Next Tuesday afternoon the Boston Symphony orchestra will play Handel's Concerto Grosso, D minor, op. 6 (No. 10); Mozart's Symphony in G minor; Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 9.

Trans

Prokofiev Brings His New Concerto

The Method, Matter, Manner, As He Sets Them Out, Ways of Work

THE distinguished and familiar guest at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday is Serge Prokofiev, again as composer and pianist. At both concerts he will play for the first times in the United States the solo-part of his new Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 55, written in this present year, produced two months ago at one of Furtwängler's concerts in Berlin. . . . Seen at Symphony Hall Tuesday morning, Mr. Prokofiev was liberal with information about the new work, interlarding it with discourse about his theories and practice in composition. "Boston knows my second and third concertos," he began. "I have played them here. The fourth was written for the one-armed pianist, Wittgenstein; is therefore not a work which the normally equipped pianist would be likely to play. The present concerto is the fifth, the next in the line of succession.

"My main problem in this concerto was to create a technic that should be different from that of the preceding concertos. You see, an artist must always be striving for new modes of expression, new ways of presenting his ideas. Each new piece must have its own technical manner. If a composer arrives at the point where he begins to say, 'This technic is my personal technic and now I can compose,' the public will soon begin to find resemblances between his works; will indeed presently accuse him of repeating himself. Then his work begins to grow stale, and his decline has begun. It would be easy to make a list of composers whose later works add nothing to the sum total of what they had already said before reaching middle age.

"To tell you about this concerto I must tell you something about the way in which I work. I am always on the lookout for new melodic themes. These I write in a notebook, as they come to me, for future use. All my work is founded on melodies. When I begin a work of major proportions I usually have accumulated enough themes to make half-a-dozen symphonies. Then the work of selection and arrangement begins. In it I use those melodies which are in themselves worthy, but which also complement and enhance each other; which can be made to evolve continuity of thought; which, taken together, will form a coherent and well-proportioned whole.

"In the melodies that I jot down, as well as in the technic of a new work, I am continually searching for something that has not already been written. The successions of tones which form melodies may be of three kinds. In first instance there are the melodic curves which have already become agreeable. With them the composer can always make an immediate success. But they are apt to be short-lived. Witness the fate which is already overtaking Puccinian melody. Secondly, there are the successions of tones which do not form real melodies, and never will. I perceive that at present much that is written and that is intended to be melody is actually anything but melody. This is pure sterility; can never lead to anything; can never have any life at all. Thirdly, there are the successions of tones which form curves that up to date have not been recognized as melodic, but which are genuinely melodic. In such curves and the combination and development of them lies the most fruitful field of work for the composer. It is such melodies that I am always trying hard to find.

"The composition of this Fifth Concerto began with such melodies. I had enough of them to make three concertos. The emphasis in this concerto is entirely on the melodic. There are five movements, and each movement contains at least four themes or melodies. The developments of these themes are exceedingly compact and concise. This will be evident when I tell you that the entire five movements do not take over twenty minutes in performance. Please do not misunderstand me. The themes are not without development. In a work such as Schumann's 'Carnaval' there are also many themes, enough to make a considerable number of symphonies or concertos. But they are not developed at all; they are merely stated. In my new concerto there are actual developments of the themes, but these developments are as compressed and condensed as it is possible to make them.

"Of course there is no program, not a sign or suggestion of a program. But neither is there any movement so expansive as to be a complete sonata-form. The first movement is an Allegro con Brio, with a Meno Mosso as middle section. Though not in sonata-form, it is the main movement of the concerto; fulfils the functions of a sonata-form; is in the spirit of the usual sonata-form. The second movement is a Moderato Ben Accentuato. This movement has a march-like rhythm, but we must be cautious in the use of this term. I would not think of calling it a march because it has none of the vulgarity or commonness which is so often associated with the idea of a march and which actually exists in most popular marches. The third movement is a Toccata, Allegro con Fuoco. This is a precipitate, displayful movement of much technical brilliance and requiring a large virtuosity—as difficult for orchestra as for the soloist. It is a toccata for orchestra as much as for piano.

The fourth movement is a Larghetto. It is the lyrical movement of the concerto. It starts off with a soft, soothing theme; grows more and more intense in the middle portion, develops breadth and tension, then returns to the music of the beginning. German commentators have mistakenly called it a Theme and Variations. The Finale runs: Vivo; Piu Mosso; Coda. It has a decidedly classical flavor. The Coda is based on a new theme which is joined by the other themes of the Finale. The concerto is not cyclic in the Franckian sense of developing several movements out of one theme or set of themes. Each movement has its own independent themes. But there is reference to some of the material of the first movement in the third; and also reference to the material of the third movement in the Finale.

"The piano-part is treated concertante fashion. It is never an actual solo-part and I have written no cadenzas for it. On the other hand it is never the equivalent of a mere orchestral voice. In return the orchestra never sinks to level of an accompaniment. It consistently plays a part in the presentation and development of themes. I may summarize this by saying that the piano always has the leading part which is closely interwoven with significant music in the orchestra." Mr. Prokofiev closely intertwined the fingers of one hand with the fingers of the other. "It is like that," he added by way of illustration.

"The exposition of the whole concerto is brilliant and full of verve and color. I hope it is the kind of music that the Boston public will like. My Fourth Symphony, certainly one of the most important among my works, it did not understand. It was the same with the portraits from 'The Gambler.' As soon as I go into something deeply emotional or profound it becomes indifferent. It is only such things as the Classical Symphony or the March from 'The Love for Three Oranges' that the Boston public likes. I trust that it will like the Fifth Concerto."

A. H. M.

Dec 31 Trans '32

"Symphony"

Quatrains Written by Tristram Livingstone

IN a cold gray garret in the tenement zone,
A man unleashed in a torrent of tone,
The aching flesh, the fevered bone
In a work that men say stands alone.

In a cold gray hall on the busy street,
Minds of creator and interpreter meet,
Lash to a frenzy of clear white heat,
The dead black notes of the printed sheet.

In her seat on the floor sits Mrs. Pratt,
Where her mother and grandam both have sat.
Suspecting they have reached the end of that,
She replaces the pins in last year's hat.

Le Sueur

Incidents and Prospects

The fourth Monday-evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra falls on Feb. 13, the anniversary to a day of the death of Wagner at Venice fifty years ago. The nearest Symphony Concerts are those of the preceding Friday and Saturday, Feb. 10 and 11. For all three concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will make more or less commemorative programs, likely to include voices as well as orchestra.

Though the composer may believe it one of his lesser works, Mr. Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony" continues to make its way into concert-halls the world over. Restricted and repetitious programs are the rule at the older orchestral concerts in Paris. A fortnight ago into the Colonne Concerts went the "Classical Symphony."

Disproportion

Beethoven and Dr. Muck—they are the greatest. [Antonia Brice, new woman-conductor in New York

Trans Dec 30

Trans Dec 30

Guest-conductors and guest-composers are few this winter in these United States. It is also a time for economy with the symphony orchestras. Consequently none of the second species and only one of the first will come to Symphony Hall during Dr. Koussevitzky's mid-winter respite.

At the concerts of the orchestra in Cambridge on Jan. 12, in Boston on Jan. 13 and 14, Mr. Burgin will be deputy-conductor. At the concerts in Boston, on Jan. 20 and 21, Albert Stoessel. of the New York Oratorio Society and the Worcester Music-Festval will be guest-conductor. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky, and the Trustees with him, are not indifferent to young Americans.

gestures and magnificent expenditures

Dec 30 Trans

Music and Musicians

Occasion for A Classicist Of This Day

Martinu's Notable Concerto From Dr. Koussevitzky, Rimsky to Berlioz

IN these December days, it is well enough to reason in the abstract about Christmas programs for symphony concerts, as this department was doing only last Tuesday; but the proof of any program is the hearing. . . . On Dr. Koussevitzky's list for the Symphony Concert of last evening, being the twenty-second of December, there was not a Christmas piece or the semblance thereof. It began with a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera about Tsar Saltan, who was a legendary sovereign in pagan Russia. It proceeded with Martinu's Concerto Grosso for string quartet and orchestra—a music altogether independent of times and seasons. It ended with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which is romantical and orchestral imagination in tones, and little else. It contains, moreover, a March to the Scaffold and a Witches' Sabbath, which are hardly exercises of "the Christmas spirit."

None the less, the audience was exceptionally numerous for a concert with a shifted date, in the midst of holiday preoccupations, while for every number it was uncommonly hearty in applause. Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite captured it. Within recent memory, no modernist—or as the preferred word now goes—no neo-classic, piece has drawn such long, warm and general plaudits as did Martinu's Concerto. As for the "Fantastic Symphony," the house bore not only with its lengths and its faded passages; but lingered at the close to clap the conductor back to the stage. Audiences are contrary creatures. Dr. Muck tried to humor his with Christmas programs, and they proved indifferent. Dr. Koussevitzky, program-making, takes no thought of Christmas, and hearers are alert and applausive.

The Suite and the Symphony made well-seasoned contrast. The Suite, like the opera whence it comes, was virtually unknown to Bostonian or, for that matter, to American ears. Unlike "Snegourotchka," "Sadko" and "The Golden Cockerel," "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" has never made way to the operatic stages of New York or Chicago. Nor, like "The Betrothed of the Tsar," have itinerant Russians carried it about the American land. Nine years ago Mr. Monteux played two divisions at Symphony Hall. Now, Dr. Koussevitzky added the middle movement; while for good measure, and as plum to many a hearer, he tucked in the little Scherzo of the buzzing bee that, after a brief day in the Symphony Concerts of his earliest years, descended to The Pops. It is to be found in the opera of "Tsar Saltan," though it is little relevant to the Suite. Nevertheless Dr. Koussevitzky served, and the audience joyfully snatched at the sweetmeat. The line imitates the bee's flight, the rhythm accents it; orchestral buzz fills the whirring air. Well within Rimsky-Korsakov's powers lay such simple, obvious delineative music.

A more desirable and rewarding Rimsky wrote the Suite; while the listener needed little background from the program-book to enjoy it. Tsar Saltan took to wife a maiden of whom her sisters were jealous; then departed to the wars. The sisters reported her son by the Tsar as a monster; whereupon she and it were crammed into a barrel and tossed upon the seas. Dolorously, they floated to an Isle of Wonders where all things were set marvellously right again. In the first division of the suite, the Tsar goes forth to battle; in the second, the Tsaritsa laments her barrelled, watery, unhappy state; in the third all concerned—the audience included—hear the voices of the magical isle. Out of the whole suite sounds the universal and delectable Rimsky—imaginative and graphic master of harmonic and instrumental color, if not of well-found and well-directed line; alert with irresistible rhythms—Stravinsky was his pupil—in this instance unusually light; impregnated with Russian folk-melodies and folk-legends; able to make them provocative upon hearers' fancy; loving tales of magic out of Russian or Eastern fable; with an eye and ear for the Tsar leaving his bride and going warward, for the lamenting empress on the unwitting seas, most of all for the "wonders" that were island-atmosphere; the one and only pagan conjuror with tones. He does himself justice in these excerpts from "Tsar Saltan," especially in the curiously voiced lament of the Tsaritsa. An illuded audience rises to him; the orchestral repertory stands enlarged.

Dr. Koussevitzky has mastered "The Fantastic Symphony" beyond any other conductor known to Boston save only the vanished Weingartner. The whole design of the five movements opens before him; into it he adjusts every detail of the musical and narrating progress; gives to each not only due place but due significance. Furthermore: he is sympathetic, above most conductors, to the matter and the manner of Berlioz. He believes in such romantic phantasmagoria as the March to the Scaffold and the Witches' Sabbath; plays them accordingly. Takes seriously the "fixed idea," which is the haunting mistress, but remembers that it is hard for our skeptical, prosaic day to absorb. Therefore, the more pains to character it. The conductor matches intensity for intensity with the melancholy and glooming Berlioz of the "Scene in the Fields," with the sensuous Berlioz of the episode at the ball. He builds up the beginnings into symphonic progress and integrity; there and elsewhere dodges the pitfalls that Berlioz's limitations and weaker idiosyncrasies set for him; cloaks the measures that a century has thinned and faded in the glamourous mantle of orchestral tone.

To remote and mistrustful hearers of these nineteen-thirties, Dr. Koussevitzky enforces what is perdurable and still alive in the extravagant romantic that was Berlioz. Under such perception, sympathy and accomplishment the whole monstrous symphony, anomalous as it is in these days, ceases to be a monument of a vanished time, plays again upon answering imagination. The Berlioz who had passed into the common stock of music, is individualized afresh. With some reason the conductor plays "The Fantastic" with only one full season between performances. It is to be observed that those who gibber with dread at a repetition of Strauss's "Domestica" or "Heldenleben" within so short an interval, now hold their peace.

The Concerto of Martinu was contrasting piece to both Suite and Symphony. The modernists of yesteryear have become the neo-classicists of today; while in this music Martinu of Prague and Paris exemplifies their theory and their practice. He returns to a close-knit and precise classical form long neglected, lately renewed—the Concerto Grosso with a string quartet for solo-instruments. He not only fills it but makes it seem in every convolution the mold into which the music naturally flows. That music has no significance outside itself; is devoid of every other interest. In each movement, it weaves a succession of tonal patterns into an unfolding design, to which both string quartet and orchestra contribute, now in association, again in contrast.

Through each division runs a sustained, ardent, vivid rhythmic life, but not with the dependence upon it that marks the lesser disciples of Stravinsky. There are frequent dissonances that spring naturally out of the tonal texture; that seem the lingering ghosts of polytonality rather than that quality itself. There are acrid but unobtruded flavors. Throughout again, when compared with Schönbergian intricacies, clarity and simplicity prevail. The first and the third division are patterns in musical sound and nothing else; but a personality, distinctly felt, invents, conducts and interweaves them. A vitalizing liveliness stirs in Martinu oftener than it did in Mr. Carpenter's "Patterns" of last October, similarly designed piece in the neo-classical genre. In the slow movement, by simple means, Martinu attains to quick, penetrating beauty. European reviewers discover Mozartean influences in the Concerto. They may or may not be present. In either case it is quite able to stand on its own feet, with Martinu as individualized composer. The Concerto, and incidentally Messrs. Burgin, Gundersen, Lefrane and Bedetti as solo-quartet, deserved the rounds of honest applause. Once more, with these neo-classicists, Dr. Koussevitzky keeps abreast of the musical times—in this Concerto of Martinu notably. H. T. P.

Dec 31 Trans

73

Symphony Hall Chatter

Concert-Notes Overheard in The Corridors

From the Babble of Tongues On a Saturday Night at Symphony Hall

TIME—A Saturday evening during the Symphony season in Boston.

Place—The corridors of Symphony Hall, not to forget the niches in which dwell the plaster-cast dieties of the auditorium. At this moment, indeed, the first part of the concert is drawing to a close. Anacreon and Sophocles, silent auditors, are the very statues of millennial patience and are also silent interlocutors. They are like many mortals in this, however, that music makes them talkative. Unlike mortals, alas, their speech remains as unheard as the melodies on Keats's urn from their homeland.

Anacreon (evidently concluding a conversation that has begun with the raising of Koussevitzky's baton). As I was saying, then . . . Do you think that we shall have beer back before the new President comes in?

Sophocles: And as I was intending to answer . . . That is a tragedy that fails to move me. Koussevitzky was superb in that last sacrifice, was he not? What a choregus! I recall, when writing the music to my Elektra . . .

Anacreon: Listen to the man! "My Elektra!" Strauss's Elektra, you mean! O'Neill's Elektra! . . . What America needs is a good five-cent libation. Mencken still keeps writing to me that the decline in the modern arts, and especially music, is naturally explained by the inferior quality of the beverages imbibed by the composers. Their music isn't music; it's a symptomology. Just as surely as the Russian revolution was caused by the revolt of the leaders against the consistent ugliness of their wives. What Russia needs is a good five-cent cosmetic . . .

Sophocles: Anacreon, you're plastered again, and no pun intended . . . Don't you find it rather warm up here?

Anacreon: It was, up to a moment ago. (Coughs). That draught, again! This time I will complain to the management. I'll catch my death of cold. Don't you feel it, old and bare as you are, and unwarmed by ichor?

At this hallowed juncture space and physics are expressionistically abolished in a counterpoint of interpenetrating planes, so that, up to the unheard audience en-niched beneath the clusters of light, float the atonal conversations of the evening's musicologists as they pour forth, during the intermission, into the various hallways of the edifice. The polysyllabic closing remark of . . .

Sophocles: Draught? That, Anacreon, is no draught. It is the wind of intermedial converse that rages storm-like between the halves of the concert. Nor is it cold, Anacreon; for it is not cold air that rises to the top, where dwell such as you and I . . .

[Clouds of opinion rise like an obscuring mist from the Niagara of discussion. Sophocles and Anacreon disappear. Out of the massed anonymity, here and there, a phrase, a dialogue, crystallizes into audibility.]

Voice of a Man: And that's why I prefer the opera to the symphony. You see, at the opera, there isn't too much music to obscure the development of the story. The trouble with a symphony concert, my dear, is that there is too much music, if you see what I mean. There's nothing to follow. Nothing to occupy a fellow's mind. If there's anything I hate, it's to wallow in emotions.

Voice of a Woman: You needn't try too hard to be funny, Alexis. A month ago at the football game you were wallowing plenty, and not only in emotions. For the first thirty miles of the way home you were weeping bitter tears because your college had lost,—yes, real Chaikovskian tears.

Man: And I wish I had some of that stuff right now. Do you think we shall have beer back before the new President comes in?

Woman: Back, did I hear you say? When did you miss it?

First Student: Marvelous! I tell you, this new Ugric composer is the very aristocrat of atonality!

Second Student: New Greek, did you say? The very cacocrat of cacophony, if you ask me!

[Anacreon and Sophocles, through the smoke of the battle and of the cigarettes, exchange puzzled, quizzical glances, as who should say, What do these students mean? They shrug their shoulders, as who should say, again, It's Ugric to me!]

One Girl: I don't know what music is coming to. When I was in high school I enjoyed these concerts much more. Those golden afternoons when we'd huddle together outside, waiting for the door to open and the rush for seats to begin; when your boy friend would dash across the street for your hot cup of coffee and then fight for his place back in the line. And you'd sink into your seat so sweetly drowsy, with an hour in which to moon, or curse a home-lesson. And then the music! It bore you off in a trance. You were transported. This modern music doesn't transport you. There's no seduction in it.

Another Girl: What do you want music to be? A spiritual pander?

One Girl: You put it uncouthly, but that's something of the idea. This new stuff irritates one; it keeps one earthbound; it doesn't lift one . . .

Another Girl: . . . into a pinkish, Maeterlincky, swoony-urban boudoir. 'Way down upon the swoony river' . . .

One Girl: Oh, Adele, do excuse me. There's that Garrison boy. To be sure, he has a Phi Kappa key, but he can't meant it, for Beta dances divinely. Transporting!

Another Girl: Good riddance! You talk like an express superintendent!

Voices: It's getting worse every season, my dear. We shall have to stop coming. So many of the people manifestly simply don't belong here. The war began it by putting too much right money into the wrong hands, and what the war left undone the depression has completed. Look! Just look! Is there any music, I ask you, in that face over there?

. . . You mean Reverdi, the founder of the new conservatory?

. . . Hush, Theobald, your humor is funereal.

. . . Hush yourself, Prudence. You don't know the difference between sonata form and a boyish form. There's no more music in you than in a radio announcer. Chord of the seventh, seventh commandment, seventh floor—they're all the same to you. So why go Park avenue on these intelligentsias here?

. . . Intelligentsia? Intelligentsia? That sounds Communistic to me!

Other Voices: Not that I'm a snob. But the audiences, so far as I can judge from an unbroken attendance of twenty-five years, are becoming less and less musical, more and more social. You remember that old magazine ad? Well, it's a sign of distinction to be seen at the Symphony nowanights. And, queerly enough, the less musical the crowd, the more polytonal and utterly non-tonal Koussevitzky's programs become. Can that have any subtle significance as to the æsthetic value of the music itself?

. . . Your quest for subtlety, young man, works like a retributive charm, for it leads you often, as I am happy to see, into the very shrine of ingenuousness. Thought, like the world, is round, and you intellectual navigators, if you sail long enough, will return to the point from which you started.

. . . Columbus sailed, you forget, for India; he discovered America. It may be a round world, but it's spherical, too. Saul set out to find his father's asses; I came upon a kingdom.

. . . Take care, son, lest in your pride you set out to find a kingdom and come upon a braying ass, or, worse still, at last discover that donkey in the mirror.

. . . We seem to have wandered, oldster, I was speaking of the audiences in these recent years. What do they know of musical structure? Do they differentiate between an overture and a concerto, except in the matter of length, or the fact that one has a soloist and the other not? Do they make any vital distinction between a first theme and a second, between the tone-color of a French horn and the contrabassoon, between an upbeat and a down, between. . . . What's the use of a catalogue? Sometimes it has seemed to me that they call this place Symphony Hall in the same way that they name those intermediate public institutions Grammar Schools. Do I have to tell you that in the grammar schools you learn everything but grammar? Fill in the rest yourself. Who shall teach the teachers, as Juvenal didn't say?

. . . True, but why so hot, big boy? After all, grammar depends upon language, not, as you seem to think, language upon grammar. Rules are parasites upon usage. And, true again, a fuller knowledge of musical construction (for, to me, form has always defined itself as the logic of structure) would do no sincere listener any harm. But, after all, you and I, as any architect might tell us, are ignorant of the laws of thrust; we couldn't, without recourse to a dictionary—and I'd hate to live in a house that an architect had erected on a dictionary—tell the difference between a pediment and a plinth. Is that a reason for denying its admission to a building? Must we be able to define precisely what we use? Wouldn't that, when you get down to the fine point, deny us the very right to live? What do you know about the human body? And how much the physicians and psychiatrists don't know about the body and the mind! Shall doctors be the only ones permitted to live? Or psychiatrists the only ones permitted—if they can—to think?

. . . Your analogies are false.

. . . That's the usual answer. But we speak a language long before we comprehend its grammar. Perhaps we teach the speaking of foreign languages too late, and their grammars too soon. Primum vivere, my son, deinde philosophare. Let these so-called ignorant symphony-goers first hear plenty of music. The rest will come in time. And rather that it should come never than through affectation.

. . . Say, I know a girl who likes to swoon through her concerts, and if she doesn't. . .

. . . I know men who sleep through theirs. They who sleep shall never awake, to music. They who swoon may even learn, who knows, to parse a symphony as one parses a sentence.

. . . Oldster, I am silenced, but not convinced.

A Voice in the Musicians' Tuning Room: If that's music, I'm a bowl of goulash.

Another—If man is what he eats, then a bowl of goulash is what you are.

. . . Do you seriously call that music?

. . . Of course I do. Say, musicians as a class give me a pain in the neck, and I don't mean my fiddle, either. They don't know any more about music than a teacher of English knows about literature. They're in it, but not of it. They're the soldiers on the battlefield, who only know how to shoot; what it's all about is beyond them.

. . . Ours not to reason why. Ours but to play and die. And am I dead! After this, the coal trilling down the chute will sound like a nocturne in C major.

. . . As Lilyan Tashman said of "Lady Chatterley's Lover," it's not erotic, but how esoteric! The tang of that middle section, where a bar in 17/16 is followed by a bar of 9/4, and that by one in 13½/12, marked down from 14! Consider how terrible it would have been had that 13½/12 been misprinted as 12/13½! Do you remember the first number of "transition," with the small t? It's a large T now, and that must mean something too difficult for us plain folk to understand. Well, a contribution by Gertrude Stein had been set up all wrong, so they inserted a "corrected" copy. I read the wrong version, then the correction, then the correction, then the wrong version. I looked at my tongue, felt my pulse, drank a keg of orange juice, hast du mich wirklich verstanden, and went to bed. But when I awoke, it all read just the same. Qu'est-ce que je veux dire? Je veux dire que this piece of music was written by Gertrude Stein in collaboration with Lilyan—I mean James Joyce.

. . . Ha, ha! Why musicians go wrong! Why 80 per cent of them land in the booby-hatch!

. . . Cherchez la femme.

. . . Seek and ye shall find. If it weren't for la donna è mobile wine would turn sour and song grow mute.

. . . And as it is, song grows mute, and wine turns sour.

Third Student: . . . the subsidiary motif, whereupon the horns enter in diminution, and after a prolonged organpoint, which is tossed from voice to voice in most uncanny fashion, with eight-part canon, invertible, convertible, semi-convertible and reversable imitation, there is a triple fugue based upon superposed fragments of the middle themes. Now, if that isn't music, I ask you, what is?

Fourth Student: I still maintain that the Gregorian chant had a deep wealth of variety in its seeming monody—that to the ears of earlier centuries their externally soft music had the effect of the greater sonorities that have

Continued on Following Page

"Think N

Concert-Notes

Continued from Preceding Page

developed today, while, per contra, our mad sonorities, in the long run, will have the effect of silence, since we shall end by either not hearing them, or not desiring to hear them. You want mountains for sculptors to engrave, and regiments to perform mastodonic symphonies. The cult of the colossal . . .

Third Student: The mastodon was a primitive animal, not a late arrival.

Fourth Student: I seek the art of the cameo, and music da camera.

Third Student: That's escape from the challenge of one's day.

Fourth Student: One may escape into life as well as from it. You, with your worship of noise, size and novelty, are trying to escape from it.

[Anacron looks worriedly at Sophocles. The look plainly says, Will that bell never ring for the third time and send this mass of words to their seat?]

A Bas Bleu: Music should no more tell a story than a story should tell music.

A Bas de Soie: What do you call opera, then?

Bas Bleu: Opera is an il—, I mean a hybrid form, fit only for business men. Program music is for persons without imagination, without musicality.

Bas de Soie: Meaning Wagner, Liszt, Strauss. . . .

Bas Bleu: Their music is music in spite of programs. It is interesting to know what gets a composer started, or what he thinks gets him started. But do you have to eat dates to understand Kant's philosophy?

Bas de Soie: Give me the dates.

Bas Bleu: You may have a fig—for your opinions.

A Philandering Physician: But tell me, Criticus, how can you ever get any enjoyment out of music? It seems to me that the very completeness of your knowledge would militate against pleasure. You know, to put it in my language, the physiology, the anatomy, the histology, the etiology, the psychology, the psychopathology, of the art. You can take it apart and put it together again. You know it from arthritis to zymosis—that is, I mean from a to z. To tell the truth, the prospect gets me jittery. I should be afraid, yes, afraid, of knowing music as you know it. When knowledge enters, feeling flies out of the window.

A Critic: I should believe you more did I know you less. I have as acquaintance a philendering physician; present company not excepted. He happens to be a gynaecologist. You don't know him, by any chance? He has dissected women, incised them, seen them through all the ills that flesh is heir to, including heirs. He knows, in your language, their physiology, anatomy, histology, etiology, psychology, psychopathology. He can take das ewig Weibliche apart and put her together. He has done so, time and again. He knows her from astigmatism to zo-ophobia. And yet, my dear Philander, and yet . . . need I say more?

[The blessed third bell reverberates through the hallways. Sophocles hums Silent Night, Holy Night. Anacreon supports him, in thirds and sixths. The lights are lowered. Applause. Dr. Koussevitzky sprucely turns the bend, steps upon the podium, and, with his baton raised like a magic wand, conjures silence out of the babbling atonality.]

Anacreon: (singing) "To Anacreon on high . . ."

Sophocles: If I may step out of character, may I remark that your song is somewhat Anacreon-istic, no pun intended.

Anacreon: You're plastered, too. . . . All this talk has gone to your head. But I've heard far better entr'actes than this. They were more stimulating in the old days.

Sophocles: I don't know. Remember a month ago? That was a rare entr'acte indeed. I gave it an encore. As a result, the third bell rang five minutes late.

Anacreon: Ho, hum. But tell me, Sophocles, do you think that we shall have our zythum back before the new President comes in? ISAAC GOLDBERG

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 31 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT 8.15

Opens Radio Series and Will Broadcast Full Concert From the Hub This Evening; Serge Koussevitsky Holds Baton

The Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the world's greatest musical organizations, will be heard over National Broadcasting company networks throughout the winter in a series of 10 weekly concerts.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra for the benefit of the nation at large, as well as for his immediate audience, each Saturday evening, beginning tonight. The full concert will be broadcast over WBZ starting at 8.15.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was the first really permanent orchestra in America, according to Elson's "History of American Music," having been heard regularly in full concert series since 1881, and is world famous.

It has been heard by radio only at rare intervals before, and never has broadcast its Saturday season series for nation-wide audiences.

Serge Koussevitzky, who has directed the Boston orchestra since 1924, when he came to this country from Europe, is a brilliant conductor, with a long and distinguished career. He was born in Tver, Russia, in 1874, and at the age of 12 became chef d'orchestre in the theater of his birthplace, composing whatever music was required in the plays, and conducting the entr'actes.

At 14 Koussevitzky went to Moscow to study, became the double-bass soloist of the Imperial Opera, and toured Europe for 10 years with great success. In 1909 he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and in addition to performing throughout the season in Moscow and Petrograd, toured the provinces in the summer, presenting his orchestra and famous soloists in Volga villages, where the peasants not only had never heard an orchestra, but had never seen many of the instruments.

After the war, in 1921, Koussevitzky began a series of tours through the capitals of Europe which were immensely successful, and he continued these until 1924, when he came to America to take over the leadership of the Boston orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 31 1932

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~has arranged~~ a special programme for the first of his new series via WJR at 8:15 p. m. It is his desire to have the Boston Symphony's programme appeal to every one. Those who would escape the mad dance of old man 1932 will do well to bend an ear for this outstanding musical presentation.... thinks me.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 31 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT 8.15

Opens Radio Series and Will Broadcast Full Concert From the Hub This Evening — Serge Koussevitsky Holds Baton

The Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the world's greatest musical organizations, will be heard over National Broadcasting company networks throughout the winter in a series of 10 weekly concerts.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra for the benefit of the nation at large, as well as for his immediate audience, each Saturday evening, beginning tonight. The full concert will be broadcast over WBZ starting at 8.15.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was the first really permanent orchestra in America, according to Elson's "History of American Music," having been heard regularly in full concert series since 1881, and is world famous.

It has been heard by radio only at rare intervals before, and never has broadcast its Saturday season series for nation-wide audiences.

Serge Koussevitzky, who has directed the Boston orchestra since 1924, when he came to this country from Europe, is a brilliant conductor, with a long and distinguished career. He was born in Tver, Russia, in 1874, and at the age of 12 became chef d'orchestre in the theater of his birthplace, composing whatever music was required in the plays, and conducting the entr'actes.

At 14 Koussevitzky went to Moscow to study, became the double-bass soloist of the Imperial Opera, and toured Europe for 10 years with great success. In 1909 he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and in addition to performing throughout the season in Moscow and Petrograd, toured the provinces in the summer, presenting his orchestra and famous soloists in Volga villages, where the peasants not only had never heard an orchestra, but had never seen many of the instruments.

After the war, in 1921, Koussevitzky began a series of tours through the capitals of Europe which were immensely successful, and he continued these until 1924, when he came to America to take over the leadership of the Boston orchestra.

---

8 Post Dec 31

SYMPHONY IN NEWEST CONCERTO

Prokofieff's Fifth With Composer at Piano Given Premiere

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The eyes of those who attended the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon were greeted by the ungainly if miraculous device which this evening will receive the manifold sounds of the orchestra that they may be transmitted far and wide. For the Symphony Orchestra, in 10 successive Saturday evening concerts, will once again be "on the air."

A FIRST HEARING

The programme heard yesterday and to be so widely heard this evening begins with the two Preludes of Bach, one originally for organ, the other for violin alone, that have been transcribed for string orchestra by the Czech-Italian Pick-Mangiagalli. To them succeed the Third Symphony of Brahms, the Fifth Pianoforte Concerto of Prokofieff, with the composer as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes.

Of these pieces only the Concerto, heard yesterday for the first time in the United States, would seem to require extended comment. Five piano concertos must surely constitute a record for a living composer, but there is no quarreling with Mr. Prokofieff's devotion to a form which he has once again adorned with genuinely diverting music.

In Five Movements

The Prokofieff Fifth, which has for its central key G major and bears the opus number 55, runs quite appropriately in five movements. Save for a pleasing interlude in the Russian manner, the first might almost be dismissed as thumpingly inconsequential. The second, "well accented," exemplifies the blend of the incisive, the piquant and the grotesque that has become a characteristic Prokofieffian note. The third, an onrushing Toccata, would persuade by its rhythmic energy alone. The fourth, a Larghetto, has mood and charm if not sentiment. The Finale begins promisingly but fails to maintain interest. None of the movements is long, and the three central ones at least make the piece decidedly worth while. It may be assumed that other pianists will take it up.

Mr. Prokofieff's outwardly awkward but brilliant method of performing his own music is familiar to us. The Concerto heard yesterday abounds in percussive effects, in glissandi and other tricks, recalling a statement once less accurately made concerning the Fourth Concerto of Saint-Saens, that it was not music at all but a kind of tonal parlor-magic. As he well deserved Mr. Prokofieff was warmly received, and he bowed his repeated acknowledgements with the ingratiating diffidence we have observed before.

Brahms' Third

The two Preludes, one gravely beautiful, the other spirited, gave pleasure. It can today be clearly seen that the Third Symphony of Brahms is hardly the peer of its three companions, but it has its memorable pages and it received a sympathetic, wholly Brahmsian reading. To hear it after Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique of a week ago is to realize that Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretations can no longer be found wanting in a proper objectivity.

The performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's virtuoso music was of a virtuoso nature. How conventional, however, seems his Spain beside that of DeFalla or of the Debussy of "Iberia."

METROPOL

Russian Composer Soloist in Unusual Symphony Concert

American

By MOSES SMITH

Dec 31

A program admirably balanced and performed with extraordinary beauty was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday and will be repeated this evening at Symphony Hall. The novel item was Serge Prokofieff's new fifth piano concerto, performed yesterday, with the composer as pianist, for the first time in America. The other works were two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, the third symphony of Brahms, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish" Caprice.

The first of the Bach preludes was presented with the most sensitive and poetic interpretation; the second was a tribute to the virtuosity of the string section, especially the violins. The Brahms Symphony, least familiar of the master's four, has rarely, if ever, been heard in such full voice, in terms, alternately, so dramatic and lyrical. The per-

---

Glob MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The appearance of Serge Prokofieff as soloist in the first performance in the United States of his new Fifth Piano Concerto lent an unusual brilliance to the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The distinguished Russian composer-pianist and his work were received with uncommon warmth. No new music played this season has aroused as much applause from the Friday afternoon audience as this concerto:

The remainder of the program comprised two Bach Preludes — one an organ Prelude in D minor, the other originally a violin solo – arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli; Brahms' Third Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

The sight of two microphones suspended from the ceiling of Symphony Hall recalled the fact that, beginning tonight, 10 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony will be broadcast.

Prokofieff has designated G major as the key in which his new concerto is written. The work was first performed in October of this year at Berlin by the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Wilhelm Furtwaengler. The composer then played the piano part. As a true child of his age, Prokofieff has written a nervous, wiry, music whose salient characteristics are driving rhythm, a certain cool wit, and superficial brilliance. In keeping with the composer's personal style and the spirit of his age, there are no flights of emotion and no sensuous beauty of tone.

In certain respects Prokofieff is one of the most discriminating and sane of modern composers. His best music seems to have the intellectual point, the logical continuity, and transparency of texture that indicate a sensitive musician. Although his methods rely a great deal upon dissonance and unusual rhythms, his best work is free from the obvious attempts at musical sensationalism to be found, unfortunately, in the productions of certain less gifted composers of the day. And Prokofieff's harmonic structures have an almost unmistakable individuality.

This new concerto has all the virtues detailed above, and, at first hearing, seems to be one of Prokofieff's notable compositions. There are five movements, four of which seem to be constructed upon curious rhythmical patterns. The piano part appears to be very involved and difficult, and is largely written in staccato chords. It is treated as one of the instrumental voices rather than a solo part in the conventional fashion.

The composer's performance was agile, ironic, and percussive, in keeping with the general tenor of his piece. What strength this player must have in his fingers! He tossed off the notes as if rippling carelessly through a bit of easy jazz.

Some find Brahms' F major Symphony the weakest of the four in structure, and others find in the Allegretto an unduplicated revelation of the composer's soul. At any rate, this Symphony appears to lack the sustained inspiration and clarity of development which have contributed to make Brahms' three other symphonies the greatest examples of strict symphonic music since Beethoven. It is true that the opening theme of the first movement is cosmic in mood, but this mood soon peters out. And to one listener, at least, Brahms was much more tender and lyrical, more revealing of himself, in many pages of the C minor, D major and E minor Symphonies than he is in the Allegretto of this work.

Rimsky's luscious and superficial music served to display the superb virtuosity of the Boston Symphony players and conductor. The shrill cries of approval which broke in upon the final chords were thoroughly merited.

The orchestra goes to New York next week. The next regular concerts in Boston, therefore, will take place on Jan 13 and 14. Richard Burgin, who will conduct in the absence of Dr Koussevitzky on his annual mid-season vacation, will introduce to these concerts Vaughan Williams' "Pastoral" Symphony. Albert Spalding, the distinguished American violinist, will be soloist in Mozart's D major concerto (K 218) and Chausson's "Poeme." Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" suite will be the remaining number.

C. W. D.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1932

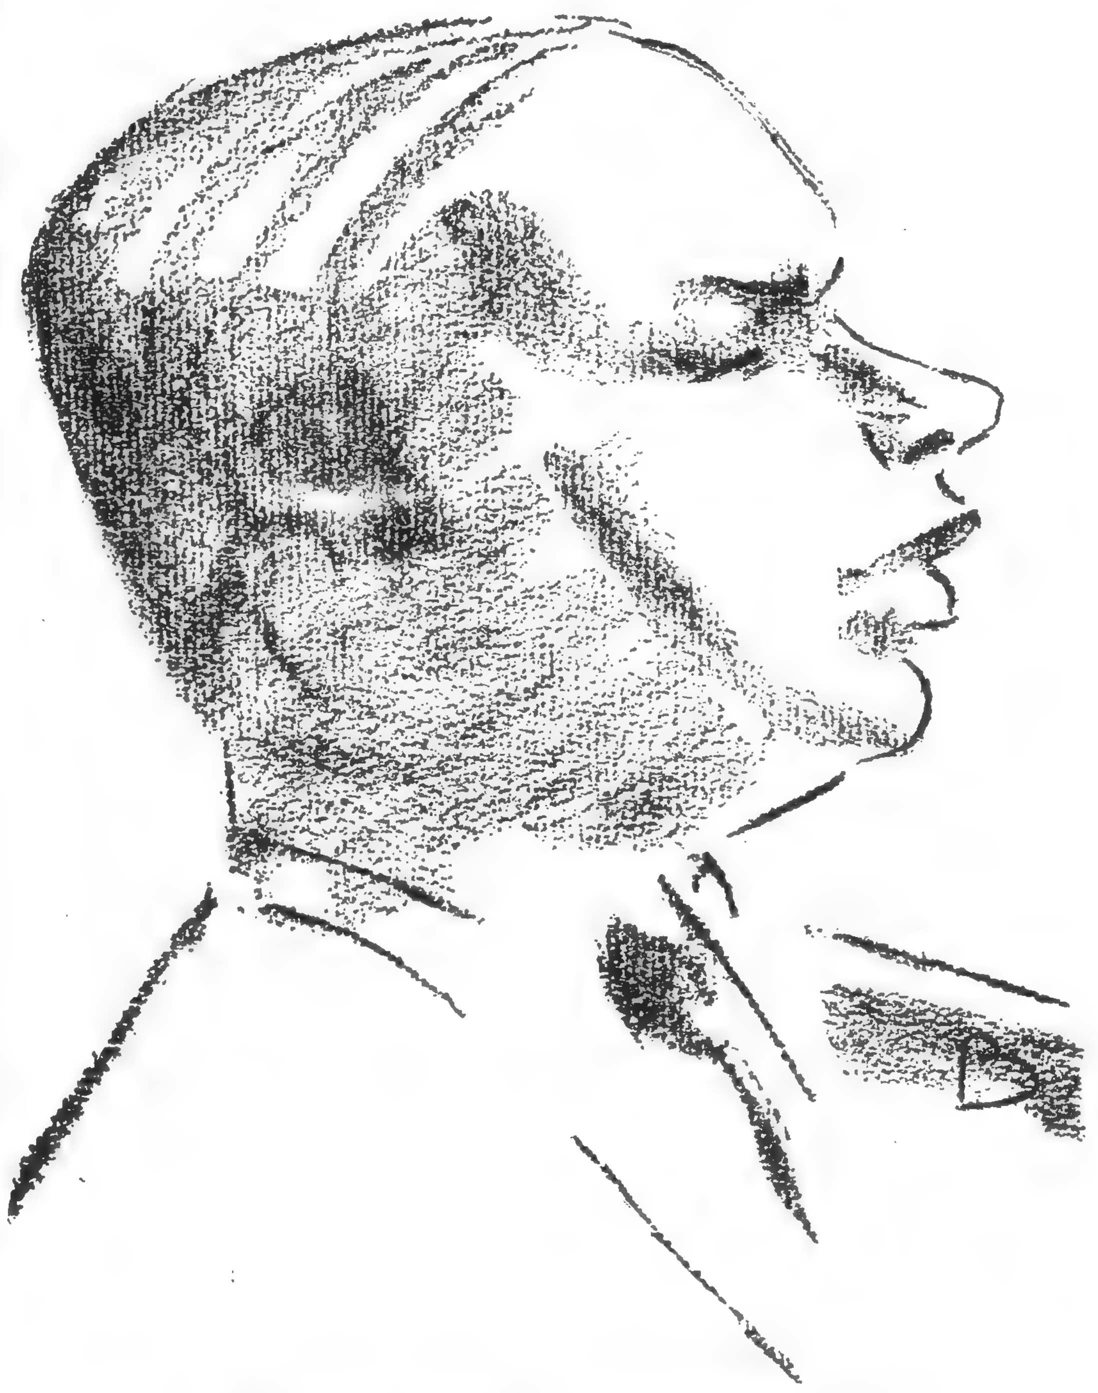
-- Prokofiev on Russia --- Mis

D

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, DI

-- Music and Musicians

Allegro con Brio



The Alert Guest at Symphony Hall

Serge Prokofiev, Composer and Pianist at the Symphony Concerts Today and Tomorrow

---

New Prokofieff Concerto

Monitor Dec 31

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

The Fifth Piano Concerto, in G major, of Mr. Serge Prokofieff was the novelty of the eleventh program of the Boston Symphony season (Dec. 30-31). The composer was the soloist, and the performance was the first in the United States.

The new concerto is in five brief movements, and is characteristic of the composer in several of his creative moods. The thematic material is salient, there is the expected play with rhythms, one notes the usual staccato accents. There is throughout a good deal of wit, and even, in the fourth movement—a Larghetto—some moments of romantic loveliness. There is also a very clever scherzo, labeled Toccata, taken with headlong velocity. The work as a whole represents perhaps the descendant of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and the composer of "Chout," "The Love for Three Oranges" and "Le Pas d'Acier," rather than the author of "Sept, Ils sont Sept" or on the other hand of the "Classical" Symphony. If this new work does not add greatly to Mr. Prokofieff's reputation, it will at least not detract from it; and to judge from its reception, it is likely to increase his popularity. It was performed with remarkable virtuosity by soloist and orchestra.

The first half of the program was occupied by Pick-Mangiagalli's orchestration of two Bach Preludes, and the Third Symphony, in F major, by Brahms, both played superbly. The concert closed with the brilliant if meretricious "Spanish Caprice" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in which the triangle was too audible.

L. A. S.

Russian Composer Symphony Soloist

The program for the Boston Symphony orchestra's final concert of the year brought to a climax that guest-composer-soloist practice, with Serge Prokofieff, distinguished Russian visitor, playing the solo part for the first American performance of his fifth piano concerto.

This concert was altogether one of the most interesting of the season. Opening with two preludes by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, it continued with the ever-welcome Brahms third symphony. After intermission was the new Prokofieff concerto, and finally the caprice on Spanish themes, by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Prokofieff's concerto is in five movements, the whole taking some 20 minutes. The first movement is an allegro con brio; the second march-like, with a heavy, marked rhythm; the third swift, on-rushing, bitten off sharply at the end; the fourth slow and lyric; the fifth brilliant and colorful, bringing the work to an abrupt close.

The whole forms a bright, stimulating work. Often it conveys an impression of jerkiness, as themes are punctuated with blasts from the brass section and thumps from the percussion battery. But it is, nevertheless, vigorous and forceful, and the thematic material is interesting. Concerto and composer were enthusiastically received.

Both Bach preludes, the first solemn and church-like, the second brisk and animated. were effective in string orchestra garb. But the first was originally written for organ, and the second for violin unaccompanied. Did they sound yesterday as Bach meant them to sound?

Dr. Koussevitzky gave the Brahms third symphony a dramatic reading. This powerful work contains some of Brahms's most beautiful music. The Spanish caprice was not so impressive. The theme of the second movement, for instance, could not stand the bright glare of five variations. It is superficial music that suffered in comparison with other works on the program.

H. C. C.

New Listeners, New Standards, New Response

Music in Soviet Russia As Prokofiev Reports It After Recent Visit

At the end of last Tuesday's interview about his Fifth Piano Concerto, Mr. Prokofiev promised the writer that at a later, somewhat less busy moment, he would be glad to tell something about the impressions he received during his recent visit to Russia. At the same time he stated modestly that these impressions were highly generalized, that there had been no time for making detailed or extensive observations. The time had been too short, the duties of concert-giving too arduous. Mr. Prokofiev's stay in Russia extended only from Nov. 21 to Dec. 5; during which time he gave four concerts at Moscow and two at Leningrad, for which his presence was required also at four rehearsals at Moscow and three at Leningrad; leaving him surely not much time for "looking around." The interview, however, developed a strong general impression about conditions in Russia, some news about the most recent Russian music, information about the composer's own activities and future projects.

"Music is held in great honor in Soviet Russia, there is strong interest in it, an unquenchable thirst for it," was the burden of his observations. He went on to explain: "The Revolution and subsequent shiftings of classes and masses in Russia left the concert world no more than about 25 per cent of its old public. One would have expected the level of musical understanding and musical activity to fall sharply under such circumstances. But such has not proved to be the case. On the contrary, there is more freshness and eagerness in the present audiences, a stronger and more vital interest in music than was previously the case."

"You mean that the seventy-five percent, which is new public. . . " the arithmetically inclined interviewer began to ask, when he was quickly interrupted, . . . "Not seventy-five per cent, but one hundred and fifty per cent, new public. Yes", at the astonished questioner, "I mean that. The new sources for concert audiences have added much, much more to the concert system than the political changes removed. You see there are so many more people to draw from. The musical perspective is now very large in Russia. Millions of people who were previously entirely submerged, who were not able to approach music at all, now have the opportunity to show their interest, and they actually do show it.

Interestingly Mr. Prokofiev told of a new plan used in the schools for testing the reception of new works by these audiences. A group of perhaps, fifteen students will be sent into a concert with pads of paper; will be told to jot down things they hear from the people they meet. Each student will be asked to bring ten opinions, so that the whole group will turn in 150 verdicts. A single opinion will read, perhaps: "Day Laborer—clapped vigorously, stamped feet, gave all possible signs of enthusiam." Another might be: "Shabby old lady—said, 'I don't like the poisy parts.'" So onward often bringing in valuable comment. Always these tests make it possible to get a cross-section of the opinion of the audience on a given work. in a way impossible from merely trying to gauge the applause.

"I will give you a single illustration. On the day on which my three first concerts in Moscow were announced, all of the tickets for all three concerts were sold; in one day, remember!" One interposed a question: "Is it in part that the tickets are not priced expensively, that they can be easily obtained?" And the answer, "No, I do not think so. The people love their music so, that they would economize in food for the sake of hearing it." And modestly, "I do not think that my case was any exception. I cite it only as an illlustration of what I believe is general. In other words, art has become a vital necessity. The Russian people are eager for every novelty. As one publisher expressed himself to me. We have re-awakened the tiger. Everything that we publish is instantly absorbed.'"

"And what about standards?" was the next question. "Standards of operatic

Continued on Page Eight

New Listeners, New Standards, New Response

Continued from Page Six

performance are very high. I am more familiar with conditions at Moscow than at Leningrad. But I believe conditions at Moscow, on which my observations are principally based, are typical. The reasons for the high standards of opera lie in the fact that everything is absolutely under the control of the 'Regisseur'. There are thus no concessions to the whims of individual artists. Every detail of a performance is thoroughly worked out and all performances perfectly unified and co-ordinated. The Russian opera thus has advantages over many other opera houses in which such consistently planned work is hardly possible.

"One detail of a performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Maid of Pskov' proved very impressive. It will be recalled that some of the churches of Moscow have been secularized, turned into museums. There remained the question of what to do with the bells. They might have been molten, turned into munitions, put to any of a multitude of uses for which metal is needed. In actual fact, however, they were turned over to the Opera for such "bell scenes" as could use them to advantage. Imagine the great scene in "Boris" with about fifty bells—the bells of nine churches—all ringing. That is what I heard at the entry of Ivan the Terrible in the 'Maid of Pskov.'

"The orchestra of the Grand Opera of Moscow also gives performances of concert programs. Its chief conductor, Golovanov, under whom I played my Fifth concerto, is an excellent musician. The Philharmonic of Leningrad is an equally good orchestra. One difficulty which the orchestras are experiencing is the impossibility of securing a sufficient supply of good strings for the violins or of good reeds for the wood-wind instruments. Russia itself does not yet produce sufficient strings or reeds of good quality, and it is too expensive to import them from foreign countries.

"Composers?—Russia has more young composers of talent than it can supply with music paper on which to write their compositions. It is a fact that when at a fire in the library of one of our musical organizations a large supply of music paper was damaged by water, the universal comment was, 'Too bad that it was the music paper and not the actual music on near-by shelves that was ruined!' The same conditions which have created so large an increase in the number of Russian listeners to music are also stimulating more and more young people to express themselves in music.

"In Moscow the chief formative influence upon these composers is Miaskovsky, who is professor of composition at the conservatory. Almost all of the young composers have studied with him. During my short visit in Moscow I had the pleasure of playing, in an eight-hand arrangement for two pianos, Miaskovsky's latest symphony, his eleventh, not yet ready for orchestral performance. A most interesting work it is. What a misfortune that Miaskovsky is not more widely known!

"Another new work which is being spoken of in Russia in the highest terms, but which I did not hear, is Schostakovitch's new opera, 'Lady Macbeth of the Russian Province.' But the musical event of the present season in Russia was undoubtedly the first performance, at Leningrad, Nov. 27, only a few days before I arrived there; of Boris Assafiev's ballet, 'Flammes de Paris.' This ballet is based on scenes of the French Revolution, culminating in the fall of the Palace of the Tuileries, Aug. 10, 1792. The first of the four acts begins with an idylic scene—a peasant family enjoying itself in the forest of its 'seigneur.' The great lord discovers them, punishes them severely. The scene shifts to Marseilles, to the formation of the 'batallion marseillais' (which is the 'hero' of the ballet) at the proclamation, 'Patrie en danger.' The second act is a banquet given by the 'Garde Royale,' which has the atmosphere of a conspiracy of the palace against the Revolution. The third act deals with the events of the night of the tenth of August, 1792, in which the battalion takes a prominent part, ending with the fall of the Tuileries. The ceremony in honor of the victims of this night occupies the fourth act.

The music of Boris Assafiev (well known as a writer about music signing himself Igor Glebov) sets itself the task of reproducing the spirit of the French music of the last part of the eighteenth century, by basing itself on compositions of Gretry, Lully, Gluck, Mehul, Lesueur, Cherubini, etc., as well as making use of the popular songs 'La Carmagnole,' 'Ca ira,' and 'La Marseillaise.' This last is used from the point of view of a simple folk-song of Marseilles, and not as the national anthem. On the choreographic side the ballet attempts to reconcile the ethnographic character dance with the art of the classical ballet."

Mr. Prokofiev did not have much to say about himself, but it leaked out that he expects to return to Russia in April to conduct master classes in composition. His pupils will be graduates in composition from the conservatories of Moscow and of Leningrad. He expects to spend two weeks in each city, looking over the work of these young composers, advising, counselling, suggesting, criticizing. He will then assist them in laying out projects for new work. In early autumn he will repeat the process, giving the students his estimate of the work done in the summer. The remarkable clarity of mind which one has found to be Prokofiev's in two interviews, the profundity of musical knowledge which he displayed, leads one to say unreservedly that such assistance should be invaluable to the budding composers. Might not some serious American institution make similar arrangements with him?

What a busy season this forty-one-year-old genius is having! Pass it in review for a moment. Begin with the première of the new Fifth Concerto with Furtwängler and the Berlin Philharmonic on Oct. 31. Continue with the seven Russian concerts between Nov. 21 and Dec. 5. Remember that he docked in New York Dec. 22. But remember also that between the Russian trip and the embarkation for America came a brilliant series of concerts in Paris, including a performance of the new concerto; the rehearsals of his new ballet, "Sur le Borysthéne," which was "created" (as the French say) at the Opéra on the eve of his departure; the first performance of a new sonata for two violins at a "Triton" concert.

Go then to the American tour with its two concerts in Boston and five in New York and extending to the beginning of March. Recall that the Moscow master classes begin in April. Add to the Moscow engagement the plan of a Prokofiev Festival, during which his entire symphonic output will receive performance in four concerts by the orchestra of the Moscow Opera. Conclude (since one must reach a point of conclusion somewhere) with the master classes at Leningrad. And consider that these dates do no more than enumerate the "high spots" of a winter's activity. Find here the work which one great artist lays out for himself. But the interviewer only wonders how many interviews it would take to get the more important details of the new works and the many pertinent impressions received on these tours. And he promises himself that at least some of these interviews must be his in the future.

A. H. M.

76

Symphony Concert

A Symphonic Session Full Of Contrasts

Brahms Impressively Played, Prokofiev's New Concerto, Fore and After Pieces

Trans Dec 31

THE Brahmsian heyday continues unabated. To the Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky brought back the composer's Third Symphony, in F major, through the conductor's lengthening term less often played than the other three. Without cough or rustle the audience listened; at the close emitted the applause that signifies the general comfort in an acknowledged masterpiece; the particular pleasure from the current performance. Nor did the clapping still until the standing orchestra as well as the bowing conductor was rewarded. Hereabouts no one questions Brahms nowadays, unless the return of a minor work gives unexpected occasion. No one even explains him. Beethoven himself is not so securely and widely established, especially in the preferences of the younger generation. It goes for granted that with his four symphonies every listener has understanding and takes pleasure. We no longer reason high about "the musical and the emotional content," as the stiff old phrases used to go. Instead, we compare the versions of favorite conductors. Here Stokowski did thus and so. There Koussevitzky chose another way. Further on, Toscanini took a third course. In the concert-going mind Brahms and Sibelius are the symphonists of the hour; while here in Boston Dr. Koussevitzky is their apostle. With reason he still contemplates a Brahms Festival next spring to mark the centenary of the composer's birth. If the applause of yesterday was meaningful, a responsive public is already waiting.

With this Third Symphony the conductor improves opportunity. The shadowed lyric voice of the two middle movements invites one side of his temperament. He may be as introspective and tender-toned as he likes when the first movement and the finale each dies away into the mood of autumnal resignation. (Yet Brahms was only fifty when he wrote.) Elsewhere in both, the heroic accent, rugged course and dark intensities open Dr. Koussevitzky's energetic, dramatizing vein. Evidently throughout the Symphony he would have us hear the whole music, feel the full man. He does not put Brahms into a cradle, Schumann-shaped, in the Andante. Or turn him querulous in the succeeding Allegretto. He captures and conveys the musing mood of both—in the Allegretto the melancholy that may haunt a subdued dance-rhythm; in the Andante, the deeper, graver reflection—so differentiates them.

Nor does the conductor overdo the more strenuous measures of the opening and the closing movement. The rhythmic sweep, the descents and upleapings, the agitations and the expansions, prevail of themselves; while through them the symphonic outline holds firm and clear. Only a conductor ripened in middle years may play the close of either movement in the beauty of understanding. Dr. Koussevitzky is at the age that divines it when the sum of life is added to the sum of the music. . . . At every turn the orchestra was the conductor's sensitive instrument. Between him, it and the composer every detail fell into immediate place. Especially in the middle movements, especially with the wood-wind choir, Brahms is more than usually decorative. The finesse of the orchestra, its sense of the clear or dusky color, met him half way.

No symphony of the four seems to some of us so Brahmsian as this Third. The ghost of Beethoven will slip behind the First. The Second asks sympathy with a general German mood as well as with Brahms's particular expression thereof. Out of the strength of the Fourth seldom comes sweetness. Here in this Third both meet. The lyrical, musing, melancholy Brahms sings out of the middle movements, out of the gentle melody midway along the first; the Brahms who was not too far from the days of Schumann and Schubert. If one likes, a certain homeliness recurs; for at the back of his head Brahms hears the German folk singing. Side by side, the resolute, puissant, heroical Brahms achieving by imaginative thought the propulsions, the agitations, the musical and the spiritual stress of the movement that begins and the movement that ends. Upon both comes a final calm—the Brahmsian doctrine of resignation, sterner in the Fourth and wintrier; in this Third more autumnal and tender. To hear at the end of either movement is to believe; to find in the mood and the expression something that is universal upon touched spirits.

The soothsayers used to tell us that the day of the concerto—particularly the piano-concerto—was past. Who wrote them? And who, if they were written, cared to hear, unless some signal virtuoso-musician impressed and commanded? But now Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Bartók, Toch, Ravel, Honegger, of the current musical generation have all written, and usually played, them; while down from the shelf for frequent re-hearing come Beethoven's Fourth and Fifth, Schumann's, Brahms's, even Liszt's, as a few backward looking pianists will have it. By this time Prokofiev's—if we include the Fourth commissioned by the one-armed pianist—are as numerous as Beethoven's. Not yet have the classic forms gone to the tonal rubbish-heap. The neo-classicists, avowed, intuitive, or merely touched by the times, serve them well.

Audiences, also, hear concertos gladly. True, the tall, blonde, alert, wide-stepping Prokofiev has become familiar and stimulating figure at Symphony Hall. But what a flurry of excitement ran through it, yesterday afternoon, when he came across the stage! All readiness, every one of us listened to the five movements of his newest Concerto; at the end burst into gusty applause, not to be stayed until the rites of congratulation and acknowledgment—pianist, conductor, orchestra, audience—had been roundly done. By all odds, a full-blooded occasion. The season through guests and "novelties" have gone uncommonly well.

In this instance with reason. This Fifth Concerto runs in five movements, three shorter, two longer. Whatever the length in a Concerto far briefer than the romantic models, each is a feat of compression, concision, tension—the motivs stated, the motivs expanding into melodies, the melodies tersely developed, little or no decoration, none of the orthodox tread-milling to fill a form. A stripped music as becomes this age of Sibelius. A music, besides, that teems with exuberant or intensive life, in itself contained, from itself projected by orchestra and pianist. Prokofiev, composer or virtuoso, is master of the chosen forms. Note the intricacies, orchestral, pianistic, blended, of the Toccata that is third division. Yet it proceeds as the label prescribes, "Allegro con Fuoco." Or the long curve of the Larghetto unfolding and returning. Again the ingenious patterning of the finale—straight onward in clear line into a coda designed by a composer who knows how to make it and to give it personal sttamp.

Prokofiev has lost nothing of his diversified mastery of animating rhythm. Lightly he lays it upon his quasi-march movement. Underneath, it keeps the slow movement pulsing. It is less obvious in the first movement and the finale; but again no small source of the musical life. Prokofiev still abounds in his bare, taut melody, recognizable on the instant as of himself and no one else. The sympathetic ear discovers it in the first and the last divisions. It sounds for all through the slow movement, at first beguilingly soft; then, as it expands, regaining stark intensity. The whole Concerto is an adroit music, especially in the ever-changing and artful relations of piano and orchestra. Yet from first bar to last spontaneous, direct, tingling, irresistible. Never for a moment is it spiritual or emotional in the usual sense of these words. But unceasingly it holds the listening mind; spurs the following imagination. There is personality in it from stage to auditorum conquering; personality and the time-spirit to which as many of us as are alive instinctively answer. At the end the listener "comes out of it" like the composer-pianist, and in his turn breathless. The patriarch of the program-book reported Prokofiev as "still living." He is.

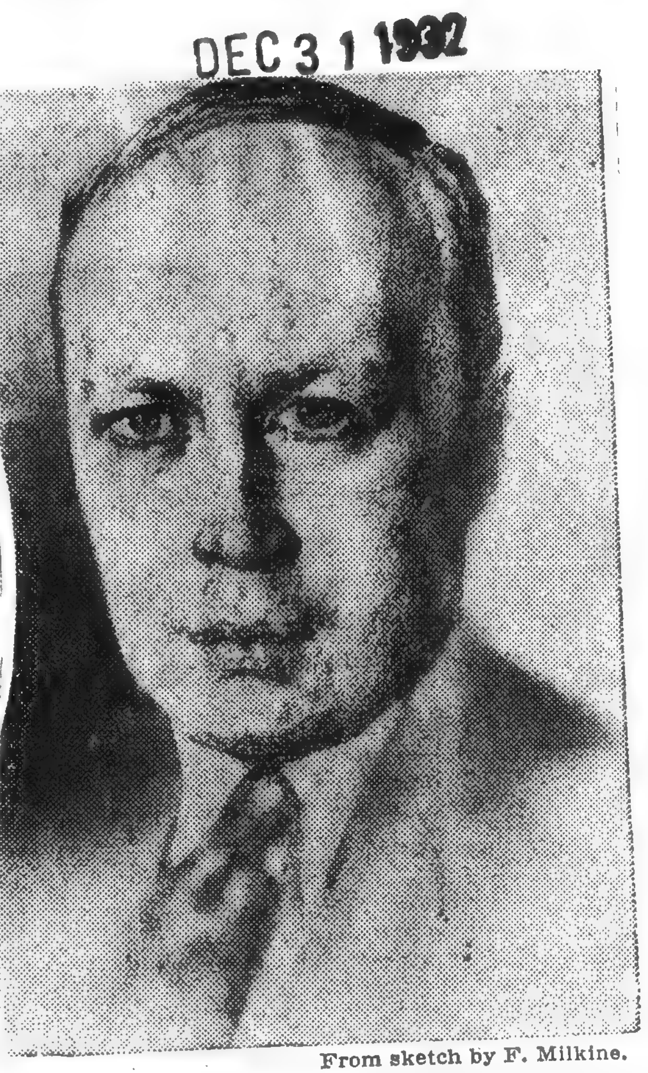
Two forepieces preceded the high pleasures of the day from symphony and concerto—the arrangements for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli of Preludes of Bach originally contained in an organ-piece and a Partita for Violin alone. They are skilful, modest transcriptions, neither inflating nor distorting the music transcribed. Pick-Mangiagalli is adept with his new medium, sympathetic to his old matter. The brighter texture and swifter movement of the second Prelude make contrast to the graver, suaver first. Dr. Koussevitzky's strings gave both rich, flexible voice. It was pleasure to find two such deserving numbers returned, after two years, to the active repertory. Other "novelties" of the past invite as much.

The manifold powers and glories of the orchestra shone or leapt out of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," which Dr. Koussevitzky uses, like Dr. Muck before him, as occasional after-piece. With the present conductor it may be something more. Russians tell you that behind Rimsky's designing and executing of an exhibitional music was the nostalgia of the North for the South—of cold and snowy Petersburg for warm and green Seville. Hence a mood, almost an emotion, interpenetrating Rimsky's virtuoso-exercise with rhythms, harmonies, timbres. Hence an excuse for its conventional Spanish flavors. Withal a certain fervor, not merely of technical imagination. One hearer liked to fancy that Dr. Koussevitzky, being another Russian and Northerner, so heard and released Rimsky's music—in the two Alboradas in particular, and in the Gypsy Song. For the rest the virtuosi of Symphony Hall doing with equal finesse and gusto every feat set down for them.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

DEC 31 1932



From sketch by F. Milkine.

Sarge Prokofieff, composer-pianist, with Boston Symphony Orchestra next week.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to New York playing in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 5, at 8:45, and Saturday afternoon, January 7, at 2:30. Serge Prokofieff, the composer and pianist, will play the solo part in his new Fifth Pianoforte Concerto at each concert. This piece had its first performances in Europe in October and November, and its first American performances by this orchestra in Boston last week. The concerto is in five short movements.

At the Thursday evening concert Dr. Koussevitzky will also perform two ~~violin~~ Preludes of Bach which have been transcribed for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, the Italian composer. The closing number will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony.

The matinee program, in addition to Prokofieff's Concerto, will consist of Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for String Orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the early British composer. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will complete the program.

Herald

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Prokofieff, composer and pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows: Bach, two preludes (arranged for string orchestra) by Pick-Mangiagalli. Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major, Prokofieff, Piano Concerto, No. 5 G major, op. 55. Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish themes. Prokofieff's concerto was played for the first time in this country.

Would that other transcribers of Bach's music were as discreet musically intelligent as Pick-Mangiagalli! When he set himself to the task he thought more of Bach than of his own glory. Take the Second Prelude played yesterday. In its original form it is the prelude of the third partita for violin solo. Hearing the transcription, one could easily believe that it was by Bach himself, in a state of contrapuntal fury. Strange to say the first prelude in the transcription—originally a prelude for organ—suggested by its serene beauty Handel in a seraphic mood, writing a slow movement for a concerto grosso. Here was no attempt on the part of the transcriber to show what he could do; how he could improve old Bach's music, "modernize" it; nor did the transcriber's reverence turn into the obsequiousness which is compounded of timidity and ignorance. Both preludes were finely played; the former with the requisite tenderness that the walk of each part should be well defined while the relation to the other voices was kept in due proportion; the latter prelude with the appropriate dignity however swift the pace.

We doubt if a Boston audience has ever heard as magnificent performance of Brahms's Third Symphony as that given yesterday by the conductor and the orchestra. The symphony itself is to us the most genial of the four. If one points to the first movement and the introduction to the finale of the first symphony, there is the intensely dramatic first movement of the third for an answer. The two middle movements of this same symphony are full of beauty. And in this symphony as in certain other works of Brahms—notably in the finale of the second piano concerto—there is the refreshing Hungarian influence that enlivens—not to say atones for arid pages; pages not so dry and labored in this symphony as elsewhere in Brahms's music. It would seem as if Brahms found beauty as well as dash, remembering Hungary and its gypsies. While there is a melancholy flavor to the third movement, the music has a peculiar grace and fascination. It is wholly free from the granitic pessimism which at times turns Brahms into a dismal Jemmy in doleful dumps.

Prokofieff's new concerto—it was written in this year—was brought out at Berlin, Oct. 31. It might be characterized as an amusing work, not so amusing that as Hannibal used to say at Yale in the 70's "it would make a man laugh if he were all alone, by himself, with nobody with him, in the woods." It is said by some that this concerto is to be classed with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, but the latter is a pleasingly simple work that at once makes its way. It has already incurred the reproach of popularity from those who shudder at the entrance of "tunes," preferring what they are pleased to call "patterns."

To us the true, the remarkable Prokofieff is the raging composer of the Scythian Suite and "Seven, They Are Seven." Apparently in this concerto he is experimenting—not necessarily with the temper of the audience—yesterday the audience showed every sign of being greatly delighted—but as one attempting to blaze new paths in the forests and jungles of "modernism."

Nor is it easy to understand how Tchaikovsky could have called Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes a "colossal masterpiece of instrumentation." Rimsky had the good sense to say that it was "a brilliant composition for the orchestra." Brilliant it is, but does it reveal what Havelock Ellis found to be the soul of Spain, as Chabrier, Debussy and Ravel found it?

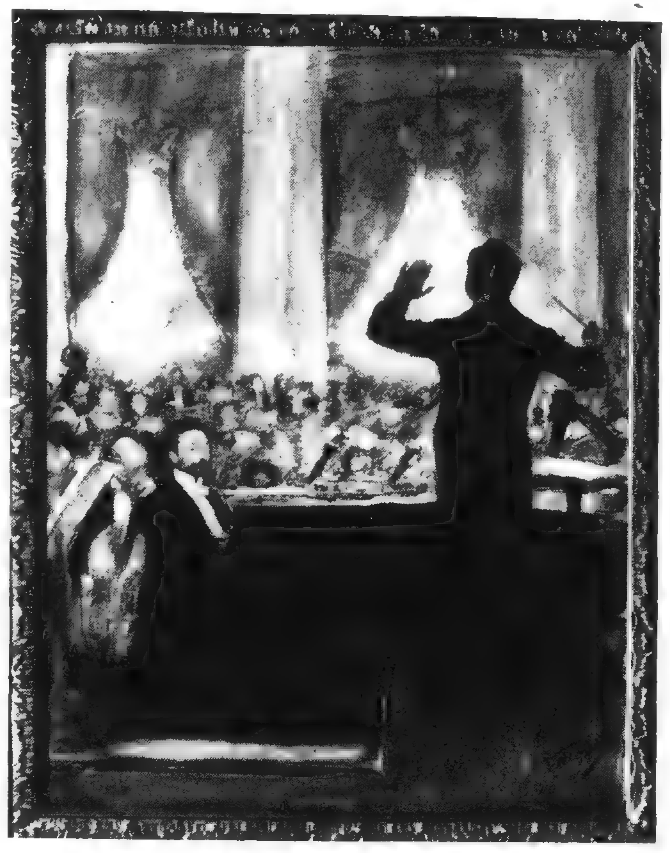
The concert will be repeated tonight. The next pair of concerts will be on Jan. 13-14. Richard Burgin will conduct. His program will be as follows: Vaughan Williams, Pastoral Symphony (first time at these concerts); Mozart, Violin Concerto, D major (K. 218). Chausson, "Poeme" for violin and orchestra. Stravinsky, Suite from "Petrouchka." Albert Spalding will be the soloist.

Dec 31 '32

SOME INTERESTING STUDIES IN THE LIFE OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

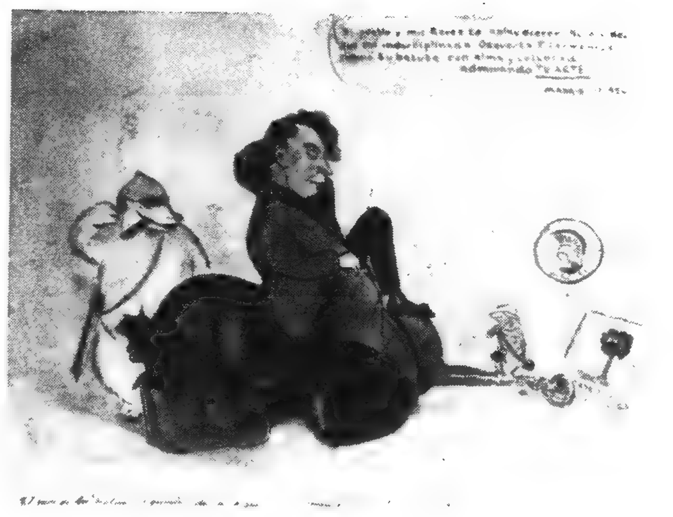
Left: Koussevitzky in 1906 at the time of his tour as double-bass virtuoso.

Right: Photograph of a painting showing Koussevitzky during the early Russian days conducting his orchestra in Moscow in the first performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus." The composer himself is shown playing the piano part, and the Koussevitzky back and shoulders are easily recognized.



Left: A photograph of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brilliant Conductor taken in Paris shortly before coming to America.

Right: A cartoon which appeared in Madrid when Koussevitzky arrived there as guest conductor. Spain is giving him a cordial welcome. You will note his baton, his double-bass, his usual music satchel, and the Russian bear with the double-bass bow.



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
DEC 31 1932

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

THE immortal novelty "that gems the starry girdle of the year" appears to be an opera which burst into a startled world in 1909. The name of it is "Elektra." Casting the customary glance over the record of the dying year, the reviewer is forced to the conclusion that Strauss's work was the most important matter delivered by musicians. This is not a recantation. The writer still questions the validity of "Elektra" as a work of art. But there can be no doubt of its immediate and powerful effect upon an audience. It is what the dramatic experts call "gripping." It was revived by Mr. Gatti-Casazza on December 4. The production brought new glory to the Metropolitan and increased the repute of the principal artists engaged in it.

Let us add that almost as great public excitement was caused by the revival on February 19 of Delibes's once despised opera, "Lakme." The renewed interest may have been due to the revelatory Indian costumes or to the tintinnabulations of Miss Pons's bell song, or both. The reasons for the success of "Lakme" are not in demand of determination. But one stirs uncomfortably under the suspicion that a starved public was ready to hasten with all speed to the saccharine feast. One remembers also how eagerly that same public received the gift of "Simon Boccanegra," graciously revived by Mr. Gatti-Casazza on January 28. Baritone operas used to spell failure. The Metropolitan, however, is blessed with the presence of a baritone who is a star of the screen and the radio. It chances that he is also an artist of the operatic stage and that his pirate doge is an impersonation of worth. But how much thought would have been expended on the question of reviving the old opera had there been no new vocal star to illumine the title role?

The opera has offered other invitations to critical pondering, but the town has urbanely dismissed the matters from its mind. So why try to resurrect them? The significant fact seems to be that, after the long reign of Puccini, the lyric kings who cannot be dethroned are still Wagner and Verdi. The Metropolitan was crowded to the walls on Monday evening last when a holiday army went to a performance of "Aida." There had been no such audience at any previous representation of the season. One noted that the baritone of the evening accomplished a broadcast before rushing to the opera house to appear as the Ethiopian monarch. And "Don Giovanni," another baritone opera, has taken a new lease of life. Can it be that the day of the tenor is declining? Well, to prove that, we must first have the tenor. An hour of Jean de Reszke would settle the question.

* * *

Concert Novelties Remembered.

IN examining the record of the year 1932 this observer was astonished to find how many new compositions had been produced in concert. He had forgotten most of them. This means either that he has a very bad memory or that the music was not memorable. To begin with, there was the Stravinsky violin concerto, anxiously performed by Samuel Dushkin with the Philadelphia Orchestra on January 5. Nothing has evaporated more completely than that labored and uninteresting composition, which Mr. Dushkin played with such effort. We can recall far more clearly the "Organum Quadruplum" of Jean Perotin, sung by the Schola Cantorum on January 20. M. Perotin flourished in the twelfth century and his "Organum" has been revived quite recently. It is much fresher and more grateful to contemporaneous musical taste than tons of the music which the makers of it are endeavoring to persuade us is the really up-to-date thing.

For example, we heard on February 4 Krenek's suite arranged from music written for Goethe's play, "The Triumph of Sensibility." Mr. Krenek is distinctly of this time. He wrote "Jonny spielt auf." There was no triumph for either jazz or sentiment. We do not believe that any of Krenek's music will be revived 600 years after its creation. February and March were fruitful in novelties. One was the second rhapsody of our own George Gershwin, done with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on February 5. It does not measure quite up to its blue predecessor, but it is a pretty good piece of music and surely a growth, not of American soil, but at least of American metropolitan life. Daniel Gregory Mason's second symphony was brought forward by the Philharmonic on February 18, and proved to be the kind of music which should be expected from the academic shades of Morningside Heights. It is a sound, well-built scholarly composition, in which intellectual, rather than emotional, quality is conspicuous.

Malipiero was represented by a new quartet, produced by the London String Quartet on February 28. A good piece of music, which will probably be industriously neglected for several seasons and then revived with a flourish of publicity trumpets.

* * *

Some Good New Music.

OUR own Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode" was revealed to us on March 3 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That famous organization had been in the throes of an anniversary and had cajoled all sorts and conditions of composers to write pieces for the occasion. Mr. Copland's was one of the best results. The work showed the composer's characteristic vigor and confidence, and there was even the flash of imagination. Another item from the Boston collection was put on exhibition on March 6, namely, Hindemith's "Concert Music." This impressed us as a good composition, containing fecund musical ideas and being clear and firmly knit in form.

Adv. Jan. 1

SER—Largest Sunday Circulation in New England

'Art Isn't Mechanical'

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who today writes in the Boston Sunday Advertiser his views on music and his prediction of the musical future. —Boston Sunday Advertiser Photo.

'Radio Passing Fancy,' Koussevitzky's View

Radio, in its present extent at least, is a passing phenomenon.

Art is the product of men's brains and hearts, not of machines.

This is a time for musicians to be optimistic rather than pessimistic.

The noble art of music will not succumb to the machines, but will eventually master them.

Mechanical devices have got people out of the habit of making their own music.

The finest orchestras in the world are right here among you.—(From Serge Koussevitzky's New Year Message).

By SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

The principal idea I would convey is that this is a time for musicians to be optimistic rather than pessimistic. If they have gone through a period of hard times, like those in other walks of life, it is comforting to know that the future is not so black.

There is a special reason for this. The musical profession has suffered greatly from the depression, but it has suffered even more from the invasion of mechanical devices which reproduce music and consequently throw many musicians out of work. At first it was the gramaphone, and now it is the radio. I consider that radio dealt an even severer blow to the art than did the depression.

MAKE LAZY LISTENERS

For besides lessening the opportunities for employment for musicians, these mechanical devices have had other disadvantageous results. They have got the people out of the habit of making their own music, a habit which is essential for the life of an art. Formerly people played or sang. Such performing inevitably leads to closer acquaintance with the art and greater love and appreciation for it. Now the people sit at ease and hear the music filter through their machines. It is an effortless task; the listener is perfectly passive.

Listening to music in the concert hall is, in this respect, far more desirable, for the auditor, by working to listen, is partly indulging in the task of recreating the art. It is my firm conviction that the passive condition engendered by mechanical reproducing instruments must disappear if the future of music is not to be imperilled.

THE GOOD IN RADIO

Mechanical devices have also tended in many instances to create false standards of performance, and thereby to lower public taste. I am speaking not merely of the many bad programs which come over the air, but to the more insidious notion that what you hear from your radio is the same as the actual performance. It is not, and it cannot be. The radio industry has accomplished marvels in conveying and reproducing sound, but it cannot from the nature of things be anything more than a substitute for the real thing.

If radio has brought symphonic music to millions who never heard it previously it has been a wonderful educational factor. But if people are content to stop there, if concert-goers are to accept radio programs in place of actual attendance at concerts, then the harm done is incalculable.

I wish it clearly understood that I am not wholeheartedly condemning mechanical reproducers. I could not do so consistently, for with my orchestra I have made records of various masterpieces for the gramaphone. Last night, indeed, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a series of radio broadcasts nationwide in scope.

But I am convinced that radio is a passing phenomenon. Perhaps the next stage is television, which, when it comes, will be even more revolutionary. But beyond all that lies the real future of music, which is very much like its past in that it depends upon people getting back to their own music-making and to hearing music in its actual setting.

BEST ORCHESTRA HERE

The finest orchestras in the world are right here among you, so superior to the best that Europe has to offer as to be in a different class altogether. It would be a national calamity to allow this superiority to be lost, to allow these marvellous instruments to be destroyed for lack of support.

The reaction will come in music. We can even see at this moment evidence of change. Many who have been awakened by the marvelous radio to the beauties of music are turning to the concert hall where they can hear living music and see it as it is recreated. The great orchestras, which demand such huge sums of money to be kept up, are in difficulties, but many are struggling to maintain them.

Musicians are turning again to their art, to its purer phases. They are making music once more because of their love for it, not merely because they are paid to perform. And soon the general public will reawaken to the truth that art is the product of men's brains and hearts, not of machines.

Try This

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 1 - 1933

Koussevitzky This Week

Boston Symphony Will Give Programs Thursday and Saturday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to New York to play in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening at 8.45 and Saturday afternoon at 2.30. Serge Prokofieff, the composer and pianist, will play the solo part in his new fifth pianoforte concerto at each concert. This piece had its first performances in Europe in October and November, and its first American performances by this orchestra in Boston last week. The concerto is in five short movements.

At the Thursday evening concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will also perform two violin preludes of Sebastian Bach which have been transcribed for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, the Italian composer. The closing number will be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony."

The matinee program, in addition to Prokofieff's concerto, will consist of Vaughan Williams' fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the early British composer. Beethoven's seventh symphony will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

JAN 1 - 1933

Serge Prokofieff, Russian composer-pianist, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next Thursday evening ~~and Saturday~~ afternoon in Carnegie Hall and Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, playing his fifth piano concerto, Op. 55, in G major. This work, which is in five short movements, was first played by the Berlin Philharmonic, with the composer as soloist, on October 30, and introduced to America by Dr. Koussevitzky in his Boston concert of last Friday.

Mr. Prokofieff will appear next week as conductor with the Musicians Symphony Orc its concert on Tuesday ary 10, at the Met se, directing woman chestra num-

Mild-n-
's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

DEC 31 1932

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

THE immortal novelty "that gems the starry girdle of the year" appears to be an opera which burst into a startled world in 1909. The name of it is "Elektra." Casting the customary glance over the record of the dying year, the reviewer is forced to the conclusion that Strauss's work was the most important matter delivered by musicians. This is not a recantation. The writer still questions the validity of "Elektra" as a work of art. But there can be no doubt of its immediate and powerful effect upon an audience. It is what the dramatic experts call "gripping." It was revived by Mr. Gatti-Casazza on December 4. The production brought new glory to the Metropolitan and increased the repute of the principal artists engaged in it.

Let us add that almost as great public excitement was caused by the revival on February 19 of Delibes's once despised opera, "Lakme." The renewed interest may have been due to the revelatory Indian costumes or to the tintinnabulations of Miss Pons's bell song, or both. The reasons for the success of "Lakme" are not in demand of determination. But one stirs uncomfortably under the suspicion that a starved public was ready to hasten with all speed to the saccharine feast. One remembers also how eagerly that same public received the gift of "Simon Boccanegra," graciously revived by Mr. Gatti-Casazza on January 28. Baritone operas used to spell failure. The Metropolitan, however, is blessed with the presence of a baritone who is a star of the screen and the radio. It chances that he is also an artist of the operatic stage and that his pirate doge is an impersonation of worth. But how much thought would have been expended on the question of reviving the old opera had there been no new vocal star to illumine the title role?

The opera has offered other invitations to critical pondering, but the town has urbanely dismissed the matters from its mind. So why try to resurrect them? The significant fact seems to be that, after the long reign of Puccini, the lyric kings who cannot be dethroned are still Wagner and Verdi. The Metropolitan was crowded to the walls on Monday evening last when a holiday army went to a performance of "Aida." There had been no such audience at any previous representation of the season. One noted that the baritone of the evening accomplished a broadcast before rushing to the opera house to appear as the Ethiopian monarch. And "Don Giovanni," another baritone opera, has taken a new lease of life. Can it be that the day of the tenor is declining? Well, to prove that, we must first have the tenor. An hour of Jean de Reszke would settle the question.

* * *

Concert Novelties Remembered.

IN examining the record of the year 1932 this observer was astonished to find how many new compositions had been produced in concert. He had forgotten most of them. This means either that he has a very bad memory or that the music was not memorable. To begin with, there was the Stravinsky violin concerto, anxiously performed by Samuel Dushkin with the Philadelphia Orchestra on January 5. Nothing has evaporated more completely than that labored and uninteresting composition, which Mr. Dushkin played with such effort. We can recall far more clearly the "Organum Quadruplum" of Jean Perotin, sung by the Schola Cantorum on January 20. M. Perotin flourished in the twelfth century and his "Organum" has been revived quite recently. It is much fresher and more grateful to contemporaneous musical taste than tons of the music which the makers of it are endeavoring to persuade us is the really up-to-date thing.

For example, we heard on February 4 Krenek's suite arranged from music written for Goethe's play, "The Triumph of Sensibility." Mr. Krenek is distinctly of this time. He wrote "Jonny spielt auf." There was no triumph for either jazz or sentiment. We do not believe that any of Krenek's music will be revived 600 years after its creation. February and March were fruitful in novelties. One was the second rhapsody of our own George Gershwin, done with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on February 5. It does not measure quite up to its blue predecessor, but it is a pretty good piece of music and surely a growth, not of American soil, but at least of American metropolitan life. Daniel Gregory Mason's second symphony was brought forward by the Philharmonic on February 18, and proved to be the kind of music which should be expected from the academic shades of Morningside Heights. It is a sound, well-built scholarly composition, in which intellectual, rather than emotional, quality is conspicuous.

Malipiero was represented by a new quartet, produced by the London String Quartet on February 28. A good piece of music, which will probably be industriously neglected for several seasons and then revived with a flourish of publicity trumpets.

* * *

Some Good New Music.

OUR own Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode" was revealed to us on March 3 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That famous organization had been in the throes of an anniversary and had cajoled all sorts and conditions of composers to write pieces for the occasion. Mr. Copland's was one of the best results. The work showed the composer's characteristic vigor and confidence, and there was even the flash of imagination. Another item from the Boston collection was put on exhibition on March 6, namely, Hindemith's "Concert Music." This impressed us as a good composition, containing fecund musical ideas and being clear and firmly knit in form.

Adv. Jan. 1

SER—Largest Sunday Circulation in New Englan

'Art Isn't Mechanical'

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who today writes in the Boston Sunday Advertiser his views on music and his prediction of the musical future. —Boston Sunday Advertiser Photo.

'RadioPassingFancy,' Koussevitzky's View

Radio, in its present extent at least, is a passing phenomenon.

Art is the product of men's brains and hearts, not of machines.

This is a time for musicians to be optimistic rather than pessimistic.

The noble art of music will not succumb to the machines, but will eventually master them.

Mechanical devices have got people out of the habit of making their own music.

The finest orchestras in the world are right here among you.—(From Serge Koussevitzky's New Year Message).

By SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

The principal idea I would convey is that this is a time for musicians to be optimistic rather than pessimistic. If they have gone through a period of hard times, like those in other walks of life, it is comforting to know that the future is not so black.

There is a special reason for this. The musical profession has suffered greatly from the depression, but it has suffered even more from the invasion of mechanical devices which reproduce music and consequently throw many musicians out of work. At first it was the gramaphone, and now it is the radio. I consider that radio dealt an even severer blow to the art than did the depression.

MAKE LAZY LISTENERS

For besides lessening the opportunities for employment for musicians, these mechanical devices have had other disadvantageous results. They have got the people out of the habit of making their own music, a habit which is essential for the life of an art. Formerly people played or sang. Such performing inevitably leads to closer acquaintance with the art and greater love and appreciation for it. Now the people sit at ease and hear the music filter through their machines. It is an effortless task; the listener is perfectly passive.

Listening to music in the concert hall is, in this respect, far more desirable, for the auditor, by working to listen, is partly indulging in the task of recreating the art. It is my firm conviction that the passive condition engendered by mechanical reproducing instruments must disappear if the future of music is not to be imperilled.

THE GOOD IN RADIO

Mechanical devices have also tended in many instances to create false standards of performance, and thereby to lower public taste. I am speaking not merely of the many bad programs which come over the air, but to the more insidious notion that what you hear from your radio is the same as the actual performance. It is not, and it cannot be. The radio industry has accomplished marvels in conveying and reproducing sound, but it cannot from the nature of things be anything more than a substitute for the real thing.

If radio has brought symphonic music to millions who never heard it previously it has been a wonderful educational factor. But if people are content to stop there, if concert-goers are to accept radio programs in place of actual attendance at concerts, then the harm done is incalculable.

I wish it clearly understood that I am not wholeheartedly condemning mechanical reproducers. I could not do so consistently, for with my orchestra I have made records of various masterpieces for the gramaphone. Last night, indeed, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a series of radio broadcasts nationwide in scope.

But I am convinced that radio is a passing phenomenon. Perhaps the next stage is television, which, when it comes, will be even more revolutionary. But beyond all that lies the real future of music, which is very much like its past in that it depends upon people getting back to their own music-making and to hearing music in its actual setting.

BEST ORCHESTRA HERE

The finest orchestras in the world are right here among you, so superior to the best that Europe has to offer as to be in a different class altogether. It would be a national calamity to allow this superiority to be lost, to allow these marvellous instruments to be destroyed for lack of support.

The reaction will come in music. We can even see at this moment evidence of change. Many who have been awakened by the marvelous radio to the beauties of music are turning to the concert hall where they can hear living music and see it as it is recreated. The great orchestras, which demand such huge sums of money to be kept up, are in difficulties, but many are struggling to maintain them.

Musicians are turning again to their art, to its purer phases. They are making music once more because of their love for it, not merely because they are paid to perform. And soon the general public will reawaken to the truth that art is the product of men's brains and hearts, not of machines.

Tru This

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 1 - 1933

Koussevitzky This Week

Boston Symphony Will Give Programs Thursday and Saturday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to New York to play in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening at 8.45 and Saturday afternoon at 2.30. Serge Prokofieff, the composer and pianist, will play the solo part in his new fifth pianoforte concerto at each concert. This piece had its first performances in Europe in October and November, and its first American performances by this orchestra in Boston last week. The concerto is in five short movements.

At the Thursday evening concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will also perform two violin preludes of Sebastian Bach which have been transcribed for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, the Italian composer. The closing number will be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony."

The matinee program, in addition to Prokofieff's concerto, will consist of Vaughan Williams' fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the early British composer. Beethoven's seventh symphony will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

JAN 1 - 1933

Serge Prokofieff, Russian composer-pianist, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next Thursday evening ~~and Sa~~turday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, playing his fifth piano concerto, Op. 55, in G major. This work, which is in five short movements, was first played by the Berlin Philharmonic, with the composer as soloist, on October 30, and introduced to America by Dr. Koussevitzky in his Boston concert of last Friday.

Mr. Prokofieff will appear next week as conductor with the Musicians Symphony Orc its concert of Tuesday ary 10, at the Met ise, directing woman

chestra
num-
Mild-n-r's

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

JAN 1 - 1933

Themes and Variations

By LINTON MARTIN

THE withdrawal of the New York Philharmonic [illegible] from the Philadelphia [illegible] for the first time [illegible] city will be deprived [illegible] the orchestra making [illegible] remarkable as it [illegible] hearing the bad news [illegible] hope [illegible] concerts given by the famous New York [illegible] that this development [illegible] temporary and that the [illegible] constant [illegible] experience has proved that [illegible] activities [illegible] withdrawal of the New York Philharmonic [illegible] concerts [illegible] soundly created [illegible] measurable [illegible] conductor [illegible]

WHETHER [illegible] Mr. Stokowski [illegible] question raised [illegible] Symphony's [illegible] inexorable [illegible] concerts of the New York [illegible] Toscanini [illegible]

[illegible] Stokowski conduct his [illegible] excerpts and "Death and Transfiguration," as well as the piano soloist in the Hindemith concerto without budging from their own living rooms.

Vanishing Visitors

OF COURSE it is as impossible to wave away or ignore modern marvels of scientific progress as to argue with the law of gravitation. But the important part played in present-day existence by radio may explain to some extent what has become of the audiences that at times past were able to support not merely one symphonic season in this city, but additional series by several regularly visiting orchestras. How else account for the paradox presented by the fact that, while population has steadily increased, audiences that once crowded the Academy for concerts by various outside orchestras have vanished? First the Boston Symphony, for many years a regular visitor here, took its departure from our musical life. Then the concerts of the New York Symphony were canceled when that organization was absorbed and combined with the New York Philharmonic. But now our sole surviving symphonic visitor follows the procession, and deserts us also. Where, how and why have audiences that attended all their concerts here apparenty evaporated?

It is possible to find reasons that serve as surface explanations for some of these developments. It is notorious that the Boston Symphony became slack and disorganized, dropping from its proud position in a single season when the amiable but unauthoritative Henri Rabaud succeeded Karl Muck as [illegible]

[illegible]

THE [illegible] conductors [illegible] is the part of the personality on the podium [illegible] orchestral [illegible] is indispensable. Probably [illegible] himself did not [illegible] his observation [illegible] it is an [illegible] tional experience [illegible] son here.

It is [illegible] conductors [illegible] New York [illegible] appeared as [illegible] the Philadelphia Orchestra. Among them have been Willem Mengelberg, Sir Thomas Beecham, Fritz Reiner and Bernardino Molinari. Even so their visits have afforded opportunity to note the different results obtained from different orchestras, and it is obvious that the greater the number of concerts has been the greater the variety, likewise of compositions included in the course of a season.

The high cost of touring, and a field for more concerts in New York are the reasons officially given by Arthur Judson, manager, for abandoning Philadelphia after this season. All dates outside of New York have been given up, he points out, so there is no special discrimination against Philadelphia. That may be poor consolation, but a more substantial and reassuring one is that while Stokowski continues to conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra there need be no fear of the stagnation that all too often results under a monopolistic regime and without the impetus of contrast and competition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

[illegible] 1 - 1933

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

Some Comments on Critic Henderson's Castigation for His Failure to Surround Koussevitsky With Trailing Clouds of Adjectives

[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

Boston on the Air

[illegible]

POTTSVILLE, PA.
MORNING PAPER

JAN [illegible]

READING CONCERT SEASON CLOSED WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

[illegible] Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who [illegible] better known through Europe than in [illegible] country;

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

JAN 1 - 1933

Themes and Variations

By LINTON MARTIN

THE withdrawal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra from the Philadelphia symphonic scene next season means that for the first time in many years—more than a generation, in fact—this city will be deprived of the musical ministrations of any great outside orchestra making regular visits here. The situation is, or will be, as remarkable as it is regrettable. Although the official announcement bearing the bad news is made with flat-footed finality, and holds no hope for any future resumption of a regular series of concerts here by the famous New York band, it is earnestly to be hoped that this development, undoubtedly due to the depression, will be but temporary, and that the suspended visits will be resumed at a not-too-distant day, when general conditions have possibly improved.

Experience has proved that variety and contrast stimulate interest generally in activities that are similar in scope and character. The withdrawal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony from Philadelphia does not necessarily mean that the subscription list it has enjoyed here will be diverted to the Philadelphia Orchestra season. Indeed, the concerts of each orchestra have undoubtedly promoted patronage for the other, for a healthy appetite for symphonic offerings, once soundly created, is an incurable and constantly increasing taste, a treasurable and indestructible lifelong possession. Hearing one famous conductor present some certain symphony creates a desire to hear what new and different meaning some other dominant and highly individual director will find in the same work.

* * *

WHETHER music lovers who attend orchestra concerts in this city are Stokowski-minded rather than symphony-minded is a question raised by the termination of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony's trips to our town. Otherwise it is difficult to explain the inexcusable neglect and poor attendance which has marked the concerts of the New York orchestra under such distinguished conductors as Toscanini, Mengelberg, Furtwaengler and Walter, in sharp and striking contrast to the capacity crowds at the Philadelphia Orchestra's Friday afternoon concerts under Stokowski, and at the Saturday and Monday night offerings also, until the depression somewhat depleted audiences on those occasions because of highly abnormal conditions by no means representative of the real tastes of the public.

In view of the indifferent interest shown in the concerts of the New York orchestra, and economic pressure having the powerful force that it does exercise in art, the management is hardly to be blamed for its decision. The blame must rest squarely upon the poor patronage extended here, as compared with the huge houses that turn out for the concerts given by the Philadelphia Orchestra during its seasonal trips to New York. That attendance, too, is another evidence of the prodigious personal popularity and prestige of Leopold Stokowski outside of the city that primarily claims his conducting.

* * *

Stokowski has been charged, in various quarters, particularly by certain New York commentators, with resorting to unmusical means for the sake of a thrill—with highlighting and underscoring sedate and sometimes soporific "classics," applying rouge, lipstick and mascara to the features of the poor old things until their own fathers would hardly know them. Toscanini's symphonic slogan has been, in effect, "the music of the masters as the composers meant it to be played." The public, of course, has the privilege of deciding which and what it prefers. If it displays a human weakness for emotional excitement above pure austerity in art, on some occasions, it does so with the unanswerable argument of patronage.

Music of the Week

TODAY

Musicale. Art Alliance. 4.00 P. M.

TUESDAY

"Aida," by Metropolitan Opera Association. Academy. 8.00 P. M.

Matinee Musical Club. Bellevue-Stratford. 2.30 P. M.

WEDNESDAY

Philadelphia Chamber String Simfonietta. Bellevue-Stratford. 8.30 P. M.

Fortnightly Club. Academy. 8.15 P. M.

THURSDAY

Harry Blank, lieder recital. Plays and Players. 8.30 P. M.

FRIDAY

Philadelphia Orchestra. Academy. 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY

Philadelphia Orchestra. Academy. 8.20 P. M.

Reckoning With Radio

HOW influential a factor radio is in public attendance at symphony concerts is a speculative matter, but one that undeniably plays a part, and an important part. Stokowski has told the writer that he firmly believes broadcasting concerts augments attendance. In its immediate application it is certainly a profitable auxiliary source of revenue, and, in times such as these, a persuasively important and powerful one. Certainly the radio has brought symphony concerts to thousands, indeed, to millions, who otherwise would not and could not hear them. It has made an open book for them of what otherwise would have remained an impenetrable musical mystery, undoubtedly creating a love for great music.

At the same time, however, it is a question how many music lovers wish or are able to take the time and spend the money to attend the subsequent public performance of a program they already may have heard broadcast earlier on Sunday afternoon. The Sunday afternoon broadcasts of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra concerts during the entire symphony season are a boon and a benefaction to an enormous number of music lovers, who can hear them comfortably and without expense in slippered ease at home. But subsequent public performance becomes largely a matter of gratifying curiosity about the personal appearance of the artists engaged. It becomes a question how many music lovers are sufficiently interested in seeing how Toscanini and other conductors wave their arms and command their orchestras, how they walk on and off the stage, whether this personal observation is worth the price of a ticket and the time and trouble of going to the hall.

The broadcast concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra are more limited in number and so are on a somewhat different footing. But some Saturday night subscribers have told the writer how delighted they were that they could avoid exposure to the wild weather on that snowy night of Saturday, December 17, let their tickets go to waste, and still hear Stokowski conduct his "Siegfried" excerpts and "Death and Transfiguration," as well as the piano soloist in the Hindemith concerto, without budging from their own living rooms.

Vanishing Visitors

OF COURSE it is as impossible to wave away or ignore modern marvels of scientific progress as to argue with the law of gravitation. But the important part played in present-day existence by radio may explain to some extent what has become of the audiences that in times past were able to support not merely one symphonic season in this city, but additional series by several regularly visiting orchestras. How else account for the paradox presented by the fact that, while population has steadily increased, audiences that once crowded the Academy for concerts by various outside orchestras have vanished? First the Boston Symphony, for many years a regular visitor here, took its departure from our musical life. Then the concerts of the New York Symphony were canceled when that organization was absorbed and combined with the New York Philharmonic. But now our sole surviving symphonic visitor follows the procession, and deserts us also. Where, how and why have audiences that attended all their concerts here apparenty evaporated?

It is possible to find reasons that serve as surface explanations for some of these developments. It is notorious that the Boston Symphony became slack and disorganized, dropping from its proud position in a single season when the amiable but unauthoritative Henri Rabaud succeeded Karl Muck as one of the musical woes of the war, and interest subsided correspondingly. The extinction of the New York Symphony left audiences for that series no alternative but to go elsewhere, although it promptly became possible for them to hear the venerable Walter Damrosch not merely conduct via radio, but talk as well. In the case of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, it has been charged, and not without reason, that the programs of Toscanini and certain of his associate conductors have not been as interesting as possible, that some, in fact, have been deadly dull. And on the score of performance, the recent presentation here of the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony by the New York band under Issay Dobrowen, who will soon be with the Philadelphia Orchestra as "guest" for seven weeks, suffered fatally through the comparison it inevitably challenged with Stokowski's famous and electrifying offerings of the same symphony.

If the public is to be chided for insularity, indifference and an inhospitable attitude toward visiting symphony orchestras in this city, at least there are two sides to the story. There may be a lesson for everybody in the present situation.

Symphonic Sophistry

THE remark, generally credited to Richard Strauss, that "there are no orchestras, only conductors," is of course something of a symphonic sophistry. Important as is the place of the personality on the podium, orchestral excellence is indispensable. Probably Strauss himself did not mean his observation to be taken too literally. At the same time, it is the conductor who admittedly gives constantly fresh zest to immutable masterpieces, and it is an invaluable artistic and emotional experience to hear as many greatly gifted composers as possible. That is another loss we suffer in the withdrawal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, for Philadelphia becomes automatically and inevitably that much more limited in the opportunities offered for contact with conductors during the season here.

It is true that some of the conductors who have appeared with the New York orchestra have also appeared as "guests" with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Among them have been Willem Mengelberg, Sir Thomas Beecham, Fritz Reiner and Bernardino Molinari. Even so, their visits have afforded opportunity to note the different results obtained from different orchestras, and it is obvious that the greater the number of concerts has been, the greater the variety, likewise, of compositions included in the course of a season.

The high cost of touring, and a field for more concerts in New York are the reasons officially given by Arthur Judson, manager, for abandoning Philadelphia after this season. All dates outside of New York have been given up, he points out, so there is no special discrimination against Philadelphia. That may be poor consolation, but a more substantial and reassuring one is that while Stokowski continues to conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra there need be no fear of the stagnation that all too often results under a monopolistic regime and without the impetus of contrast and competition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 1 - 1933

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

Some Comments on Critic Henderson's Castigation for His Failure to Surround Koussevitsky With Trailing Clouds of Adjectives

It now appears that no less a personage than W. J. Henderson, than whom there is no more able music critic and estimator in the entire world, is in hot water because he referred to Koussevitzky as a "competent conductor." Upon his head, therefore, is heaped all possible contumely and obloquy for those two unfortunate words. Never mind the countless times he has lauded the said Koussevitzky to the skies. Forgotten are the many occasions on which he has raised his voice in praise of the distinguished leader and of his interpretations. It appears that somewhere he failed to attach the numerous complimentary adjestives with which the eminent batonist is usually adorned.

This brings up an important question —Is it not about time to have done with the indiscriminate and often ill-advised praise of whoever stands out in front of the prosceninm arch and either executes appropriate gymnastics or really guides his forces through the mazes of more or less well-known music? Do we not visit absurd and fulsome praise upon a director when it is the orchestra, and above all the worth of the composition itself, which should have the praise? There have been times when said conductor has not conducted and the concertmeister or "assistant conductor" has been director. At such times did the orchestra find itself in the ditch, were there any particular shortcomings in the interpretations? Did the presentations suffer from any particularly grievous faults and did one have to feel burning shame for what seemed to be a poor performance?

The answer to all of these important questions is a robustious and emphatic No! On the contrary, there have been occasions when a substitute conductor seemed to do much better with his forces than the usual director. Particulars, together with names, dates, pages and measures of the orchestral score, may be had upon private or public request. Departures from orchestral excellence may sometimes be charged to the fact that the men do not offer the substitute conductor the attention and artistic support that he deserved. Instead of putting their very best efforts into the work in hand, the men sometimes allow themselves to be overcome by a musical lassitude which has an immediate effect upon the music, very much to the detriment of the performance and to the substitute conductor who, finding himself suddenly in a position of unusual responsibility, tries his utmost to make the performance an artistic success and in a measure fails because the men under him are not imbued with high artistic ideals.

True Musicians and Others

The true musician is one who does his very best at all times, who finds no detail or occasion too small for conscientious attention and interpretation, who feels the spirit speak to him as truly and sincerely in a music shed or in the woods as in a concert hall crowded with the nobility and the gentry, and who summons his most luscious tones in praise of the Most High whether it be in his practice chamber or in a gilded mosque. Because of the fine habits of a lifetime, such a man could not depart from high musical and artistic ideals. There are but few descriptive appellations suitable to those who would not render an assistant or substitute conductor their very best efforts and those do not look well in print. Yet men have been known who were low and cruel enough to really try to throw the show, and attempt to confuse a substitute conductor by false entrances and ill-timed phrases.

Within two weeks, the incomparable Toscanini gave a reading of Beethoven's third symphony. In 50 years of concert-going this writer has never heard the "Funeral March" taken at such a slow tempo or the "allegro vivace" so moderately and so deliberately played. Now there is no reason to become excited or alarmed over what is obviously an unusual interpretation. It does not necessarily mean that the great musician is slipping or that his art has forsaken him. If, however, there are too many such differences between the conductor's personal views and the composer's express commands as laid down in the score, or if they are too long continued, it is certain that those who know about music will be sure to publicly voice their opinions and their reasons therefor.

Behind the Scenes

There is much that might be said about the "inside tracks" of music, much that might be told by those behind the scenes—of times when orchestra instruments failed completely in their entrance in familiar classics, of pianists who went wool-gathering in their concertos and returned to the continuity only by a very slender thread, of conductors who frequently take an adagio like a brisk andante and of string quartets who take but little stock in the directions for performance laid down in the score by the composer. Or of eminent pianists who played the light whirring "spinning song" of Mendelssohn like horses ploughing through a stubbly field, or Debussy's flashing "goldfish" more like the thrashing of whales, and so on through many programs which were not exactly helped by technical errors or inadequacies.

However, these are to be considered rare occasions and such departures from musical orthdoxy are unusual and entirely unworthy of editorial comment or unfavorable criticism. They are, however, an offence to music and the more perfect the artist or organization the less often they may happen. When they occur too often, it will be plenty of time for public censure. It is a fine commentary on the natural charity and kindliness of music critics that attention is not directed more frequently to these matters and affairs. And so we find that the greatest of musicians are those who commit the fewest of these errors, whose technique serves them well at all times, in the hours of musical plain sailing and in the days of trouble.

Perhaps there will some time be a day of reckoning when the "Yes guy" will change his affability for the mein of the stern judge and mete out his measure of comment after the manner of the good old text, "Now it can be told." In the meanwhile, it will be the ardent effort of most reviewers to give the greatest praise where one can, to pass gently over the rough places and perhaps receive the everlasting gratitude of those who know how they have been spared and how badly they might have fared had the reviewer not been brought up on the Golden Rule or had he known less of the matter in hand.

The story has been told of an inexperienced reporter who when first brought face to face with an organ console was quite overcome by so many ivory stop tablets and push buttons and speedily rushed into print with the astounding news: "This organ has a million stops and cost two million dollars." One also recalls the story of the trombone player who, when instructed to play the overture to "William Tell," excitedly stated, "My goodness gracious! I have just played that." The cautious critic will leave the discovery of such situations to the gentle reader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

Boston on the Air

When hard times came and rich men were no longer able to help support symphony orchestras, more than one U. S. orchestra was saved by radio. Several orchestras have been helped by commercial sponsors. Columbia Broadcasting System has the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra as sustaining features. But National Broadcasting Co. has not felt like paying a major orchestra's price until last week, when it signed up the Boston Symphony for ten Saturday night concerts beginning New Year's Eve. The fee was not disclosed but the Boston Symphony badly needs whatever it can get. Boston's band has never been offered a sizeable radio contract before. To help meet this season's deficit, which without N. B. C.'s help would have run to some $93,000, Conductor Sergei Koussevitsky and his non-union orchestra (only one in the U. S.) lately offered to turn back $46,000 from their salaries.

POTTSVILLE, PA.
MORNING PAPER
8 JAN 3 1 1933

READING CONCERT SEASON CLOSED WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

The greatest musical season Reading has ever had was brought to a brilliant close Monday evening under the efficient management of Geo. D. Haage, with the initial appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Mr. Haage has been untiringly spreading the gospel of music for 25 years, and, as a celebration of this anniversary, has given his patrons an almost unequaled array of talent, comprising as it did, Rosa Ponselle, who is generally acknowledged the greatest dramatic soprano in the world today; Fritz Kreisler, the mere mention of whose name tells the story of his place as perhaps one of the finest all around musicians in the world—some one has fittingly termed him "Dean of Violinists"; Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who perhaps is better known through Europe than in his own country; Vladimir Horowitz, an especially brilliant pianist, and the Boston Symphony with its personnel of 110 men and Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. One could never hope to hear such a marvelous combination of concerts again outside the large musical centers, but Reading is rapidly becoming known for its increasing interest and appreciation of the best in all the various branches of art. Mr. Haage's belief in music has been justified by the enthusiastic support given him by patrons who come from a radius of 40 miles to enjoy these evenings.

While Mr. Haage has been fortunate in the past to number the Cleveland Orchestra as an outstanding feature of his course, he is to be especially congratulated in obtaining the Boston Symphony for this season. The Cleveland Orchestra, under Sokoloff, will be remembered as having played here in Pottsville some years past with Robert Braun as soloist. This orchestra has always delighted its audiences, but the renewed life that has been creeping into the Boston organization in the last half dozen years is rapidly bringing it back to its original high standard, when it was the only real orchestra in the country. With Dr. Karl Muck as conductor no other orchestra could compare with it, and it had the proud distinction of weathering a gratifying comparison with the best organizations of its kind in Europe. However, after Dr. Muck was no longer associated with it, this wonderful reputation sustained interest for a time but gradually faded until the happy arrival of Koussevitzky, who has imparted new life into it and brought it back to its present enviable standing among the splendid orchestras of the country.

With the marvelous background of 110 tried and experienced musicians, and a well balanced program of three masters, plus a vibrant and insatiable artist to lead them in their beautiful pianissimo and stirring fortissimo passages, who could fail to designate this concert as the climax of all the musical activities ever held in Reading?

Koussevitzky was particularly happy in his choice of Bach, Brahms and Wagner on the same program. Starting with the sweet tones of the entire string section in the opening Bach numbers—Two Preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, the first half ended with the Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F. Major, op 90. The latter half of the program was given over to three numbers from the Wagner operas:

From the delicate murmurs and entrancing themes of the Forest Murmurs from Seigfried, through the exquisite and soulful strains of the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," to the thrilling close of the Overture to Tannheuser, the audience seemed to be held spell bound by the inspired rendition of these numbers.

79

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

JAN 1 - 1933

Themes and Variations

By LINTON MARTIN

THE withdrawal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra from the Philadelphia symphonic scene next season means that for the first time in many years—more than a generation, in fact—this city will be deprived of the musical ministrations of any great outside orchestra making regular visits here. The situation is, or will be, as remarkable as it is regrettable. Although the official announcement bearing the bad news is made with flat-footed finality, and holds no hope for any future resumption of a regular series of concerts here by the famous New York band, it is earnestly to be hoped that this development, undoubtedly due to the depression, will be but temporary, and that the suspended visits will be resumed at a not-too-distant day, when general conditions have possibly improved.

Experience has proved that variety and contrast stimulate interest generally in activities that are similar in scope and character. The withdrawal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony from Philadelphia does not necessarily mean that the subscription list it has enjoyed here will be diverted to the Philadelphia Orchestra season. Indeed, the concerts of each orchestra have undoubtedly promoted patronage for the other, for a healthy appetite for symphonic offerings, once soundly created, is an incurable and constantly increasing taste, a treasurable and indestructible lifelong possession. Hearing one famous conductor present some certain symphony creates a desire to hear what new and different meaning some other dominant and highly individual director will find in the same work.

* * *

WHETHER music lovers who attend orchestra concerts in this city are Stokowski-minded rather than symphony-minded is a question raised by the termination of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony's trips to our town. Otherwise it is difficult to explain the inexcusable neglect and poor attendance which has marked the concerts of the New York orchestra under such distinguished conductors as Toscanini, Mengelberg, Furtwaengler and Walter, in sharp and striking contrast to the capacity crowds at the Philadelphia Orchestra's Friday afternoon concerts under Stokowski, and at the Saturday and Monday night offerings also, until the depression somewhat depleted audiences on those occasions because of highly abnormal conditions by no means representative of the real tastes of the public.

In view of the indifferent interest shown in the concerts of the New York orchestra, and economic pressure having the powerful force that it does exercise in art, the management is hardly to be blamed for its decision. The blame must rest squarely upon the poor patronage extended here, as compared with the huge houses that turn out for the concerts given by the Philadelphia Orchestra during its seasonal trips to New York. That attendance, too, is another evidence of the prodigious personal popularity and prestige of Leopold Stokowski outside of the city that primarily claims his conducting.

* * *

Stokowski has been charged, in various quarters, particularly by certain New York commentators, with resorting to unmusical means for the sake of a thrill—with highlighting and underscoring sedate and sometimes soporific "classics," applying rouge, lipstick and mascara to the features of the poor old things until their own fathers would hardly know them. Toscanini's symphonic slogan has been, in effect, "the music of the masters as the composers meant it to be played." The public, of course, has the privilege of deciding which and what it prefers. If it displays a human weakness for emotional excitement above pure austerity in art, on some occasions, it does so with the unanswerable argument of patronage.

Music of the Week

TODAY

Musicale. Art Alliance. 4.00 P. M.

TUESDAY

"Aida," by Metropolitan Opera Association. Academy. 8.00 P. M.

Matinee Musical Club. Bellevue-Stratford. 2.30 P. M.

WEDNESDAY

Philadelphia Chamber String Simfonietta. Bellevue-Stratford. 8.30 P. M.

Fortnightly Club. Academy. 8.15 P. M.

THURSDAY

Harry Blank, lieder recital. Plays and Players. 8.30 P. M.

FRIDAY

Philadelphia Orchestra. Academy. 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY

Philadelphia Orchestra. Academy. 8.20 P. M.

Reckoning With Radio

HOW influential a factor radio is in public attendance at symphony concerts is a speculative matter, but one that undeniably plays a part, and an important part. Stokowski has told the writer that he firmly believes broadcasting concerts augments attendance. In its immediate application it is certainly a profitable auxiliary source of revenue, and, in times such as these, a persuasively important and powerful one. Certainly the radio has brought symphony concerts to thousands, indeed, to millions, who otherwise would not and could not hear them. It has made an open book for them of what otherwise would have remained an impenetrable musical mystery, undoubtedly creating a love for great music.

At the same time, however, it is a question how many music lovers wish or are able to take the time and spend the money to attend the subsequent public performance of a program they already may have heard broadcast earlier on Sunday afternoon. The Sunday afternoon broadcasts of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra concerts during the entire symphony season are a boon and a benefaction to an enormous number of music lovers, who can hear them comfortably and without expense in slippered ease at home. But subsequent public performance becomes largely a matter of gratifying curiosity about the personal appearance of the artists engaged. It becomes a question how many music lovers are sufficiently interested in seeing how Toscanini and other conductors wave their arms and command their orchestras, how they walk on and off the stage, whether this personal observation is worth the price of a ticket and the time and trouble of going to the hall.

The broadcast concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra are more limited in number and so are on a somewhat different footing. But some Saturday night subscribers have told the writer how delighted they were that they could avoid exposure to the wild weather on that snowy night of Saturday, December 17, let their tickets go to waste, and still hear Stokowski conduct his "Siegfried" excerpts and "Death and Transfiguration," as well as the piano soloist in the Hindemith concerto, without budging from their own living rooms.

Vanishing Visitors

OF COURSE it is as impossible to wave away or ignore modern marvels of scientific progress as to argue with the law of gravitation. But the important part played in present-day existence by radio may explain to some extent what has become of the audiences that in times past were able to support not merely one symphonic season in this city, but additional series by several regularly visiting orchestras. How else account for the paradox presented by the fact that, while population has steadily increased, audiences that once crowded the Academy for concerts by various outside orchestras have vanished? First the Boston Symphony, for many years a regular visitor here, took its departure from our musical life. Then the concerts of the New York Symphony were canceled when that organization was absorbed and combined with the New York Philharmonic. But now our sole surviving symphonic visitor follows the procession, and deserts us also. Where, how, and why have audiences that attended all their concerts here apparenty evaporated?

It is possible to find reasons that serve as surface explanations for some of these developments. It is notorious that the Boston Symphony became slack and disorganized, dropping from its proud position in a single season when the amiable but unauthoritative Henri abaud succeeded Karl Muck as one of the musical woes of the war, and interest subsided correspondingly. The extinction of the New York Symphony left audiences for that series no alternative but to go elsewhere, although it promptly became possible for them to hear the venerable Walter Damrosch not merely conduct via radio, but talk as well. In the case of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, it has been charged, and not without reason, that the programs of Toscanini and certain of his associate conductors have not been as interesting as possible, that some, in fact, have been deadly dull. And on the score of performance, the recent presentation here of the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony by the New York band under Issay Dobrowen, who will soon be with the Philadelphia Orchestra as "guest" for seven weeks, suffered fatally through the comparison it inevitably challenged with Stokowski's famous and electrifying offerings of the same symphony.

If the public is to be chided for insularity, indifference and an inhospitable attitude toward visiting symphony orchestras in this city, at least there are two sides to the story. There may be a lesson for everybody in the present situation.

Symphonic Sophistry

THE remark, generally credited to Richard Strauss, that "there are no orchestras, only conductors," is of course something of a symphonic sophistry. Important as is the place of the personality on the podium, orchestral excellence is indispensable. Probably Strauss himself did not mean his observation to be taken too literally. At the same time, it is the conductor who admittedly gives constantly fresh zest to immutable masterpieces, and it is an invaluable artistic and emotional experience to hear as many greatly gifted composers as possible. That is another loss we suffer in the withdrawal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, for Philadelphia becomes automatically and inevitably that much more limited in the opportunities offered for contact with conductors during the season here.

It is true that some of the conductors who have appeared with the New York orchestra have also appeared as "guests" with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Among them have been Willem Mengelberg, Sir Thomas Beecham, Fritz Reiner and Bernardino Molinari. Even so, their visits have afforded opportunity to note the different results obtained from different orchestras, and it is obvious that the greater the number of concerts has been, the greater the variety, likewise, of compositions included in the course of a season.

The high cost of touring, and a field for more concerts in New York are the reasons officially given by Arthur Judson, manager, for abandoning Philadelphia after this season. All dates outside of New York have been given up, he points out, so there is no special discrimination against Philadelphia. That may be poor consolation, but a more substantial and reassuring one is that while Stokowski continues to conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra there need be no fear of the stagnation that all too often results under a monopolistic regime and without the impetus of contrast and competition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 1 - 1933

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

Some Comments on Critic Henderson's Castigation for His Failure to Surround Koussevitsky With Trailing Clouds of Adjectives

It now appears that no less a personage than W. J. Henderson, than whom there is no more able music critic and estimator in the entire world, is in hot water because he referred to Koussevitsky as a "competent conductor." Upon his head, therefore, is heaped all possible contumely and obloquy for those two unfortunate words. Never mind the countless times he has lauded the said Koussevitzsky to the skies. Forgotten are the many occasions on which he has raised his voice in praise of the distinguished leader and of his interpretations. It appears that somewhere he failed to attach the numerous complimentary adjestives with which the eminent batonist is usually adorned.

This brings up an important question—Is it not about time to have done with the indiscriminate and often ill-advised praise of whoever stands out in front of the prosceninm arch and either executes appropriate gymnastics or really guides his forces through the mazes of more or less well-known music? Do we not visit absurd and fulsome praise upon a director when it is the orchestra, and above all the worth of the composition itself, which should have the praise? There have been times when said conductor has not conducted and the concertmeister or "assistant conductor" has been director. At such times did the orchestra find itself in the ditch, were there any particular shortcomings in the interpretations? Did the presentations suffer from any particularly grievous faults and did one have to feel burning shame for what seemed to be a poor performance?

The answer to all of these important questions is a robustious and emphatic No! On the contrary, there have been occasions when a substitute conductor seemed to do much better with his forces than the usual director. Particulars, together with names, dates, pages and measures of the orchestral score, may be had upon private or public request. Departures from orchestral excellence may sometimes be charged to the fact that the men do not offer the substitute conductor the attention and artistic support that he deserved. Instead of putting their very best efforts into the work in hand, the men sometimes allow themselves to be overcome by a musical lassitude which has an immediate effect upon the music, very much to the detriment of the performance and to the substitute conductor who, finding himself suddenly in a position of unusual responsibility, tries his utmost to make the performance an artistic success and in a measure fails because the men under him are not imbued with high artistic ideals.

True Musicians and Others

The true musician is one who does his very best at all times, who finds no detail or occasion too small for conscientious attention and interpretation, who feels the spirit speak to him as truly and sincerely in a music shed or in the woods as in a concert hall crowded with the nobility and the gentry, and who summons his most luscious tones in praise of the Most High whether it be in his practice chamber or in a gilded mosque. Because of the fine habits of a lifetime, such a man could not depart from high musical and artistic ideals. There are but few descriptive appellations suitable to those who would not render an assistant or substitute conductor their very best efforts and those do not look well in print. Yet men have been known who were low and cruel enough to really try to throw the show, and attempt to confuse a substitute conductor by false entrances and ill-timed phrases.

Within two weeks, the incomparable Toscanini gave a reading of Beethoven's third symphony. In 50 years of concert-going this writer has never heard the "Funeral March" taken at such a slow tempo or the "allegro vivace" so moderately and so deliberately played. Now there is no reason to become excited or alarmed over what is obviously an unusual interpretation. It does not necessarily mean that the great musician is slipping or that his art has forsaken him. If, however, there are too many such differences between the conductor's personal views and the composer's express commands as laid down in the score, or if they are too long continued, it is certain that those who know about music will be sure to publicly voice their opinions and their reasons therefor.

Behind the Scenes

There is much that might be said about the "inside tracks" of music, much that might be told by those behind the scenes—of times when orchestra instruments failed completely in their entrance in familiar classics, of pianists who went wool-gathering in their concertos and returned to the continuity only by a very slender thread, of conductors who frequently take an adagio like a brisk andante and of string quartets who take but little stock in the directions for performance laid down in the score by the composer. Or of eminent pianists who played the light whirring "spinning song" of Mendelssohn like horses ploughing through a stubbly field, or Debussy's flashing "goldfish" more like the thrashing of whales, and so on through many programs which were not exactly helped by technical errors or inadequacies.

However, these are to be considered rare occasions and such departures from musical orthdoxy are unusual and entirely unworthy of editorial comment or unfavorable criticism. They are, however, an offence to music and the more perfect the artist or organization the less often they may happen. When they occur too often, it will be plenty of time for public censure. It is a fine commentary on the natural charity and kindliness of music critics that attention is not directed more frequently to these matters and affairs. And so we find that the greatest of musicians are those who commit the fewest of these errors, whose technique serves them well at all times, in the hours of musical plain sailing and in the days of trouble.

Perhaps there will some time be a day of reckoning when the "Yes guy" will change his affability for the mein of the stern judge and mete out his measure of comment after the manner of the good old text, "Now it can be told." In the meanwhile, it will be the ardent effort of most reviewers to give the greatest praise where one can, to pass gently over the rough places and perhaps receive the everlasting gratitude of those who know how they have been spared and how badly they might have fared had the reviewer not been brought up on the Golden Rule or had he known less of the matter in hand.

The story has been told of an inexperienced reporter who when first brought face to face with an organ console was quite overcome by so many ivory stop tablets and push buttons and speedily rushed into print with the astounding news: "This organ has a million stops and cost two million dollars." One also recalls the story of the trombone player who, when instructed to play the overture to "William Tell," excitedly stated, "My goodness gracious! I have just played that." The cautious critic will leave the discovery of such situations to the gentle reader.

POTTSVILLE, PA.
MORNING PAPER

8 JAN 31 1933

READING CONCERT SEASON CLOSED WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

The greatest musical season Reading has ever had was brought to a brilliant close Monday evening under the efficient management of Geo. D. Haage, with the initial appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Mr. Haage has been untiringly spreading the gospel of music for 25 years, and, as a celebration of this anniversary, has given his patrons an almost unequaled array of talent, comprising as it did, Rosa Ponselle, who is generally acknowledged the greatest dramatic soprano in the world today; Fritz Kreisler, the mere mention of whose name tells the story of his place as perhaps one of the finest all around musicians in the world—some one has fittingly termed him "Dean of Violinists"; Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who perhaps is better known through Europe than in his own country; Vladimir Horowitz, an especially brilliant pianist, and the Boston Symphony with its personnel of 110 men and Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. One could never hope to hear such a marvelous combination of concerts again outside the large musical centers, but Reading is rapidly becoming known for its increasing interest and appreciation of the best in all the various branches of art. Mr. Haage's belief in music has been justified by the enthusiastic support given him by patrons who come from a radius of 40 miles to enjoy these evenings.

While Mr. Haage has been fortunate in the past to number the Cleveland Orchestra as an outstanding feature of his course, he is to be especially congratulated in obtaining the Boston Symphony for this season. The Cleveland Orchestra, under Sokoloff, will be remembered as having played here in Pottsville some years past with Robert Braun as soloist. This orchestra has always delighted its audiences, but the renewed life that has been creeping into the Boston organization in the last half dozen years is rapidly bringing it back to its original high standard, when it was the only real orchestra in the country. With Dr. Karl Muck as conductor no other orchestra could compare with it, and it had the proud distinction of weathering a gratifying comparison with the best organizations of its kind in Europe. However, after Dr. Muck was no longer associated with it, this wonderful reputation sustained interest for a time but gradually faded until the happy arrival of Koussevitzky, who has imparted new life into it and brought it back to its present enviable standing among the splendid orchestras of the country.

With the marvelous background of 110 tried and experienced musicians, and a well balanced program of three masters, plus a vibrant and insatiable artist to lead them in their beautiful pianissimo and stirring fortissimo passages, who could fail to designate this concert as the climax of all the musical activities ever held in Reading?

Koussevitzky was particularly happy in his choice of Bach, Brahms and Wagner on the same program. Starting with the sweet tones of the entire string section in the opening Bach numbers—Two Preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, the first half ended with the Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F. Major, op 90. The latter half of the program was given over to three numbers from the Wagner operas:

From the delicate murmurs and entrancing themes of the Forest Murmurs from Seigfried, through the exquisite and soulful strains of the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," to the thrilling close of the Overture to Tannhauser, the audience seemed to be held spellbound by the inspired rendition of these numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

JAN 2 - 1933

Boston on the Air

When hard times came and rich men were no longer able to help support symphony orchestras, more than one U. S. orchestra was saved by radio. Several orchestras have been helped by commercial sponsors. Columbia Broadcasting System has the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra as sustaining features. But National Broadcasting Co. has not felt like paying a major orchestra's price until last week, when it signed up the Boston Symphony for ten Saturday night concerts beginning New Year's Eve. The fee was not disclosed but the Boston Symphony badly needs whatever it can get. Boston's band has never been offered a sizeable radio contract before. To help meet this season's deficit, which without N. B. C.'s help would have run to some $93,000, Conductor Sergei Koussevitsky and his non-union orchestra (only one in the U. S.) lately offered to turn back $46,000 from their salaries.

80

Concert-Chronicle

Trans — Jan 3

Retrospect—Saturday

THE intervening holidays, one on top of another, permit only a word of retrospect as to the week-end concerts. . . . At the Symphony Concert of Saturday, the Third Symphony of Brahms, piece and performance, again engrossed and stirred the audience. Nor was it less warm than the company of Friday in applause for Mr. Prokofiev as composer and pianist through his new Piano-Concerto. From beginning to end, alike on stage and in auditorium, the whole concert might hardly have proceeded more fortunately. . . . For the first time in some years it was broadcast; by report from both Boston and New York, as clearly and effectively as such transmission goes; while for a few moments at intermission Dr. Koussevitzky pleased the radio audience by addressing it—happily not his custom with the more sophisticated assembly at Symphony Hall.

Needless to say symphonic music broadcast is less than the equivalent of symphonic music heard in the concert-hall. The balance of tone from the several choirs is altered, however skilfully the controls are manipulated. The finer textures of the music are not always distinct to the ear; while there are measures especially in pieces of today, that resist the microphone. Needless also to say, the exhilarating atmosphere of Symphony Hall on a Saturday evening is lacking. Nevertheless such broadcasts give pleasure to many who otherwise might be deprived altogether of symphonic music; but they are no substitute for that music heard by the immediate ear. An exuberant contemporary declared editorially that "a large part of the nation would be turning toward Symphony Hall." Since the extent of "the nation" is one hundred twenty millions and the number of those interested in symphonic music may hardly exceed half a million—it is usually estimated at many less—the more substantial fraction hardly bears cool scrutiny. It is also a trifle difficult to see how these listeners over the air could be "in spirit within Symphony Hall" —a concert-room quite unknown to most of them in general and in its particular aspects on a symphonic Saturday. This, dear brethren, is an age of deflation.

Retrospect—Sunday

The student public is no small part of Wagner's audience in Boston. Last Sunday the Christmas holidays had dispersed it. Though it was lacking, nearly twenty-five hundred listeners flocked to Symphony Hall to hear orchestral and vocal fragments from his operas. The orchestral excerpts, save, possibly, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," were all repertory pieces. The Narrative from "Lohengrin" and the Prize-Song from "Die Meistersinger"—Mr. Althouse's tenor numbers—were no less familiar. Allow for the response to Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra of those who would hear them at concerts for its Pension Fund. There remains a substantial audience to which Wagner is persistent magnet. If in the concert-hall he assembles it, what might he not do in his true seat, the opera house? What indeed, has he not done there in the more recent visits of the Chicago Company? Had the fates been favorable the Metropolitan Company would have brought specimens of its Wagner to Boston in March. Once more the bystander was ready to believe that could that venture have passed the guarantee fund, the response of the public at the box-office would have equalled the largest expectation.

Though Dr. Koussevitzky seldom invites Wagner from opera house into concert-hall, he ripens steadily as Wagnerian conductor. Once more his version of the Prelude and the Closing Scene of "Tristan" joined clarity to intensity; proportion to eloquence. Again the Death-Music for Siegfried (in which he has long excelled) rang with the sonorities of a hero-life and memory. For once he took the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" neither over-fast nor over-loud; but measured and clarified its upswelling course. Only in the Venusberg Music from the Paris "Tannhäuser" did he hasten and blur through the revels of the beginning. . . . As for Mr. Althouse, in range and in quality of voice, in clearness and pithiness of diction, in command of Wagnerian phrase and accent, of color and style, he excelled many a German tenor to whom Chicago or New York has pointed with pride. Yet only last season did Chicago call him; while in the opera house New York has never given him ear.

Incidents and Prospects

On Thursday, Friday and Saturday next the Symphony Orchestra will continue its concerts in New York and Brooklyn. At all three Mr. Prokofiev will be composer-pianist in his new Concerto. In New York on Thursday the two Preludes from Bach, heard here last week, will precede it. Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will follow it. On Saturday, Vaughan Williams's "Tallis Fantasia" will begin the concert; and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony end it.

Le Temps, the Parisian newspaper to which Monsieur Florent Schmitt contributes reviews of concerts, reports the "great success" in Boston of his "Symphonie Concertante" and announces a performance of the piece in the spring from the Paris Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux.

Reviewing the ended year in the concert-hall, Mr. Henderson of The Sun cites Mr. Copland's "Symphonic Ode," Mr. Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody" and Hindemith's "Concert-Musik" as new pieces to be praised and remembered from Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. Yet not one of the three fared too well in its "home-city." H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

JAN 4 - 1933

Boston Programs.

There will be no regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston this week, as the orchestra is to play in Brooklyn and New York. To both of these places Serge Prokofieff will accompany the orchestra and play the piano part in his new concerto for that instrument and orchestra.

At the regular concerts in Boston next week the concert master, Richard Burgin, will conduct the programs, Dr. Koussevitsky taking his customary brief holiday. Solo artist will be Albert Spalding, violinist, whose playing was so much enjoyed in his appearance in a community concert here last season. He will be heard in the Mozart Concerto in D major. . .

The first broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra last Saturday evening was greatly appreciated, the music, with the possible exception of the piano, coming over the air with excellent effect. The Wagner program on Sunday afternoon for the pension fund brought out some of the finest qualities of the orchestra and revealed the ability of the conductor

---

Music

Monit Jan 4

Tuesday Symphony

For the second program in his series of Tuesday afternoon classes in adult musical education, given yesterday in Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky had selected the following orchestral masterpieces: Handel, Concerto Grosso in D minor, op. 6, No. 10; Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Schubert, Symphony in C major.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the top of its form, played superlatively. The performance of the Handel was particularly eloquent. For Mozart the conductor employed a reduced orchestra, built up on the basis of six doublebasses. This enhanced the values of the score, which, except for a tendency to meticulousness in the first movement, was finely articulated.

The audience, which was large, nevertheless left some seats vacant; which seems a pity, since this series offers an unsurpassable realization of the history of symphonic music.

L. A. S.

MUSIC

Globe Jan 4

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky pursued his plan of making a practical demonstration of the development of symphonic music, at the second Tuesday afternoon supplementary concert by the Boston Symphony yesterday. He therefore selected specimens from the 18th and early 19th century literature: a Handel Concerto Grosso in D minor; Mozart's great G Minor Symphony, and Schubert's C major Symphony, No. 7.

Handel's D minor Concerto Grosso, the 10th in the series, known as Op 6, has received more performances at Symphony Hall, according to record, than any other of the 12. Dr Koussevitzky has placed it upon a number of his programs. This is a music in which he seemingly delights to exhibit the technical precision and tonal euphony of his superb string choirs, and a music which benefits by his mettlesome and lambent interpretation. It was so played yesterday and the beauty of the performance stifled an obstinate suspicion that the work is not free of dull pages.

Schubert's Symphony has lived for more than 100 years. This is doubtless sufficient guarantee of its inherent worth, generally speaking. Yet it does seem that the sporadic outbursts of genius, which characterize it, are separated by stretches of slighter merit, which, had they been written by one of lesser fame than Schubert, might have been called commonplace. This especially refers to the many repetitions and sequences. And when this Symphony is placed beside the G minor Symphony of Mozart, it appears to suffer by comparison. Schubert's work lacks the cohesion, the clearness of purpose and the direct expression of Mozart. Mozart was 32 when he wrote his Symphony, Schubert but one year younger when he composed his.

Dr Koussevitzky read Mozart becomingly, but his performance of Schubert was a triumph of interpretive genius. The febrile ardors of the latter took on a greater fire, and the arid measures were heightened in proportion.

The next concert of this series will be played Feb 7. C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 5 - 1933

Noted Leaders For NBC

Well-Known Conductors to Wield Batons on Winter's Programs.

Names of distinguished conductors who will direct orchestras heard over National Broadcasting Company networks this Winter have been announced by M. H. Aylesworth, NBC president.

The list of those who will wield their batons before NBC microphones includes Serge Koussevitzky, whose Boston Symphony Orchestra is presenting a series of ten Saturday programs; Alfred Hertz and Bernardino Molinari and the San Francisco Symphony, Walter Damrosch, Issay Dobrowen of the New York Philharmonic, Fritz Reiner of the Curtis Institute and Philadelphia Opera, Hans Kindler of the Washington National Symphony, Nicolai Sokoloff of the Cleveland Symphony, Artur Bodanzky and Tullio Serafin, Metropolitan Opera conductors; Guy Frazer Harrison and the Rochester Philharmonic; Leopold Stokowski, Frank Black, director of NBC musical programs, and Cesare Sodero.

Those who will conduct the NBC Symphony Orchestra in a special series of Wednesday evening concerts at 9.00 p. m., over the NBC-WEAF network, are Dobrowen, Reiner, Kindler and Sokoloff, while Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Orchestra each Saturday evening at 8.15 p. m., over the NBC-WJZ network. Bodanzky and Serafin direct Metropolitan Opera performances heard Saturday afternoons over the NBC-WJZ network. Damrosch leads the nationwide symphony classes for schoolchildren and adults every Friday morning, and the others perform at regular periods during the week.

Koussevitzky, who never before has directed the Boston Orchestra in a radio series, broadcast the first of the Saturday evening concerts on December 31 from Symphony Hall, Boston. The distinguished Russian conductor, who has held his present post since 1924, arranged a special program for the first broadcast, which included a piano concerto played by Serge Prokofieff.

Ten of these concerts will be broadcast, and speciail equipment has been installed in Symphony Hall for the programs, including huge parabolic microphones which maintain the true tonal balance of the orchestra.

The Wednesday evening series offers listeners a most unusual opportunity to hear a wide variety of symphonic concerts broadcast under the batons of the leading conductors now directing the finest orchestras in the country.

In addition to these special concerts, Dr. Walter Damrosch, Frank Black, Cesare Sodero and others will continue their regular NBC symphony programs throughout the Winter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

JAN 6 - 1933

Music

The Boston Orchestra Plays; 'Tristan' at the Opera

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Carnegie Hall last night under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, and with the assistance of Serge Prokofiew as soloist. Mr. Prokofiew played in his own fifth concerto for piano and orchestra, which was heard for the first time locally. The purely orchestral numbers on the program were Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangements of two Bach preludes, which Mr. Koussewitsky introduced here a season or two ago, and Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony.

Prokofiew's concerto will be featured on the program of the Boston Orchestra's Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music tonight, and further comment on it will be made in this column tomorrow.

* * *

At the opera house, a second performance this season of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" held the attention of a large audience through the four hours required for its unfolding. The protagonists were represented by Gertrude Kappel and Gustaaf de Loor. Miss Branzell, recovered from her recent illness, was the Brangaena, Mr. Schorr the Kurwenal, and Mr. Hofmann the Marke. The opera was given under the direction of Artur Bodansky.

N. Y. AMERICAN

JAN 6 - 1933

PROKOFIEFF HEARD IN NEW OPUS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

New works, when they are by the once-radical Serge Prokofieff, Russian composer, march quickly across the musical continents. His latest piano concerto, No. 5 (opus 55), had its European premiere last October; made its initial American bow in Boston a week ago, and received its first New York performance last evening. The occasion was the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The composer played the solo part. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

In the program annotations Prokofieff is quoted as saying about his new concerto:

"All my work is founded on melodies...The emphasis in this concerto is entirely on the melodic. There are five movements and each movement contains at least four themes or melodies. The developments of these themes are exceedingly compact and concise. This will be evident when I tell you that the entire five movements do not take over twenty minutes in performance."

Some of us might quarrel with Mr. Prokofieff's conception of a melody, and consider his themes more in the nature of rhythmic motifs. At any rate they are terse, need no spyglass for their discovery, and serve adequately for the fleeting, mobile, and skeletonized treatment given them by the composer. He keeps his piano and orchestra in almost perpetual and scurrying motion, mostly choppy and percussive, but not without many whimsical and witty quirks and twists. All the movements have abrupt surprise endings. There is no flowing lyricism except for a brief period in the fourth part, and even then the listener gets the impression that Mr. Prokofieff's muse was not stirred by emotion, but, rather, was resting before taking up the speedy, hurtling, crackling matter of the finale.

The total effect is that of a cynical, unsensuous kind of music-making, somewhat macabre and with the hard glitter of polished steel. It leaves the auditor a bit breathless, somewhat amused and totally unmoved.

Mr. Prokofieff played his work as though the piano part is difficult, but he tossed it off with dash, brilliancy and amazing rhythmic verve and precision. The orchestra did its work well on the whole, but not without an occasional suggestion of scrambling. The applause was encouraging, but hardly enthusiastic.

The rest of the program offered two preludes by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli; and the "Fantastic Symphony," by the Frenchman, Hector Berlioz.

In these days, when nearly every composer is trying to show Bach how he should have written and arranged his works, it is only natural that some of the adaptations are clever and others not so good. Pick-Mangiagalli's versions belong to the former class. The audience liked them and they were played excellently.

Berlioz's "Fantastic" is about 100 years old. Dear, dear, how time flies! It seems only a few decades ago when there was still animated argument about the orchestral realism of "Hector of the flaming locks." Then came Richard Strauss and his orchestral orgies, and suddenly Berlioz's scores sounded like symphonic pap in spite of the opium dreams, the whirling witches and the march to the scaffold, in the truly phantasmagorial hodge podge of the "Fantastic Symphony."

It is, however, a composition worth hearing occasionally (and Koussevitzky tellingly presents all its imagery and passion) if only, like last night, to see how far a 1933 composer like Prokofieff has strayed from the kind of music which in 1932 stirred frenzied enthusiasm (to quote Tiersot).

"In pale, long-haired youths ...with strange, fierce countenances, curled mustaches, Merovingian hair...extravagant doublets, velvet-faced coats thrown back on the shoulders ...the women dressed in the height of the prevailing fashion, with coiffures a la giraffe, high shell combs, shoulder-of-mutton sleeves and short petticoats that revealed buskins."

We have changed our dress fashions since then no less radically than our tastes in music.

THIS CLIPPING FRC
NEW YORK MIRROR

JAN 6 - 1933

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

AMUSING VAPIDITIES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m. Soloist, Serge Prokofieff, pianist.

THE PROGRAM.

Two Preludes (arranged for string orchestra, by Pick-Mangiagalli)	Bach
Piano concerto No. 5 in G, Opus 55	Prokofieff
Symphonie Fantastique (C major, Opus 14A)	Berlioz

The third episode of an orchestral festival which has occupied Carnegie Hall this week attracted the regular subscription audience of the Boston band to that musical shrine last night. It was the first concert of the second pair in the New York series. The point at issue was a fifth piano concerto by Serge Prokofieff, with the composer blazing a forthright trail at the piano.

I suppose that to mention modern music is to call forth a category in which the pleasant platitudes of melodic sentiment are abhorred. Such, indeed, is the realm encircling Mr. Prokofieff and his kind. Until now, I had supposed Mr. Prokofieff to have nurtured a saving grace of mockery, thereby averting the common fault of taking this neo-dissonance too seriously. In this quality of ironic dispute lay the one idea that has pervaded his music.

And now we hear Mr. Prokofieff again, lapsing into a fatal literacy, amusing yet vacuous, clever but brittle and sometimes sadly obvious. The larghetto seemed to me the most promising of all, reverting somewhat to a classic mood, sincere and at times almost beautiful.

The Bach was truly magnificent, although the orchestration struck me as too sophisticated for the austere devotion that is Bach. I could spare the Berlioz for many moons.

Sometimes the god of perversity thumbs his nose, having nothing better to do at the moment. One of the doormen, for instance, who has kept many an ardent music-lover from his heart's desire inside, found himself locked out last night and had to thump right smartly on the glass to arouse a dawdling critic to let him in. Ah, well!

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

(8)

JAN 5 - 1933

Boston Leader

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Noted Conductor of the Boston Symphony Now Heard Over NBC Networks In Its First Radio Series

Boston, Jan. 4.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, oldest organization of its kind in the United States, has just started its first series of radio concerts, over National Broadcasting Company networks.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor now directs the orchestra each Saturday evening at 8:15 p. m., over a WJZ network, for the benefit of radio listeners. The regular performances are broadcast from Symphony Hall.

The new series has been described in music circles as radio's greatest

NEW YORK JOURNAL

JAN 6 - 1933

Music

Prokofieff's New Atonalities Nothing to Cause Alarm

By Irving Weil

Serge Koussevitzky, bringing the Boston Orchestra to Carnegie Hall last night, was the third conductor in as many evenings to present some new music. Mr. Koussevitzky, however, also brought the composer with him, the same being that tall, long-armed Russian, Serge Prokofieff who, as pianist, took part in his new concerto, the fifth to his credit.

Before going right into a discussion of Mr. Prokofieff's latest concerto, we feel that some sort of grateful expression is due Mr. Koussevitzky as a sane, sensible and thoughtful program-maker. The previous two evenings at Carnegie Hall, one with the Philadelphia Orchestra and the other with the Philharmonic, gave one the impression that conductors generally have come to devise their programs on the grab-bag principle and that this matter that was once really a musical and psychological art, has come to be a lost one.

Both previous conductors had placed all their new music at the very end of their evenings, so that what needed most concentration could only be met by tired brains on the part of an audience. psychologically, of course, this is simply all wrong although, for one reason or another, it may be more suitable to a conductor's convenience. Even if this new music had been worth giving any profound consideration to—which it wasn't—nobody would have been in fit mental condition to do it.

Mr. Koussevitzky who, by the way, plays more unfamiliar music in the course of a season than any other two conductors together, and still never gluts a single program with it, began his evening yesterday with two preludes of Bach, decently and reverently transcribed for strings and not loaded down with a full orchestral instrumentation. The transcriber was Ricardo Pick-Mangiagalli. Then Mr. Prokofieff promptly came along and played his piano concerto. The second half of the evening was given over to a remarkably dramatic performance of the Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony.

Mr. Prokofieff, in this Fifth Concerto, has abandoned the rules of the form as set by Mozart with considerable modern thoroughness, although there is still a kind of remote relationship discernible. There are five brief movements, instead of the customary three, and all save one of them are brittle with a crackling staccato utterance on the part of the solo instrument. The orchestra also provides its modernist background, which sometimes, but rarely, becomes foreground, but this is not an ultra-dissonant Prokofieff. He has now swung into his 40s, and his atonalities and polytonalities still follow the fashion, but they are nothing to become alarmed over.

The concerto is really "sassy" music, brashing its way through all its effrontery in a total of about 20 minutes. Actually, it is the most superficial sort of stuff in the world and is made of as commonplace melodic material as may well be imagined. But, except for the larghetto, it moves so briskly and its ingredients are flaunted so cleverly at the listener that it becomes really amusing. Moreover, it takes a virtuoso of the first rank to play the piano part and Mr. Prokofieff was all of that.

Music Today

Metropolitan Opera, "L'Elisir d'Amore," with Nina Morgana, Tito Schipa, Giuseppe De Luca and Ezio Pinza, 8:30 p. m.

Philharmonic Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting and acting as piano soloist, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m.

George Copeland, foremost American piano specialist in Spanish music, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

JAN 6 - 1933

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Newest of Prokofieff's Piano Concertos Introduced by Boston Symphony With Composer at the Keyboard

SCHUMANN wrote one piano concerto, Grieg one, Chopin two, Brahms two, Liszt two, and Tchaikovsky three. Beethoven wrote five. Serge Prokofieff, who will be forty-three years old next April, also has written five. But Mozart, who died at thirty-five, had time to get on paper between twenty and thirty such works. Mr. Prokofieff played his own fifth (G major, opus 55), for the first time in New York, as soloist of the Boston Symphony last night and was quoted in the program notes to the effect that when he began the composition of this particular work he had ready for use a sufficient supply of themes for three concertos. Perhaps there will be more. His habit, it was explained, is to stock up melodic material in a notebook. "I usually have accumulated enough themes to make half-a-dozen symphonies." So there would seem to be further possibilities in that direction, also.

As the composer described his new work, the emphasis is entirely melodic. There are five movements and each movement contains at least three or four themes or melodies. So compact and concise is the development of these themes that the entire concerto does not run over twenty minutes. There is no program. No use is made of the sonata form, though the first movement is avowed to be in the spirit of that form and to fulfill its functions. One movement is marchlike but the composer "would not think of calling it a march because it has none of the vulgarity or commonness which is so often associated with the idea of a march and which actually exists in most popular marches." That the work has difficulties both for the orchestra and the pianist is tactfully admitted in the course of this illuminative exegesis; also that the third movement is one of much technical brilliance.

MR. PROKOFIEFF described his music so well that other comment seems rather superfluous. His modesty, however, restrained him from pointing out that it is clearly expressive of his prosilient musical personality and sounds most unmistakably like its predecessors. It has plenty of "go." The orchestra is the big flywheel, the piano the piston. The results are not so much harsh as merely mechanistic. The second movement, the one that should be termed marchlike rather than a march, has something of the same droll character as the familiar marchlike excerpt from Mr. Prokofieff's fairy-tale opera; usually but perhaps not quite fairly styled the March from "The Love for the Three Oranges." All is vigorously percussive, highly geared as to rhythms, and, as played last night, open and above board as to dynamics. Some softening there was for the Larghetto. Zestful of spirit, the beginning was con brio; the middle con fuoco and the conclusion vivo. The piano writing was precise and clearly defined. So was Mr. Prokofieff's playing of it. The orchestral scoring had the same outspoken quality, including a part for drum. The concerto interested the audience and so did the composer, who was recalled to the platform several times. Additions of this kind to the repertory of orchestral soloists are not common. Still, it seems unlikely that the composer and his offspring will be soon parted.

Mr. Koussevitzky's other numbers were two conservative transcriptions of Bach Preludes by Pick-Mangiagalli, which he has played here before; and the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, given a performance altogether in the spirit of the work, with much nicely calculated and admirably achieved detail along the way—a considerable way for those not altogether convinced that this is one of the more richly inspired masterpieces of symphonic literature. The conductor was in the vein, with orchestra and audience responsive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 6 - 1933

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Koussevitzky Gives Prokofieff's Concerto for First Time Here With Composer as Solo Pianist.

By OLIN DOWNES.

An electrical performance of Serge Prokofieff's fifth piano concerto, with the composer as solo pianist, made the novelty for New York of the concert given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, in Carnegie Hall.

